AN

UNIVERSAL HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earlieſt Account of Time to the Preſent.

COMPILED FROM

ORIGINAL AUTHORS;

And ILLUSTRATED with

MAPS, CUTS, NOTES, Chronological, and other TABLES.

VOL. XVI.

Ιστορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεσθαι μὴ καλαινόει, ἐν αὐταῖς γὰρ ἐυρήσεις ἀκόπως, ἅπερ ἕτεροι συνῆξαν ἐγκόπως. Baſil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

DUBLIN:

Printed for R. OWEN, S. HYDE, G. RISK, J. LEATHLEY, G. and A. EWING, W. SMITH, J. SMITH, P. CRAMPTON, G. FAULKNER, A. BRADLEY, T. MOORE, E. EXSHAW, C. WYNNE, C. CONNOR, O. NELSON, P. WILSON, W. POWELL, I. KELLY, T. BUTLER, and W. BRIEN, Bookſellers.

M DCC XLV.

123

CONTENTS

OF

VOLUME XVI.

FROM the death of Julian to the death of Valens, continued Page 1

From the death of Valens to the diviſion of the empire 27

From the death of Theodoſius the great to the taking of Rome the firſt time by the Goths 116

From the taking of the city by the Goths to the death of Theodoſius II. 185

From the death of Theodoſius II. to the total failure of the Weſtern Empire in Auguſtulus 242

From the diſſolution of the Weſtern Empire to the death of Juſtinian the great 286

From the death of Juſtinian the great, to the depoſing of Irene, and the promotion of Nicephorus 319

From the promotion of Nicephorus to the death of Baſilius II. 377

From the death of Baſilius II. to the taking of Conſtantinople by the Latins 439

From the expulſion of the Greeks to the taking of Conſtantinople by the Turks, and the utter deſtruction of the Roman empire 505

The

CONTENTS.

The history of the Carthaginians 556

SECT. I.

A description of Carthage, and some account of the origin of that city ibid.

SECT. II.

A description of Africa Propria, or the territory of Carthage 571

SECT. III.

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, language, customs, arts, learning and trade of the Carthaginians 674

AN

UNIVERSAL HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earlieſt Account of Time to the Preſent.

CHAP. XXVII.

The Roman Hiſtory, from the death of Julian, to the death of Valens, continued.

THE following year, while Valens was paſſing the winter at Antioch, many of all ranks and conditions were accuſed of attempting to learn, by magical practices, and forbidden arts, the name of the perſon who was to ſucceed Valens in the empire. Some of them owned the crime laid to their charge, and declared, that Theodorus, the emperor's ſecond ſecretary, was the man whom the ſtars ſeemed to have deſtined to the empire. Theodorus was deſcended of an illuſtrious family in Gaul, or, as others will have it, in Sicily, endowed with extraordinary accompliſhments, and in every reſpect worthy of the empire, if he had not had the ambition of aſpiring at it, and endeavouring to raiſe himſelf, by unlawful means, to that high ſtation [c]; for all authors agree, that he was privy to the execrable practiſes of the magicians. Ammianus, who, it ſeems, was then at Antioch, or at leaſt in that neighbourhood, gives us a very particular and diſtinct account of what paſſed on that occaſion, which it would be too tedious to tranſcribe. Theodorus was found guilty, not only of magical practices, which were forbidden on pain of death, but of having conſpired with others to take away the emperor's life; whereupon he was beheaded, as we read in Ammianus [d], whoſe authority authority is of more weight with us than that of Sozomen, who writes, that he was burnt alive [e]. As Theodorus, and the others concerned in this conſpiracy, were pagans, Libanius endeavours to extenuate their crime; nay, he is not aſhamed to tell us, that Theodorus was condemned unjuſtly [f], though both Zoſimus [g] and Ammianus [h] own, that he aſpired at the empire; that by his own letters he was convicted of treaſon; and that the emperor narrowly eſcaped being aſſaſſinated. No one would have complained, if only Theodorus and his accomplices had ſuffered; but innumerable innocent perſons were, on that occaſion, inhumanly racked, and afterwards either executed, or ſent into baniſhment: a diligent ſearch was made, not only after thoſe who had been privy to the conſpiracy, but after ſuch as was only ſuſpected of practiſing magic, or uſing magical remedies. Such numbers were daily accuſed and ſeized, that the public priſons could no longer contain them, and few of thoſe who were apprehended, had the good luck to eſcape death or baniſhment. Diogenes, formerly governor of Bithynia, was publicly executed; and Salia, treaſurer of Thrace, fell down dead at the officer's feet who was to examine him, overcome, as was ſuppoſed, by an apprehenſion of the torture he was to undergo [i]. Baſſianus, whom ſome writers ſuppoſe to have been the ſon of Baſianus Cæſar, brother-in-law to Conſtantine the Great [k], was ſaved by the powerful interceſſion of his relations, who were all perſons of great diſtinction; but ſtript of his eſtate, and all his effects. The two brothers Euſebius and Hypatius, brothers-in-law to Conſtantius, who had been conſuls in 359, were accuſed of having aſpired at the empire; and tho' the charge could not be proved, yet they were baniſhed, and condemned to pay a great fine, but ſoon after recalled with great honour [l]. Eutropius, proconſul of Aſia, was accuſed of having been privy to the conſpiracy of Theodorus; but the philoſopher Paſiphilus, who was brought as an evidence againſt him, having ſuffered all the torments cruelty itſelf could invent, without laying any thing to his charge, he was diſmiſſed, but deprived of his employment, which was given to Feſtus the hiſtorian, who diſcharged it for the ſpace of five years with the utmoſt cruelty. Alypius, formerly vicar of Britain, and employed by Julian in rebuilding the temple of Jeruſalem, was accuſed

The conſpiracy of Theodorus.

Who is beheaded.

[c] Ammian. ibid. Sozom. l. vi. c. 35. p. 229. [d] Ammian. p. 389.

Many innocent perſons put to death.

[e] Sozom. p. 694. [f] Liban. vit. p. 69. [g] Zos. p. 743.
[h] Ammian. ibid. [i] Idem. p. 390. [k] Cange Byz. fam.
[l] Ammian. l. xxix. p. 392.

accuſed with his ſon Hierocles, the diſciple of Libanius, as a poiſoner; the father was ſtript of his eſtate, and baniſhed; and the ſon condemned to death, but ſaved, as Ammianus writes, without explaining himſelf any farther, by a favourable accident [m]. But the moſt rigorous enquiries were made after the pagan philoſophers, who were, generally ſpeaking, addicted to the ſtudy of magic. The moſt conſiderable among them were publickly executed, viz. Hilarius, who was burnt alive, Patricius, Andronicus, and Cœranius: Maximus, the famous maſter of Julian, was carried to Antioch to be examined there, and afterwards ſent back to Epheſus, where Feſtus ordered his head to be cut off, tho' he was then ſo ill, that he muſt have ended his life in a few days, without the intervention of the executioner [n]. Zonaras writes, that the philoſopher Iamblichus, by a draught of poiſon, prevented his falling into the emperor's hands [o]. Valens expected and greatly deſired, to find Libanius in the number of the guilty; but nothing was alledged againſt him, though, as to magical practices, he was, as he himſelf owns, not free from all guilt; but as to the conſpiracy of Theodorus, he ſolemnly proteſts, that he was altogether a ſtranger to it [p]. A diligent ſearch was made, not only after magicians, but after all books treating of magic, which, where-ever diſcovered, were committed to the flames, with thoſe in whoſe poſſeſſion they were found. Theſe enquiries extended to all the provinces ſubject to Valens; and from the moſt remote parts were daily brought to Antioch numbers of people to be tried as magicians, becauſe books of magic had been found in their cuſtody. Ammianus tells us, that the officers themſelves, out of ſpite or malice, often conveyed privately among the other writings, ſome charm or inchantment; upon which the perſons, to whom they were ſuppoſed to belong, were immediately ſeized and condemned, and their eſtates confiſcated. Hereupon perſons of all ranks were ſeized with ſuch dread and terror, that they burnt their libraries, leſt, among their other books, any ſhould be found unknown to them, treating of forbidden arts. On this occaſion Feſtus, proconſul of Aſia, diſtinguiſhed himſelf above the other miniſters of the emperor's cruelty, torturing with the utmoſt inhumanity, and putting to death, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition, ſuch as were convicted or only ſuſpected of having uſed any kind of charms or inchantments:

Maximus and other philoſophers put to death

Feſtus practiſes great cruelties in Aſia.

[m] Idem, p. 390. [n] Idem ibid. Eunap. c. 5. p. 88, 89.
[o] Zonar. p. 23. [p] Lib. vit. p. 56, 57.

chantments: he tortured the philoſopher Cœranius till he expired, for no other crime but becauſe in a private letter to his wife he had uſed a proverbial expreſſion, which looked like a charm: he put to death a woman for pretending to cure agues by a charm, tho' ſhe had before been ſent for, with his knowledge and conſent, to cure his own daughter, and had been, as we are told, attended therein with ſucceſs: a young man being obſerved in a public bath to touch the marble with the fingers of both his hands, the one after the other, and then putting them to his breaſt, to repeat the ſeven vowels, which he fancied was a preſent remedy againſt a pain in the ſtomach, Feſtus cauſed him to be immediately ſeized, tortured, and executed [q]. At Antioch, a perſon being accuſed of having written a book of magic, found an opportunity of throwing it into the river before he was apprehended: but this did not ſave him; for though the book could not be produced againſt him, yet he was, after a ſhort hearing, condemned and publicly executed. A few days after, St. Chryſoſtom, who relates this, and was then a youth, going with a companion to viſit a church in the neighbourhood, found the book on the ſtrand: his companion, not knowing what it contained, took it up, and, led by his curioſity, began to read it aloud, when they both perceived it was a book of magic, and at the ſame time obſerved, not without dread and horror, a ſoldier at a ſmall diſtance, ſo that they neither dared tear it, nor throw it again, as they had deſigned at firſt, into the river, leſt the ſoldier ſhould ſuſpect and ſeize them. However, Chryſoſtom's companion concealing the book with great care under his garments, they had both the good luck to eſcape without being ſearched, tho' every ſoldier was impowered to ſearch all he met for books of magic and charms. Had the book been diſcovered, they muſt both have inevitably periſhed; but they found means of throwing it again into the river, without being obſerved [r]. Socrates writes, that an oracle having anſwered thoſe, who came to enquire who ſhould ſucceed Valens, that the firſt part of his name was Theod, the emperor, acquainted with that anſwer, cauſed not only Theodorus to be put to death, but all thoſe whoſe names began with thoſe letters, ſuch as Theodulus, Theodotus, Theodoſius, &c. among theſe was, according to that writer, one Theodoſiolus or Theodoſius, a Spaniſh lord of great diſtinction [s]. Ammianus and Zoſimus give us

St. Chryſoſtom in danger.

[q] Ammian. ibid. [r] Chryſ. in Act. hom. xxxviii. p. 340.
[s] Socr. l. iv. c. 14. p. 229.

us a very minute account of the other cruelties of Valens, without taking the leaſt notice of this, which makes us queſtion the truth of what Socrates writes. Be that as it will, the extraordinary ſeverity which Valens exerted on this occaſion againſt magicians, aruſpices, aſtrologers, and diviners of all denominations, is highly blamed, not only by the pagan, but even by the chriſtian writers [t]. If Valens looked upon magic as a vain imagination, he ought not to have been thus alarmed; if he gave credit to their predictions, he could not, without being inconſiſtent with himſelf, ſtrive to prevent their being accompliſhed: and truly, in ſpite of all his cruelties, he was ſucceeded by Theodoſius, whoſe name began with the letters, which, if Socrates is to be credited, he ſo much dreaded. This fire, to uſe the expreſſion of Libanius [u], continued raging till the emperor was diverted by another, which the Goths kindled three years after in Thrace. This year is likewiſe remarkable for the death of two princes, both treacherouſly murdered by the Romans, viz. of Gabinius, king of the Quadi, in the weſt; and of Paras, king of Armenia, in the eaſt. Of the former we have ſpoken in the reign of Valentinian: as to the latter, he had in ſome degree ſubmitted to the king of Perſia, as we have obſerved above, but afterwards renewed, it ſeems, his alliance with the Romans, and was by them acknowledged king, ſince Ammianus gives him that title; but ſeveral perſons, at the head of whom was count Terentius, having tranſmitted to court diſadvantageous accounts of his conduct and adminiſtration, the emperor ſent for him, as if he deſigned to adviſe with him about the proſecution of the Perſian war. Upon his arrival at Tarſus in Cilicia, he was commanded to wait there till further orders; but being in the mean time informed, that the emperor's deſign was to arreſt him, and ſend another to be king of Armenia in his ſtead, he reſolved to make his eſcape, with the aſſiſtance of three hundred of his own ſubjects, who perſuaded him to it, and privately provided horſes for that purpoſe. They ſet out in the duſk of the evening; but were ſoon purſued and overtaken by a whole legion, ſent on purpoſe to prevent their eſcape. At their approach, Paras faced about, and charged them with ſuch reſolution, that they made more haſte to fly from him, than they had done to overtake him. After this he travelled night and day till he reached the Euphrates, which he paſſed upon barrels joined together, and purſued his journey with extraordinary expedition. But in the mean time the emperor, having notice of his eſcape, diſpatched a thouſand archers, under the command of two principal officers, to bring him back. Theſe being well acquainted with the country, to which Paras was altogether a ſtranger, getting through by-ways before him, divided their forces, and ſeized on two paſſes, three miles diſtant from each other, through one of which they took for granted he would paſs. But being informed of his danger by a traveller, and conducted by him through by-paths and thick woods, he eſcaped the ambuſcade, and got ſafe to his dominions, where he was received with inexpreſſible joy, while the Roman officers, who had long waited for him, were by all derided and ridiculed upon their diſappointment. This incenſed them to ſuch a degree againſt Paras, that, in order to haſten his ruin, they made the credulous emperor believe, that the young prince was a famous magician, and knew how to conſume and waſte by degrees a man's body, though at never ſo great a diſtance. This ſo alarmed the emperor, that though Paras, forgetting the late affront, continued faithful to the Romans, yet his death was reſolved on, and orders ſent to Trajan, who commanded the Roman forces in Armenia, to diſpatch him by private treachery, if he could not by open force. The manner which Trajan choſe to put this baſe and inhuman command in execution, was no leſs baſe and inhuman, than the command itſelf; for he having gained the young prince's confidence, by frequenting his table, and producing counterfeit letters from Valens, filled with the moſt tender expreſſions of kindneſs, prevailed upon him to accept of an entertainment at his houſe. during which he cauſed him to be barbarouſly murdered by a ruffian hired for that purpoſe [w]. The death of Paras gave great uneaſineſs to Sapor, who had hoped to gain him over in the end to his intereſt. He was therefore no ſooner informed of his misfortune, than he diſpatched embaſſadors to Valens with propoſals for an accomodation. The remaining part of this year was ſpent in negotiations, but without ſucceſs, the emperor who was then at the head of a numerous and well diſciplined army, being deſirous of retrieving the glory of the Roman arms, and recovering the provinces given up by the treaty with Jovian. But in the mean time, Thrace being threatened with a general invaſion of the Gothiſh nation, he was obliged to conclude a peace with the Perſians, but upon what terms we know not. The following

Paras, king of Armenia, detained at Tarſus.

He makes his eſcape.

[t] Soz. l. vi. c. 35. p. 694 Socr. l. iv. c. 15. p. 229. [u] Lib. vit. p. 58.

Is treacherouſly murdered.

[w] Ammian. l. xxx. p. 412.—415.

following year, 375, Valens was alarmed by an embaſſy from the Goths, who, being driven out of their own country by the Hunns, deſired leave to ſettle in Thrace. But before we ſpeak of that embaſſy, and the memorable events attending it, we muſt take a curſory view of what happened in the weſt after the death of Valentinian, who, as we have related already, died at Bregetio on the ſeventeenth of November of this year. He left two ſons, viz. Gratian, born in 359, and by his father created emperor on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt 367, and Valentinian born in 371. As Gratian was at a great diſtance from the army when his father died, having been left, as we have obſerved above, at Treves, the great officers of the court, uncertain what ſuch an extraordinary and unexpected accident might produce, eſpecially among the Gauls, who ſerved in the army, and were then ravaging the country of the Quadi beyond the Danube, diſpatched a meſſenger with private intelligence of the emperor's death to Merobaudes their leader, who, thereupon ſent immediately out of the way, purſuant to his inſtructions, count Sebaſtian, an officer greatly beloved by the ſoldiery, and then marched back to the camp at Bregetio. Upon his arrival, it was reſolved in a general council of all the chief officers both civil and military, that Valentinian, the ſecond ſon of the deceaſed emperor, then a child but four or five years old, ſhould be declared emperor. He was therefore ſent for without delay from a village, named Murocincta, about an hundred miles diſtant from Bregetio, and upon his arrival proclaimed emperor with the uſual ſolemnity the ſixth day after the death of his father. This ſtep they took to prevent any ſudden attack from the enemy, or mutiny in the army. They hoped, that Gratian, who was then but ſeventeen years old, and had already given proofs of an extraordinary mild temper, and an uncommon underſtanding, would acquieſce to the motives, which had induced them to prefer his brother to the empire without his knowledge or conſent. Gratian at firſt complained of their taking ſuch an extraordinary ſtep before they had made him privy to it, but immediately confirmed their election, and ever after treated young Valentinian more like his child than his brother [x]. Victor [y] and Zoſimus [z] will have Equitius and Merobaudes to have been the chief authors of this election, which by Rufinus is aſcribed to Probus [a]. Merobaudes

Gratian ſucceeds his father Valentinian

Valentinian II. proclaimed emperor by the officers of the army.

Gratian confirms their election.

[x] Ammian. l. xxx. p. 433, 434. Zos. l. iv. p. 746. Socr. l. iv. c. 31. p. 249. [y] Vict. epit. [z] Zos. ibid. [a] Ruf. l. ii. c. 12. p. 184.

robaudes was, according to Victor, related to young Valentinian, probably by marriage; for he seems, so far as we can conjecture from his name, to have been a barbarian. The election being confirmed by Gratian, and soon after by Valens, the western provinces were divided between the two brothers: young Valentinian had for his share Italy, Illyricum, and Africa; and Gratian, Gaul, Spain, and Britain. The division was made, not by Gratian, who was yet too young, as Zosimus pretends [b], but by the great officers of the court. As they did not therein consult Valens, some misunderstanding arose between that prince and his nephew [c]. Notwithstanding this partition, Gratian alone governed the western provinces to his death, Valentinian not having been capable of acting on account of his age, so long as Gratian lived. The first thing Gratian did, after the death of his father and the promotion of his brother, was to recal to court his mother Severa, who had been divorced and banished by Valentinian, and restored her to her former honours [d].

THE following year, 376, Valers was consul the fifth time, and young Valentinian the first. This year Gratian, being informed of the unheard-of cruelties practised by the famous Maximinus both in Italy and Gaul, caused him to be publicly executed; and named one Antonius, prefect of Gaul, in his room. Simplicius, who had been vicar of Rome in 374, and Doryphorianus, who had succeeded him in that office, underwent the same fate, being accused of the like crimes: the former was beheaded in Illyricum, and the latter put to a cruel death, at the instigation of Severa, says Ammianus, in Gaul, whither he was conveyed from the Tullian prison in Rome [e]. As these three cruel and bloody magistrates had, with the utmost injustice, put a great number of senators to death, Gratian, by a declaration published this year, established the method of trying senators [f], which was read by Symmachus in the senate on the thirteenth of August [g]. To the above-mentioned execution St. Jerom no doubt alluded, when he wrote, that this year several persons of distinction were executed [h]. Maximinus, Simplicius, and Doryphorianus, had long deserved the doom which at length overtook them, and died unlamented; but the Maximinus and his accomplices put to death.

He celebrated count Theodosius justly put to death.

[b] Zos. ibid. [c] Eunap. legat. p. 19. [d] Chron. Alex. p. 704. Ammian l. xxviii. p. 366. [e] Ammian. l. xxviii. p 357. [f] Cod. Theodos p. 96. [g] Symm. l x. ep. 2. p. 390, 391. [h] Hier. in chron.

the death of the renowned count Theodoſius, one of the greateſt officers and beſt men of his age, is a ſtain on the character of Gratian never to be effaced. Of his glorious exploits in Britain and Africa, we have ſpoken at length in the reign of Valentinian; but notwithſtanding the eminent ſervices he had rendered the empire, he was this year by an order from court beheaded at Carthage, after he had triumphed over Firmus, and with his prudence and induſtry reſtored Africa to its former tranquillity. His death was owing, if St. Jerom [i], Oroſius [k], and St. Ambroſe [l], are to be credited, to the malicious ſuggeſtions of certain perſons at court, who, envying him the mighty reputation he had deſervedly acquired, filled the young prince's mind with jealouſies and ſuſpicions, and by that means compaſſed the ruin of a perſon worthy, both for his valour and unblemiſhed conduct, of the greateſt honours the emperor could confer upon him. He was, at his earneſt requeſt, baptized juſt before he died; ſo that his death was no leſs exemplary, than his life had been glorious [m]. Socrates writes, as we have obſerved above, that, on occaſion of the conſpiracy of Theodorus, all thoſe were by Valens put to death, whoſe names began with Theod; and among the reſt of the names one Theodoſiolus, who was, ſays he, a man of great courage, and deſcended from an illuſtrious family in Spain, meaning perhaps count Theodoſius; at leaſt Baronius [n], Jornandes [o], who, for the moſt part follows Socrates, and Flechier, in his life of the emperor Theodoſius, are of that opinion. But Theodoſius was put to death at Carthage, and not in the eaſt, where Valens reigned. Beſides, we cannot help looking upon the whole account of Socrates as a fable, to which he too eaſily gave credit, ſince neither Ammianus nor Zoſimus, who ſeem to take particular pleaſure in diſplaying the cruelties of Valens, make any mention of ſuch a remarkable piece of cruelty as his putting ſeveral perſons of diſtinction to death merely for the ſake of their names. Sozomen indeed ſpeaks of it, but as of a thing that was reported, perhaps becauſe he had read it in Socrates [p]. Be that as it will, ſtatues, and other extraordinary honours, were decreed to Theodoſius ſome years after his death by the

[i] Hier. chron. [k] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 33. p. 219. [l] Ambroſ div. 3. p. 125. [m] Oroſ. ibid. [n] Baron ad ann 370. [o] Jor. de reg. ſucc. c. 40. p. 652. [p] Soz. l. vi. c. 35. p. 694.

the ſenate of Rome; and ſeveral inſcriptions, ſetting forth his virtues and exploits, have reached our times [q]. His ſon, named likewiſe Theodoſius, who being duke of Mæſia in 374, had, with a courage and conduct above his years, defended that province againſt the incurſions of the barbarians, as we have related above, was obliged to yield to the ſtorm, and retire to Spain, his native country, where he lived in a kind of exile, till he was recalled by Gratian, and raiſed to the empire. As Ammianus takes no notice of theſe remarkable executions, we cannot help thinking there is a chaſm in this part of his hiſtory, the more becauſe he had promiſed elſewhere [r] to ſpeak in a more proper place of the death of Maximinus and his accomplices, of which, however, no mention is made in ſuch of his books as have reached us; nay, we find nothing in them relating to the weſtern provinces, from the death of Valentinian I. that is, from the year 375, to 378. This year Valens ſent the celebrated philoſopher Themiſtius, with the character of embaſſador, to Gratian, then in Gaul; but what was the ſubject of his embaſſy, we know not. The philoſopher, on his return to the eaſt, came to Rome, complying therein with the requeſt of Gratian, deſiring the Romans might have the pleaſure and honour of ſeeing ſo great a man [s]. It was at Rome, and before the ſenate of that great metropolis, that Themiſtius pronounced an oration altogether unworthy of a philoſopher, nay, of any perſon who pretended to the leaſt gravity [t]. However he beſtows great encomiums upon Gratian; extols his liberality and generous temper; and obſerves, among other things, that the avaricious and cruel exactors of the old debts due to the exchequer were in the utmoſt confuſion, becauſe the inſtruments of their malice and cruelty had by the prince's order being conſumed in the flames [u], alluding, no doubt, to what we read in Auſonius, viz. that Gratian remitted whatever was due to the exchequer at the time of his father's death, and cauſed all the papers relating thereunto to be burnt throughout the provinces that were ſubject to him [w]. Themiſtius writes, that he found Gratian not far from the ocean [x], that is, in Gaul; for he was, as appears from the dates of ſeveral laws, during the Young Theodoſius retires to his native country.

An inſtance of Gratian's generoſity.

[q] Vide Rein. p 326. Gruter. p 412. [r] Ammian l. xxviii. p 366. [s] Themiſt or. xiii. p. 163—168 [t] Idem ibid. p. 178. [u] Idem ibid p. 175. [w] Auſon. ad Grat. proconſ. p. 406, 407. [x] Themiſt. orat. xiii. p. 163.

the months of March, April, May, and September, at Treves; and we have no proof of his being elſewhere this year. By a law dated from Treves the twenty-third of May, he raiſes the ſalaries of all public profeſſors in the metropolitan cities of Gaul, eſpecially in the moſt illuſtrious city of Treves, as it is ſtyled [y]. From this law ſome pretend to infer, that Spain and Britain were at this time governed, not by vicars, but proconſuls, independent of the prefect of Gaul. However that be, it is certain, that vicars were ſoon after re-eſtabliſhed in both provinces. By another law dated the ſeventeenth of the ſame month, which was an anſwer to Artemius vicar of Spain and ſeveral biſhops, the emperor declares, that religious matters ought to be judged and decided on the ſpot by a ſynod of the dioceſe. By a dioceſe is meant the diſtrict within the juriſdiction of a vicar. By a third law, addreſſed to Nitentius, Gratian forbids all heretics, eſpecially the Donatiſts, to hold aſſemblies; and commands the places where they ſhall aſſemble to be confiſcated, except the churches, which he orders to be reſtored to the catholics [z]. From ſeveral monuments of this year, it appears, that the emperor allowed more liberty to the pagans, than to the Donatiſts, Arians, and other heretics.

He enacts laws againſt heretics.

WHILST theſe things paſſed in the weſt, a dreadful ſtorm was raiſed in the eaſt by the Hunns, a nation till this time quite unknown to the Romans. They dwelt on the eaſt ſide of the Palus Mæotis, now the ſea of Zabache, and were near neighbours to the Goths, as Sozomen ſtyles them [a], or rather to the Alans, who inhabited the country bordering on the oppoſite ſide of that marſh, which both nations looked upon as a deep ſea, and were therefore altogether unacquainted with each other, till a hind, purſued by ſome hunters, or, as others will have it, an ox ſtung by a gad-fly, having paſſed the marſh, ſome Hunns followed their guide to the oppoſite ſide, where they diſcovered a country far more agreeable and fruitful than their own [b]. What we find concerning the Hunns in Ammianus Marcellinus, the moſt antient author that ſpeaks of them, and moſt worthy of credit, is, that they firſt broke into the country of the Alans, who dwelt on the banks of the Tanais, the boundary between Europe and Aſia; and having obliged that nation to enter into into an alliance with them, they fell, thus re-inforced, upon the Goths, called by Ammianus, Greuthongi, and by Jornandes, Oſtrogoths, and ſpread every-where ſuch terror among them, that Ermenric, or, as Jornandes calls him, Ermanaric, their king, tho' a martial prince, laid violent hands on himſelf, to avoid by that means the dreadful calamities that threatened him. The Hunns were headed, according to Jornandes, by one Balamir, by him ſtyled king, probably becauſe he was the moſt powerful man of their nation; for, according to Ammianus, they had no kings, but ſeveral chiefs, whoſe authority was very precarious [c]. Vithimir, created king of the Greuthongi or Oſtrogoths, in the room of Ermenric, attempted to make head againſt the Hunns; but was killed in a battle. Alatheus and Saphrax, governors to his ſon Vitheric, apprehending all their efforts would prove unſucceſsful againſt the numerous and formidable forces of the enemy, abandoned the country, and withdrew into the plains between the Boryſthenes and the Danube; that is into the preſent Podolia. Athanaric, king or chief of the Thervingi, who had aſſiſted Procopius in his late uſurpation, reſolved to ſtand upon his guard, and prepared for a vigorous defence; but the Hunns, falling upon him before he had the leaſt notice of their approach, obliged him to retire in diſorder, after he had loſt great numbers of his men. As the enemy, overloaded with booty, purſued him but ſlowly, he improved the ſhort reſpite they allowed him, in fortifying himſelf by a wall, which he carried through the country of the Taifali from the Geraſus, or the Pruth, to the Danube [d]. The other Goths, who had the good luck to eſcape the dreadful havock which the Hunns made of their nation, found no other recourſe, but to abandon their country, and ſave themſelves within the Roman dominions. They therefore approached the banks of the Danube, to the number of two hundred thouſand men, moſt of them the ſubjects of king Athanaric, and thoſe whom Jornandes calls Viſigoths. From thence they diſpatched embaſſadors to Valens, who was then at Antioch, begging, in a moſt ſubmiſſive manner, to be admitted into Thrace, where they promiſed to live peaceably, and to ſerve, whenever called upon, in the Roman armies [e]. At the head of this embaſſy was their biſhop Ulphilas, who, on this occaſion

[y] Cod. Theod. l. xiii. tit. 3. leg. 11. p 39, 43. [z] Idem, tit. 6. p. 224, 225. [a] Soz. l. vi. c. 37. p. 696. [b] Jorn. rer. Goth. p. 644.

The Goths driven out of their country by the Hunns.

They demand to be admitted into Thrace.

[c] Ammian. l. xxxi. p. 435—440. Jorn. ibid. p. 645. [d] Ammian. p. 440, 441. [e] Idem ibid. Jorn. c. 25. p. 646.

caſion, out of complaiſance to Valens, became a proſelyte to the doctrine of Arius, and infected with the tenets of that hereſiarch, not only ſuch of his nation as already profeſſed the chriſtian religion, but thoſe two who promiſed to embrace it, provided proper perſons were ſent to inſtruct them [f]. The demand of the Goths occaſioned great debates in a grand council held at court ſoon after the arrival of their embaſſadors; but Valens in the end reſolved to grant them their requeſt, ſeveral ſycophants about him flattering him, and extolling his good fortune, which had unexpectedly brought him a perpetual ſupply of excellent ſoldiers, with which he could be furniſhed at his pleaſure, and by that means ſave the expence of new levies, to the great benefit of his treaſury; nay, their demand was thought ſo advantageous to the empire, that ſome Roman officers having cut off a party of Goths, who attempted to paſs the Danube before the return of the embaſſadors, whom both their nation and the governor of Thrace had ſent to Antioch, they were caſhiered as good officers, but bad politicians [g]. Valens, upon the imaginary proſpect of the great advantages that would accrue to the empire from ſuch an encreaſe of people, ordered them to be immediately tranſported, to be plentifully ſupplied with proviſions, and lands to be aſſigned them to cultivate. He took, however, therein ſuch precautions, as would perhaps have prevented the diſturbances which ſoon followed, had they been duly obſerved; for, according to the inſtructions which he ſent to his officers and miniſters, the children were to paſs the firſt, and be ſent into Aſia, where they were to be kept as hoſtages; and as for the reſt, they were not to be ſuffered to land on the Roman ſide, till they had quitted their arms. But the heads of the nation, by preſenting the Roman officers with ſums of money, with beautiful women, and robuſt ſlaves, prevailed upon them to neglect both theſe orders [h]. Thus the Goths, in this year 376, abandoned to the Hunns the country, in which they had dwelt for the ſpace of one hundred and fifty years. We are told, that great numbers of them were drowned in their paſſage, the river happening to be greatly ſwelled at that time [i]. Ammianus writes, that the Roman officers deſigned to have counted them as they paſſed, but could not by reaſon of their numbers, which that writer compares to the ſparks which at that very time iſſued out out of mount Ætna, and to the ſands of the Lybian ſhore. They were under the conduct of Ablavivus and Fritigern, who are ſtyled kings [k]. Vitheric, king of the Greuthongi, with his governors Saphrax and Alatheus, and another chief named Farnobius, being likewiſe driven out of their country by the Hunns and the Alans, flocked in ſwarms to the banks of the Danube, and, encouraged by the reception which their countrymen had met with from Valens, diſpatched embaſſadors to him, begging, that they too might be admitted within the Roman dominions; but the emperor not thinking it conſiſtent with the ſafety of the ſtate to comply with their requeſt, they continued for ſome time on the banks of the Danube, which they paſſed in the end, in ſpite of the Romans, as we ſhall relate hereafter. As for Athanaric, he retired with his people to a place defended by inacceſſible rocks, named Caucalanda, having driven from thence the Sarmatians and the Taifali. The latter people followed and joined the Greuthongi. A numerous body of Goths had been admitted ſome time before, on what occaſion we are no-where told, and were at this time encamped in the neighbourhood of Adrianople, under the command of their two chiefs Suerid and Colias: perhaps Valens had ſent for them on occaſion of his intended expedition into Perſia; for Ammianus aſſures us, that he hired troops of the Goths [l]. The following year 377, when Gratian was conſul the fourth time, with Merobaudes, Valens was, as appears from the dates of ſeveral laws, at Antioch on the fourth of April; at Hierapolis on the fourth of July and the ninth of Auguſt; and again at Antioch on the twenty-fourth of September. The Romans ought in policy to have immediately led the Goths away from the Danube; for by that means they would have got them into their power, and, remaining maſters of the river, prevented their receiving any aſſiſtance from their countrymen, encamped in great numbers on the oppoſite bank; but, inſtead of that, Lupicinus and Maximus, who commanded in Thrace, the former with the title of count, and the latter with that of duke, ſuffered them to continue long in that neighbourhood, pretending ſcarcity of proviſions, in order to impoſe upon them, and oblige them to buy neceſſaries at extravagant rates. The Goths, thus pinched with hunger, and provoked by other outrages, began to mutiny; which Lupicinus perceiving, he ordered them to begin their march, and remove from the neighbourhood of the Danube, charging he Goths, provoked by e Romans, utiny.

Valens complies with their requeſt.

They enter Thrace.

[f] Soz. l. vi. c, 37. p. 679, [g] Ammian. ibid. Eunap. legat. p. 19. Socr. l. iv. c. 34. p. 252. [h] Ammian. ibid. [i] Idat. faſt.

[k] Ammian. p. 443. [l] Idem. l. xxx. p. 416.

ing the ſoldiers who guarded the banks of the Danube, to drive them on, and take care that they committed no diſorders in the countries through which they paſſed. The Greuthongi, finding the banks of the river unguarded, laid hold of that opportunity to paſs it, following at ſome diſtance Fritigern and Ablavivus, who were advancing at the head of the Thervingi to Marcianopolis, the capital of Lower Mœſia. Upon their arrival in the neighbourhood of that city, Lupicinus, who reſided there, invited the two chiefs to a banquet; but at the ſame time placed guards at the gates, to prevent their troops from entering the city, tho' they deſired to be admitted as friends, only to buy the neceſſary proviſions, of which they ſtood in great need. Hereupon the Thervingi, who were in a ſtarving condition, falling upon the guards, cut moſt of them in pieces; which Lupicinus no ſooner heard, than, by way of retaliation, he commanded the attendants of the two chiefs to be aſſaſſinated in the height of their mirth. The Thervingi without the walls, provoked at the treachery and cruelty of the governor, vowed revenge; but nevertheleſs wiſely forbore for the preſent all hoſtilities, and diſſembled their juſt reſentment, leſt the Romans ſhould offer any affront to their chiefs, or detain them as hoſtages. This Fritigern himſelf apprehended, and therefore begged leave of Lupicinus to go with Ablavivus, and ſhew himſelf to his men, who were ready to mutiny, upon a falſe report, that they had both been killed with the reſt. Lupicinus, who by this time was ſo intoxicated with wine, that he knew not what he did, complied with his requeſt; and the two chiefs, being received with great joy by their countrymen, immediately mounted their horſes, declared themſelves enemies, and began to plunder the open country. Lupicinus marched out againſt them the next day, with the few troops he had with him; but the Goths, falling upon him with great reſolution and intrepidity, cut moſt of his men in pieces, and obliged him to fly back into the city. We have obſerved above, that a conſiderable body of Goths was encamped in the neighbourhood of Adrianople. Theſe, upon the news of the revolt, and the victory gained by Fritigern, continued quiet in their camp, without betraying the leaſt inclination to join him; but when they received orders to paſs without delay over into the Helleſpont, and the chief magiſtrate of Adrianople, incenſed againſt them for ſome damage they had done at his country-ſeat, inſtead of ſupplying them with the neceſſary proviſions for their march, ordered the people of the country to fall upon them, they likewiſe began to mutiny, put to flight the diſorderly Declare themſelves enemies, and plunder the country.

They are joined by a body of their countrymen encamped at Adrianople.

multitude that offered to attack them, and joining Fritigern, laid ſiege to Adrianople; but not being able to reduce it, they left a ſufficient force to block it up, and ravaged all Thrace, growing daily ſtronger by the acceſſion of incredible numbers of Gothiſh ſlaves, flocking to them from all quarters; nay, many Romans, not able to pay the exorbitant taxes with which they were loaded and oppreſſed, took part with them, and it is not to be doubted, but Vitheric with his Greuthongi joined them ſoon after; for they too fought againſt the Romans in the memorable battle of Adrianople, of which hereafter. Valens, who was then at Antioch, watching the deſigns of the king of Perſia, upon the firſt notice of theſe dangerous commotions, diſpatched Victor to the Perſian court, with the character of embaſſador, charging him to conclude a peace with that king, upon the beſt terms he could obtain; and at the ſame time ordered the two generals, Trajan and Profuturus, to march with the utmoſt expedition againſt the Goths, at the head of the legions that were quartered in Armenia. Gratian, alarmed at the danger that threatened his uncle's dominions, ſent to his aſſiſtance Richomeres, with a conſiderable reinforcement out of Gaul; but the ſoldiers deſerted in great numbers, on their march, ſolicited to it, as was reported, by Merobaudes, who apprehended the barbarians might take advantage of their abſence to break into Gaul. As Profuturus and Trajan were commanders of more courage than conduct, inſtead of ſecuring the paſſes, and ſhutting up ſuch multitudes in the province of Thrace, where they muſt inevitably have ſoon periſhed with famine, they ventured to engage them at Salices, a city of Leſſer Scythia. The battle laſted from morning to night, both armies fighting with ſuch obſtinacy and reſolution, as can hardly be expreſſed. Victory continued doubtful to the laſt; but the Romans, having loſt more men in proportion to the ſmall number of their forces, thought it adviſeable to retire to Marcianopolis. Thus Ammianus, whom we have all along followed [m]. But Theodoret [n], St. Jerom [o], and Oroſius [p], write, that the Romans were defeated, and put to flight. This battle was fought in the latter end of the ſummer of this year 377. Trajan and Profuturus being afterwards reinforced by a conſiderable body of troops ſent by Valens, under the command of Saturninus general of the horſe, they attempted to ſhut up the enemy enemy in certain narrow places, and intercept their provisions; but the Alans and Hunns themselves hastening in great numbers to their relief, the Romans were obliged to retire, and suffer them to ravage and lay waste all Thrace, without daring to oppose or molest them. At a place called Dibaltum, they fell upon a tribune, who was stationed there with his own legion and some other forces. As the tribune, by name Barzimeres, was an old experienced officer, he drew his men up in a close body, and, endeavouring to make his way through the enemy's squadrons, cut great numbers of them in pieces; but was at length overpowered, and put to the sword, with all his men [q]. Animated with this success, they went in quest of Frigerid, who commanded in Illyricum, and had been ordered by Gratian to march from thence to the assistance of Valens. The Goths, under the command of Farnobius, met him near Berea, a city in Thrace properly so called, and attacked him with great resolution. But Frigerid, who was an officer of great experience, tho' perhaps over-cautious, and thence by some reproached with timorousness, stood his ground, and, after a long and obstinate dispute, killed their leader on the spot, and put the rest to the sword, excepting a very small number, who throwing down their arms, were spared, and sent captives into Italy, where they were employed in tilling the ground about Mutina, Rhegium, and Parma. With this battle, which was fought in the latter end of the autumn, ended the campaign of this year 377 [r].

The battle of Salices.

[m] Ammian. p. 447—449. [n] Theodor. l. iv. c. 30. p. 703.
[o] Hier. chron. [p] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 33. p. 219.

The Romans retire, and abandon Thrace to the Goths:

They cut off a Roman legion.

But are defeated with great slaughter by Frigerid.

As for Gratian, he was on the twenty-seventh of February at Treves, where he had passed the winter, and on the twenty-eighth of July at Mayence, perhaps on some expedition against the Germans not mentioned in history; for Ausonius tells us, that he took some Germans prisoners, and brought them with him into Gaul [s]. He was returned to Treves on the seventeenth of September [t]. By a law dated the fifth of March, and addressed to Cataphronus vicar of Italy, he grants several exemptions to the clergy, comprising under that name, not only bishops, priests, and deacons, but likewise sub-deacons, exorcists, readers, and janitors or door-keepers [u]. A dreadful plague raged this year in most of the western provinces, and swept off incredible numbers of Gratian grants several exemptions to the clergy.

[q] Ammian. p. 452. [r] Idem, p. 443—453. [s] Auson. consul. p. 378. [t] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 97, 98. [u] Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 2, leg 24 p. 56.

of people [w]. The following year 378, when Valens was conſul the ſixth time, and young Valentinian the ſecond, the Goths, from Thrace, advanced into Macedon and Theſſaly, committing every-where dreadful ravages; nay, they approached Conſtantinople itſelf, plundered the ſuburbs, and kept the city for ſome time blocked up. Valens therefore, having firſt ſent a body of Saracens to drive them from the neighbourhood of that metropolis, ſet out from Antioch, in order to head his army in perſon, and arrived at Conſtantinople on the thirtieth of May, where he found the people highly diſſatisfied with his conduct, in admitting the Goths into Thrace, and by that means giving riſe to the preſent war. Soon after his arrival, he diſcharged Trajan general of the foot, and put count Sebaſtian, a brave and experienced commander, in his room [x]. Theodoret tells us, that Trajan, who was a profeſſed enemy to the Arians, and a zealous defender of the Nicene faith, hearing himſelf reproached by the emperor with cowardice, as if the loſs of the late battle had been owing to want of courage in him, anſwered boldly, that heaven juſtly provoked at his driving out the orthodox biſhops, and putting the infamous followers of Arius in their room, had declared for the Goths; and conſequently that he ought to blame not his generals, but himſelf, for the loſſes he had hitherto ſuſtained, and for the far greater calamities that would ſoon overtake him, unleſs he altered his conduct. The generals Arintheus and Victor declared, adds Theodoret, that they were of the ſame opinion, and begged the emperor not to reſent their ſpeaking, as his true friends, their ſentiments without diſguiſe [y]. The piety of Trajan is greatly commended by the eccleſiaſtic writers, eſpecially by Theodoret and St. Baſil, with whom he lived in great intimacy. But it is no eaſy task to reconcile with his extraordinary piety the death of Paras king of Armenia, whom, if the account of Ammianus be true, he cauſed to be murdered with the utmoſt treachery and barbarity, as we have related above. Valens continued but a very ſhort time at Conſtantinople; for he left that city on the eleventh of June, highly exaſperated againſt the inhabitants, who had inſulted him as the author of the preſent war, and threatening, if he came back ſafe, to turn their city into a deſert [z]. From Conſtantinople

The Goths block up Conſtantinople.

Valens ſets out for that city.

Trajan reproaches the emperor with great freedom.

[w] Ambr in Luc. xxi. p 203, Biblioth. patr. tom 8. p. 579. [x] Ammian. p. 458. [y] Theodor. l iv. c. 30. p. 703. [z] Ammian. l. iii. p. 456. Socr. l iv. c. 38, p. 255.

nople he marched to Melanthias, an imperial caſtle, about eighteen miles diſtant from the city; and thence detached Sebaſtian with a body of choſen troops againſt Fritigern, who was encamped in the neighbourhood of Adrianople. Sebaſtian, coming upon the enemy unawares, cut off ſeveral of their parties, who were roving about the country, without the leaſt apprehenſion of danger, and recovered the booty with which they were loaded. Hereupon Fritigern, having ſent orders to all the parties that were diſperſed about the country, to join him without delay, retired upon their arrival to the city of Catyle, of which geographers can give no account [a]. Zoſimus tells us, that Sebaſtian engaged to force the Goths either to quit the Roman territories, or to ſubmit to Valens, with two thouſand men only, by cutting off their parties, and intercepting their proviſions; but that Valens, deſirous to equal, by ſome memorable action, the glory acquired this year by Gratian in the famous battle of Argentaria, rejected his propoſal, and leaving Melanthias, advanced to the neighbourhood of Adrianople, with a deſign to give the enemy battle. He was at the head of a very numerous and well-diſciplined army, commanded by officers of great renown, and among the reſt by Trajan, whom he had reſtored to his former poſt. While he lay at Adrianople, Richomeres arrived there with letters from Gratian, acquainting him, that he was on full march with his victorious army to join him, and earneſtly entreating him, not to hazard a battle till his arrival, nor make that victory doubtful, which the conjunction of their forces would render certain and indiſputable. Hereupon a council of war being immediately ſummoned, Victor, who commanded the horſe, and was both a brave and prudent officer, adviſed him by all means to wait the arrival of his nephew, and the reinforcement of the Gauliſh troops; but Sebaſtian was for giving battle without delay; and his opinion the emperor preferred to that of Victor, and almoſt all the other officers, being induced thereunto by his flatterers, telling him, that he ſtood in no need of the aſſiſtance of his nephew, and therefore ought not to allow him any ſhare in the victory, and the glory attending it. At the ſame time Fritigern ſent deputies to him, at the head of whom was a chriſtian prieſt, offering to conclude a peace upon very reaſonable terms, which moſt of his officers adviſed him by all means to embrace, remonſtrating, that an honourable and Valens marches againſt the Goths.

Gratian marches to the aſſiſtance of Valens.

[a] Vide Baud. p. 142.

certain peace was preferable to an uncertain victory; but he, deaf to all their remonſtrances, and obſtinately bent upon engaging before the arrival of his nephew, leaving the great officers of the court, with his treaſures, in Adrianople, and all the baggage of the army near that city, with a ſtrong detachment to guard it, ſet out with the reſt in queſt of the enemy, whom he diſcovered about noon in the neighbourhood of Nice, about fifteen miles from Adrianople. The Goths, commanded by Alethus and Saphrax, were encamped at a conſiderable diſtance from the reſt. Meſſengers were therefore immediately diſpatched to them; and in the mean time, to amuſe the emperor till they arrived, embaſſadors were ſent to him, with propoſals of peace, to which the emperor gave ear; but inſiſted upon their delivering up to him ſome of their chief men as hoſtages. At the ſame time, Fritigern, further to amuſe the emperor, acquainted him by a private letter, that he was ready to bring all his forces over to him, provided ſome perſons of diſtinction were ſent to him as hoſtages. Valens, overjoyed at this propoſal, named firſt Equico his kinſman for one of the hoſtages; but he, as he had been taken priſoner by the Goths the preceding year, and had made his eſcape, begging to be excuſed, Richomeres offered himſelf of his own accord; but, before he reached the enemy's camp, Bacurius, prince of the Iberians, and one Caſſio, who commanded a party of archers, falling upon the Goths, gave beginning to the battle, which was fought with great obſtinacy and reſolution on both ſides. Ammianus gives us a long, but confuſed, account of this memorable engagement. According to him, the foot in the left wing of the Romans, having advanced too far, and ſeparated themſelves from the main body of the army, and from the cavalry that was to ſupport them, were ſurrounded by the enemy, which inſpired the barbarians with great courage [b]. St. Jerom [c] and Socrates [d] write, that the foot was abandoned by the cavalry; and Sozomen [e], that Valens, being in too great haſte to engage, did not allow himſelf time to draw up his men as he ought. Libanius ſays, that he fought with more courage than prudence or conduct [f]. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the Romans were utterly defeated;

But Valens reſolves to give battle before his arrival.

The battle of Adrianople.

The Romans utterly defeated.

[b] Ammian. p. 460—462. [c] Hier. in chron. [d] Socr. l. iv. c. 38. p. 255. [e] Soz. l. vi. c. 40 p. 703. [f] Lib. vit. p. 58.

defeated; that two thirds of their army were cut in pieces, and the reſt forced to ſave themſelves by a precipitous and diſorderly flight. The Roman writers themſelves own this to have been the greateſt overthrow their ſtate had ever received ſince the battle of Cannæ. Their foot did all that men, whoſe native courage was emboldened by deſpair, could do; but were in the end overpowered with numbers, and obliged, in ſpite of their utmoſt efforts, to yield to an enemy, who was not only infinitely ſuperior to them in numbers, but equalled them in courage and bravery. Among many other eminent perſons, fell in this action the brave generals Trajan and Victor, with Valerian the tribunus ſtabuli, or maſter of the horſe; Equico the emperor's kinſman, and magiſter palatii, or great ſteward of the houſhold; and Patentius, a youth of extraordinary hopes, and by all greatly reſpected, in regard of his father Urſicinus, ſo famous in the reign of Conſtantius [g]. But nothing has rendered this battle more memorable in hiſtory, than the unhappy end of Valens himſelf, who periſhed on this occaſion, as all authors agree, tho' they differ in their accounts of his death; for ſome write, that he was killed upon the ſpot; and others, that being wounded in the field, and not in a condition to fly, he was carried to a countryman's houſe, which his attendants made good againſt the barbarians, till they, not ſuſpecting the emperor to be there, ſet fire to it, which conſumed the houſe, and all who were in it, except a youth, who having made his eſcape, firſt out of the flames, and afterwards from the enemy, who had taken him priſoner, gave the Romans an account of the emperor's unhappy end [h]. Both theſe opinions are related by Ammianus; and the former was adopted by Libanius, as more proper for a panegyric; but the latter, which is generally thought the moſt probable, by Victor [i], St. Jerom [k], Ruſinus [l], Oroſius [m], Zoſimus [n], and Socrates [o]. Sozomen [p] and Philoſtorgius [q] follow the ſame opinion; but add ſome circumſtances, which ſeem quite improbable. St. Chryſoſtom ſpeaks of the death of Valens periſhing in the flames, as a memorable inſtance of the vanity of all human grandeur [r]. Theodoret follows the ſame opinion; but was certainly miſtaken in ſuppoſing

The death of Valens variouſly related.

[g] Ammian. p. 463. [h] Idem, p. 462. [i] Vict. epit. [k] Hier. chron. [l] Ruf. l. ii. c. 13. p. 184. [m] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 33. p. 219. [n] Zoſ. p. 750. [o] Socr. l. iv. c. 38. p. 255. [p] Soſ l. vi. c. 40. p. 703. [q] Philoſt. l. ix. c. 17. p. 131, 132. [q] Chryſ. ad vid. p. 464.

Valens not to have been preſent at the battle [s]. Ammianus obſerves, that before Valens left Antioch, it was become a common curſe or imprecation among the inhabitants of that metropolis, May Valens be burnt alive. The ſame writer pretends that unhappy end to have been protended by ſeveral prodigies, as a puniſhment inflicted upon him by heaven, for having cauſed Paras king of Armenia to be inhumanly murdered, and for putting many innocent perſons to death, on occaſion of the conſpiracy of Theodorus [t]. The reader will find in Zoſimus the deſcription of a ſpectre, which, ſays he, was ſeen by Valens and all his court, when he marched out of Conſtantinople againſt the Goths [u]. To this perhaps Ammianus alludes in a paſſage, which ſeems to us very obſcure [w]. Theophanes takes notice of ſome other prodigies, and aſſures us, that ſome of the emperor's officers owned after his death, that he had ſuffered the aruſpices to be conſulted concerning the iſſue of this war [x]. Ammianus, and other writers, tell us, that near the place where the emperor died, was diſcovered, agreeable to a pretended prediction, the tomb of an antient Macedonian captain, by name Mimantus [y]. All authors agree, that neither his body, nor the leaſt remains of it, were ever found; and that his memory was honoured by no funeral obſequies. Eccleſiaſtic writers look upon his death as a judgment from heaven, for his perſecuting with great cruelty the catholics, and his encouraging the hereſy of Arius, which flouriſhed and encreaſed in his reign, more than it had done under any of his predeceſſors. With him periſhed in the flames, according to the modern Greeks, his great chamberlain, a zealous patron of the Arians, and an avowed enemy to the orthodox believers [z]. Such was the end of Valens, after he had lived about fifty years, and reigned fifteen, four months, and ſome days [a]. He was quite a ſtranger to every branch of literature, and no better acquainted with the military art, than with the liberal ſciences. He did not ſo much as underſtand the Greek tongue, tho' he had reigned ſo many years in the eaſt among the Greeks. He found out no expedients of himſelf; but, when they were propoſed by others, he had diſcernment enough to

Said to have been portended by ſeveral prodigies.

His character.

[s] Theod. l. iv. p 704. [t] Ammian. p. 435. [u] Zoſ. l. iv. p 748. [w] Ammian. p. 435. [x] Theoph. p 55. [y] Ammian p. 465 Zonar p. 27. Cedrem. p. 314. [z] Menæa magn. Græc. p. 229. [a] Ammian. l. xxxi. p. 463, 464.

to know which was the beſt and moſt proper [b]. He was naturally indolent and inactive, an enemy to all labour, and averſe to buſineſs; which was owing to the eaſy life he had led, free from trouble, till he was created emperor. He was timorous to a great degree, and unwilling to expoſe himſelf to any danger. To this diſpoſition moſt authors aſcribe the extraordinary deference which he ever paid to his brother Valentinian [c]. Themiſtius commends his chaſtity [d]; and Ammianus, a writer no-ways biaſſed in his favour, does not reproach him with any kind of lewdneſs or debauchery. He was conſtant and faithful in his friendſhip, whereof ſeveral inſtances are related by Ammianus [e]. He raiſed ſuch only of his relations as were perſons of merit, and, generally ſpeaking, had regard to nothing but merit in the diſpoſal of employments [f]. He kept a watchful eye over his miniſters, exacted the military diſcipline with great rigour, not ſufferng his ſoldiers to do the leaſt injury to thoſe through whoſe countries they marched, and ſhewed himſelf on all occaſions ready to hearken to the complaints of his injured ſubjects [g]. He ſeems to have diſcharged the foreign guards, who had been employed by other princes as the miniſters of their cruelty [h]. He was thoroughly acquainted with the ſtate of his finances, and therefore did not ſuffer himſelf to be impoſed upon, as moſt of his predeceſſors had done, by thoſe who managed them [i]. Tho' he was quite unacquainted with the liberal ſciences, yet he is ſaid to have compoſed ſome ſpeeches, with the aſſiſtance of one Heliodorus, a man of a mean deſcent, and infamous character, as we read in Ammianus, who complains of the emperor, for obliging perſons of the firſt rank to attend his funeral [k]. Themiſtius ſtyles him the father of the provinces, by reaſon of the great care he took in eaſing them, by all poſſible means, of the heavy taxes with which they had been loaded by his predeceſſors [l]. Ammianus owns, that he could not with more care conſult the good of his own family, than he did the welfare of all his ſubjects; and that the eaſtern provinces had been under no prince happier than under him [m]. However, all authors agree, that he had a ſtrange biaſs to avarice and cruelty, which, joined to his jealous and ſuſpicious temper, prompted him often to condemn innocent perſons, and ſeize on their eſtates. The leaſt ſuſpicion of treaſon rendered him inexorable, ſays Ammianus, and his ears were open to all manner of accuſations [n]. All the eccleſiaſtic writers agree, that he allowed to the many ſects that then prevailed, nay, even to the Jewiſh and pagans, the free exerciſe of their religion; but perſecuted the catholics with the utmoſt cruelty, of which we have ſeen one remarkable inſtance in the hiſtory of his reign; and the reader may find many others in the above-mentioned writers. He left two daughters behind him, Caroſa and Anaſtatia; but all we know of them is, that Procopius, who become famous in the latter end of the reign of Theodoſius, married one of them, he being ſtyled by Zoſimus [o] and Sozomen [p], the ſon-in-law of Valens. What become of the empreſs Albia Dominica, after the death of her huſband, we are no-where told. St. Chryſoſtom, writing about the year 381, obſerves, that the widow of an emperor, who had been baniſhed by another prince, was then recalled by the mediation of many perſons of diſtinction, who with much ado obtained that favour [q]. Moſt writers take the empreſs, of whom he ſpeaks in that place, to have been the widow of the emperor Valens. But as to the cauſe of her diſgrace and misfortune, we are quite in the dark. With the death of Valens, Ammianus Marcellinus ends his hiſtory; but of him, and Eutropius, who wrote his abridgment of the Roman hiſtory in the reign of Valens, and by that prince's command, we ſhall ſpeak in note (K).

[b] Idem, g. 464. Themiſt. orat. vi. p. 11. & orat ix. p. 71. [c] Idem ibid. & Vict. epit. Theodor. vit patr. p. 815. [d] Themiſt. orat. viii. p. 119, 120. [e] Ammian. p. 464. [f] Idem. p. 463. [g] Themiſt. orat. x. p 158. [h] Idem, orat. xii. p. 155. [i] Idem, orat. viii. p. 114. [k] Ammian. l. xxix. p. 392, 393. [l] Themiſt. orat x. p. 129. [m] Ammian. l. xxxi. p. 464.

[n] Idem, p. 465. [o] Zoſ l. v. p. 786. [p] Zoſ. l. iv. c. 9. p. 469. [q] Chryſ. ad vid. Jun. p. 463.

(K) Ammianus Marcellinus was a native of Antioch, where his family made ſome figure (1). He ſerved ſeveral years in the army, from the year 350 to 359, under count Urſicinus, partly in Meſopotamia, and partly in Gaul, in quality of domeſticus, which was then an honourable poſt. He attended Julian in his Perſian expedition, and was at Antioch, or in that neighbourhood, when the conſpiracy of Theodorus was diſcovered in the reign of Valens (2). Afterwards he renounced the profeſſion of arms, and retired to Rome, where he wrote his hiſtory, as appears both from the hiſtory itſelf (3), and from a letter which Libanius wrote to him from Antioch (4), while while he was compoſing it. His twenty-ſixth book was not ended before the year 390, and the twenty-ſecond was written the year before (5). His work was divided into thirty one books, and compriſed the reigns of all the emperors, from Domitian, where Suetonius ends, to the death of Valens; but of his thirty-one books, only the laſt eighteen, beginning after the death of Magnentius in 353, have reached our times. Tho' he was a Greek, he choſe to write in Latin; but his Latin, in the opinion of Voſſius, ſpeaks him both a Greek and a ſoldier (6). But his other good qualities make ſufficient amends, ſays the ſame writer, for theſe faults; for he writes with great judgment, and ſeems to have been a great lover of truth (7). However, he plainly betrays a great zeal for the religion of the antient Romans, and no ſmall partiality for thoſe who countenanced it, eſpecially for his hero Julian. In his hiſtory he frequently makes long and tedious digreſſions on the comets, and other things, which fall not within the province of an hiſtorian. In his accounts he is now-and-then ſomewhat confuſed, and often leaves out the moſt material circumſtances of the facts he relates; which has induced ſome to believe, that his hiſtory is in ſeveral places maimed and imperfect. But, after all, without his hiſtory, we ſhould have been quite in the dark with reſpect to the moſt remarkable tranſactions of thoſe times. Some epigrams by one Ammianus have reached our times; but whether they were the work of the hiſtorian, is altogether uncertain. The reader will find ſeveral things relating to Ammianus have reached our times; but whether they were the work of the hiſtorian, is altogether uncertain. The reader will find ſeveral things relating to Ammianus, and his hiſtory, in the prolegomena, which Mr. Valois has prefixed to the laſt edition of the works of that hiſtorian at Paris in 1681. Eutropius wrote his abridgment of the Roman hiſtory in the reign of Valentinian and Valens, and inſcribed it to the latter, having undertaken it at his requeſt. He gives that prince the title of Gothicus, a plain proof that he publiſhed his work after the year 369, in which Valens defeated Athanaric, one of the kings or chiefs of the Goths. Mr. Valois ſtyles him a polite and elegant writer; but Vinetus, who publiſhed his works in 1553, concludes from his ſtyle, that he was not a Roman, but a Greek (8). Voſſius too finds fault with his ſtyle; but, upon the whole, commends his work, as an abridgment of the Roman hiſtory done with great judgment (9). He is often copied by St. Jerom in his chronicle, and quoted by other Latin writers His work ſeems to have been in great requeſt among the Greeks; for two tranſlations of it were done into that language, guage, the one by Pæanius, and the other by Capito. The latter, who was by birth a Lycian, not only tranſlated into Greek the abridgment of Livy, ſays Suidas, done by Eutropius, but wrote beſides the hiſtory of Iſauria in eight books, and likewiſe that of Lycia and Pamphylia. The tranſlation of Eutropius by Pæanius, was publiſhed among the other Auguſtian writers by Sylburgius at Francfort in 1590. Sylburgius is of opinion, that Pæanius was contemporary with Eutropius. However that be, it is certain, that he often deviates both from the meaning of the original, and the truth of hiſtory (10). As for Eutropius himſelf, Suidas ſtyles him an Italian ſophiſt; and adds, that he publiſhed ſeveral other works (11). From his works it does not appear, whether he profeſſed the chriſtian religion, or no. He was preſent, according to Codin, at the laying the foundations of Conſtantinople, and left behind him an account of the origin of that city (12). If what that author writes be true, Eutropius muſt have been very young at that time. He attended Julian in his expedition into Perſia (13). He ſeems to have been of the ſenatorial order; for, at the head of his work, he is diſtinguiſhed with the title of clariſſimus, which was peculiar to ſenators In the reign of Valentinian, and before the year 376, died, according to St. Jerom, Aquilius, or Acilius Severus, a native of Spain, who wrote the hiſtory of his own life in proſe and verſe, under the title of cataſtrophe. He was deſcended from another Severus, to whom Lactantius inſcribed two books of his letters. St. Jerom places him among the eccleſiaſtic writers (14); but his work has been long ſince loſt.

(1) Ammian l. xix. p. 144. (2) Idem, l. xxix. p. 387. (3) Idem, l. xxxi. p 469. (4) Ammian. vit. p. 4—8.

(5) Idem. p. 8, 9. (6) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 9. p. 201. (7) Idem ibid. (8) Eutrop. p. 557. (9) Voſſ. hiſt Lat. c. 8. p. 198.

(10) Eutrop. Græc. p. 63. (11) Suid. p. 1099. (12) Codin, antiq. Conſtantinop. p. 17. (13) Eutrop. p. 589. (14) Hier. vir. illuſtr. c. 111.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXVIII.

The Roman hiſtory, from the death of Valens to the diviſion of the empire.

GRATIAN, alarmed at the danger that threatened the eaſtern provinces, overrun by the barbarians, reſolved to march in perſon to the aſſiſtance of his uncle, as ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit; and in the mean time ordered part of the forces he had with him in Gaul to haſten into Illyricum, and, joining the troops quartered in that province, to enter Thrace, and reinforce the army which Valens had ſent thither. This the Germans, called Lentienſes, whoſe country bordered upon Rhætia, no ſooner underſtood, than by an open breach of the treaty, which they had but lately concluded with Gratian, they paſſed the Rhine upon the ice, to the number of forty thouſand men, and upwards; and entering Gaul, began to commit dreadful ravages in the neighbourhood of that river. Hereupon the emperor recalled the troops which he had ordered to march into Illyricum, and ſent them reinforced with thoſe that were left in Gaul under the conduct of count Nannianus, and Mallobaudes, king of the Franks, who ſerved in the Roman army in quality of comes domeſticorum, to drive back the Lentienſes, whoſe numbers encreaſed daily, the Romans, who guarded the banks of the Rhine, having through fear of the barbarians, abandoned their ſtations. The two generals, though at the head of a handful of men, gave them battle in the neighbourhood of Argentaria, which moſt geographers take to have ſtood where the preſent city of Colmar ſtands. The Romans at firſt gave ground, being overpowered with numbers; but in the end gained a complete victory, and made ſuch a dreadful havock of the enemy, that, out of ſuch a prodigious multitude, ſcarce five thouſand had the good luck to make their eſcape, thirty thouſand of them being killed upon the ſpot, and the reſt either ſlain in the purſuit, or taken priſoners. Their king Triarius, the chief author of the war, was in the number of the ſlain [r]. Oroſius writes, that Gratian was preſent at the battle; and that, depending

The Lentienſes paſs the Rhine, and break into Gaul.

They are utterly defeated by the Romans.

[r] Ammian. l. xxxi. p. 453, 454. Vict. epit. Hier. in chron.

ing

ing upon the aſſiſtance of heaven, he attacked the enemy, tho' greatly ſuperior to him in number [s]. But Ammianus only writes, that Gratian advanced to ſupport his generals [t]. This battle was not fought before the month of May; for on the twenty-ſecond of April the emperor was ſtill at Treves, as appears from a law bearing that date [u]. After this victory, Gratian paſsed the Rhine at the head of his army; and, entering the enemy's country, ſhut them up on all ſides among the barren mountains, to which they had fled with their families; and by that means reduced them in a ſhort time to ſuch ſtreights, that they were forced to ſubmit to the terms the conqueror thought fit to preſcribe; one of which was, that they ſhould deliver up their youth to ſerve in the Roman army, which they did accordingly. Thus were the Romans greatly reinforced by this new acceſſion of ſtrength, and at the ſame time that inconſtant and faithleſs nation put out of a condition of raiſing new diſturbances in the emperor's abſence. In this expedition Gratian gave ſignal proofs of his courage, prudence, good-nature, and generoſity; which gained him the eſteem and affection of all who ſerved under him [w]. He immediately wrote to Valens, acquainting him with his victory, and begging him not to hazard a battle till he had joined him, which he aſſured him would be very ſoon. But Valens, now jealous of the reputation of his young nephew, which he thought eclipſed his own, and deſirous of equalling his exploits againſt the Germans, reſolved to give battle before his arrival, that he might enjoy, without a rival, the glory of the victory, which he looked upon as certain. In the mean time, Gratian having ſufficiently provided for the ſecurity of Gaul, began his march, and with great expedition advanced to Arbor Felix, now Arbon, on the lake of Conſtance, and from thence to Lauriacum, now Lork, in Auſtria, on the Danube, between the Traun and the Ens. There he embarqued part of his troops on the Danube, and marched by land with the reſt to Bononia in Lower Dacia, and from thence to Sirmium, where he ſtaid but four days, tho' he was then ill of an intermitting fever. From Sirmium he purſued his march along the Danube to a fort in the ſame province, called Caſtra Martis. In his march, ſome of his men, who had ſtraggled from the army, were intercepted and cut off by the Alans. From Caſtra Martis he diſpatched Richomeres, his comes domeſ-

They ſubmit to Gratian.

Gratian marches to the aſſiſtance of his uncle.

[s] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 33. p. 219. [t] Ammian. ibid Cod. Theod. chron. p. 98. [w] Ammian. ibid. p. 455.

domeſticorum, to acquaint Valens, that he was at hand, and earneſtly entreat him in his name not to engage the numerous forces of the enemy till his arrival. But Valens, haſtening the battle, that his nephew might have no ſhare in the victory, was utterly defeated and periſhed, with two-thirds of his army, in the manner we have related above. The day after the battle, the Goths, informed by a deſerter, that Valens had left many perſons of great diſtinction in Adrianople, and that the imperial treaſure was lodged there, laid ſiege to the place; but being repulſed with great ſlaughter, as quite ſtrangers to the art of beſieging towns, they dropped the enterprize; and marching towards Perinthus or Heraclea, laid waſte that fertile country, and then advanced to Conſtantinople, hoping to make themſelves maſters of that ſtately metropolis, and of the immenſe wealth lodged in it. But the Saracens, whom Mavia their queen had ſent to the aſſiſtance of the Romans, and who were more dextrous at ſudden onſets, than regular engagements, having in ſeveral ſallies cut off great numbers of the Goths, the reſt thought it adviſeable to break up the ſiege, and retire from the neighbourhood of that city. The remaining part of this year they ſpent in ravaging, without oppoſition, Thrace, Scythia, Mœſia, and even Illyricum, as far as the Julian Alps, which part that province from Italy [x]. The neighbouring barbarians, namely the Quadi and Sarmatians, entered the Roman territories at the ſame time, putting all to fire and ſword, and ſurpaſſing the Goths themſelves in the un-heard-of cruelties they practiſed [y]. St. Jerom gives us a pathetic account of the calamities ſuffered at that time by the ſubjects of the empire. The whole country, ſays he, from Conſtantinople to the Julian Alps, have been ſwimming theſe twenty years in Roman blood: Scythia, Thrace, Macedon, Dardania, Dacia, Theſſalonica, (or rather Theſſaly) Achaia, both Epirus's, Dalmatia, both Pannonia's, are filled with Goths, Sarmatians, Quadians, Alans, Hunns, Vandals, Marcomans, &c. whoſe avarice nothing has eſcaped, whoſe cruelty has been felt by perſons of all ranks, ages, and conditions. How many eminent perſons of both ſexes, how many ſacred virgins, have been outrageouſly inſulted, and hurried into captivity? Biſhops have been inhumanly maſſacred, with their clergy; churches pulled down, the reliques of the holy martyrs dug up, and the Valens gives battle, and is defeated and killed before his arrival.

The Goths beſiege in vain Adrianople and Conſtantinople.

Dreadful ravages committed by the Goths, and other barbarians.

[x] Idem, p. 456---458. & l. xx. p. 160. [y] Idem, l xxxi. p. 469. Zoſ. l. iv. p. 751.

the ſacred altars turned into mangers. The downfal of the Roman empire is at hand [z]. The ſame ſaint, writing in the year 406, that is, eight years after the preſent time, tells us, that Illyricum, Thrace, and Dalmatia, his native country, looked ſtill like deſerts, and that nothing was to be ſeen in them but briars and thick foreſts [a]. The cities of Illyricum, which ſuffered moſt on this occaſion, were Petavio and Murſia; the former is ſaid to have been betrayed to the barbarians by Valens, whom the Arians had attempted to raiſe to that ſee [b]. As there were great numbers of Goths, who ſerved in the Roman armies, quartered in the forts and cities of Aſia, Julius, who commanded in that province, apprehending they would riſe and join their countrymen, if they ſhould move that way, by private letters ſent to the governors of the cities where they were quartered, ordered them all to be maſſacred at the ſame time. This ſevere, but perhaps neceſſary, order was put in execution without the leaſt noiſe or diſturbance, and Aſia delivered from the danger it had juſt reaſon to apprehend; for Zoſimus aſſures us, that the Goths only wanted an opportunity to revolt, and treat the Romans as they were treated by them [c].

All the Goths put to the ſword in the eaſt.

We left Gratian on the frontiers of Thrace, ready to enter that province, and join Valens; but he no ſooner heard the news of his death, and of the great loſs the Romans had ſuſtained in the fatal battle of Adrianople, which was brought to him by Victor, who had had the good luck to eſcape the general ſlaughter, than he marched back to Sirmium, to deliberate there on the moſt proper meaſures to be taken in ſo critical a conjuncture. After a ſhort ſtay at Sirmium, he marched at the head of all the forces he could aſſemble, to Conſtantinople, to ſecure that metropolis; and in the mean time conſidering with himſelf how many brave officers had periſhed in the preſent war, and how much he ſtood in need of an able and faithful general, he ſent for young Theodoſius, who, after having given ſignal proofs of his courage, conduct and experience in military affairs, had, upon the death of his father, retired to Spain, his native country, to avoid, as we have related above, the ſtorm that threatened him. Theodoſius complied with the emperor's command; and quitting his retirement, haſtened into Illyricum, where he was received by Gratian with the greateſt demonſtrations of kindneſs and eſteem, and ſoon after ſent at the head of a conſiderable

Gratian ſends for Theodoſius.

[z] Hier. epiſt. 3. p. 26.
[a] Idem in Soph. 1. p. 209.
[b] Ambroſ. epiſt. 1. p. 167
[c] Zoſ. p. 752. Ammian. p. 459.

conſiderable army againſt the Sarmatians, who were in full march to join the Goths: but Theodoſius, falling upon them, cut the greater part of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to repaſs the Danube. The victory he gained on this occaſion was ſo complete, that the emperor could not believe the account which Theodoſius himſelf gave him of it upon his return to court, till he was informed of the truth by perſons ſent on purpoſe to view the field of battle [d]. To this victory, and the other which Gratian had gained this year over the Germans before he left Gaul, Auſonius no doubt alluded, when he wrote, that the emperor in one and the ſame year appeaſed the troubles on the Rhine and the Danube [e]. From Conſtantinople the emperor returned to Sirmium, and paſſed the winter there. As he was a zealous catholic, he no ſooner ſaw himſelf by the death of Valens, maſter of the eaſt, than he recalled and reſtored to their ſees, the orthodox biſhops, who had been baniſhed by Valens; and, by an edict, granted an entire liberty of conſcience to chriſtians of all denominations, except the Manichees, the Photinians, and the Eunomians, whom he would not ſuffer to have any churches [f]. This edict put a ſtop to the perſecution, which the Arians had raiſed, and carried on with great cruelty againſt the catholics, during the whole reign of Valens. Gratian, notwithſtanding his zeal for the orthodox faith, did not think it adviſeable for the preſent to meddle any farther with religious affairs, through fear of raiſing new diſturbances, which, in the preſent diſtracted ſtate of the empire, might have been attended by dangerous conſequences. This law, granting liberty of conſcience to all chriſtians, ſeems to have taken place only in the eaſt, where the catholics did not enjoy it before; for by another law enacted this very year, and addreſſed to Flavianus, vicar of Africa, he abſolutely condemns the Donatiſts, orders their churches to be delivered up to the catholics, and declares, that he will ſuffer no other doctrine to be taught or held, except that which is agreeable to the goſpel, to the faith of the apoſtles, and to the tradition of the church [g]. While he reſided at Sirmium, ſurrounded on all ſides by the barbarians, he named Auſonius and Olybrius conſuls for the enſuing year. He wrote to Auſonius, who had been his preceptor, a moſt obliging letter,

Who gains a complete victory over the Sarmatians.

Gratian recalls the baniſhed biſhops.

He condemns the Donatiſts.

He raiſes the poet Auſonius to the conſulſhip.

[d] Theodoret. l. v. c. 5. p. 710. [e] Auſon. conſ. p. 378.
[f] Cod. Theod l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 5 p. 116. [g] Idem. tit. 6. leg. 2. p. 194.

ter, acquainting him with his promotion, and at the ſame time ſent him the conſular robe, that which the emperors wore when they triumphed [h]. As Valens died without iſſue male, Gratian by his death, became ſole maſter of the empire; but not thinking himſelf, being then only in the twentieth year of his age, equal to ſo great a burden, eſpecially at ſo critical a conjuncture, when the Goths, Hunns, Alans, Sarmatians and Quadians had broken into the empire on one ſide, and the Alemans and other German nations were ready to invade it on the other, he reſolved to take a collegue capable of eaſing him of part of his burden, and extricating the ſtate out of the difficulties under which it laboured. Young Valentinian ſhared indeed with him the title, but not the authority of emperor, he being but ſeven or at the moſt eight years old. Without any regard therefore to his own relations, or rather looking upon thoſe, to uſe the expreſſion of Themiſtius, as his neareſt relations, who were beſt qualified for ſo great a truſt, he determined to aſſume Theodoſius for his partner in the ſupreme power; a perſon of moſt extraordinary accompliſhments, and no leſs admired by all on account of his exemplary piety, than for his prudence, his experienc in war, and the mighty exploits he had already performed [i]. Purſuant to this reſolution, he declared him emperor at Sirmium on the nineteenth of January of the enſuing year 379, whilſt Auſonius and Q. Clodius Hermogenianus Olybrius were conſuls. It was with the utmoſt difficulty that Gratian prevailed upon him to accept, ſays Pacatus, what others ſought with ſo much ambition, and employed the moſt unlawful means to attain. He refuſed, continues the ſame author, what others looked upon as the greateſt happineſs, in ſuch manner as evidently ſhewed, that he accepted it in the end by mere conſtraint [k]. After Gratian had to the general ſatisfaction both of the people and ſoldiery, declared him emperor with the uſual ſolemnity, he committed to his care the eaſt, Thrace, and the reſt of the provinces, which had been governed by Valens, reſerving for himſelf only Gaul, Spain, and Britain; for Italy, Illyricum, and Africa, were held by his brother Valentinian [l]. Sozomen writes, that to the eaſt Gratian added Illyricum [m]; which, if true, muſt be

He reſolves to take a collegue.

He raiſes Theodoſius to the empire.

Andcommits the eaſtern provinces to his care.

[h] Auſon. ibid. p. 381. [i] Themiſt. or. xiv. p. 182. [k] Pacat. p. 253, 254. [l] Theod. l. v. c. 6. p. 711. Zoſ. p. 746. [m] Soz. l. vii. c. 4. p. 707.

be underſtood of the eaſt part of Illyricum; for the weſt part was always held by the princes of the weſtern empire, who till this time had been maſters of both. Weſt Illyricum compriſed both Pannonia's, the one and the other Noricum, Dalmatia, and Savia, which we take to be the province that was for ſome time known by the name of Valeria. That Gratian kept theſe provinces is paſt diſpute [n]. Eaſt Illyricum conſiſted of Macedon, the one and the other Epirus, Theſſaly, Achaia, Crete, both Dacia's, Upper Mœſia, Dardania, and Prævalitana [o].

Birth, education, employments, &c. of Theodoſius.

THEODOSIUS, whom Gratian raiſed to the empire, was, according to moſt authors, a native of Cauca in Galicia, which city ſtill retains the ſame name; but Marcellinus in his chronicle ſuppoſes him to have been born in Italica near Seville, the birth place of the emperor Trajan; and both that writer and Claudian reckon him among the great men of the Ulpian family, from which Trajan was ſprung [p]. Theodoſius reſembled that prince according to Victor, both in the features of his face, and the virtues of his mind; but was a ſtranger to the vices of Trajan, ſuch as drunkenneſs, incontinence, and ambition [q]. He was the ſon of Theſmantia and the celebrated Theodoſius, who conquered a new province in Britain, overcome Firmus in Africa, and was deſervedly accounted the greateſt commander of his age [r]. But his triumphs and great reputation having raiſed him many enemies at court, he was executed at Carthage in the year 376, the ſecond of Gratian's reign, as we have related above. Victor tells us, that the name of the emperor Theodoſius's father was Honorius [s]; but he is therein contradicted by Ammianus Marcellinus, and all the other writers. Both the emperor and his father, in moſt antient coins bear the prænomen of Flavius, which, after Conſtantine's time, became common to thoſe who had none of their own: whence ſome authors conclude, and perhaps not improbably, that the family of Theodoſius made no great figure before that prince's reign; and that Claudian and Victor only flattered him in deriving his pedigree from Trajan. Pacatus obſerves, that he was a native of Spain, as well as Trajan and Adrian; but takes not the leaſt notice of [n] Cod. Theod. l. xi. tit. 13 p. 100. & l. xiii. tit. 1. leg. 11. p. 14. [o] Notit. c. 3. p. 6. [p] Marcell. chron. p 78. Claud. p. 40. [q] Vict. p. 546, 547. [r] Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 368. [s] Vict. p. 546.

of his being of the ſame family, which we can ſcarce believe he would have omitted, had Theodoſius been allied to thoſe two great princes. He had, according to Victor, only one brother and a ſiſter, whoſe children he brought up with the ſame care as he did his own [t]. St. Ambroſe and Symmachus ſuppoſe him to have had ſeveral brothers [u]. One of his brothers, by name Honorius, had by his wife Maria, whom Claudian ſtyles one of the moſt illuſtrious women Spain ever produced, two daughters, Thermantia and Serena, of whom the latter was married to the famous Stilicho, and the former to another general, whoſe name is not mentioned [w]. Eucherius, whom we ſhall ſee conſul in 381, is ſuppoſed to have been another of the emperor's brothers [x]. The emperor himſelf was born in the year 346, ſo that he was advanced to the empire in the thirty-third year of his age [y]. We are told that he was called Theodoſius, not only becauſe his father had been ſo named, but becauſe both his parents were commanded in a dream to give him that name, ſignifying according to the import of the Greek word Theodoſius, that the child was in a particular manner the gift of God [z]. He ſerved under his father in Britain, when he was yet very young [a]; and being ſoon after created duke of Mœſia, he gained a memorable victory over the Samaritans in 374, being then only eighteen years old [b]. After the death of his father he withdrew to Spain, to avoid the ſtorm which threatened him too; and there led a retired life, employing his time partly in reading, and partly in works of agriculture, till he was recalled by Gratian in 373, and declared emperor [c]. He was then married to Flaccilla, called by moſt of the Greek writers Placilla, and by ſome Placidia. She is thought to have been the daughter of Antonius, who, after having been prefect of Italy and Gaul in 376, and the two following years, was raiſed to the conſulſhip in 382 [d]. She was a native of Spain [e], and ſiſter to the mother of Nebridius, who married Salvina, the daughter of Gildo a Mooriſh prince, and count of Africa [f]. Nebridius, was proconſul of Aſia in 396, but died ſoon after; for Salvina was a widow, when St. Jerom, who had lived in great intimacy timacy with the father of Nebridius, wrote to her in 400 [g]. Theodosius had at least three children by Flaccilla, viz. Arcadius, born about the year 377, during his father's retirement; for he was thirty when he died on the first of May 408. Honorius, born in 384, and a daughter, named Pulcheria, born before the year 379, since Theodosius had then according to Claudian [h], several children. To these some add, and among the rest St. Ambrose [i], and Themistius [k], a third son, named Gratian. They do not tell us whether he was the son of Flaccilla, or Galla, the emperor's second wife, of whom hereafter; but Gregory of Nyssa writes in express terms, that the emperor had by Flaccilla only three children, viz. two sons and one daughter [l]. Besides Gratian, who died before his father, the emperor had by Galla the celebrated Placidia, mother to Valentinian III. and another son; but the mother died in child-bed, and the child with her [m].

[t] Idem, p. 547. [u] Ambroſ. epiſt. 17. p. 214. Sym. l. x. epiſt. 57 p. 459. [w] Claud. de laud. Stil. p. 194. Cange Byz. fam. p. 75. [x] Themiſt. or. xvi. p. 203. [y] Theodor. l. v. c. 5 p. 710. [z] Vict. p. 46. [a] Zoſ. p. 760. [b] Ammi. an. l. xxix. p. 410. [c] Ambroſ. ſermo de diverſ. p. 125. Vict. p. 546. [d] Cod. Theod. tit. 6 p. 350. [e] Claud. ibid. p. 193. Hier. ep. 9. p. 73.

The joy which the news of Theodosius's promotion gave to all the subjects of the empire, was equal to the mighty opinion they entertained of his justice, integrity, moderation, and abilities in war; and truly, tho' commendations in the mouth of a poet are of no great weight, yet we cannot help thinking with Claudian, that the empire, without the assistance of Theodosius, would never have recovered its former lustre, but rather become a prey to the barbarians [n]. But to return to Gratian, he seems to have continued some months at Sirmium, after the promotion of Theodosius [o]; nay, Socrates, tho' in this place somewhat confused, tells us, that he gained considerable advantages over the barbarians, who surrounded him on all sides; and soon after set out for Gaul, upon intelligence, that the Germans were up in arms, and ready to break into that province [p]. He was at Aquileia in the beginning of July, and in the latter end of the same month at Milan [q], where he contracted great intimacy with St. Ambrose, to whom he ever after shewed the highest respect and veneration, as appears from a letter he wrote to him with his own hand, which in our opinion deserves no less to be admired for the elegance of the style, than for the pious and truly chriſtian ſentiments it contains [r]. It was at his requeſt that St. Ambroſe wrote, tho' unwilling to engage in religious debates, his excellent treatiſe on faith, in which he proves the divinity of the Son, and another proving the divinity of the Holy Ghoſt [s]. The pious emperor was ſo well pleaſed with theſe two pieces, that he immediately ordered a church to be delivered up to the catholics, which he had ſequeſtered at Milan in 380, with a deſign, as was thought, to give it to the Arians, out of complaiſance to his mother-in-law Juſtina. At the ſame time, revoking the law by which he had granted, the preceding year, liberty of conſcience to all ſects, he publiſhed another, forbidding all heretics, eſpecially the rebaptizers, to preach their tenets, or to hold aſſemblies in any part of the empire. This law is dated from Milan the third of Auguſt of the preſent year 379 [t], and was, no doubt, owing to the zeal of St. Ambroſe. Gratian left Milan ſoon after; and paſſing thro' Rhætia, the province of the Sequani, and Germania Prima, repaired to Treves, where he was on the fourteenth of September [u], and perhaps before; for he is ſaid to have marched with incredible expedition, and to have ſurprized the people of Gaul with his unexpected arrival [w]. He paſſed the winter at Treves, and conſequently was in that city, when Auſonius, upon the expiring of his conſulſhip, pronounced the oration, which has reached our times, thanking the emperor for that and the other honours he had conferred upon him [x]. This year we find the Lombards, whom we ſhall ſee two hundred years hence maſters of Italy, firſt mentioned in hiſtory. Proſper, who after having copied the chronicle of St. Jerom to this time, begins now one of his own, tells us, that the Lombards, abandoning the moſt diſtant coaſts of the ocean, and their native country Scandinavia, and ſeeking new ſettlements, as they were over ſtocked with people at home, attacked firſt, and overcame about this time the Vandals, a German nation. They were headed by two chiefs named Iboreus and Aionus, who dying about ten years after, they created Agelmond, ſon to the latter, their firſt king, who reigned thirty-three years [y]. We are told, that the Lombards, and the Gepidæ, were for many years one and the ſame nation; and that they paſſed

[g] Idem ibid. [h] Claud. ibid. p. 194. [i] Ambros. ibid. p. 122. [k] Themist p. 477. [l] Greg. Nyss. in funere Flaccillæ, p. 533. [m] Zos. l iv. p. 777. [n] Claud. consul Hon. c. 4. p. 40, 41. [o] Auson. ep. 2. p. 5, 6. [p] Socr. l. v. c. 6. p. 260. [q] Cod. Theodos. chron p. 100.

A law againſt heretics.

Gratian returns to Gaul.

The Lombards.

[r] Ambroſ de fide, p. 109—112. [s] Idem ibid. & de Spir. l. i. c. 1. p. 213. [t] Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 117. [u] Cod. Theod chron. p. 100. [w] Auſon. conſ. p. 411. [x] Idem ibid. [y] Proſp. chron. Grot. proleg. in hiſt. Goth. p. 53.

paſſed the Danube together about the year 400, in the reign of Honorius, who allowed them ſettlement about Sirmium and Singidunum. This is what Grotius writes upon the authority of Paulus Diaconus, who flouriſhed in the ninth century [z]. Grotius adds, that the Gepidæ, and conſequently the Lombards, held the tenets of Arius, and that they were originally Vandals [a]. Tho' we have ſaid after Grotius, that Proſper is the firſt author who mentions the Lombards, yet we muſt own, that their name is to be met with in Ptolemy, Tacitus and Strabo. But to this Grotius anſwers, that by the name of Lombards in thoſe authors are meant, not the people we are here ſpeaking of, but other German nations, who from their long beards were called Longobarbi and Longobardi.

We left Theodoſius at Sirmium, where he had been declared emperor on the nineteenth of January of this year 379. He was ſurrounded on all ſides by numberleſs multitudes of barbarians, who, after the defeat and death of Valens, ſcoured the neighbouring countries without reſtraint, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. Dacia, Thrace and Illyricum were already loſt. The Goths, the Taifali, the Alans and the Hunns, were maſters of the greateſt part of theſe provinces, and had ravaged and laid waſte the reſt: the Armenians, Iberians and Perſians, were likewiſe up in arms, and ready to take advantage of the preſent diſtracted ſtate of the empire [b]. What evils, ſays Gregory Nazianzen, have we not ſeen or heard of? whole countries have been deſtroyed with fire and ſword; many thouſand perſons of all ranks and ages have been inhumanly maſſacred; the rivers are ſtill dyed with blood, and the ground covered with heaps of dead bodies. Let us not aſcribe the calamities we ſuffer to the cowardice of our ſoldiers, who have conquered the world; our ſins, and the Arian impiety, which has ſo long prevailed, are the only cauſe of our misfortunes [c]. The few ſoldiers who had ſurvived the late defeat, ſtruck with terror and diſmay, kept within the cities and ſtrong-holds of Thrace, without daring ſo much as to look abroad, much leſs to make head againſt the victorious enemy, who moved about the country in great bodies [d]. Gratian, in all likelihood, gave the new emperor ſome troops; 'tis at leaſt certain, that he left with him two officers of great diſtinction, viz. count

The deplorable ſtate of the eaſtern provinces.

[z] Idem, ibid. p. 27. Paul. Diac. de geſt. Longobard. l. i. c. 2——16. p 746. [a] Grot. p. 27, 53. [b] Themiſt or. xvi. p. 207. [c] Greg. Naz. or. xiv. p. 214. [d] Themiſt. ibid. p. 180.

Ricomer, a Frank by nation, and Majorianus, who commanded the troops of Illyricum under Gratian, and was by Theodoſius raiſed to the poſt of general both of the horſe and foot. Both theſe officers diſtinguiſhed themſelves under Theodoſius in a very eminent manner, and gained great advantages over the Goths [e]. Theodoſius, leaving Sirmium ſoon after the departure of Gratian, repaired to Theſſalonica, the capital of Eaſt Illyricum, which Gratian had yielded to him, as we have obſerved above [f], and was ſtill there on the ſeventeenth of June [g]. During his ſtay in that metropolis, the chief cities of the eaſt ſent deputies to him, congratulating him upon his acceſſion to the ſovereign power, and craving his protection. At the head of the deputies from Conſtantinople was the celebrated orator Themiſtius, who, in a ſpeech which he pronounced on that occaſion, begged the emperor to confirm the privileges granted to that great metropolis by his anceſtors. The emperor received them all in a moſt obliging manner, promiſing to redreſs, as far as in him lay, the evils of which they complained [h]. Having reinforced his army with new levies, and made other preparations for war, during his ſtay at Theſſalonica, he took the field, probably about the end of June; for on the ſeventh of July he was at Scupi in Dardania, and on the tenth of Auguſt at a place called Vicus Auguſti [i], the ſituation of which is unknown to geographers. Several battles were fought this year, of which we can ſcarce give any account; for our beſt guide, Ammianus Marcellinus, fails us here; and other authors are ſo obſcure in their accounts, ſo inconſiſtent with each other, and often with themſelves, that we can ſcarce depend upon any thing they relate. Idatius [k], Proſper [l], and Oroſius [m], tell us, that many great battles were fought, and as many ſignal victories gained by Theodoſius. On the other hand, Zoſimus mentions but one battle, which he deſcribes at length; but as he ſtudies on all occaſions to detract as much as he can from the glory of Theodoſius, he aſcribes the ſignal victory that was gained, not to him, but to one Modares, a prince of royal extraction among the Goths, who had lately taken party with the Romans [n]. Zoſimus, prompted by his blind zeal for the worſhip worſhip of the idols, omits no opportunity of vomiting his venom againſt a prince who completed, as we ſhall ſee, the ruin of idolatry, which other princes had ſuffered out of policy, or had not been able utterly to extirpate. We ought to be very cautious in giving credit to what that writer relates to the prejudice of a prince, againſt whom he betrays on all occaſions an inveterate hatred, and unſurmountable prejudice. As to Modares, by whoſe conduct Thrace was delivered, according to that writer, from ruin and deſtruction, he was a man of great addreſs, intrepidity and experience in war. St. Gregory Nazianzen wrote ſome letters to him, wherein he extols his piety, and recommends to him the peace and tranquillity of the church [o]; whence we may conclude him to have been, not only a chriſtian, but a catholic. Proſper tells us, that Theodoſius not only overcame the Goths in ſeveral pitched battles, but forced them to repaſs the Danube, and by that means delivered Thrace from the inſupportable yoke under which it groaned [p]. Great numbers of them took part with the Romans, after having delivered up to the emperor ſome of the chief men among them as hoſtages. Thus Proſper, Zoſimus [q], and Sozomen [r]. However, it is no eaſy matter to determine, whither thoſe retired who repaſſed the Danube, ſince their own country was poſſeſſed by the Huns, who had driven them out. The operations of this campaign are by ſome authors confuſedly related, and only hinted at by others; and therefore we have not been able to give any diſtinct account of them. All we know for certain is, that part of the Goths ſubmitted to Theodoſius, and the reſt withdrew from Thrace. In this, at leaſt, all authors are unanimous. The emperor, having thus reſtored Thrace to its former tranquillity, returned in the latter end of the autumn to Theſſalonica, and there took up his winter-quarters.

The chief cities in the eaſt, ſend deputies to Theodoſius.

He gains ſeveral victories over the Goths.

[e] Sidon, car. v. p. 312. [f] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 751, [g] Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 99. [h] Themiſt. or. xiv. p. 180—183, Zoſ. l. iv. p. 751. [i] Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 100. [k] Idat. chron. faſt. [l] Proſper. chron. [m] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 34 p 229. [n] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 751, 752.

And delivers Thrace.

THE following year 380, the two emperors were conſuls, Gratian the fifth time, and Theodoſius the firſt. The former, after having paſſed the winter at Treves, from which place we find two laws dated the ſixth and fifteenth of February, ſet out early in the ſpring for Italy, and was on the fourteenth of March at Aquileia and at Milan on the twenty-fourth of April. From Milan he advanced to Sirmium, and continued till the end of the ſummer, partly in the neighbourhood of that city, and partly in Pannonia [s]. Theodoſius was ſeized in the month of February of this year with a dangerous malady; and this was what obliged Gratian to quit Gaul, and haſten into Illyricum, leſt the neighbouring barbarians ſhould lay hold of that opportunity to break into Thrace [t]. As the Goths were ſtill in arms, and threatened to paſs the Danube, Gratian, during the malady of his collegue, propoſed, and concluded a treaty of peace with them, which, however advantageous to their nation, was confirmed by Theodoſius upon his recovery [u]. One of the articles of this treaty was, if Zoſimus is to be credited, that the Goths, who ſerved in the Roman armies, ſhould be at liberty to quit the ſervice when they pleaſed, provided they found others to ſubſtitute in their room [w]. Gratian, by a law dated from Milan the twenty-fourth of April, exempts from the obligation of acting upon the ſtage ſuch women as had embraced the chriſtian religion, tho' bound by their birth to follow that infamous profeſſion [x]. He renewed the ſame law the following year, adding this clauſe to it, that if ſuch women behaved for the future more like players than chriſtians, they ſhould be condemned to ſerve the ſtage the remaining part of their lives, without remiſſion [y]. As for Theodoſius, being ſeized in the beginning of this year with a dangerous malady, as we have hinted above, he demanded with great earneſtneſs the ſacrament of baptiſm; which he received with exemplary piety at the hands of Aſcolus biſhop of Theſſalonica, after having carefully informed himſelf of the faith that prelate profeſſed. Finding him to be both orthodox in his belief, and blameleſs in his manners, the pious emperor immediately ſent for him to court, was baptized by him, and from that inſtant, the violence of the malady abating, he began to recover [z]. Soon after, the emperor gave a ſignal proof of his zeal for the orthodox faith, by the famous law dated from Theſſalonica the twenty-eighth of February of the preſent year 380. In that law Theodoſius declares, that he will have all his ſubjects, without exception, to adhere to the faith which the church of Rome had received of St. Peter, which was taught by Damaſcus biſhop of that city, and by Peter biſhop of Alexandria, a man of great ſanctity; that is, that they muſt all acknowledge and confeſs the divinity of the Father, of the Son, and of Gratian returns to Illyricum.

[o] Greg Naz. epiſt. 135, 136. p 864. [p] Proſp. chron. [q] Zoſ. p. 756. [r] Soſ. l. vii. c. 4 p. 707. [s] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 102—104.

And concludes a treaty with the Goths.

Theodoſius being ſeized with a dangerous malady is baptized.

His zeal for the orthodox faith.

[t] Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 27. p. 649. [u] Proſp. chron. [w] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 756. [x] Cod. Theod. l. xv. tit. 7. leg. 4. p. 365. [y] Idem, leg. 9. p. 371. & leg. viii. p. 370. [z] Ambroſ. ep. 21. p. 229. Soz. p. 707. Aug. civit. Dei, l. v. c. 26 p. 64.

of the Holy Ghoſt; that thoſe who held this doctrine, ſhould be deemed chriſtian catholics; but, on the contrary, ſuch as rejected it, ſhould be treated as heretics and infamous perſons; their conventicles ſhould not be called churches, and they themſelves ſhould undergo thoſe puniſhments, which were due to their wickedneſs, from the imperial authority and divine juſtice, it being a crime and a ſacrilege to depart from the true faith through contempt, nay, or out of ignorance [a]. This is that memorable law, which was addreſſed to the people of Conſtantinople, and to the prefect Eutropius, with orders to ſend it into all the provinces, and cauſe it to be every-where obſerved by the ſubjects of the empire [b]. To this law St. Auſtin, no doubt, alluded, when he wrote, that Theodoſius, upon his acceſſion to the empire, by a law full of mercy and juſtice, curbed the fury of the wicked, and relieved the church, long oppreſſed by the protection given by Valens to the Arians [c]. Beſides this, the emperor publiſhed ſeveral other laws this year, tending to the reformation of manners, viz. one dated the twenty-ſeventh of March forbidding all capital trials during the forty days preceding Eaſter; that is, during Lent; another of the eighteenth of December, prohibiting, under ſevere penalties, widows to marry during the time of mourning for their deceaſed huſbands, which was by this law extended from ten months to a whole year: ſeveral laws againſt informers, who were to be puniſhed with death, if they were found to have informed thrice, tho' their informations had always proved true. By a law dated the ſixteenth of November, the emperor declares it unlawful for any one to beg the eſtate of ſuch perſons as were condemned for treaſon; adding, whereas the importunity of ſuch petitioners often wreſts from the prince what he ought not to grant, his reſcript in their favour ſhall be of no force; and ſuch as ſhall by that means have obtained the confiſcated eſtates, ſhall be puniſhed as tranſgreſſors of the laws. Theſe eſtates he will have the prince to grant merely of his own motion [d]. Under other princes, the eſtates of perſons condemned for treaſon were frequently granted to thoſe who had accuſed them, which proved a great encouragement to informers; but this, and the other laws of Theodoſius, put a ſtop to their vile practices. By former laws, the eſtates of ſuch as had been baniſhed, or executed, cuted, fell to the exchequer; but Theodoſius, by two laws of this year, dated the ſeventeenth of June, orders the eſtates of the former to be divided between the exchequer and the criminal, or his children; and thoſe of the latter to be left entire to their children or grand children [c]. We are not told what induced the emperor to be more indulgent the children of thoſe who were executed, than to the children of ſuch as were only baniſhed. In caſes of treaſon, only one ſixth of the criminal's eſtate was to be left to his children, whether he was baniſhed or executed. The emperor publiſhed ſeveral other laws this year, which are ſo many inſtances of his good-nature, his application to buſineſs, and his care of the public welfare [f].

Several laws of this year.

[a] Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 2. leg. 25. p. 57. [b] Idem ibid. & Soſ. p. 708. [c] Auguſt. ibid. l. v. c. 26. p. 64. [d] Cod. Theod. l. x. tit. 10. leg. 15. p. 441.

The Goths re-enter Thrace.

NOTWITHSTANDING the treaty which the Goths had concluded with Gratian, during the malady of Theodoſius, that prince had no ſooner left Illyricum, to return to Gaul, than they paſſed the Danube, under the conduct of Fritigern, Alatheus, and Saphrax; and, breaking into Thrace and Pannonia, advanced as far as Macedon, deſtroying all with fire and ſword [g]. Zoſimus writes, that they laid waſte Theſſaly and Epirus, and penetrated as far as Achaia, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition [h]. Theodoſius, having in the mean time drawn together his troops, took the field; and coming up with the enemy on the frontiers of Macedon, thought it adviſeable not to venture an engagement with forces ſo much ſuperior to him in number; but to haraſs them, by cutting off their parties, and intercepting their convoys. The Goths, appriſed of his deſign, attacked the Roman camp in the dead of the night, made themſelves maſters of it, cut moſt of Theodoſius's men in pieces, and would have taken the emperor himſelf priſoner, had he not ſaved himſelf by a ſpeedy flight, while the Goths were buſied in plundering the tents [i]. Thus Zoſimus. But Idatius [k], Marcellinus [l], Gregory Nazianzen, who was then at Conſtantinople [m], and Philoſtorgius [n], an Arian writer, and conſequently no-ways partial to Theodoſius, aſſure us, that the emperor gained a complete victory over the Goths; and that, upon his return to Conſtantinople, which happened according to ſome, on the ſeventeenth, according to others, on the twenty-fourth, of November, entered that metropolis in triumph.

Theodoſius defeats the Goths.

[c] Idem, l. ix. tit. 42. leg. 8. p. 335. [f] Idem, l. ix. tit. 2. leg. 3. p. 29. tit. 3 leg. 6. p. 31. tit. 2. leg. 6. p. 32, & l. x tit. 18 leg. 2. p. 486. [g] Jorn. ibid. p. 649. [h] Zoſ. p. 756. [i] Idem p. 757. [k] Idat. faſt. [l] Marcel. chron. [m] Greg. Naz car 1. p. 20. [n] Philoſt. l ix. c 19. p. 133.

umph. Jornandes, who omits no opportunity of ſetting forth the exploits of his Goths, takes no notice of their pretended victory over Theodoſius. Beſides, Gregory Nazianzen deſcribes his triumphal entry into Conſtantinople, of which he was an eye witneſs; and adds, that he well deſerved that honour, for having checked the fury of the barbarians, who, confiding in their numbers and natural fierceneſs, had ventured to engage him. [o]. The emperor, ſoon after his arrival in that metropolis, appointed Gregory Nazianzen biſhop of the place in the room of the Arian biſhop Demophilus, who refuſed to ſubſcribe to the doctrine of the council of Nice. The emperor in perſon conducted the new biſhop to the great church, and put him in poſſeſſion, both of that, and of all the other churches in the city, with their revenues, driving out the Arians, who had held them for the ſpace of forty years [p]. Thus was the orthodox faith re-eſtabliſhed in the metropolis of the eaſt, about the latter end of this year 380. The next conſuls were Fl. Syagrius and Fl. Eucherius, uncle, as is ſuppoſed, to Theodoſius. Gratian was this year, as appears from the dates of ſeveral laws, at Milan on the twenty-ninth of March; at Aquileia on the twenty-ſecond of April and eighth of May; and at Treves on the fourteenth of October. He returned to Aquileia on the twenty-ſixth of December, and ſeems to have paſſed the winter in that city [q]. Valentinian had introduced the cuſtom of ſetting yearly at liberty ſome criminals, on occaſion of the feſtival of Eaſter. This cuſtom Gratian confirmed by a law addreſſed to Antidius, vicar of Rome; but excludes from ſuch indulgence all criminals guilty of treaſon, parricide, murder, adultery, rapes, inceſt, magic, all falſe coiners, and ſuch as had been pardoned before. This law was read at Rome on the twenty-firſt of July of this year 381 [r]. As to the affairs in the eaſt, Theodoſius continued at Conſtantinople, at leaſt to the nineteenth of July. During his ſtay in that metropolis, he publiſhed a law dated the tenth of January, forbidding heretics of all denominations to hold aſſemblies in cities, and commanding the churches throughout the empire to be immediately delivered up to the catholics. The execution of this memorable law was committed to Sapor, one of the greateſt generals of his time, who was ſent into the ſeveral provinces,

The orthodox faith re-eſtabliſhed in the eaſt.

All the churches delivered up to the catholics.

[o] Greg. Naz. car. i. p. 20, 21. [p] Socr. l. v. c. 7. p. 263, 264. Greg. Naz. ibid. [q] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 104, 105. [r] Idem, l. ix. tit. 31. leg. 6. p. 275.

provinces, with orders every-where to drive out the heretics, and put the catholic paſtors in poſſeſſion of the churches the ſectaries had uſurped. Sapor met no-where with the leaſt difficulty in the execution of his commiſſion, except at Antioch, where the catholics were divided among themſelves [s]. Philoſtorgius writes, that the Arians were not only driven from the churches, but from the city of Conſtantinople [t]. This year Athanaric, the moſt powerful of all the Gothiſh princes, who had maintained a three years war with Valens, as we have related above, being driven out by a faction at home, took refuge in the Roman territories, notwithſtanding his pretended oath never to tread on Roman ground; and coming to Conſtantinople, was there received with great marks of friendſhip by Theodoſius, who went out to meet him, and attended him, and his numerous retinue, into the city on the eleventh of January of the preſent year. But Athanaric died ſoon after, viz. on the twenty-fifth of the ſame month; and Theodoſius cauſed him to be buried after the Roman manner, with ſuch pomp and ſolemnity, that the Goths, who had attended him in his flight, aſtoniſhed at the magnificence of the funeral, returned home, reſolved never to moleſt the Romans; nay, out of gratitude to the emperor, who had thus honoured the memory of their deceaſed prince, they took upon them to guard the banks of the Danube, and prevented the Romans from being attacked on that ſide [u]. Oroſius writes, that the emperor's generous behaviour to Athanaric made ſuch a deep impreſſion on all theGothiſh nations, that, charmed with his virtue and ſingular good-nature, they renounced all farther thoughts of war, and ſubmitted to the laws of the empire [w]. The ſame thing is confirmed by Idatius and Marcellinus; but this did not happen till the third of October of the following year, as we ſhall relate anon. A few days after the arrival of Athanaric at Conſtantinople, and before his death, the philoſoper Themiſtius pronounced his fifteenth oration in the palace before the emperor, in which he obſerves, among other things, that Theodoſius, who was then in the third year of his reign, had granted innumerable favours, but had not yet condemned one perſon to death [x]. The pious emperor, no leſs deſirous to heal the diviſions that rent the church, than to redreſs

Athanaric recurs to Theodoſius, dies, and is interred at Conſtantinople.

[s] Idem, l. vi. tit. 5. leg. 6. p. 117, 118. Theodoret. l. v. c. 2. p. 706. [t] Philoſt. l. 9. c. 19. p. 522. [u] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 758, 759, Oroſ. l. vii. c. 34. p. 220. [w] Oroſ. ibid. [x] Themiſt. orat. xv. p. 185—190.

dreſs the abuſes which prevailed in the ſtate, ſummoned this year, in the month of May, the ſecond general of œcumenical council, which was held at Conſtantinople by all the biſhops of his dominions [y]. While the council was aſſembling, the emperor publiſhed a law dated the ſecond of May, depriving ſuch as had renounced the chriſtian religion to embrace paganiſm, of the right of diſpoſing of any thing by will [z]. By a law dated the eighth of the ſame month, he extends that penalty to the Manichees, whoſe eſtates he declares confiſcated, unleſs their children ſhould embrace the true religion; in which caſe they were to enjoy the inheritance of their parents [b]. In a council held before the emperor on the twenty-ninth of June, Theodoſius declared, that the reſpect due to the prieſthood not ſuffering biſhops to be ſummoned to the public courts as witneſſes, they were by the laws exempted from the obligation of appearing there [c]. By another law dated the nineteenth of July, he forbids the Eunomians and Arians to build churches, either in the cities, or in the country, and declares the places where they ſhall have preached, or performed any other function, confiſcated [d]. All theſe laws are dated from Conſtantinople; but two others, of the twenty-firſt of July, from Heraclea in Thrace [e], whither the emperor had advanced againſt ſuch of the barbarians as were ſtill in arms. Zoſimus tells us, that having demanded aſſiſtance of Gratian, that prince ſent him a conſiderable body of troops commanded by Baudo, or Bauto, and Arbogaſtes, who were both Franks, but experienced officers, and greatly attached to the empire. The former was father to Eudoxia the wife of Arcadius, and maintained a correſpondence by letters with Symmachus [f]. Of the latter we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter. Upon the arrival of theſe two renowned commanders, the Goths, who were ravaging Macedon and Theſſaly retired with great precipitation into Thrace; but not being able to ſubſiſt in that province, which they themſelves had laid waſte the preceding year, they were forced to ſue for peace, and ſubmit to Theodoſius [g]. Thus Zoſimus, detracting, according to his cuſtom, as much as he can, from the glory of Theodoſius. However, he owns, that the emperor gained a complete victory over the Scyri and Carpodacæ, who had, jointly with the Hunns, broken

The ſecond œcumenical council.

Several laws of Theodoſius againſt heretics.

The Scyri and Carpodacæ defeated by Theodoſius.

[y] Socr. l. v. c. 8. p 264. [z] Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 7. leg. 1. p. 203. [b] Idem, tit. 5. leg. 7. p. 120. [c] Idem, l. xi. tit. 39. leg. 8 p. 327. [d] Idem, tit. 1. leg. 3 p. 9. [e] Cod. Theod. chron. p, 105. [f] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 757. Symm. l. iv. ep. 15, 16 p. 150. [g] Zoſ. ibid. p. 758.

broken into the empire, and that he obliged them to repaſs the Danube [h]. We find the Scyri frequently mentioned amongſt the northern barbarians; but of the Carpodacæ no farther notice is taken in hiſtory. This campaign ended, it ſeems, in September; for, on the fifth of that month, the emperor was at Adrianople, and on the twenty-eighth at Conſtantinople, where he continued the remaining part of the year [i].

THE following year 382, when Antonius, called alſo by ſome Antoninus, and ſuppoſed to have been father-in-law to Theodoſius, was conſul with Syagrius, the neighbouring barbarians broke into Italy; but were ſoon driven back by Gratian, who paſſed the greateſt part of this year at Milan, or in that neighbourhood, watching their motions [k]. From ſome laws publiſhed in the month of September of this year, it appears, that the emperor was forced to raiſe new levies, and demand extraordinary ſubſidies, for the defence of Rhætia and Illyricum. A law dated the fifteenth of December informs us, that perſons of fortune were obliged to ſupply the army with horſes [l]. As Rome was infeſted by multitudes of beggars, Gratian by a law dated the twentieth of June, orders Severus, prefect of the city, to ſeize ſuch of them as were capable of earning their livelihood by working, and to beſtow them upon thoſe who ſhall have informed againſt them, either as ſlaves if they were ſuch by condition, or to be employed the remaining part of their lives, if they were free-born, in tilling their grounds, and in other works of agriculture [m]. By another law dated the eighteenth of Auguſt, he ſuſpends, for the ſpace of thirty days, the execution of all criminals, reckoning from the day they received ſentence. By another law, he ordered the altar of Victory, which ſtood in the place where the Roman ſenate aſſembled, to be removed, and declared the revenues belonging to it confiſcated [n]. This altar had been removed by Conſtantius, when he came to Rome in 357, but re-eſtabliſhed by Julian in 361, and ſuffered to continue there by Valentinian, who allowed to all his ſubjects the free exerciſe of what religion they liked beſt. At the ſame time, Gratian declared void and null all the privileges and exemptions granted by other emperors to the pagan pontiffs, or to the veſtal virgins, ordering the officers of

A law of Gratian againſt beggars.

He cauſes the altar of Victory to be removed out of the ſenate.

[h] Idem, p. 759. [i] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 105 [k] Idem, p. 106. [l] Cod. Theod. l. ii. tit. 4 leg. 3. p. 149. [m] Idem. l. xvi. tit. 2 p. 256, 257. [n] Idem, l. x. tit. 10. leg. 10. p. 259

of the revenue to ſeize on the lands, which, for the future, ſhould be bequeathed to them or their temples. The pagan ſenators ſent deputies, at the head of whom was Symmachus, to try whether they could prevail upon the emperor to revoke theſe laws; but Gratian would not ſo much as admit them to his preſence [o]. The heretics met with no leſs ſevere treatment in the eaſt from Theodoſius, than the pagans in the weſt from Gratian; for by a law dated the laſt of March, he declared ſuch of the Manichees, as were then known by the names of Encratitæ, Saccofori, and Hydroparaſtatæ, that is, the continent, the ſack-bearers, the water-drinkers, guilty of death, encouraging all to inform againſt them, and likewiſe againſt ſuch as, in the celebration of Eaſter, differed as to the day from other chriſtians; theſe he likewiſe pronounced guilty of death [p]. All the laws enacted this year by Theodoſius are dated from Conſtantinople; which gives us room to believe, that he continued in that city without taking the field, the Goths having, by their deputies, offered to ſubmit to him, as we have related above. As they had been driven out of Macedon, and ſhut up in Thrace, where they could not ſubſiſt, Theodoſius, not caring to drive them to deſpair, received their deputies in a very obliging manner; and as they could not return to their own country, which was held by the Hunns, upon their laying down their arms, he gave them leave to ſettle in Thrace and Mœſia, which two provinces were almoſt quite diſpeopled by the frequent incurſions of the neighbouring barbarians, and the late wars. The emperor exempted them from all the tributes and taxes that were paid by the other ſubjects of the empire [q]. This was in all likelihood one of the articles on which they ſubmitted. Great numbers of them entered into the Roman ſervice; but formed a ſeparate body, and were commanded by officers of their own nation, which proved the ſource of many evils; but as they were well acquainted with the avarice, injuſtice, and cruelty of the Roman officers, they refuſed to put themſelves into their power, and inſiſted upon their continuing united, in order to ſecure themſelves againſt ſuch inſults as they had reaſon to apprehend, when diſperſed among the Roman troops. Zoſimus does not forget to blame the conduct of Theodoſius, and his want of foreſight, in this particular [r]; but Themiſtius, in a ſpeech which he pronounced

Laws of Theodoſius againſt heretics.

The Goths ſubmit to Theodoſius.

[o] Ambr. ep 11. p. 195. Symm. l. x. ep. 54. p. 455, 456.
[p] Cod. Theod. l. xiv. tit. 10. leg. i. p. 208. & l. xvi. tit. 5. leg 9. p. 124. [q] Themiſt. orat. xvi. p. 199. [r] Zos. p 758.

nounced before the emperor himſelf, tells him, that he gained by his indulgence and good-nature the barbarians, whom he was not perhaps in a condition to conquer by force of arms [s]. The Goths therefore were not yet ſo far weakened, as to ſubmit to what terms the emperor thought fit to impoſe upon them [t].

THE next conſuls were Fl. Merobaudes the ſecond time, and Flavius Saturninus. Gratian was, from the twenty-ninth of January of this year 383, to the ſecond of May, at Milan; at Padua on the twenty ſeventh and twenty-eighth of the ſame month; and at Verona on the ſeventeenth of June [u]. He publiſhed ſeveral excellent laws this year, and among the reſt one dated the nineteenth of January, revoking all the privileges and exemptions granted to particular perſons, to the prejudice of the body to which they belonged [w]; another dated the twenty-ſeventh of February, inflicting ſevere penalties on ſuch as ſhould conceal deſerters or robbers [x]; a third, condemning informers to ſuch puniſhments as were due to the crimes of which they accuſed others, when they could not make good the charge [y]; a fourth, forbidding any deference to be paid to ſuch orders as tribunes, ſecretaries, counts, or any other perſons, however dignified and diſtinguiſhed, ſhould pretend to have received from the emperor by word of mouth [z]: the former of theſe two laws is dated the twenty-ſeventh of May, and the latter the ſeventeenth of June. By a law dated the twenty-ſecond of May, he declares thoſe incapable of diſpoſing of their eſtates by will, who ſhall renounce the chriſtian religion to embrace paganiſm, Judaiſm, or the execrable tenets of the Manichees. Thoſe by whom they ſhall have been ſeduced, are ſubjected to the ſame penalty [a]. This year is remarkable for a dreadful famine, that raged in Rome, but more on account of the diſturbances that were raiſed in the ſtate by Maximus, and put an end to the life and reign of the excellent emperor Gratian. That uſurper, named Magnus Clemens Maximus, was by birth a Briton, as a learned modern writer pretends to gather from Socrates [b]; but, in our opinion, that author ſpeaks of the place where he began to reign, and not of the place

Several laws publiſhed by Gratian.

[s] Themiſt. ibid. p. 211. [t] Idem, p. 212. [u] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 108, 109. [w] Cod. Theod. l. xi. tit. 13. p. 100. [x] Idem, l. ix. tit. 29. leg. 2. p. 222. [y] Idem, tit. 1. leg. 14. p. 19. [z] Idem, l. i. tit. 3. leg. 1. p 27. [a] Idem, l. xv. tit, 7. leg. 3. p 205. [b] Uſſer. eccleſ. Britan. antiq. p. 199.

place of his nativity [c], as does likewiſe Gildas [d]. Pacatus who flouriſhed in thoſe times, aſſures us, that he was a ſtranger in Britain, and had been baniſhed into this iſland [e]. Zoſimus writes, that he was a native of Spain [f], which is not improbable, ſince it is certain, that he pretended to be allied to Theodoſius. He was brought up, ſays Pacatus, in the family of Theodoſius as a ſervant, and employed in the meaneſt offices [g]. Zoſimus pretends, that he ſerved in Britain with Theodoſius, who, as we have obſerved above, attended his father into this iſland in the year 368. Be that as it will, ſeeing Theodoſius raiſed to the empire, ſays Zoſimus, while he could not attain to ány creditable employment, prompted by jealouſy and envy, he began to foment the averſion of the Roman ſoldiers to Gratian, whom they looked upon as too great an encourager of foreigners; inſomuch that in the end they revolted, declared Maximus emperor, and, with the uſual ſolemnity, gave him the purple and diadem. He gave out, that he was allied to Theodoſius, and that it was with his participation and conſent he had taken upon him the ſovereignty [h]. Thus Zoſimus. But Sulpicius Severus[i], and Oroſius [k], tell us, that the ſoldiers mutinying, forced him to accept the purple. The authority of theſe two authors, of whom the former flouriſhed at that very time, and the other ſoon after, is of great weight with us. Oroſius ſtyles him a man of courage, and worthy of the empire, had he attained it by lawful means [l]; and Sulpicius ſpeaks of him as one, who, abating this uſurpation, deſerved in every other reſpect to be eſteemed and commended [m]. Gregory of Tours writes, that, before his uſurpation, he had gained ſeveral ſignal victories in Britain [n]; and ſome modern authors, that he drove the Scots quite out of the iſland [o]. But neither is conſiſtent with what we have related above out of Zoſimus. Maximus at firſt was ſupported only by a ſmall number of the inhabitants of this iſland; but others flocking to him from all parts of Britain, he found himſelf in a very ſhort time at the head of a numerous army, which, without loſs of time, he tranſported into Gaul; and landing at the mouth of the Rhine, he prevailed

Maximus revolts in Britain.

His character.

He paſſes over into Gaul.

[c] Vid. Socr. l. v. c. 11. p. 270. [d] Gild. de excid. Britan. c. 10. p. 117. [e] Pacat. p. 263, 269. [f] Zoſ. p. 760. [g] Pacat. p. 264. [h] Zoſ. p. 760. [i] Sulp. Sev. vit. S. Martin. c. 23, p. 208. [k] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 34. p. 220. [l] Oroſ. ibid. [m] Sulp. Sev. l. ii. c. 7. p. 290. [n] Greg. Tur. hiſt. Franc. l. i. c. 43. p. 30. [o] Vide Uſſ. eccleſ. Brit. antiq. p 592.

vailed upon the neighbouring provinces to revolt from Gratian, and join him, not ſo much by force of arms, as by art and addreſs [p], extending, ſays Gildas, by lyes and perjuries the empire which he had acquired by wickedneſs and rebellion [q]. Gratian was then making war upon the Germans, called Juthongi; but he no ſooner heard of the arrival of the uſurper in Gaul, than he haſtened to Treves, to put a ſtop to his farther progreſs. On his march, great numbers of his troops, gained over by the emiſſaries of Maximus, abandoned him, to take part with the uſurper. However, thinking himſelf ſtill a match for Maximus, he left Treves, went in queſt of his enemy, and offered him battle [r]. Baronius writes, that Gratian, finding himſelf abandoned by his own troops, had called the Hunns and Alans to his aſſiſtance, and that his army conſiſted chiefly of thoſe barbarians [s]. The learned Uſher was once of the ſame opinion [t]; but afterwards retracted it [u]; St. Ambroſe, on whoſe authority it was grounded, ſpeaking in the letter quoted by Baronius [w], not of Gratian, but of Valentinian II. Gratian's army was commanded by Merobaudes, and count Balio, an officer of known valour and fidelity [x]. Some authors write, that a battle was fought near Paris [y]. But Zoſimus tells us, that the two armies continued for five days together in the preſence of each other, without any action, except a few ſkirmiſhes, in which no great advantage was gained on either ſide; but that in the end the troops of Gratian, provoked at his ſhewing ſo much favour, and giving the preference, to foreigners, as if he chiefly relied on their courage and fidelity, ſhamefully deſerted him, and went over to Maximus. Gratian, ſeeing himſelf thus betrayed and abandoned, fled towards the Alps, attended only by three hundred horſemen; and having got into Lions, after he had been refuſed admittance into other cities, he was there taken priſoner, and ſoon after put to death [z]. That he was put to death at Lions, all authors agree, except Zoſimus, who miſtook, as is ſuppoſed, Singidunum in Mœſia for Lugdunum in Gaul. Socrates [a] and Sozomen [b] relate his death with ſeveral cir-

Gratian abandoned by his army.

And put to death at Lyons.

Andra-

[p] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 760. [q] Gild. excid. Brit. c. 10, 11. p. 117.
[r] Socr. l. v. c. 11. p. 270. Soz. l. vii. c. 13. p. 720. Zoſ. p. 760.
[s] Baron ad ann. 583. [t] Uſſ Brit. eccleſ. antiq. p. 590.
[u] Idem ibid. p. 1058. [w] Ambroſ. ep. 56. p. 320. [x] Proſper. p. 267. Ambroſ. ep. 56. p. 320, 321. [y] Proſp. Tyro. chron. [z] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 34. p. 220. Hier. chron. p. 26. Ambroſ. pſal. lxi. p. 746. [a] Socr. l. v. c. 11. p. 270.
[b] Soz. l. vii. c. 13 p. 721.

cumſtances unknown to other writers; for they tell us, that Andragathius, who was general of the horſe under Maximus, and ſent by him to purſue Gratian, coming up with the fugitive prince as he was croſſing the Rhone, put himſelf into a cloſe litter, and ordered his men to give out, that in the litter was the empreſs Læta, whom Gratian had lately married, going to her huſband. The emperor, giving credit to this report, and impatient to ſee one whom he ſo tenderly loved, turned back to meet her; but while he was ſtanding with open arms ready to receive her, Andragathius, ſtarting out of the litter, ſeized him, and ſoon after put him to death. This account cannot be reconciled with what we read in St. Ambroſe, a contemporary writer, viz. that Gratian was betrayed by a perſon whom he had truſted with entire provinces: that being by the traitor invited to a banquet, he refuſed at firſt to comply with the invitation, ſuſpecting ſome treachery; but being in the end deceived by falſe oaths, and feigned proteſtations, he came to the banquet, but was murdered, as he withdrew by thoſe who had feaſted with him [c]. Theſe circumſtances are not mentioned by hiſtorians; only Oroſius and Marcellinus write, that he was ſurpriſed by the craft and artifice of Maximus, and ſoon after put to death [d]. Thus died Gratian in the flower of his age, having lived only twenty-four years, and three or four months, and reigned, from the time he had been created emperor, ſixteen years, and one day, but from the death of his father, only ſeven years, and nine months [e]. He married in 374 or 375 Conſtantia, the poſthumous daughter of the emperor Conſtantius, and had by her a ſon, and other children [f]; but they all died, it ſeems, before him [g], as did likewiſe his wife Conſtantia, whoſe body was brought this very year to Conſtantinople, according to Idatius and the chronicle of Alexandria, on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, and interred on the ſecond of December. Gratian not long before his death married to his ſecond wife Læta [h], to whom, as well as to her mother, by name Piſſamine, Theodoſius allowed a yearly penſion, to ſupport them according to their rank, which they employed in relieving the poor of Rome, while that city was beſieged by Alaric in the year 408 [i]. The death of Gratian was no ſooner known at Milan, than St. Ambroſe, who had lived in great intimacy with him, and was, as appears from his works, deeply affected with the loſs of ſuch an excellent and inimitable prince, as he ſtyles him, ſet out in great haſte from that city to demand his body of Maximus in the name of Valentinian. But the uſurper refuſed it to him, pretending, that the tranſporting of his aſhes would ſerve only to renew the grief of the ſoldiery [k]. However, they were afterwards brought to Milan, and interred there near the tomb of Valentinian II.

[c] Ambroſ. pſal. lxi. p. 848. [d] Oros. p 220. Marcell. chron. [e] Socr. l. v. c. 11. p. 270. Marcell. chron. [f] Aug. civit. Dei, l. v. c. 25. Ambr de fid. l. i. c. 20. [g] Theodor. l. v. c. 12 p. 722. [h] Soz. l. vii. c. 13. p. 721. [i] Idem ibid. Zos. l. v. p. 815.

His character.

As for his character, all writers, whether chriſtians or pagans, agree, that he was endowed with every good quality that can be deſired in a prince, extolling with one voice his modeſty, his juſtice, his moderation, and deſire of doing good to all, in which he ſeemed to place his chief happineſs. Ammianus Marcellinus, tho' a zealous pagan, writes, that he would have equalled the greateſt princes of antiquity, had he lived longer; but at the ſame time blames him, as being too much addicted to hunting, and other diverſions [l], which may be juſtly imputed to his youth, and for which he would, in all likelihood, have made ample amends by applying ſeriouſly to buſineſs in his riper years. St. Ambroſe, Theodoret, Rufinus, Auſonius, and even Zoſimus himſelf, give us a great idea of his piety, in which he ſurpaſſed all the princes who had reigned before him, Conſtantine himſelf not excepted. St. Ambroſe, in his anſwer to a letter the emperor had written to him, gives him the title of moſt chriſtian [m]. The many laws he enacted in favour of the catholics, are ſo many inſtances of his zeal for the orthodox faith. Tho' none of the chriſtian princes his predeceſſors had ſcrupled to aſſume the habit of the high pontiff of the pagans, yet when it was, according to cuſtom, brought to him, he rejected it, ſaying, that it was not conſiſtent with the principles of the chriſtian religion to wear that habit. Thus Zoſimus [n]; but it will be no eaſy taſk to prove, that either Conſtantine after his converſion, or any other chriſtian prince, ever aſſumed the habit or title of PONTIFEX MAXIMUS, though the latter was commonly given to them by the pagans, and even to Gratian himſelf [o]. The pagan prieſts, adds Zoſimus, finding the emperor would not accept either of the habit or title of high-pontiff, the chief man among them uttered theſe memorable words; If the prince will not be ſtyled pontifex maximus, Maximus will

Is ſaid to be the firſt who rejected the title of high pontiff.

[k] Ambroſ. pſal. lxi. p. 849. [l] Ammian. l. xxvii. p. 344
[m] Ambroſ. de fid p. 110. [n] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 761. [o] Grut. p 160. Baron. ann. 312.

will ſoon become pontifex [p], foretelling, that Maximus would be raiſed to the empire. But this pretended prediction, or, as we may call it, pun, was, without all doubt, invented after the revolt of Maximus. However that be, Maximus was no ſooner informed of the death of Gratian, than he took his ſoon Flavius Victor for his collegue in the power he had uſurped, and gave him, though then only an infant, the title of Auguſtus, as we read in Victor the hiſtorian †; which is confirmed by ſome antient inſcriptions [q], tho' Zoſimus gives him only the title of Cæſar [r]. The uſurper fixed the ſeat of his empire at Treves, and extended his wings, to uſe the expreſſion of Gildas [s], over Spain and Britain, being maſter, according to Zoſimus [t], of all the countries, which Gratian, in the diviſion of the weſtern provinces, had reſerved for his own ſhare. We do not find, that he put any of Gratian's favourites to death, except Merobaudes, the conſul of this year, and Balio, or, as ſome ſtyle him, Vallio, one of the beſt officers of his age; their only crime was their inviolable attachment to Gratian, by whom they had been raiſed for their eminent ſervices to the greateſt offices in the ſtate [u]. Merobaudes received orders from the tyrant to diſpatch himſelf, which he did accordingly, to avoid a more ignominious death [w]. Pacatus writes, that Balio was ſtrangled in his own houſe by the Britons, who ſerved under Maximus [x]; but from St. Ambroſe it appears, that the uſurper had commanded him to be conveyed to Challon on the Saone, to be there burnt alive; but that he, by a violent death, prevented the execution of ſo cruel a ſentence [y]. Proſper, in his chronicle, writes, that Gratian was betrayed by Merobaudes; but is therein contradicted by all other writers, and the death of that brave officer ſufficiently clears him from ſo black an aſperſion: whence in the chronicle of Proſper, ſome, inſtead of Merobaudes, read Mellobaudes; for Mellobaudes, king of the Franks, ſerved under Gratian in quality of comes domeſticorum [z]; and treachery was in thoſe days the peculiar character of that nation. Maximus commanded count Narſes likewiſe, and Leucadius, governor of a province, to be put to death for their attachment to Gratian; but was prevailed upon by the famous St. Martin to ſpare

Maximus declares his ſon Victor his collegue.

Puts Merobaudes and Balio to death.

[p] Zoſ. ibid. † Vict. p. 546. [q] Rein. p. 326. [r] Zoſ. p. 770. [s] Gild. excid. Brit c 10 p. 117. [t] Zoſ. p. 766. [u] Pacat. p. 267. Ambroſ. ep 56. p. 320. [w] Pacat. ibid. [x] Idem ibid. [y] Ambroſ. ep. 56. p. 321. [z] Vide Valeſ. rer. Fran. l. ii. p. 59.

them [a]. Paulinus Diaconus, in his life of St. Ambroſe, tells us, that that prelate was ſent into Gaul to propoſe an accommodation between Maximus and young Valentinian; on which occaſion he treated the uſurper as one cut off from the communion of the church, exhorting him to attone by a ſincere repentance for the enormous crime he had committed in imbruing his hands in the blood of an innocent prince, his lawful ſovereign: the ſame author adds, that other biſhops, more complaiſant, flocking from all parts to the tyrant's court, by their low and ſhameful flatteries, lulled him aſleep in his wickedneſs [b]. As Maximus had brought over with him into Gaul the flower of the Britiſh youth, and the Roman ſoldiers quartered in the iſland, the country remained by that means expoſed to the incurſions of the Scots and Picts, who meeting with little or no oppoſition, over-ran the northern parts, committing every-where dreadful ravages. The Romans now-and-then ſent over troops to drive them back into their own country; but they conſtantly returned, and continued thus harraſſing the Roman provinces till the arrival of the Angles and Saxons, who made themſelves maſters of that part of the iſland which is now known by the name of England, about the middle of the fifth century [c]. Thoſe Britons, who attended Maximus into Gaul, never returned to their native country; but are ſuppoſed to have ſettled in Armorica, which was allotted to them by Maximus, and from its new inhabitants called Britania, now Bretagne [d]. Colonies are ſaid to have been ſent from this iſland into Bretagne at three different times, viz. in the reign of Conſtantius Chlorus, the father of Conſtantine the Great, during the uſurpation of Maximus, and when the Angles made themſelves maſters of this iſland [e]. The antients mention the latter, but take no notice of the other two colonies; which gives us room to queſtion the truth of what the moderns have written on that head. Conſtantius, who in the end of the fifth century wrote the life of St. Germain of Auxerre, calls Bretagne, Armorica [f]; but Sidonius of Clermont, who flouriſhed about the ſame time, ſpeaks of Britons inhabiting the country that borders on the Loire [g]; nay, amongſt his letters we find one to Riotham their king [h]. That the Britons, tons, who went over with Maximus, ſettled in Armorica among the natives of the country, is not affirmed by any antient hiſtorian, but may be looked upon as a conjecture not altogether improbable; but that they, driving out the antient proprietors, made themſelves abſolute maſters of the country under the conduct of their leader Conon Meriodoc; and wanting women, had recourſe to Dionotus, or Diodochus, king of Cornwall, who ſent them his own daughter, by name Urſula, with eleven thouſand young women of quality, and ſixty thouſand of an inferior rank, is now deemed an arrant fable, even by the Roman-catholic writers. Had the Britons wanted women, they would, without all doubt, have kept thoſe of the country, when they drove out the men. Beſides, it is altogether improbable, that Cornwall was ſo ſtocked with women as to ſpare ſeventy-one thouſand virgins. The fleet, fraught with theſe unhappy virgins, is ſuppoſed to have been driven by a ſtorm to the mouth of the Rhine, and to have ſailed up that river to Cologn, where they fell into the hands of the barbarians, who fought for Gratian againſt Maximus, and were by them either put to death, or carried into captivity. Urſula is ſtill revered in the church of Rome as a ſaint; but the number of eleven thouſand virgins, ſaid to have ſuffered martyrdom with her, has been not many years ſince left out of the Roman breviary. Of Auſonius, who was preceptor to Gratian, we ſhall ſpeak in note (L).

The Britiſh, who attended Maximus into Gaul, are ſuppoſed to have ſettled in Bretagne.

[a] Sulp. dialog. iii. c. 15. p. 321. [b] Paul Diac. vit Ambroſ. p. 82, 83. [c] Gild. c. 11 p. 117. [d] Idem ibid. Uſſer. ibid. p. 199, 200. [e] Uſſer. ibid. p. 421. [f] Surius, 31 Jul. p. 366. [g] Sidon. l. i. ep. 7. p. 16. [h] Idem, l. iii. ep. 9. p. 73, 74.

(L) Decius, or rather Decimus Magnus Auſonius, was a native of Bourdeaux. He tells us, that he was deſcended of a noble family (15); however, his father, who was a native of Bazas, and lived at Bourdeaux, followed the profeſſion of phyſic, till his ſon procured him the rank and title of honorary prefect of Illyricum. He practiſed gratis, and was generally eſteemed a man of learning; but, what may ſeem ſtrange, was better acquainted with the Greek than the Latin tongue. He died in 377, at the age of eighty eight or ninety (16). Cæcilius Argicius Arborius, uncle to Auſonius by the mother, was born in Autun, and deſcended of an illuſtrious family; but his father and uncle being proſcribed in the reign of Gallienus and Aurelian, he was obliged to abandon his country, and retire to Bayonne, where he married Æmilia Corinthia Maura, deſcended of a good family, and had by her one ſon, named Æmilius Magnus Arborius, and three daughters, Hiluria, Dryadia and Æonia: Arborius

(15) Auſon. grat. act. pro conſul. p 389. (16) Idem, parent. i. idyl 30. p. 355--359.

But to reſume the thread of the hiſtory. Theodoſius, who had never ſtirred this year from Conſtantinople, or the neighbourhood rius was a celebrated profeſſor of eloquence; Hilaria profeſſed celibacy, and became famous for her virtue; Dryadia was betrothed, but died a little before the celebrations of her nuptials; Æonia was mother to Auſonius. Julia Cataphronia, the ſiſter of Julius Auſonius, our author's father, embraced the ſtate of virginity, and lived to a great age (17). As for Auſonius himſelf, he ſtudied rhetoric under his uncle Arborius at Tolouſe, where Arborius taught about the year 325, before he was invited to Conſtantinople by Conſtantine: he ſtudied likewiſe at Bourdeaux under Minervius, Nepotianus, and Staphylus, profeſſors of grammar and rhetoric (18). When he had ended his ſtudies, he firſt pleaded at the bar, and afterwards taught grammar and rhetoric; which profeſſion he followed for the ſpace of near thirty years, till he was by Valentinian I. appointed preceptor to his ſon Gratian in 367, whom he attended into Germany the following year 368 (19). He had ſoon after ſome employment at court with the title of comes or count, and was by degrees raiſed to the firſt offices in the ſtate. Valentinian made him quæſtor, and had even promiſed him the conſulſhip (20). After the death of Valentinian, Gratian raiſed him to the high ſtation of præfectus prætorio, firſt of Italy and Africa, and afterwards of Gaul. He was prefect of Gaul, and likewiſe conſul, in 379 (21). He was, it ſeems, at Treves when Gratian was killed (22); but ſoon after retired to Guienne (23). In a letter to Paulinus about the year 392, he deſcribes the place where he then led a retired life (24), which is ſuppoſed to have been in Saintonge. He profeſſed, without all doubt, the chriſtian religion; but his writings are, even in the opinion of Scaliger, altogether unworthy of the chriſtian name, being filled with pagan expreſſions, and the moſt bare-faced obſcenities, in which he ſurpaſſes the moſt infamous among the pagan poets. As for his ſtyle, it is commended by ſome, and found fault with by others. The reader will find the different opinions of critics concerning his writings in Baillet (25). His works, which give ſome light to neighbourhood of that metropolis, was no ſooner informed of the death of Gratian, than he drew together all his forces, with to hiſtory, are the epigrams he wrote on the profeſſors of Bourdeaux, his verſes on the chief cities of the empire, and the ſpeech in which he returned thanks to Gratian for the honour he had done to him in raiſing him to the conſulſhip. He wrote verſes on all the emperors who had reigned till his time, and likewiſe conſular tables, extending to the year 382 or 383 (26). But the latter work has been long ſince entirely loſt, and of the former only a ſmall part has reached us. His poem on the Moſelle was greatly eſteemed by Symmachus (27), and is ſtill looked upon by the beſt judges as his maſter-piece (28). Some aſcribe to him, but without ſufficient ground, the diſtichs that paſs under the name of Cato (29). The emperor Theodoſius, who had a particular eſteem for him, wrote to him with his own hand, demanding his works (30). Auſonius and Symmachus lived in great great intimacy, as appears from their letters to each other (31). Gratian, out of gratitude to his preceptor, not only preferred him to the greateſt employments of the ſtate, but likewiſe raiſed moſt of his relations. His father was by him honoured, as we have hinted above with the title of prefect of Illyricum before the year 379, for in that year he died, being then in the eighty-eighth or ninetieth year of his age (32). Sanctus, who married his wife's ſiſter, was made governor of Britain (33). Paulinus, ſon-in-law to his ſiſter Dryadia, was raiſed to the government of the province of Tarraca in Spain, and the huſband of his other niece by the ſame Dryadia to great employments (34). Arborius, prefect of Rome in 380, is ſuppoſed to have been his nephew by the ſame ſiſter (35). Auſonius married Attuſia Lucana Sabina, the daughter of Attuſius Lucanus Taliſius, one of the chief citizens of Bourdeaux, and had by her two ſons, viz. Auſonius and Heſperus, and one daughter, whoſe name is not mentioned in hiſtory. Auſonius died in his infancy; but Heſperus was prefect in Africa in 376, of Italy in 378, and the ſame year prefect of Gaul with his father The daughter of Auſonius was married firſt to Vallatinus Euromius, who died when he was yet very young, tho' he had been already governor of a province in Illyricum, and afterwards to Thalaſſus, who was proconſul of Africa in 378. She had one ſon by Euromus or Euromius, and ſeveral children by Thalaſſus, of whom the eldeſt was with the deſign to march againſt the uſurper, and prevent him from ſeizing on Italy and Weſt-Illyricum, belonging to young Valentinian. But in the mean time, Maximus having aſſured him by his deputies, that he had no deſign upon the dominions of Valentinian, but that he would ſuffer him peaceably to reign in Italy, Africa, and Illyricum, Theodoſius thought it adviſeable to put off his journey into to the weſt [a].

(17) Idem, parent. iv. p 106---109. Profeſſ. Burdeg. car. 17. p. 160. (18) Voſſus in clar urb. p. 408. epiſt. p. 257. idyl, p. 367. profeſſ. Burdeg. car. 12. 25. p 156. 169. (19) Idyl. 32. p 367. epiſt. 4. p. 428. (20) Idem grat. act. pro. conſ. p. 378.. (21) Idem. ibid. p. 391. (22) idem, epiſt. 9. p. 443. (23) Idem. epiſt. 18. p. 463. idyl. 31. p. 485. (24) Idem, epiſt. 23. p. 485. (25) Baillet jugemens des ſovans. p. 456---472

(26) Auſon p. 126, 199, 375. (27) Sym. l. i. epiſt. 8. 9. (28) Vide Baillet, p. 472. (29) Voſſ. poet Lat. c. 4. p. 65. (30) Auſon. p. 1. (31) Sym. l. i. ep. 8 p. 9. ep. 26. p. 22. ep. 31. p. 25, &c. (32) Auſon. ibid. 30. p. 358, 359. parent. i. p. 102. (33) Idem, parent, xviii. p. 123. (35) Idem ibid. p. 123, 129. idyl. 30. p. 358. (35) Idem, parent. p. 121.

Maximus propoſes an alliance with Theodoſius.

Not long after, Maximus ſent his great chamberlain to Theodoſius, not to make an apology, ſays Zoſimus [b], for the murder of Gratian, but to propoſe an alliance with the emperor againſt the common enemies of the empire; and in caſe he rejected that friendly offer, to denounce war againſt him. Theodoſius not thinking the glory that might accrue to him from revenging the death of Gratian a ſufficient motive for entering into a war, which he foreſaw would be attended with great evils, and perhaps with the ruin of the empire, the neighbouring barbarians being ready to invade it on all ſides, hearkened to the propoſals of Maximus; and acknowledging him in the end for his collegue, ſent Cynegius, then comes was named Auſonius (36). Symmachus mentions a ſon of Thalaſſus, to whom the ſenate had at his requeſt granted ſome favours (37). Auſonius had taken care to inſtruct his daughter in the liberal ſciences (38). His wife Sabina died in the twenty eighth year of her age (39); and Auſonius compoſed her epitaph thirty-ſix years after (40). He wrote his conſular tables, and ſome other hiſtorical pieces, for the uſe and inſtruction of his ſon Heſperus, whom he commends as a young man of extraordinary parts, and naturally more grave and compoſed than himſelf (41). Heſperus married the daughter of Severus Cenſor Julianus, and Pomponia Urbica, who was deſcended of an illuſtrious family, and had by her at leaſt three children, of whom the youngeſt, named Paſtor, died when he was but a youth: of Paulinus, his eldeſt ſon, ſurnamed the penitent, we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter. From the poem he wrote on his repentance, and ſtyled Euchariſticon, it appears, that his father was firſt vicar of Macedon, where Paulinus was born in 376, and afterwards proconſul of Africa, which employment he held for the ſpace of twenty-eight months (42).

[a] Themiſt. or. xviii. p. 220. [b] Zos. l. iv. p. 764.

(36) Idem ibid. p. 119. idyl. 30. p. 358 Sym l i. ep 19 p. 17. (37) Sym. l. v. ep. 56. p. 208. (38) Auſon. idyl. 32. p. 364, 365. (39) Idem, parent. p. 114. (40) Idem ibid. p. 113. (41) Auſon. p. 79. idyl 32. p. 362. (42) Paulin. euch. p. 284 286.

comes largitionum, and afterwards prefect of the eaſt, into Egypt, with orders to proclaim Maximus there, and to cauſe his image to be ſet up in Alexandria [c]. Zoſimus in this place writes, that Theodoſius only pretended to be reconciled with Maximus, to divert him from ſurpriſing young Valentinian, who was not in a condition to make head againſt ſo powerful an enemy; and elſewhere [d] blames him for obſerving the treaty he concluced with the uſurper, when he ought both in policy and honour to have made war upon him. Pacatus tells us, that when Maximus revolted, Theodoſius was engaged in a war on the moſt diſtant confines of the eaſt [e], perhaps with the Saracens; for he is ſaid by Marcellinus [f] to have overcome them about the beginning of his reign; and Libanius writes, that the news of the victory gained this year by Richomer was received with great joy by the inhabitants of Antioch [g]. The Hunns, likewiſe called Euthalites or Nephalites, whoſe country bordered on Perſia, as appears from Procopius, are ſaid to have broken into Meſopotamia about this time, and to have even laid ſiege to Edeſſa, which obliged Theodoſius to ſend part of his forces to the relief of that city [h]. No wonder therefore, that the emperor at this juncture choſe rather to receive Maximus for his partner in the empire, than, by rejecting his propoſals, to kindle a war in the very bowels of the empire, which, in all likelihood, would have proved fatal to both parties. The wars we have mentioned were managed by his generals; for the emperor himſelf, as we have obſerved above, continued the whole year at Conſtantinople, or in that neighbourhood. In the very beginning of the preſent year 383, that is, on the ſixteenth, or, as others will have it, on the nineteenth of January, he had declared his ſon Arcadius emperor [i], The ceremony was performed with extraordinary pomp at the palace of Hebdoman, diſtant ſeven miles from Conſtantinople. Arcadius was then about ſix years old; for at the time of his death, which happened on the firſt of May 408, he was, according to Socrates, in the thirty-firſt year of his age [k]. As for Valentinian II. who poſſeſſed the weſtern provinces of Illyricum, with Italy and Africa, while Maximus held Gaul, Spain, and Britain, he was at this time but twelve, or at moſt thirteen,

Who acknowledges him for his collegue.

Arcadius d clared emperor.

[c] Idem, p. 761. [d] Idem. p 768. [e] Pacat. p. 263.
[f] Marcell. chron. p. 342. [g] Liban, vit. p. 67. [h] Sur. 15 Novemb.
[i] Idat. Marcell. Proſp. chron. [k] Socr. l. vi. c. 23. p. 332.

thirteen, years old; and the great diſturbances which his mother Juſtina raiſed, by eſpouſing with too much warmth the cauſe of the Arians, give us room to believe, that ſhe reigned in her ſon's name. Under her Probus, who had been conſul in 371, and prefect of Illyricum and Italy in 368, had the chief direction of affairs [l]; but, in all matters of moment, the young prince had recourſe to Theodoſius [m]; nay, Oroſius looks upon Theodoſius as ſole emperor, after the death of Gratian, of the weſtern as well as the eaſtern provinces [n].

THE next conſuls were Richomer and Clearchus. The former was of the royal blood of the Franks, had been comes domeſticorum under Gratian, and was left by that prince with Theodoſius, when created emperor. In a law of the year 391, he is ſtyled general of the horſe and foot [o]. He was a pagan, but a man of great integrity, valour, and experience in war, as appears from the ſeveral letters which Symmachus wrote to him [p]. He is by ſome called Ricimer, and by others Richimer, and Ricomer. Gregory of Tours ſpeaks of one Richimer, the father of Theodomir king of the Franks [q], whom ſome authors, whoſe opinion is not ill grounded, take to be the conſul of this year 384. Clearchus, his collegue, had been proconſul of Aſia in 264, and afterwards prefect of Conſtantinople, in which employment he was ſucceeded this year by the philoſopher Themiſtius, who, on that occaſion, made a ſhort ſpeech in commendation of Theodoſius, who had raiſed him to that dignity [r]. This year Proculus, count of the eaſt, being accuſed of extortion, and ſeveral outrages committed by his orders at Daphne near Antioch, was ignominiouſly depoſed, and obliged to abſcond, till the rage of the multitude was appeaſed [s]. Icarius, the ſon of Theodorus, who had conſpired againſt Valens, was appointed count of the eaſt in his room, which office he diſcharged with great rigor and ſeverity, not ſparing even the public magiſtrates, whom he put to the rack, in deſiance of the laws, ſays Libanius [t], which had been but lately publiſhed; that is, of the laws dated the twenty-twenty-ſixth of April 380, and thirty-firſt of July, 381. This year a famine, attended as uſual with a dreadful plague, raged in Antioch, and moſt other cities of Syria. The plague ſoon ceaſed; but the famine continuing, Libanius, in the name of the people of Antioch, had recourſe to Icarius, entreating him to relieve, by ſome means or other, the poor, who had flocked from all parts to that metropolis, and were daily periſhing in great numbers with hunger. But Icarius, without being in the leaſt affected with their calamity, returned no other anſwer, than that they were abhorred, and juſtly puniſhed, by the gods [w]. This occaſioned great diſturbances in Antioch, which, however, were appeaſed without bloodſhed. The ſame year, Theodoſius, reſolving utterly to extirpate the idolatrous worſhip of the pagan gods, enacted ſeveral laws, forbidding all his ſubjects, on pain of death or perpetual baniſhment. to offer ſacrifices to idols; to conſult aruſpices, or diviners of what denomination ſoever; or to practice any of thoſe ceremonies, which had been forbidden by his chriſtian predeceſſors [x]. Zoſimus, in his uſual ſtyle, better becoming a declaimer than an orator, tells us, that Theodoſius proclaimed war againſt the gods; that he attacked them in their temples; that he proceeded with ſuch ſeverity againſt thoſe who worſhipped them, that no one dared own he believed there were gods, or could with ſafety lift up his eyes to heaven, and adore the ſtars that ſhine there [y]. Libanius writes, that on a certain occaſion, ſtanding in need of the aſſiſtance of the gods, he had recourſe to their altars; but not daring to implore their protection, or ſhed a tear before their ſtatues, he only bewailed within himſelf his unhappy condition [z]. It was on occaſion of the above-mentioned laws, that Libanius made his famous ſpeech in defence of the temples, wherein he inveighs with great bitterneſs againſt the monks; blames the conduct of Conſtantine the Great; extols Julian; and ends his ſpeech with threatening, that the country-people, who were more attached to the religion of their anceſtors, than the inhabitants of the cities, will, if further provoked, take arms, and defend them by force [a]. The attachment of the country-people, or inhabitants of villages, called by the Latins pagani, to their idols and temples, gave riſe to the denomination of paganus or or pagan, which began about this time to be given to all who worſhipped idols. Libanius, in that ſpeech, often addreſſes himſelf to Theodoſius as preſent; but nevertheleſs we cannot perſuade ourſelves, that he had the boldneſs to pronounce it before ſo religious and zealous a prince. It ought, in our opinion, to be looked upon only as a declamation, delivered not in the preſence of the emperor, but perhaps of his own ſcholars, and other pagan auditors. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the pious emperor was ſo far from yielding to the arguments which the pagan ſophiſt alledged in favour of his idols, that, on the contrary, having appointed Cynegius this very year prefect of the eaſt, he ſtrictly enjoined him to ſhut up all the temples within his juriſdiction. Cynegius executed his orders with ſuch zeal and fidelity in the Eaſt, properly ſo called, that he was ſoon after ſent by the emperor for the ſame purpoſe into Egypt, where, by breaking in pieces the idols, by prohibiting all manner of idolatrous worſhip, and by ſhutting up the temples, in ſuch manner that no one could have acceſs to them, he, in a ſhort time, utterly aboliſhed the very remains of idolatry in a country, which, for many ages, had been, above all others, addicted to ſuperſtition [l]. The zeal, which he exerted on this occaſion for the true religion, procured him after his death, which happened in 388, the honour of being interred in the church of the Apoſtles at Conſtantinople, the burying-place of the emperors [m]; whence his aſhes were conveyed the enſuing year by his wife Acancia into Spain, probably the place of his nativity [n]. He was comes largitionum from 381 to 383, when he was made prefect of the eaſt, in which office he continued till his death; that is, to the year 388, in which he died, being then conſul with the emperor Theodoſius [o]. Libanius himſelf, notwithſtanding his zeal for idolatry, could not help commending him as a magiſtrate of an unblemiſhed character [p]; and Theodoſius, in a law addreſſed to him in 385, ſays, that his juſtice and equity were known and applauded by all the world [q]. It is ſurpriſing, that Baronius ſhould confound the prefect Cynegius with another of the ſame name, who, in 401, was ſent by Arcadius to demoliſh the temple of Marnas, and other temples in the city of Gaza.

[l] Socr. l. v. c. 11. p 270. Soz. l. vii. c. 13. p. 720. [m] Ambroſ. ep. xi. p. 195. [n] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 35. p. 220. [o] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 123. [p] Symm. l. iii. ep. 59, 61. p. 129. et ep. 54, 56, 69, &c. [q] Greg. Tur. hiſt. Fran. l. ii. c. 9. p. 64. [r] Themiſt. orat. xvii. p. 213. [s] Liban. vit. p. 68. & orat. xx. p. 471. [t] Idem, orat. xx. p. 464. [u] Cod. Theod. tit. iv. p. 435.

A famine in Syria.

The cruelty of Icarius.

[w] Liban. vit. p. 60. & orat. xx. p. 468. [x] Cod. Theod. tit. 9. p. 267. & al. xvi. tit. 7. leg. 18. p. 203. & tit. 10. leg. 7. p. 266. [y] Zoſ. p. 758. [z] Lib. vit. p. 63. [a] Idem, orat. pro temp. p. 10—63.

Theodoſius cauſes all the temples to be ſhut up in the eaſt, and in Egypt.

[l] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 762 Cod. Theod. l. x. tit. 10. leg. 15. p. 444. Idat. chron. [m] Zoſ p. 769. [n] Idat. faſt. [o] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 762. Cod. Theod. chron. p. 111. [p] Liban. de ingred. ad judices. p. 100. [q] Cod. Theod. l. ix tit. 1. leg. 15. p. 21.

Gaza. This year the emperor publiſhed a law, forbidding the marriages of couſin-germans, which had been always deemed lawful among the Romans, and no one ever looked upon as inceſtuous. However, Theodoſius not only prohibited ſuch marriages, but, by the ſame law, commanded the contracting parties to be burnt alive, their eſtates to be confiſcated, and their children to be deemed illegitimate [r]. Arcadius ſoftened the rigor of this law by another, dated the twenty-ſixth of November 396, whereby he exempts the tranſgreſſors from the penalties inflicted on them by the law of Theodoſius; but nevertheleſs declares ſuch marriages unlawful and inceſtuous, and the children incapable of receiving the leaſt legacy from their parents [s]. In 405, he entirely revoked the law of his father, declaring the marriages of couſin-germans abſolutely lawful [t]. This revocation was not received in the weſt till the time of Juſtinian, who cauſed it to be put into his code; by which means it became general, and ſuch marriages were celebrated without reſtraint or ſcruple in the weſt, as well as in the eaſt. At the ſame time, and under the ſame penalties, Theodoſius revived the antient law, forbidding the marrying of nieces, which he extended to the niece of a firſt wife [u]. By another law of this year, dated the twenty-firſt of January, he ordered Cynegius to make a diligent ſearch after the Eunomian, Macedonian, Arian, and Apollinarian biſhops and clergy in Conſtantinople, and to drive them all, without exception, out of the city [w]. By a third he forbids the Jews to buy chriſtian ſlaves; and allows all chriſtians the liberty of ſetting free ſuch ſlaves as they ſhall have purchaſed [x]. Theodoſius, as appears from the dates of his laws, paſſed moſt part of this year at Conſtantinople, and there received a ſolemn embaſſy ſent to him by the king of Perſia, to ſolicit, or rather to buy, a peace with rich preſents, and to excuſe, ſays a panegyriſt [y], by his ſubmiſſion, all the evils, which, till that time the Romans had ſuffered from the Perſian nation. They had loſt their great king Sapor II. who died about the year 379, after having lived and reigned ſeventy years. He was ſucceeded by Artaxer, whom Eutychius ſuppoſes to have been his ſon [z], tho Agathias and Abulfaragius call him his his younger brother [a]. But if Sapor himself was born after the decease of his father, as most authors write, he could not be succeeded by his younger brother. Artaxer, styled Ardshir by Abulfaragius and Eutychius, and Artaxerxes by Scaliger and Petavius, reigned only four years, and was succeeded in 383, by his son Sapor III. called by Theophanes, Arsabel, who, after having reigned five years, bequeathed the kingdom in 388, to his son Vararanes or Varanes IV. surnamed Kermasaa, perhaps from some country called Kerma, conquered by his father. Varanes reigned eleven years, and maintained the whole time a good understanding with the Romans [b]. The embassadors, of whom we have spoken above, were sent, not by Sapor II. as Pacatus seems to suppose; [c] but by Sapor III. who reigned in Persia this year 384,

He forbids under ſevere penalties, the marriages of couſin-germans.

A ſolemn embaſſy ſent to him by the king of Perſia.

[r] Cod. Theod. l. iii. tit. 12 leg. 3. p. 297. [s] Idem, tit. 1. p. 227. [t] Cod. Juſt. l. v. tit. 4. leg. 19. p. 419. [u] Cod. Theod. l. iii. tit. 12. leg. 3. p 297. [w] Idem, l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 13. p. 129. [x] Idem, l. iii. tit. 1. leg. 5. p. 246. [y] Paeat. p. 263. [z] Eutych. p. 470.

With whom he concludes a treaty.

Orosius writes, that a treaty was concluded between the Persians and the Romans, in virtue of which the whole east still enjoyed a profound tranquillity at the time he was composing his history; that is, about the year 416 [d], The articles of this treaty are not mentioned by any historian; but from a law of Theodosius, dated the fourteenth of June 387, and addressed to Gaddanes, satrapa or governor of Sophene, it appears, that the authority of the Roman emperors was acknowledged in that province, which, by most geographers, is placed in the south of Armenia, and is reckoned, by some historians, one of the five provinces which Jovian yielded to the Persians. While the Persian embassadors were still at Honorius born.

Constantinople, a second son was born to the emperor in that city on the ninth of September. Theodosius gave him the name of Honorius, to honour in his son, says the poet Claudian, the memory of his brother [e], distinguished him with the title of nobilissimus, or most noble, and named him consul for the year 386 [f].

THE same year, the Sarmatians having made an irruption into the dominions of Valentinian, he dispatched one of his generals, not named in history, against them, who drove them back with great slaughter, and took many prisoners, who were all sent to Rome, to be either massacred in the shews of gladiators, or destroyed by the wild beasts. The emperor, in the letter which he wrote to the senate, acquainting them with the success that had attended his arms, bestowed beſtowed the higheſt encomiums on the general who commanded on that occaſion [g]. As for Valentinian himſelf, he continued the whole year, as appears from his laws, in Italy; for, during the months of March and April, he was at Milan; at Aquileia in the month of September; and again at Milan in October, and the two remaining months of the year [h]. By a law dated the twenty ſecond of March, which was this year good-friday, he commanded all the priſoners, who were not charged with the enormous crimes mentioned in the law, to be ſet at liberty, in honour of the approaching great feſtival [i]. This year died Vettius Agorius Prætexatus, a perſon greatly commended and extolled, as one of the moſt deſerving men of his age, by Ammianus Marcellinus, who wrote his hiſtory about this time, by Zoſimus, Symmachus, Libanius and in general all the pagan writers; for he was not only a pagan himſelf but augur, high-pontiff of Veſta and the ſun, and the head, as we may ſtyle him, of the pagan ſuperſtition. He was by Julian made proconſul of Achaia in 362, by Valentinian I. prefect of Rome in 367, and afterwards prefect of Italy and Illyricum; in which employments he acquitted himſelf ſo as to be at the ſame time feared and beloved. Ammianus writes, that, from his youth, he excelled in every virtue becoming a man of his rank; that he revived the gravity and probity of the antient Romans [k]. Zoſimus calls him a man of an unblemiſhed character, and propoſes him as a pattern to be imitated by all governors of provinces, and other magiſtrates [l]. Macrobius ſuppoſes the banquet of the learned men, which is the ſubject of his Saturnalia, to have been celebrated at the houſe of Prætextatus [m]. Symmachus looked upon him as in every reſpect the beſt, or, at leaſt, as one of the beſt men of his age. He tells us among other things, that he accepted no legacies, but conſtantly yielded to the children or relations of the teſtator, whatever was bequeathed to him; that he was no leſs affected with the misfortunes of others, than with his own; and that ſuch as poſſeſſed eſtates adjoining to his, in the diſputes which aroſe between him and them, concerning the limits of their lands, would admit of no other judge but himſelf; ſo great was the opinion they had of his integrity [n].

The Sarmatians defeated by the troops of Valentinian.

[a] Agath. l. iv. p. 135. Abulf. p. 90. [b] Agath. p. 136. Theoph. p. 55, 58. Eutych p. 472. Claud. in Eut l ii. p 120. [c] Pacat. p. 263. [d] Oros. ibid. [e] Claud. de Ser. p. 194. [f] Socr. l. v. c. 12. p. 171. Theoph. p. 59.

Prætextatus dies.

His character.

The

[g] Symm. l. x. ep. 61. p. 461. [h] Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 212. [i] Cod. Theod. l. ix tit. 38. leg. 7. p. 276, 277. [k] Ammian. l xxii. p. 210. & l. xxvii. p. 399. [l] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 735. [m] Macrob. l. i. c. 1. p. 162. [n] Symm. l. i. ep. 38—49. p. 29. ep 47. p. 34.

The many letters which Symmachus wrote to him, and after his death, to the emperors concerning him, are ſo many panegyrics, in which he extols his wiſdom, his integrity, his modeſty and moderation, his humanity and good-nature to all, not excepting even his moſt inveterate enemies [o]. He came this year to Rome, and entered that metropolis in a kind of triumph, being attended by all the magiſtrates, by the nobility and the people, and repairing, amidſt the loud acclamations of the multitude, to the capitol, pronounced there an elegant oration in praiſe of Valentinian [p]. He was then conſul elect; but before he entered upon that new office, he was ſnatched away by a natural, but ſudden, death, to the inexpreſſible grief of the Roman people. The ſenate erected ſeveral ſtatues to the honour of a perſon, who lived, to uſe the expreſſion of Symmachus, even after his death, in the memory of all good men [q]. St. Jerom, who was then at Rome, compares the death of Prætextatus, whom he ſtyles a ſacrilegious idolater, with that of the holy abbeſs Lea, who died a few days after him [r]. Prætextatus was no friend to the chriſtians; but uſed to ſay, by way of raillery, that he would readily embrace their religion, provided they would make him biſhop of Rome [s]. About this time, Symmachus was appointed prefect of Rome, in which employment he acquitted himſelf with great reputation, and procured a law from the emperor, moderating the expences of the new conſuls, prætors and quæſtors. The conſuls uſed, agreeable to a cuſtom which then obtained, to ſend rich preſents to their friends, and to all perſons of diſtinction; and the prætors and quæſtors to expend immenſe ſums in the public ſports, which they were bound to exhibit. The value of the preſents to be given by the conſuls, and the ſums to be laid out in the public ſhews by the two other magiſtrates, were fixed by this law, and thoſe declared infamous, who ſhould ſolicit an exemption from it [t]. This year a famine being apprehended in Rome, by reaſon of the ſcarcity of corn, in Africa, which uſed of late years to ſupply that metropolis, Theodoſius, at the requeſt of Symmachus, delivered the Roman people from the danger that threatened them, by ſending them great plenty of grain from Egypt and Macedon.

Symmachus made prefect of Rome.

Theodoſius ſupplies Rome with corn.

[o] Idem, l. x. ep. 34. p. 417. ep. 23, 25. p. 415. ep. 34. p. 417. [p] Idem, l. x. ep. 37. p. 424. Hier. ep. 24. p. 156. [q] Idem, l. x. ep. 23, 24, 37. p. 405, 406, 424. [r] Hier. ep. 24, p. 156. [s] Idem, ep. 61. p. 165. [t] Symm. ep. 21. p. 402. & cod. Theod. tit. 5. p. 383, 384.

don. For this ſeaſonable ſupply Symmachus returned thanks, not only to Theodoſius, but to count Ricomer, and likewiſe to Rufinus, who, it ſeems, made already ſome figure in the emperor's court [u]. The great power he afterwards acquired there, does no ways redound to the honour of Theodoſius. The following year 385, when Arcadius and Bauto were conſuls, St. Auguſtin, then profeſſor of rhetoric in Milan, pronounced on the firſt of January a panegyric on the two new conſuls [w]. Bauto was by nation a Frank, and had been ſent by Gratian in 381, to the aſſiſtance of Theodoſius; but returning afterwards into the weſt, he ſerved Valentinian II. with great fidelity. Valentinian paſſed the firſt ſix months of this year at Milan, and the reſt either at Aquileia or Verona [x]. Tho' he enacted this year ſeveral excellent laws in favour of the church, yet he ſuffered his mother Juſtina to perſecute and oppreſs the catholics, becauſe they would not yield the great church at Milan to the Arians, whom ſhe countenanced and protected [y]. Theodoſius continued all this time at Conſtantinople, where a dangerous conſpiracy was formed againſt him; but diſcovered a little before it was to be put in execution. Moſt of the conſpirators were apprehended, tried, and ſentenced to death; but Theodoſius generouſly forgave them, and would not allow any enquiries to be made after their accomplices, tho' ſome perſons, in whom he repoſed great confidence, were ſuſpected to be in that number [z]. Not long after died at Conſtantinople the emperor's daughter Pulcheria, who was ſoon followed by the empreſs Flaccilla her mother, to the great grief of Theodoſius, who was no leſs a tender father than husband. The empreſs died at Scotuminum in Thrace, where ſhe was drinking the waters for the recovery of her health, but her body was brought back to Conſtantinople, and interred there with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. Gregory of Nyſſa, who was then at Conſtantinople, pronounced her funeral oration, as he had done ſome time before that of her daughter Pulcheria [a]. The fathers of the church who lived in that age, beſtow upon her the higheſt encomiums; and the pagan writers themſelves cannot help extolling her piety, moderation, and other vir-

He forgives thoſe who had conſpired againſt him.

The death of Pulcheria, and her mother the empreſs Flaccilla.

[u] Symm. l iii. ep 55, 82. p. 127, 138. [w] Aug. contra lit. Petiliani, l. iii. c. 25. p. 131. [x] Cod. Theod chron p. 144. [y] Socr. l. v. c. 11. [z] Themiſt. orat xix. p. 231. [a] Greg. Nyſſ. de Pul. p. 516. & de Flaccill p 528.

tues [b]. The Greeks honour her as a ſaint, and celebrate her feaſt on the fourteenth of September, perhaps the day on which ſhe died [c]. The next conſuls were Honorius, ſtyled in the faſti nobiliſſimus puer, and Evodius, perhaps the prefect of Gaul under Maximus. This year Theodoſius continued at Conſtantinople till the third of September, when he is ſuppoſed to have left that metropolis, in order to march againſt the Greuthongi, who were ready to paſs the Danube, and break into the empire, under the conduct of Odotheus, whom Claudian honours with the title of king [d]. The barbarians were attacked, and utterly defeated by the two emperors Theodoſius and Arcadius, who returned to Conſtantinople, leading with them an incredible number of captives, and entered that city in triumph on the twelfth of October. Thus Idatius in his faſti, and Marcellinus in his chronicle [e]. Claudian likewiſe ſpeaks of a victory gained this year by the two emperors over the Greuthongi [f]. But Zoſimus, to rob Theodoſius of the glory of this, as he does of moſt other victories, aſcribes it to Promotus, who commanded in Thrace, in quality of general of the foot. According to his account, Promotus ſent to the enemy's camp ſome perſons, who, pretending to be deſerters, undertook to conduct the barbarians over the river, and to betray the Roman commander and his army into their hands. Odotheus, not ſuſpecting any treachery, ſuffered himſelf to be conducted by them; but, in the mean time, Promotus, informed by his emiſſaries of the enemy's deſign, received them ſo briſkly, while they expected to meet with no oppoſition, that great numbers of them were driven back into the Danube, and drowned, and the reſt either taken priſoners, or cut in pieces. After this, Promotus attacked and made himſelf maſter of their camp, in which he found a great booty, and an incredible multitude of women and children, whom he immediately ſent to Theodoſius; but the emperor ordered them to be ſet at liberty, and having made them rich preſents, gave them leave to return to their own country, hoping by that means to gain the good-will of the barbarians, ſays Zoſimus, to entice them into his ſervice, and to employ them in the war againſt Maximus, for which he was then making great preparations under-hand [g]. All other writers ſuppoſe Theodoſius to have commanded Theodoſius gains a great victory over the Greuthongi.

He ſets the captives at liberty.

[b] Themiſt. orat. xix. p. 231. orat. xviii p. 225. [c] Vide men. mag. Græc. 14 Sep. p. 209. & Cange. Byz. fam. p. 70 [d] Claud conſ. Hon. 4. p. 55. [e] Idat. p. 61. Marcel. p. 6. [f] Claud. ibid. [g] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 759---763.

commanded his troops in perſon; nay, Claudian tells us, that he engaged Odotheus himſelf, who was killed in the battle [h]. The emperor, ſoon after his return to Conſtantinople, married to his ſecond wife Galla, ſiſter to Valentinian II. and daughter to Valentinian I. by the empreſs Juſtina. He had by her a ſon called Gratian, who died before his father, and a daughter named Galla Placidia, of whom we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the reign of her brother Honorius, and her ſon Valentinian III [i]. As for Valentinian, he was at Milan on the eighteenth of January; at Ticinum or Pavia on the fifteenth of February; at Aquileia on the twentieth of April; at Milan during the months of June and July; at Aquileia on the third of November; and again at Milan on the eighteenth of the ſame month, and on the third of December [k]. Baronius produces a letter written this year by Valentinian to Saluſt prefect of Rome, enjoining him to rebuild the church of St. Paul in the neighbourhood of that city, and to enlarge it, by taking in, with the conſent of the ſenate and people of Rome, part of the public road: he commands him to acquaint the ſenate, and the chriſtian people, with the orders he had received, and to follow in every thing the directors of the venerable biſhop of that city [l]. Prudentius deſcribes the church of St. Paul placed on the Oſtian-way, or the way leading to Oſtia, and tells us, that it was built by an emperor, which Baronius underſtands of the emperor who reigned in Prudentius's time, and thence concludes, that the above-mentioned church was finiſhed by Honorius [m]. That it was finiſhed in the reign of Honorius, is certain, not from the words of Prudentius quoted by Baronius, but from an antient inſcription, which informs us at the ſame time, that it was begun by Theodoſius, perhaps when he came to Rome in 398, and imbelliſhed by his daughter Placidia, in the time of Leo the Great, biſhop of Rome [n]. However, it is manifeſt from the code [o], that Valentinian iſſued orders this year 386, for the building of that church, tho' the work was not begun till the reign of Honorius. The next conſuls where the emperor Valentinian the third time, and Eutropius, who had been proconſul of Aſia, and afterwards prefect of the eaſt. In the very beginning of this year 387, Theodoſius publiſhed a law addreſſed by way of letter to all the cities of the eaſt, enjoining

He marries Galla.

Valentinian orders the church of St. Paul in the Oſtian-way to be rebuilt.

[h] Claud. ibid. p. 55. [i] Philoſt. l. x. c. 7. p. 139. [k] Cod. Theod. chron. p 116---117. [l] Baron. ann. 386. [m] Idem ibid. [n] Gruter. p. 1100. [o] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 383.

joining the magiſtrates to honour the ſolemnity of Eaſter, by ſetting at liberty ſuch as on the approach of that great feſtival they ſhould find in their priſons, unleſs they had been confined for very enormous crimes. It was on this occaſion that the emperor uttered thoſe memorable words; I wiſh it were in my power to reſtore life to the dead [m]. This year, Theodoſius finding the exchequer quite drained, and being on the other hand obliged to celebrate, according to cuſtom, the fifth year of the reign of his ſon Arcadius, to which he added, it ſeems, the ſolemnity of the tenth year of his own reign, tho' he was then only in his ninth, an extraordinary tax was laid on the people to defray that expence [n]; for we are told, that on ſuch occaſions each ſoldier received five pieces of gold [o]. Moſt cities ſubmitted chearfully to this burden; but the people of Antioch, complaining of it as an unreaſonable oppreſſion, crouded to the houſe of Flavianus their biſhop, as ſoon as the edict was publiſhed, to implore his protection; but not finding him, they returned to the forum, and would have torn the governor of the city in pieces, had not the officers who attended him, with much ado, kept back the enraged multitude till he made his eſcape. Being thus prevented from venting their fury upon him, they fell upon the emperor's ſtatues, broke ſome of them in pieces, and dragged others, with the ſtatues of his two ſons Arcadius and Honorius, of the late empreſs Flaccilla, and of his father Theodoſius, through the chief ſtreets of the city, uttering the whole time moſt injurious and abuſive reflections againſt their perſons [p]. Having thus demoliſhed moſt of the emperor's ſtatues, they ſet fire to the houſe of one of the principal citizens, to whom they bore ſome grudge, and would have committed other diſorders, had they not been diſperſed by a body of archers, who, by wounding only two of the rabble, ſtruck terror into all the reſt. The governor, hearing the archers were come, ſhewed himſelf to the multitude, and with an air of authority commanded them to diſperſe, and retire to their houſes. Thus was the ſedition quelled at once; and the city reſtored by noon to its former tranquillity [q]. The two perſons, who had been wounded by the archers, being taken, informed againſt their accomplices, who were all by different ways put to death by the governor of the city: ſome were beheaded; others expoſed to the wild beaſts in

A ſedition of Antioch.

Which is appeaſed, and the authors of it puniſhed.

[m] Chryſ. tom. i. or. 6. p. 84. [n] Liban. or. xxiii. p. 526. [o] Ammian. p. 314, 315. [p] Lib. or. xv. p. 467. [q] Idem, or. xiv. & xxiii. p. 393, 415.

in the theatre, and ſome burnt alive; he did not even ſpare the children, who had inſulted the emperor's ſtatues; and cauſed ſeveral perſons to be executed, who had been but bare ſpectators of the injuries offered them [r]. While the cruel governor was thus proceeding with inexorable ſeverity againſt the unhappy Antiochians, almoſt without diſtinction of guilty or innocent, a report was ſpread, that a body of troops was at hand, with orders to plunder the city, and put all the inhabitants to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition. Hereupon that populous metropolis of Syria was at once turned into a deſert, the citizens abandoning in the utmoſt terror and confuſion their dwellings, and retiring with their wives and families to the neighbouring mountains and deſerts. As that report proved groundleſs, ſome returned to their native country; but the far greater part, dreading the cruelty of the governor, and the juſt reſentment of the emperor, kept themſelves concealed in the neighbouring cities, or amongſt the rocks and mountains. To thoſe who returned, St. Chryſoſtom preached ſome of thoſe inimitable homilies, which have reached our times, and are wonderfully adapted to ſtir them up to repentance, and to make them look upon the danger that threatened them as drawn down upon them from heaven by their ſins [s]. The eloquence and zeal of the preacher, joined to the apprehenſion they were under of the effects of the emperor's indignation, wrought a great change in that licentious and diſſolute people, as appears not only from St. Chryſoſtom himſelf [t], but from Sozomen [u], and even from Libanius [w]. In the mean time, Theodoſius, being informed of what had paſſed at Antioch, and particularly of the inſults offered to his ſtatues, and to thoſe of his father, of the late empreſs, and of his children, was provoked to ſuch a degree, that in the firſt tranſports of his paſſion, he commanded the city to be laid in aſhes, and the inhabitants, without diſtinction of ſex or age, to be put to the ſword [x]. This ſhews, that he was naturally choleric, and apt, when in a paſſion to enter into the moſt violent meaſures. His indignation ſeemed to him the more juſt, as he had favoured that city above all the reſt; for he had deſigned to reſide ſome time there, as Valens had done, and had with that view built Theodoſius highly provoked againſt the city of Antioch.

[r] Chryſ. homil. iii. p 49. Theodoret. l. v. c. 19. p. 731. Lib. p. 397. [s] Vide Chryſ. hom. ii p. 22. hom. xi. p. 127. hom. vi. p. 86. hom iv. p 54. [t] Idem, p. 109 [u] Soz. l. vi c. 23, p 741. [w] Lib. or. xiv. p. 403 [x] Chryſ ep. ad Cal. homn. vii p. 207. Theodoret. l. v. c. 19 p. 731

built a magnificent palace at Daphne, and another in the old city, beſides ſeveral other ſtructures, with which he had at a great expence embelliſhed that metropolis [y]. But nothing incenſed him ſo much againſt that ungrateful city, as their having inſolently inſulted even the dead [z], that is, his father and the empreſs Flaccilla. However, as his wrath ſoon aſ-ſwaged, he revoked the order he had given, and contented himſelf for the preſent with cauſing the public baths, the theatre, and the circus, to be ſhut up, with degrading the city from the rank of a metropolis, and ſubjecting it as a common village to its rival Laodicea [a]. A certain quantity of bread was there daily diſtributed among the poor, as at Rome and Conſtantinople; and of this largeſs too the emperor thought fit to deprive them [b]. Theſe puniſhments Theodoſius inflicted on the Antiochians in general, but at the ſame time he diſpatched Cæſarius, magiſter officiorum, and Ellebichus, magiſter militum, or general, with full power to try and puniſh ſuch as had been concerned in the late riot [c]. Ellebichus was a man of an unblemiſhed character, and is ſaid to have ſquared all his actions by that golden and truly chriſtian rule, "Do as you would be done by [d]." Gregory Nazianzen wrote a letter to him, entreating him, by their antient friendſhip, to diſcharge a reader from the ſervice, and aſſuring him, that by ſo doing he would draw down the bleſſing of heaven upon his arms, in a war of which he had the whole management [e]. Cæſarius, his collegue in this commiſſion, was at this time magiſter officiorum, was prefect of Conſtantinople in 365, prefect of the eaſt in 395, and conſul in 397 [f]. He is commended by Sozomen and Libanius as a man of great integrity, and one who never promiſed what he did not deſign to perform [g]. Theſe two officers the emperor choſe in regard of their known integrity, to try and puniſh, according to the laws, ſuch of the Antiochians as ſhould be accuſed and found guilty of having of having been any-ways concerned in the late ſedition. St. Chryſoſtom deſcribes, with his uſual eloquence, the dread and terror which on this occaſion ſeized the inhabitans of Antioch: they apprehended nothing leſs than the utter deſtruction

Appoints judges to try and puniſh the offenders.

[y] Theodoret. l. v. c. 18. p. 731. & c. 19. p. 733. [z] Idem ibid. [a] Chryſ. or. xii. p. 137. Lib. or. xvii. p. 197. Theod. l. v c. 19. p 731. [b] Lib. p. 408. [c] Chryſ. or. xvii p. 195. [d] Lib. or. xxiii. p. 529. [e] Greg Naz. ep. cxxiii. p. 857. [f] Cod. Theod. tit. 6 p. 354. [g] Soz. l. ix. c. 2. p. 802. Lib. or. xxii. p 518.

ſtruction of their city; the emperor, as they were well informed, was highly offended, eſpecially at the outrages offered to his deceaſed father and to the late empreſs, and reſolved to puniſh them with the utmoſt ſeverity; the judges were men not to be moved by entreaties, or gained over with preſents; the crime they had committed was open rebellion, and, according to the laws of the empire, puniſhable with death and, the confiſcation of their eſtates; even ſuch as were barely ſuſpected, were liable to the moſt rigorous enquiries, to racks and tortures. The conſternation was, as St. Chryſoſtom informs us, ſo great and general, that the inhabitants were preparing to retire, all to a man, with what effects they could carry with them, to the mountains and deſerts; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that he and the governor diverted them from that reſolution. As the two judges approached the city, the whole people went out to meet them, and were received by them, eſpecially by Ellebichus, in a very obliging manner, which allayed in ſome degree their fears. The next morning the alarm was renewed; for the two commiſſioners, having placed guards in the ſeveral quarters of the city, to reſtrain the people from aſſembling, ſummoned all the members of the ſenate or public council to their lodging, examined them concerning the late riot, heard with great patience what they alledged in their own defence, and in defence of their fellow-citizens; and after various enquiries, diſmiſſed them, highly ſatisfied with the treatment they had met with, eſpecially from Ellebichus, who could not refrain from tears, when they, throwing themſelves at his feet, implored his protection. The compaſſion and good-nature he ſhewed on this occaſion revived in a manner the whole city; their fears began to abate, and joy appeared in every face. But the ſcene ſoon changed; for Ellebichus, having cauſed great numbers of perſons of all ranks to be ſeized in the night-time upon private informations, repaired early next morning to the place where juſtice was uſually adminiſtered; and ordering the priſoners to be brought in chains before his tribunal, ſentenced ſuch of them to death as owned their crime, and ordered thoſe who denied it to be cruelly racked, without ſhewing the leaſt pity or compaſſion, as if he had changed his nature. Thoſe who had ſeen him the day before, could ſcarce perſuade themſelves he was the ſame man; for not ſatisfied with cauſing perſons of the firſt quality to be racked and tortured, like ſo many ſlaves, he uttered dreadful menaces againſt the whole city, threatening to lay it in aſhes,

The city in the utmoſt conſternation.

Ellebichus, one of the judges, proceeds with the utmoſt ſeverity.

aſhes, and put the inhabitants, without diſtinction of age, ſex, or condition, to the ſword, unleſs they redeemed themſelves and their children from impending ruin, by a timely diſcovery, not only of the authors and ringleaders of the late treaſonable and wicked attempts, but of all who had been any-ways concerned in them. St. Chryſoſtom, who was an eye-witneſs of all that paſſed, ſo far as his tenderneſs and compaſſion for the unhappy ſufferers would allow him, gives us a lively, but dreadful deſcription of this ſcene of horror, which he compares to that of the laſt day, when all diſtinction of birth, wealth, and rank will ceaſe, and every one be puniſhed or rewarded according to his deſerts [h]. Multitudes were dragged in chains from every quarter of the city to the tribunal of the inexorable judges, who, unmoved with their tears, and deaf to the entreaties of their relations, after a ſhort hearing, either ſentenced them to death, or ordered them to be racked till they owned themſelves guilty, and diſcovered their accomplices. St. Chryſoſtom mentions a lady of the firſt quality, who, ſeeing her ſon apprehended by an officer on horſeback, laid hold of his bridle, and ſuffered herſelf to be dragged in that manner through the ſtreets to the tribunal, where, with her hair diſhevelled, and bathed in tears, ſhe threw herſelf at the feet of Ellebichus; but he, deaf to all entreaties, purſued his enquiries with ſuch rigor, as threw the whole city into the utmoſt confuſion. St. Chryſoſtom, who, with ſome others of the ſacerdotal order, was admitted into the hall where the criminals were examined and tortured, exerted all his eloquence to move the judges to compaſſion, and was therein ſeconded by the hermits, who were very numerous in the neighbourhood of Antioch, where they led a retired life amongſt the adjacent mountains; but, quitting their ſolitude, they had flocked to the city on this extraordinary occaſion, to comfort with their preſence the diſconſolate citizens, and try whether they could raiſe any ſentiments of humanity or commiſeration in the hearts of their judges. With this view they repaired to the hall, where the judges were ſitting; and having exhorted them in a very pathetic manner to treat their fellow-creatures with more humanity and compaſſion, they prevailed upon them in the end to ſuſpend the execution of the ſentence pronounced againſt thoſe who were found guilty, and all proceeding againſt ſuch as were not yet convicted, till a report of the whole

St. Chryſoſtom and the hermits obtain a reſpite for ſuch as were condemned.

[h] Chryſ. orat. xiii. p. 147—150, & orat. xvii. p. 252.

whole had been made to the emperor, and his further pleaſure were known. One Macedonius, an anchorite, univerſally eſteemed and revered for his ſanctity, diſtinguiſhed himſelf above the reſt; for meeting Ellebichus and Cæſarius on horſeback in the forum, laying hold of one of them by the garment, he commanded them both, with an air of authority, to diſmount. As neither of them knew him, they were not a little ſurpriſed, that a perſon, in appearance ſo mean and contemptible, ſhould dare to ſpeak to them in ſuch a ſtyle; but they were no ſooner informed who he was, than diſmounting from their horſes, they threw themſelves at his feet; when the holy anchorite, addreſſing them in the Syriac tongue, "The emperor, ſaid he, however diſtinguiſhed "by his imperial dignity, is ſtill a man; and therefore ought "to conſider his nature, as well as his rank. Thoſe whom "he commands, are of the ſame nature with himſelf, and "the images of the Supreme Being; let him therefore take "care not to provoke the Almighty, by deſtroying the living "images of the divine nature, for an affront offered to the "inanimate images of his body. Other ſtatues may be eaſily raiſed to him in the room of thoſe that have been demoliſhed; but he, notwithſtanding his boaſted power, is "not able to make the leaſt reparation for a ſingle life, which "he has once taken away [i]." We are told, that both Ellebichus and Cæſarius heard theſe words, which were interpreted to them in Greek, with the greateſt reſpect and veneration, and immediately acquainted the emperor with what they had heard [k]. The judges having, at the requeſt of the eccleſiaſtics and hermits, agreed to ſuſpend the execution of the criminals, till the emperor's further pleaſure was known, ſuch as had been found guilty were conducted under a ſtrong guard to the publick priſon, and the reſt diſmiſſed. Amongſt the former were all thoſe who compoſed the ſenate or council, that is, all the chief men in the city, whoſe eſtates were immediately ſeized, together with their houſes and effects, their wives and children being driven out by the officers of the revenue, and obliged to lie in the ſtreets, their friends and neareſt relations fearing, leſt, by harbouring them, they ſhould be involved in the ruin of their huſbands and fathers [l]. The hermits, having thus obtained of the judges a reprieve for the criminals, did not doubt but they ſhould prevail upon the emperor to pardon them. In order order to this, they resolved to repair without delay to Constantinople, and throw themselves at the prince's feet; but Ellebichus and Cæsarius, affected with their zeal, and unwilling they should expose themselves to the fatigue and inconveniencies of so long a journey, advised them rather to draw up a memorial in behalf of the unhappy citizens, and took upon themselves to present it to the emperor. The hermits followed their advice, and leaving the memorial in their hands, returned the same day to their mountains and deserts [m]. Upon their departure, it was agreed between Ellebichus and Cæsarius, that the former should remain at Antioch, and the latter carry the memorial to the emperor. Accordingly Cæsarius set out that very evening, and pursued his journey with such expedition, that the sixth day about noon he reached Constantinople, distant above five hundred miles from Antioch [n]. In the mean time, Ellebichus caused those who had been condemned to be removed from the public prison to a more convenient place, allowing them the liberty of taking the air in the gardens belonging to it, and seeing their friends and relations [o]. St. Chrysostom let no day pass without visiting them, in order to bring them, while thus kept in suspense between hope and fear, to an entire resignation to the will of the Almighty, in whom alone he daily exhorted them to place their confidence [p]. The Antiochians, dreading the effects of the emperors resentment, had sent, a few days after the riot was committed, Flavianus, bishop of the place, to intercede with Theodosius in their behalf. Flavianus had met Ellebichus and Cæsarius on the road, who acquainted him with the commission they were going to execute at Antioch. The holy bishop, in hearing it, burst into tears; but nevertheless pursued his journey, still hoping he should be able to soften the good-natured emperor into compassion. The day after his arrival at Constantinople he appeared at court; but in order to move the emperor to compassion, stood at a distance from him, silent, and bathed in tears, as if he dared not look up, or approach him. But the emperor no sooner observed him, than he flew to him, not to upbraid him for undertaking the defence of the rebellious city, but to justify his own conduct, and complain to him of the ungrateful return the Antiochians had made for the many favours he had heaped upon them. Flavianus,

[i] Idem, p. 193. 194. Theodor. l. v. c. 19. p. 731, 732. [k] Idem ibid. [l] Idem, p. 517.

The drawup a memorial in behalf of the Antiochians.

The prisoners treated with great humanity by Ellebichus.

Flavianus, bishop of Antioch, recurs to the emperor in their behalf.

[m] Idem, orat. xvii. p. 195. [n] Lib. orat. xxii. p. 518. & orat. xxiii. p. 533. [o] Idem, orat. xxii. p. 535. [p] Chrys. orat. xvii. p. 204.

vianus, burſting into tears, anſwered, that the ſevereſt puniſhment he could inflict upon them, was too mild and gentle for the enormous crimes they had committed, and their undutiful return to ſo indulgent a prince; but at the ſame time he told him, that to forgive one's enemies was a duty incumbent upon every chriſtian; that from his pardoning ſuch enormous offences, great glory would redound to the religion he profeſſed; that the Jews, Greeks, and barbarians, would admire and extol the purity of its morals, &c. He added, that now an opportunity offered to make himſelf a laſting inſtance to all poſterity of humanity and good-nature; and ſeaſonably put him in mind of the order he had iſſued this very year, commanding all priſoners to be ſet at liberty againſt the ſolemnity of Eaſter, and of the memorable words he uttered on that occaſion, viz. I wiſh it were in my power to recal the dead from their graves, and reſtore them to life! This admirable ſpeech, which is related at length by St. Chryſoſtom, made ſo deep an impreſſion on the mind of the emperor, that he could not refrain from tears, nor forbear crying out, that he pardoned the ungrateful city, and reſtored the inhabitants, however guilty, to his favour. Thus St. Chryſoſtom [q]. But Libanius [r] and Theodoret [s] tell us, that the emperor, tho' greatly ſoftened by the ſpeech of Flavianus, yet did not grant a general pardon till the arrival of Cæſarius; who preſenting to him the memorial of the hermits, and at the ſame time pleading with great energy in favour of the unhappy city, which, he ſaid, had been already ſufficiently puniſhed, prevailed upon him to grant a general pardon. He therefore wrote a letter to the citizens of Antioch, ſhewing, that it was not without reaſon he had treated them with ſo much ſeverity, after they had, in ſuch un outrageous manner, inſulted his deceaſed father and wife. He added, that as his anger, however juſt, was ſoon appeaſed, he pardoned all without exception, whether condemned to death or baniſhment, reſtored to them their eſtates, their ſhews, baths, theatres, and territory, and to their city the privileges and rights of a metropolis. He concluded with expreſſions of the deepeſt concern for the death of thoſe who had been condemned by the governor, and executed without his knowledge. This letter the emperor delivered to Flavianus, that he might have the honour of carrying the joyful tidings to the Theodoſius grants them a general pardon.

And reſtores to the city all its privileges.

[q] Idem, orat. xx. p. 226—233.
[r] Lib. orat. xxii. p. 519.
[s] Theodor. l. v. c. 19. p. 732.

the diſconſolate city; but the holy biſhop, impatient to put an end to the affliction of his people, yielded that honour to another, whom he thought capable of performing the journey with more expedition. It is more eaſy to conceive than expreſs the joy, which the arrival of the meſſenger cauſed in Antioch. St. Chryſoſtom, to whom we refer our readers, deſcribes at length what paſſed on this occaſion, and concludes with theſe words: Let the pagans be aſhamed, or rather inſtructed; and learning our philoſophy of an emperor and a biſhop, renounce their errors, and embrace a religion, which encourages and produces ſuch eminent virtues[s].

Maximus invades the dominions of Valentinian, who flies to Theodoſius.

WHILE theſe things paſſed in the eaſt the boundleſs ambition of Maximus raiſed far greater diſturbances in the weſt; for that uſurper, not ſatisfied with the provinces which had been held by Gratian, paſſed this year the Alps all on a ſudden, with a deſign to ſeize on Valentinians ſhare too; and, meeting with no oppoſition, marched ſtrait to Milan, where Valentinian uſually reſided. The young prince, not finding himſelf in a condition to make head againſt him, fled firſt to Aquileia, and from thence, being cloſely purſued by Maximus, to Theſſalonica, with his mother Juſtina, and the prefect Probus, to implore the protection and aſſiſtance of Theodoſius[t]. That pious prince, in a letter which he wrote to Valentinian, in anſwer to one he had received from his mother Juſtina, told him, that he was not at all ſurpriſed at the progreſs Maximus had made, nor at the bad ſucceſs that attended his affairs, ſince the tyrant had protected and he perſecuted, the orthodox faith; for Valentinian, as we have hinted above, had not only embraced the doctrine of Arius, but proſecuted the orthodox prelates, and driven ſeveral of them from their ſees, being induced thereunto by his mother Juſtina, a moſt zealous Arian. Soon after, Theodoſius removed from Conſtantinople, attended by ſeveral members of that ſenate, to Theſſalonica, in order to comfort with his preſence the young prince, who had taken refuge in his dominions. Upon his arrival, he repaired to the palace where Valentinian was lodged; and after having aſſured him, that he was reſolved to employ all the forces of the eaſt in his defence, he prevailed upon him to renounce the Arian impiety, as the only obſtacle to the ſucceſs which they might expect from heaven[u]. Suidas relates the diſcourſe which Theodoſius

Who induces him to renounce the doctrine of Arius.

[s] Chryſ. orat xx p. 234. [t] Zoſ. l. iv. p 667. Theodor. l. v. c. 14. Soz. l vii. c. 14. p. 728. [u] Theodor. p. 724.

ſius made on that ſubject [w]. Zoſimus writes, that in a great council held at Theſſalonica, all the counſellors to a man were of opinion, that war ſhould be forthwith declared againſt Maximus; but that Theodoſius, forſeeing and dreading the evils inſeparable from a civil war, ſent firſt embaſſadors to the tyrant, ſeriouſly exhorting him to reſtore to Valentinian the uſurped provinces, and content himſelf with Gaul, Spain and Britain, which had been yielded to him by himſelf and Valentinian [x]. Maximus would not, it ſeems, hearken to any propoſals; for this very year he laid ſiege to Aquileia, which he reduced, notwithſtanding the vigorous reſiſtance of the inhabitants, as he did Quaderna, Bononia, Mutina, Regium, Placentia, and ſeveral other cities in Italy; nay, he was the enſuing year acknowledged in Rome, and in all the provinces of Africa [y]. Theodoſius, therefore, finding a war inevitable, ſpent the remaining part of this, and the firſt month of the following year 388, when he was conſul the ſecond time with Cynegius, in making the neceſſary preparations for carrying it on with vigor. His army conſiſted chiefly of Goths, Hunns, Alans, and other barbarians, whom he was glad to take into the ſervice, to prevent their raiſing diſturbances on the frontiers. He appointed Promotus general of the horſe, and Timaſius of the foot; and having committed the government of the eaſtern provinces to ſuch perſons as, he knew, would, in his abſence, conſult the welfare of his ſubjects, and maintain the public tranquillity, he ſet out from Theſſalonica, in the beginning of the ſummer, marching with great expedition through Illyricum, with a deſign to ſurpriſe Maximus, who had not yet taken the field, but continued, without the leaſt apprehenſion of danger, in Aquileia. Andragathius, one of the uſurper's generals, a man of great courage and experience in war, had been appointed to guard the paſſes of the Julian Alps; but a report being ſpread, that Theodoſius deſigned to paſs the Ionian ſea, and invade Italy, he was ordered to quit thoſe paſſes, and to man with the utmoſt expedition what ſhips he could, in order to intercept the emperor in his paſſage. Thus was Maximus deprived of the aſſiſtance of that excellent commander, and of the flower of his troops, who were employed in manning the fleet, which Andragathius aſſembled, purſuant to his orders, on the coaſt of the Ionian ſea. In the mean time, Theodoſius entered Maximus reduces ſeveral cities.

Theodoſius marches againſt him.

[w] Suid. p. 347. [x] Zoſ. l iv. p. 768. [y] Ambroſ. ep. 17. p. 215. Pacat. p. 275. Zoſ. p. 769.

tered Pannonia, and advanced to Sciſcia, now Seiſſeg, before the enemy had the leaſt notice of his approach. However, the general, who commanded the troops of Mxaimus in that neighbourhood, having drawn them together with incredible expedition, fell upon Theodoſius as he was paſſing the Save; but his army was utterly defeated, and he himſelf drowned in the river [y]. From Sciſcia the emperor advanced to Petovio, now Pettaw on the Drave, whcre he was met by Marcellinus, the brother of Maximus, at the head of an army far more numerous than his own. However, the emperor offered him battle, which he readily accepted; but was utterly defeated, tho' his men fought with extraordinary courage and reſolution. We are not told, that Maximus was preſent at either of theſe battles; but he muſt have at leaſt advanced to ſupport his generals; for both Pacatus [z] and St. Ambroſe [a] write, that after his forces were twice defeated, he fled with the troops that attended him, and with the remains of the ſhattered army, to Aquileia, whither Theodoſius purſued him, having ſent Arbogaſtes before to inveſt the place, and prevent the tyrant from making his eſcape. Zoſimus writes, that the emperor arriving ſoon after, took the town by aſſault [b]; and Socrates, that it was delivered up to him by the ſoldiers of Maximus [c]. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the tyrant was ſeized, according to ſome, by his own men, according to others by the ſoldiers of Theodoſius, who had entered the city, and dragged in chains to the emperor, encamped about three miles from the city. Theodoſius reproached him with the death of Gratian, and his unbounded ambition, which had prompted him to murder one brother, and drive the other out of his dominions. As Maximus was, or at leaſt pretended to be, touched with remorſe for the crimes he had committed, and publicly owned he had no claim or title to the power he had uſurped, Theodoſius began to look upon him with an eye of compaſſion; which thoſe about him obſerving, and fearing he might pardon him, they removed him out of the emperor's ſight, and without waiting his orders, ſtruck off his head [d]. He was executed at a place about three miles diſtance from Aquileia, on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt, according to Socrates [e]; or on the twenty-eighth of July, as Idatius will have

The army of Maximus defeated.

Theodoſius gains a ſecond victory.

Maximus taken.

And beheaded.

[y] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 769, 770. Amb ep. 17. p. 215. [z] Pacat p. 270—275. [a] Ambr. p. 214. [b] Zoſ. p. 770. [c] Socr l. v. c. 14. p. 273. [d] Socr. Zoſ. ibid. Pacat. p. 279. [e] Socr p. 273.

have it [f]. St. Ambrose writes, that Maximus was at the same time defeated by the Saxons, the Franks, and Theodosius [g]. Those two nations had broken into Gaul, as appears from Gregory of Tours [h], under the conduct of Genobaud, Marcomir, and Sunno; and having ravaged the country bordering on the Rhine, were preparing to repass that river with an immense booty, when Nannius and Quentinus, two of Maximus's generals, falling upon them unexpectedly, cut great numbers of them in pieces. Quentinus followed the Franks cross the Rhine, which he passed near the present city of Nuys; but, as he was not acquainted with the country, most of his men were cut off by the enemy in the woods and marshes, and the rest obliged to save themselves by a shameful and precipitous flight [i]. Maximus had left his son Victor, whom he had declared Augustus, in Gaul, to awe the inhabitants of that province during his absence. Against him Theodosius dispatched Arbogastes, who took him prisoner, after having dispersed the troops that attended him, and put him to death [k]. Zosimus calls him a youth; but all other writers style him an infant. Andragathius, hearing of the defeat and death of Maximus, as he was cruizing in the Ionian gulf, threw himself headlong into the sea, and was drowned, chusing that kind of death, to prevent a more ignominious one, which, as Gratian had been seized and murdered by him, he had reason to apprehend [l]. Orosius writes, that he was overcome in battle [m]; and St. Ambrose, that he had joined Maximus, before his defeat, and perished soon after [n]. Thus ended a war, which at first threatened the empire with endless calamities; and the glory which Theodosius acquired by his victory, was greatly heightened by his moderation and clemency in the use of it; for immediately after the death of Maximus, he published a general amnesty, and was so far from persecuting the friends and relations of the usurper, that he would not even suffer them to be reproached with their rebellion. No man was banished, says Pacatus, no man's estate was confiscated; and those who deserved, and would have suffered, the most cruel death under any other prince, were dismissed by Theodosius, without so Quentinus, one of the generals of Maximus, defeated by the Franks.

Victor, the son of Maximus, taken in Gaul, and put to death.

Theodosius uses the victory with great clemency and moderation.

[f] Idat. chron. [g] Ambr. ep. 17. p. 215. [h] Greg. Turon. hist. Franc. l. ii. c. 9. p 58, 59. [i] Idem ibid. p. 59, 60. [k] Zos. l. iv. p. 770. Victor. p. 545. Prosp p. 515. [l] Zos. Vict. Prosp. ibid. [m] Oros. l. vii. c. 35. p. 220. [n] Ambr. ep. 17. p. 214.

ſo much as hearing from him an angry word [o]. Thoſe who had with moſt warmth eſpouſed the tyrant's cauſe, were allowed to return unhurt, continues the ſame author, to their wives and children, to enjoy their eſtates unmoleſted, and with them the ſame rank, dignity and honours, by which they had been diſtinguiſhed before the rebellion [p]. The wife and daughter of Maximus had been taken, and confined in a public priſon by ſome of the emperor's officers; which the good-natured prince no ſooner knew than he ordered them to be ſet at liberty, ſettled a conſiderable penſion upon them, and charged one of their kinſmen to take care, that no one injured or inſulted them [q]. But what St. Ambroſe and Zoſimus himſelf moſt of all admired in Theodoſius, was, his not only reſtoring to Valentinian his own ſhare, when no one was in a condition to diſpute with him the poſſeſſion of the whole empire, but his generouſly relinquiſhing to him Gaul, Spain, and Britain, which, before the revolt of Maximus, had been held by his brother Gratian. He was ſatisfied ſays St. Ambroſe, with the good he had done, without reaping any advantage from it himſelf, tho' no one could have blamed him, had he retained ſome of thoſe provinces, conſidering the immenſe charge he had been at in reſtoring the young prince to the quiet poſſeſſion of the reſt [r]. As Juſtina, the mother of Valentinian, died about this time, Theodoſius, during the three years he continued in the weſt, governed in the name of that prince, who was, at the death of his mother, ſcarce ſeventeen years old, and conſequently not yet equal to ſo great a burden [s]. While Theodoſius was purſuing the war in Illyricum, a report was ſpread at Conſtantinople, that his army was cut off, and he himſelf in great danger of falling in the hands of the uſurper. Hereupon the Arians, whom he had highly diſobliged, by driving them from their churches in 380, as we have related above, riſing in the night time, ſet fire to the houſe of Nectarius, the orthodox biſhop of Conſtantinople, who periſhed in the flames, and committed ſeveral other diſorders. But the news of the entire defeat of the uſurper being brought ſoon after to that metropolis, the Arians, dreading the effects of the emperor's indignation, had recourſe to the clemency of Arcadius, whom Theodoſius had left at Conſtantinople in ſetting out for the war; and the young prince not only forgave them himſelf, but prevailed upon his father to confirm the pardon which he had granted Diſturbances raiſed in Conſtantinople by the Arians.

[o] Pacat. p. 281. [p] Idem, p. 282. [q] Ambr. ep. 17. p. 215. [r] Ambr. p. 216. [s] Ruffin. l. ii. c. 17. p. 135.

ed them [t]. It was without all doubt, on this occaſion that the Arians ſet fire to the church of St. Sophia, which conſumed the roof of that ſtately edifice, as we read in Codin; but Theodoſius, notwithſtanding his zeal for the orthodox faith, to encourage his ſon to acts of clemency, at his requeſt overlooked that, and the other enormous diſorders committed by the fanatics on that occaſion. The emperor was ſtill at Aquileia on the twenty-ſecond of September; but on the tenth of October at Milan, where he ſeems to have paſſed the winter [w]. Being informed, while he reſided in that city, that the chriſtians had burnt a ſynagogue of the Jews and a temple of the pagans at Callinicum in Meſopotamia, he condemned the biſhop of the place to rebuild the ſynagogue at his own expence, and ordered all thoſe who had been any-ways concerned in either of theſe riots, to be puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity. But St. Ambroſe, thinking a prince, who had lately overlooked far greater diſorders in the Arians, ought not to exert ſo much rigor againſt an orthodox biſhop and his people, wrote to him from Aquileia in their favour; and upon his return to Milan perſuaded the emperor, by a ſpeech he pronounced before him in the great church, to revoke the order he had given [x]. About the latter end of this year, the ſenate of Rome diſpatched deputies to Theodoſius, earneſtly entreating him to give them leave to reſtore to its former place the altar of Victory, which had been removed by Gratian. The emperor ſeemed at firſt inclined to grant them their requeſt; but was in the end perſuaded by St. Ambroſe to deny it. However, Symmachus, the chief of the deputies, a man univerſally eſteemed for his eloquence, and greatly beloved by the pagans, in regard of his zeal for the antient religion of the Romans in a panegyric which he pronounced ſoon after on Theodoſius, renewed the ſame requeſt in the name of the ſenate; which ſo provoked the emperor, that he immediately ordered him to come down, and to be put that inſtant into a chariot, in order to be conveyed into baniſhment, forbidding him, under the ſevereſt penalties, ever to come within an hundred miles of Rome [y]. The emperor's indignation ſeemed the more juſt, Theodoſius pardons them at the requeſt of his ſon Arcadius.

A deputation from the ſenate of Rome, for reſtoring the altar of Victory.

Their requeſt rejected, and Symmachus baniſhed but recalled.

[t] Sodr. l. v. c. 13 p. 272. Soz l. vii. c. 14. p. 722, 723. [u] Codin. orig. Conſtant. p. 64. [w] Cod. Theod. l. xv. tit. 14. leg. 6. p. 409. & leg. 7. p. 410 [x] Ambr. epiſt 17, 18. vit. p. 83, 84. [y] Socr. l. v. c. 14. p. 273. Proſp. de promiſſ l. iii. c. 38. p. 149.

juſt, as Symmachus had been but very lately pardoned by him, when accuſed by his enemies of treaſon, in having pronounced a panegyric during the war on the uſurper Maximus. However, as Theodoſius was never more ready to pardon, than when he ſeemed moſt provoked, the friends of Symmachus no ſooner ſpoke in his behalf, than the emperor recalled him, reſtored him to his former rank, and to convince the world that he retained no ill will to him, raiſed him two years after to the conſular dignity [z]. This year Theodoſius enacted ſeveral laws againſt heretics, viz. one dated the ſecond of March, forbidding them, eſpecially the Apollinarians, to hold aſſemblies, to have biſhops or clergy, to live in cities, to appear at court, or to preſent any petition to the emperor [a]. The ſame prohibition was renewed by another law, dated the fourteenth of June [b]. By another enacted two days after, all public diſputes concerning religion were forbidden under the ſevereſt penalties [c]. A law dated the twenty-ninth of February declares all marriages between Jews and chriſtians unlawful, and ſubjects the contracting parties to the puniſhments due to adultery; another, addreſſed to Cynegius, forbids any one to marry his brother's wife, or his own wife's ſiſter [d]. The ſame prohibition had been made by Conſtantius in 355 [e]. Theodoſius, who was ſtill at Milan on the twenty-ſecond of May [f], left that city ſoon after, and repaired to Rome with young Valentinian and his ſon Honorius, whom he had ſent for from Conſtantinople, after the defeat of Maximus. He entered that metropolis in triumph on the thirteenth of June; and a few days after Latinus Pacatus Drepanius, an orator of Gaul, pronounced his panegyric in the ſenate, the emperor himſelf being preſent. The orator takes notice of his liberality towards the people on that occaſion, of his affability and condeſcenſion, not only in viewing the rarities of the city, but in entering the houſes of private perſons, which won him the hearts of the Roman people [g]. The poet Claudian tells us, that at Rome he received embaſſadors ſent by the king of Perſia to treat with him about a peace between the two Several laws of this year, eſpecially againſt heretics.

Theodoſius goes to Rome.

[z] Ambroſ. ſermo de diverſ. iii p. 118. Sym. l. ii ep. 30, 31. p. 74. ep. 61, 63. p. 89, 90. & l. v. ep. 15. p. 191. [a] Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 5. leg 14. p. 130. [b] Idem, leg. 15 p. 131. [c] Idem, tit. 4 leg 2. p. 100. [d] Idem, l. iii. tit. 7. leg. 2. p. 278. & cod. Juſtin. l. v. tit. 5. leg. 5 p. 425. [e] Cod. Theod. l. iii. tit. 12. leg 2. p. 296. [f] Idem, p. 130. [g] Soz. p. 273. Ruf. l. ii. c 17. p 185.

two empires [h]. To Theodoſius's journey to Rome was owing, according to Prudentius [i], the converſion of the ſenate and people of that city to the chriſtian relgion; not that he uſed any violence, ſays that writer, for he indifferently raiſed pagans and chriſtians to the firſt employments in the ſtate [k]; but ſo great was the force of his example, that few, either in the ſenate or among the people, were ſo attached to their errors as to withſtand it. Prudentius mentions ſeveral illuſtrious families converted on this occaſion to the true religion, viz. the families of the Paulini, of the Baſſi, of the Annii, and of the Gracchi, at that time the moſt antient and noble family in Rome. The people, continues that writer, flocked to the Lateran church, to receive there the ſacred ſign of the royal chriſm, and to the Vatican, to viſit the aſhes of the father of the faith; meaning, we imagine, St. Peter, who was then ſuppoſed to have planted the faith in Rome. The idols, ſays St. Jerom, were every-where pulled down; their temples abandoned; and the gods, once ſo much revered, left in their nitches alone, or attended only by mice and owls: the capitol, continues the ſame writer, formerly ſo much frequented, is now turned into a deſert; the other temples are covered with duſt, and filled with cobwebs; the whole city crouds to the tombs of the martyrs; and the people, in paſſing by thoſe antient temples, behold them with joy ready to fall, and bury the gods under their ruins. Rome forſakes Jupiter and his temples, deſpiſes his ceremonies, and is aſhamed of the worſhip formerly paid him [l]. Theodoſius, however, would not ſuffer the ſtatues of the gods, many of which were the work of the beſt artificers of antiquity, to be deſtroyed; but ordered them to be removed from the places where they had been adored, to the public ſquares, where they ſerved as ornaments to the city [m]. Theodoſius ſtaid ſcarce three months at Rome, but in that ſhort time he not only ſeriouſly applied himſelf to the ſuppreſſion of idolatry, but with indefatigable care laboured to reform many abuſes, which had long prevailed in the city, as appears from the ſeveral laws he publiſhed there [n]. He enacted one, dated the ſeventeenth of June, ordering all the Manichees to be driven out of the city, and declaring them incapable of receiving legacies, or leaving any thing by will even to their children.

Endeavours to aboliſh idolatry in that metropolis.

[h] Claud. p. 176. [i] Prud. in Sym l. i. p. 218. [k] Idem, p. 220. [l] Hier. ep. 7. p. 54. & in Jov. l. ii. c. 18. p. 95. [m] Prud. p. 220. [n] Cod. Theod. l. xii. tit. 10. leg. 1. p. 612. & l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 18 p. 138.

A comet appears in the eaſt.

A few days before Theodoſius left Rome, a comet is ſaid to have appeared in the eaſt in the ſhape of a ſword; and moving northward, to have vaniſhed in the middle of the Urſa Major, after having laſted forty days, as we read in Philoſtorgius [o]; or only twenty-ſix, as Marcellinus will have it [p]. The former writer mentions ſeveral other prodigies, among which he reckons two men equally remarkable for their ſize, the one being ſeven cubits and three inches, and the other no taller, ſays the author, than a partridge, though he had an agreeable voice, and an excellent underſtanding: the former was a native of Syria, and the latter of Egypt, and they both lived to the age of about twenty-five [q]. Theodoſius leaves Rome.

Theodoſius left Rome on the firſt of September, was at a place called Valentia on the third of the ſame month, and on the ſixth at Forum Flaminii, now Ponte Centeſimo on the Topino, not far from Fuligno in the dutchy of Spoleto, where he enacted a law forbidding the execution of criminals during Lent [r]. From thence he purſued his journey to Milan, where he enacted a law, dated the twenty-ſixth of November, commanding the heretic biſhops and clergy to be every-where driven out of the cities and their ſuburbs [s]. From this law, and ſeveral others of the enſuing year, it appears, that Theodoſius paſſed the winter in that city, while Valentinian marched into Gaul, to make head againſt the Franks, who were preparing to invade that province; but all we know of this expedition is, that Valentinian had an interview with Marcomir and Sunno, two chiefs of the Franks; that they delivered hoſtages to him; and that the emperor, on the eighth of November, was at Treves, where he took up his winter quarters [t]. This year is chiefly remarkable for the deſtruction of the celebrated temple of Serapis at Alexandria, which, according to the deſcription Ammianus Marcellinus gives us of it, ſurpaſſed in grandeur and wealth all the temples in the world, that of Jupiter Capitolinus alone excepted [u]; nay, Theodoret calls it the greateſt, and without exception the moſt beautiful temple, in the univerſe [w]. Theodoſius, who had hitherto ſpared that ſtately edifice, cauſed it this year to be levelled with the ground on the following occaſion. Theophilus, biſhop of Alexandria, having begged and obtained Valentinian concludes a peace with the Franks.

of

[o] Philoſt. l. x. c. 9 p. 139——141. [p] Marcell. chron. [q] Philoſ ibid. p. 142, 143. [r] Cod. Theod. chron p. 120, 121. [s] Idem ibid. [t] Oroſ. l. vii c. 35. p. 220. Cod. Theod. chron. p. 120. [u] Ammian l. xxii. p. 234. [w] Theodor. p. 735.

of the emperor an old temple, formerly conſecrated to Bacchus, but at that time ruined and forſaken, with a deſign to convert it into a church, the workmen, in clearing it of the rubbiſh, found among the ruins ſeveral obſcene figures, which the biſhop to ridicule the ſuperſtition of the heathens, cauſed to be expoſed to public view. This provoked the pagans to ſuch a degree, that they flew to arms; and falling upon the chriſtians, cut great numbers of them in pieces, before they were in a condition to oppoſe their furry. At length the chriſtians took arms in their own defence; and, being ſupported by the few ſoldiers who were quartered in Alexandria, began to repel force by force. Thus a civil war was kindled within the very walls of the city, and no day paſſed without ſome ſcuffle and bloodſhed. The pagans, when tired with fighting, or overpowered with numbers, (for the chriſtians were far more numerous) uſed to retire to the temple of Serapis; and thence ſallying out again unexpectedly, ſeize on ſuch of the chriſtians as they met, and dragging them into the temple, either force them by the moſt exquiſite torments to ſacrifice to their idol, or, if they refuſed, to rack them to death. As they expected to be ſoon attacked by the emperor's troops, they choſe a philoſopher, by name Olympus, for their leader, with a reſolution to defend themſelves, their temple, and their religion, to the laſt extremity. In the mean time, Evagrius, governor of Egypt, and Romanus, who commanded the troops there, having attempted in vain to perſuade the pagans to quit the temple, and retire to their dwellings, ſent a diſtinct account of the whole to the emperor, who extolling and envying the happineſs of ſuch as had choſen rather to die, than renounce their religion and offer ſacrifice to the idols, would not ſuffer their death to be revenged on thoſe at whoſe hands they had obtained the crown of martyrdom, but readily forgave them. However, at the ſame time, he ordered the temple of Serapis, and all the other temples in Alexandria, which gave occaſion to frequent diſturbances, to be utterly demoliſhed, charging Theophilus, biſhop of the place, who had ſolicited this order, to ſee it put in execution, and enjoining Evagrius and Romanus to follow therein his directions. The pagans no ſooner knew that the emperor had been informed of the cruelties they had committed, than they abandoned the temple and diſperſed, ſome of them retiring privately to their own houſes, and others withdrawing from the town, and either concealing themſelves in the neighbouring cities, or flying to more diſtant

The pagans riſe againſt the chriſtians in Alexandria.

Several chriſtians maſſacred and put to cruel deaths.

Theodoſius orders the famous temple of Serapis, and all the temples in Alexandria, to be pulled down.

diſtant countries. Among the latter was their leader Olympus, who conveyed himſelf in the night on board a veſſel which was ready to ſail for Italy. Helladius and Ammonius, two grammarians, under whom Socrates, the eccleſiaſtic hiſtorian, had ſtudied at Conſtantinople, withdrew from Egypt, and took refuge amongſt the neighbouring barbarians. The former uſed to brag of his having killed, during that tumult, nine chriſtians with his own hand [x]. The temple, thus abandoned by the pagans, was delivered up to Theophilus, who, with the aſſiſtance of the people and ſoldiery, reduced it in a ſhort time to an heap of ruins, leaving nothing undemoliſhed but the foundations, which could not be removed on account of the extraordinary weight and ſize of the ſtones. The celebrated ſtatue of Serapis, the principal god of the Egyptians, was broken in pieces, and the limbs of that pretended divinity carried firſt in triumph by the chriſtians through the city, and then thrown into an huge fire kindled for that purpoſe in the amphitheatre. As the Egyptians aſcribe the overflowing of the Nile, to which was owing the fertility of their country, to the benign influence of their god Serapis, they concluded, that, now he was deſtroyed, the river would no longer overflow, and conſequently that a general famine would enſue. But when they obſerved, that the Nile, on the contrary, ſwelled to a greater height than had been known in the memory of man, and thereby produced an immenſe plenty of all manner of proviſions, many of the pagans, renouncing the worſhip of the idols, adored the God of the chriſtians [y]. Rufinus [z], Socrates [a], Eunapius [b], and Sozomen [c], write, that croſſes were found engraved on ſeveral of the ſtones of the temple, which occaſioned the converſion of great numbers of the Egyptian prieſts, the croſs being in the ſacred language of that nation the ſymbol of life; and on the other hand, a tradition having for many ages obtained among them, that their religion, and the temple of Serapis would ſubſiſt till the ſign of life appeared. Not only the ſtatue of Serapis, which was lodged in the temple, but all the other ſtatues of that pretended deity, were by the zealous chriſtians carefully ſought for, ignominiouſly dragged through the ſtreets, and conſumed in the flames; inſomuch, that in the great city of Serapis, as Alexandria andria was frequently ſtiled, not the leaſt footſtep was left of that idol, or of the worſhip which for ſo many ages had been paid him. In the room of the temple of Serapis was built a church, and a martyrium, ſays Rufinus [d], meaning perhaps a burying-place for thoſe who had ſuffered martyrdom, during the late diſturbances. Sophronius, one of St. Jerom's friends, wrote a particular and diſtinct account of the demolition of the temple of Serapis [e]; but his work has not reached our times. Theophilus, who was a prelate no leſs active than zealous, not ſatisfied with demoliſhing the temple of Serapis, encouraged the people, ſupported by the governor of the province, and the commander of the Roman troops, to pull down and level with the ground all the other temples, oratories, chapels, and places ſet apart for the worſhip of the idols throughout Egypt, cauſing every-where the ſtatues of the gods to be either burnt or melted down. Of the innumerable ſtatues, with which that ſuperſtitious province was filled, he is ſaid to have ſpared but one, viz. that of an ape, in order to expoſe the pagan religion to ridicule [f]. Theodoſius not only approved of what Theophilus had done, but commended his zeal, and returned him public thanks for the pains he had taken in clearing that province from the abominations to which it had been ſo long addicted [g]. Soon after he enacted a law, forbidding, on pain of death, the ſubjects of the empire to offer any kind of ſacrifice to idols; and declaring the eſtates confiſcated of ſuch as ſhould burn incenſe before them [h].

The ſtatue of Serapis, broken in pieces.

[x] Socr. l. vii. c. 15. p. 724. Ruf. l. ii. c. 22. p. 187. Soz. p. 726. [y] Ruf. l. ii c. 27. p. 190. Socr. l. v. c. 16. p. 274. [z] Ruf. ibid. [a] Socr ibid. [b] Eunap. c. 4. p. 60—64. [c] Soz. l. vii. c. 15. p. 725.

All the temples throughout Egypt demoliſhed.

THE following year 390, when Valentinian was conſul the fourth time with Neoterius, Theodoſius continued at Milan, as appears from the code, till the fifth of July; was at Verona from the twenty-third of Auguſt to the eighth of September, and again at Milan on the twenty-ſixth of November, and the twenty-third of December. At Verona he publiſhed a law, dated the third of September, commanding thoſe who profeſſed a monaſtic life, to withdraw from the cities, and retire to the deſerts, purſuant to their inſtitution. But this law he revoked by another dated the ſeventeenth of April 392 [i]. By a law, which was publiſhed at Rome on the fourteenth of May, he commanded thoſe who ſhould be found found guilty of unnatural luſt to be burnt alive in the ſight of the whole people [k]. This year, an obeliſk, twenty-four cubits in height, was raiſed in the circus at Conſtantinople, and a column before the church of St. Sophia, on which was a ſtatue of Theodoſius in ſilver, weighing ſeven thouſand four hundred ounces [l]. As for Valentinian, he ſeems to have continued all this year at Treves, or in the neighbourhood of that city. The next conſuls were Tatianus and Q. Aurelius Symmachus. Theodoſius continued this year at Milan to the twenty-ſecond of March, was at Concordia on the ninth of May, at Vicentia on the twenty-ſeventh of the ſame month, and at Aquileia from the ſixteenth of June to the fourteenth of July [m]. By a law dated the ninth of May, he declared thoſe who ſhould renounce the chriſtian religion, after having been baptized, not only incapable of giving or receiving the leaſt thing by will, but of being, as infamous perſons, witneſſes to any private or public deed; adding, that he would have confined them to the deſerts, had he not believed it a greater puniſhment for them to live among men, without being looked upon as men [n]. By another law, dated the ninth of the ſame month, he commanded the heretics to be every-where driven out of the cities [o]. Some writers confine this law to the Manichees, while others extend it to heretics of all denominations. Theodoſius was, as we have obſerved above, at Aquileia on the fourteenth of July; but ſoon after he ſet out from thence for Conſtantinople, leaving the entire management of affairs in the weſt to Valentinian, now in the twentieth year of his age. On his arrival at Theſſalonica, he found the province of Macedon in great confuſion; for the barbarians, who, at the inſtigation of Maximus, had revolted, and concealed themſelves among the marſhes and woods, after the defeat of the uſurper, taking advantage of the emperor's abſence, began to ſally out of their faſtneſſes in the night, and ſeizing on whatever came in their way, they retired with their booty before day. As it was a more difficult taſk to find them out than to conquer them, the emperor took that province upon himſelf; and without diſcovering his deſign to any one, made choice of five perſons, in whom he could confide, to attend him, ordering each of them to take three ſpare horſes, that

A law againſt unnatural luſt.

[d] Ruf. l. ii c. 27. p. 190. [e] Hier vir. illuſtr. c. 133. p. 303. [f] Socr. p. 275. [g] Ruf. p. 189. [h] Cod Theod. l. xvi. tit. 10 leg 10 p. 271. [i] Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit 3. leg. 1. p. 96. & leg. 2. p. 97, 98.

One againſt apoſtates.

Theodoſius returns to the eaſt.

The barbarians, concealing themſelves amongſt the woods and marſhes, infeſt the province of Macedon.

[k] Idem, l ix. tit. 2. leg. 4 p. 30. [l] Marcell. chron. [m] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 123. [n] Idem, l xvi. tit. 7. leg. 4 & v. p. 207, 208. [o] Idem, tit. 5. leg. 20. p. 137.

that they might ſhift as often as there was occaſion. Thus attended and diſguiſed, he ranged about the country, receiving from the peaſants ſuch refreſhments as their cottages could afford him. At length he came to a ſmall inn, kept by a woman ſtricken in years, who received him with extraordinary civility, which induced him to ſtay there that night. In the ſame inn lodged a perſon, who declining to converſe with the reſt, and ſeeming deſirous to conceal himſelf, gave the emperor no ſmall jealouſy. Having therefore, after he was retired to his chamber, called for the miſtreſs of the houſe, and aſked her who that perſon was, ſhe anſwered, that who he was ſhe knew not; but that ever ſince the news of the emperor's return out of the weſt, he had lodged at her houſe, going out in the morning, and continuing abroad all day, but returning at night to his lodging, for which he honeſtly paid her. Upon this information, the emperor ordered him to be ſeized and examined; but he refuſing to declare who he was, the emperor at laſt diſcovered himſelf, ordered the man to be put to the rack, and by that means forced him to own the truth, viz. that he was employed as a ſpy by the barbarians, who lay concealed among the woods and bogs, to give them intelligence from time to time of the motions of the emperor's army, and to inform them what places lay moſt convenient for their incurſions. Hereupon the emperor cauſed his head to be ſtruck off; and returning early the next morning to the army, led his ſoldiers to the place where he had learnt from the ſpy the barbarians were lodged; and falling upon them unexpectedly, cut great numbers of them in pieces. Timaſius, who together with Promotus commanded on this occaſion under Theodoſius, imagining moſt of the barbarians to be already cut off, adviſed the emperor to allow his ſoldiers ſome time to refreſh themſelves after ſo warm and fatiguing a ſervice, that they might with more vigour purſue the reſt, who could not make their eſcape. The emperor, following his advice, founded a retreat; but while his men were refreſhing themſelves without the leaſt apprehenſion of danger, the barbarians, falling upon them when they were quite unprepared, and moſt of them overcome with wine, or aſleep, made a dreadful havock of them, and would have either killed, or taken the emperor himſelf, had he not been ſeaſonably reſcued by Promotus, at the danger of his own life. However, Theodoſius, having rallied his diſperſed forces the next day, attacked the barbarians anew with ſuch ſucceſs, that few of them

How diſcovered by Theodoſius.

The emperor in great danger.

He gains a complete victory over the barbarians.

them eſcaped the general ſlaughter. Thus Zoſimus [p], on whoſe ſingle authority the whole truth of this account reſts; for no other writer takes the leaſt notice of this expedition. The victory over the barbarians was, according to Zoſimus, who ſtudies to leſſen on all occaſions the glory of Theodoſius, chiefly owing to the courage and conduct of Promotus; but that brave general, who had ſerved the emperor with great fidelity, was this very year killed in an ambuſcade by the barbarians in Thrace. Zoſimus writes, that Rufinus, the emperor's chief favourite, having treated Promotus in a very haughty and inſolent manner, the general, not able to brook ſuch treatment, ſtruck him; which affront Rufinus revenged, by betraying him into the hands of the barbarians, with whom he maintained for that purpoſe a private correſpondence [q]. But Claudian, who mentions the death of Promotus, and wrote two books filled with invectives againſt Rufinus, takes no notice of this black piece of treachery. Zoſimus adds, that Rufinus having complained of Promotus to the emperor, the prince, who repoſed an entire confidence in him, returned him this anſwer; If the other miniſters continue thus to envy you, your good fortune, they ſhall ſoon have the mortification to ſee you emperor [r]. Claudian writes, that Stilicho revenged the death of his friend Promotus on the Baſtarnæ, by whoſe hands he fell; and that after having defeated them with great ſlaughter, he ſhut them up in a narrow valley, with the Goths, Hunns, and other barbarians, who had long infeſted Thrace, and would have cut them all off to a man, had not the emperor choſen rather to conclude a peace with them, following therein, ſays that poet, the evil counſels of the traitor Rufinus [s].

Promotus kil'ed in an ambuſcade.

Theodoſius endeavours to ſuppreſs idolatry and Arianiſm in the eaſt.

Theodoſius, upon his return to Conſtantinople, made it his chief ſtudy to ſuppreſs idolatry and Arianiſm, ordering ſuch temples as were ſtill ſtanding to be pulled down, and the Arians to be every-where driven out of the cities, leſt they ſhould infect their fellow-citizens with their peſtilent doctrine [t].

THE next conſuls were Arcadius, the ſecond time, and Rufinus. Theodoſius had, as we have obſerved above, during his three years ſtay in the weſt, uſed all poſſible means to extirpate idolatry; but upon his return to the eaſt, the pagans began to conceive new hopes, and ſuch of the ſenators of Rome, as continued ſtill attached to the ſuperſtition of

[p] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 770—773. [q] Idem, p. 773. [r] Idem ibid. [s] Claud. de laud. Stil. l. i. p. 125, 126. in Ruf. l. i. c. 17. [t] Ruf. l. ii. c. 19 p. 185.

of their anceſtors, ſent a deputation to Valentinian, at the head of which was the celebrated Symmachus, entreating him to reſtore to their prieſts and temples, the privileges which they had enjoyed till the reign of Gratian. Valentinian, who was then in Gaul, received the deputies in a very obliging manner; but could not be prevailed upon, either by them, or by the many pagan miniſters who were in his court, to grant them their requeſt [u]. Not long after, the barbarians threatening to paſs the Alps towards Rhœtia, and invade Italy, the emperor reſolved to quit Gaul, and haſten to Milan, in order to make head againſt them. As he was deſirous of being baptized before he engaged in a war, he diſpatched from Vienne, where he then was, an expreſs to St. Ambroſe biſhop of Milan, for whom he had an extraordinary eſteem and veneration, inviting him into Gaul, to adminiſter to him that ſacrament. The prelate, upon the receipt of the emperor's letter, ſet out without delay; but before he reached Vienne, he received the melancholy news of the death of that unfortunate prince, inhumanly murdered, as moſt authors agree, by Arbogaſtes. He was a Frank by nation, and owed his preferment to Gratian. After that prince's death, the ſoldiery, by whom he was highly eſteemed, and not undeſervedly, for his experience in military affairs, his liberality and diſintereſtedneſs, raiſed him, without the conſent either of Valentinian, who was then a child, or of his mother Juſtina, to the poſt of general; in which command he acquitted himſelf with great fidelity and moderation, while Theodoſius continued in the weſt; but, upon the departure of that prince for Conſtantinople, he began to act more like a ſovereign than a miniſter or officer, arrogating to himſelf the power of controuling the young prince, and governing the court with an abſolute ſway. Such of the officers in the army as ſeemed attached to Valentinian, he diſcharged, and put Franks, in whom he could confide, in their room, diſpoſing at the ſame time of all the civil employments, without the emperor's conſent or knowledge, and beſtowing them upon perſons of his own faction. Valentinian, no longer able to brook ſuch a ſhameful ſervitude, reſolved to diſcharge Arbogaſtes; and accordingly ſeeing him one day at court, he threw him a paper, containing an abrogation of his command. But Arbogaſtes, having peruſed it, tore it in pieces with great contempt, and threw it on the ground, telling the emperor with Valentinian refuſes to reſtore to the temples their antient privileges.

Arbogaſtes pretends to controul the young prince.

[u] Ambr ſerm. de diverſ p 114. Symm. l. iii ep. 63. p. 130. Oroſ. l. vii. c. 35. p 249.

He is diſcharged; but refuſes to reſign his poſt, and cauſes Valentinian to be murdered.

with the utmoſt arrogance, that as he had not received his authority of him, it was not in his power to diveſt him of it. After this, Arbogaſtes, well appriſed that Valentinian would not ſuffer ſuch an outrage to paſs unrevenged, reſolved to be before-hand with him, and accordingly diſpatched him a few days after [w]. Authors diſagree as to the manner of his death:

Various opinions concerning the manner of his death.

Zoſimus writes, that while Valentinian, attended by a ſmall guard, was diverting himſelf in the neighbourhood of Vienne, Arbogaſtes, aſſaulting him unexpectedly, ſtabbed him with his ſword [x]. According to Philoſtorgius, he was ſtrangled, while he was taking his diverſion on the banks of the Rhone, by aſſaſſines, whom Arbogaſtes had hired for that purpoſe. The ſame author adds, that, after they had ſtrangled him, they tied his own handkerchief about his neck, and hung him upon a tree, that the world might be induced to believe, he had laid violent hands on himſelf; for his guards were at ſome diſtance, and out of ſight [y]. St. Jerom [z], Oroſius [a], Rufinus [b], Epiphanius [c], Socrates [d], and Sozomen [e], agree, that he was ſtrangled; but the two latter writers ſuppoſe this to have happened in the palace, and the eunuchs of the court, gained over by Arbogaſtes, to have been the authors of his death. Idatius and Tiro Proſper only write, that he was murdered by the treachery of Arobogaſtes. The report which Arbogaſtes, and thoſe of his faction, ſpread abroad, viz. that the prince had laid violent hands on himſelf, was credited by many, and among the reſt by Proſper, who relates it in his chronicle as an event not to be queſtioned; but we can hardly believe, that St. Ambroſe would have extolled, as he does, his piety and religious ſentiments, had he ended his life by the enormous crime of ſelf-murder. He died in 392, on the fifteenth of May, that year the eve of Pentecoſt, after having lived only twenty years and ſome months, and borne the title of emperor ſixteen years and about ſix months, tho' he cannot be ſaid to have reigned till the death of Gratian, who died eight years and nine months before him [f]. St. Ambroſe tells us, that when he ſaw himſelf unexpectedly attacked by the aſſaſſins, the only words he uttered were, Alas! my poor ſiſters [g]! The funeral ceremonies monies were performed the next day, the ſixteenth of May, with great ſolemnity; and his body was ſent to Milan, and interred there near that of his brother Gratian, on which occaſion St. Ambroſe pronounced an oration in praiſe of the deceaſed prince [h], who, according to him, and moſt other writers, would have equalled, if not eclipſed, the glory of the beſt emperors, had he been ſuffered to live longer, being of a lively genius, valiant, ſober, liberal, ſincere in his friendſhip, entirely unbiaſſed in the adminiſtration of juſtice, and in the diſpoſing of employments partial to merit alone [i]. Zoſimus, tho' highly prejudiced againſt all chriſtian princes, owns, that his death was a public loſs [k]. He had perſecuted the catholics in his mother's life-time, or rather, ſhe had perſecuted them in his name; but, after her death, he proved a moſt zealous patron of the orthodox faith, diſcountenancing the Arian and other ſectaries, as much as he had favoured them before he was capable of diſtinguiſhing truth from falſhood [l]. His two ſiſters, Juſta and Grata, continued at Milan, and there embraced, after his death, the ſtate of virginity. His ſiſter Galla, who was married to Theodoſius, died two years after in child-bed.

[w] Oroſ. p. 220. Zoſ. p. 776. Socr. p. 93. Soz. ibid. [x] Zoſ. ibid. [y] Philoſtorg l. xi c. 1. p. 145. [z] Hier. ep. 3. p. 26. [a] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 35. p. 220. [b] Ruf. l. ii. c. 31. p. 191. [c] Epiph. de menſ & pond. 20. p. 177. [d] Socr. l. v. c. 25. p. 294. [e] Soz l. vii. c. 22. p. 739. [f] Epiph. p. 177. Philoſt. p. 144. [g] Ambr. ibid p. 112.

His character.

AFTER the death of Valentinian, Arbogaſtes might have eaſily ſeized on the ſovereignty; but not caring to appear guilty of ſuch a treacherous and inhuman murder, he choſe to confer it on Eugenius, and to reign in his name [m]. Eugenius had formerly taught grammar, and afterwards rhetoric, and was generally eſteemed on account of his eloquence. Ricomer, at the requeſt of Symmachus, had taken him under his protection, and upon his returning into the eaſt with Theodoſius, recommended him to Arbogaſtes, by whoſe intereſt he was raiſed to the poſt of ſecretary [n]. Zoſimus tells us, that Arbogaſtes, repoſing an entire confidence in Eugenius, and judging him capable of the moſt daring reſolutions, imparted to him the deſign he had formed of murdering Valentinian, and raiſing him to the empire in his room; that Eugenius rejected at firſt the propoſal with horror; but was in the end prevailed upon to fall in with the meaſures of his patron; whereupon he was, by his intereſt, after the death of the young prince, proclaimed emperor, as a perſon well qualified Eugenius is ſet up by Arbogaſtes in his room.

[h] Idem ibid, p. 113—115. [i] Idem ibid. Socr. l. iv. c. 31. p 250. [k] Zoſ. l iv. p. 776. [l] Ambr. ſerm. de diverſ. p. 107. [m] Philoſt. l. xi. c 2. p. 145. Oroſ. l vii. c. 35. p 220. Claud. conſ. Hon 3, 4. p. 35, 41. [n] Soc. l. v. c 25. p. 293. Zoſ. p. 775. Philoſt p. 146. Symm. l. iii. ep. 60, 61. p. 129.

He ſeizes on all the weſtern provinces.

qualified for that high ſtation [o]. He ſoon made himſelf maſter of all the weſtern provinces, ſays Socrates [p]; which muſt be underſtood of Weſt Illyricum, Italy, Gaul, Spain, and Britain; but not of Africa, which, after the death of Valentinian, ſubmitted to Theodoſius, as appears from two laws of that prince, the one dated from Conſtantinople the thirtieth of December, 393, and addreſſed to Gildo count of Africa, and the other dated from the ſame place the twenty-ſeventh of March, and addreſſed to Silvanus duke of the province Tripolitana [q]. It is likewiſe manifeſt from Claudian, that Gildo acknowledged Theodoſius, and not Eugenius [r]. The new uſurper, tho' a chriſtian, was greatly favoured by the pagans, who were well appriſed, that he only bore the title of emperor, while the whole power was lodged in Arbogaſtes, who pretended a great attachment to their religion. The aruſpices, who began to appear anew, aſſured him, that he was deſtined to the empire of the whole world; that he would ſoon gain a complete victory over Theodoſius, who was as much hated, as he was beloved, by the gods; and that his power and authority would have no other bounds, but thoſe of the Roman empire [s]. Tho' Eugenius ſeemed to favour the pagans, yet, in the very beginning of his reign he wrote to St. Ambroſe, who did not anſwer his letter, till he was preſſed by ſome of his friends to recommend them to the new prince, and then he treated him in his letters with all the reſpect due to an emperor [t]. While theſe things paſſed in the weſt, ſome diſturbances happened in the court of Theodoſius at Conſtantinople: Rufinus, not ſatisfied with the conſular dignity to which he was raiſed this year, notwithſtanding the report of his having been the author of the death of Promotus, killed by the barbarians, began to aſpire at the prefecture of the eaſt, which was held by Tatianus, whom he cauſed to be accuſed of oppreſſion in his government. Zoſimus will have him to have been altogether innocent, and only hated by Rufinus, on account of his integrity. Proculus, the ſon of Tatianus, and prefect of Conſtantinople, was accuſed of the ſame crime, Rufinus hating him, ſays Zoſimus, for the ſake of his father. Theodoſius appointed ſeveral judges to try them; but as Rufinus was at the head of that commiſſion, and the other judges dreaded his reſentment, they were both declared guilty: the father was depoſed, Tatianus and his ſon Proculus accuſed at the inſtigation of Rufinus.

[o] Zoſ. p. 775. [p] Socr p. 294. [q] Cod Theod. chron. p. 128 [r] Claud. bell. Gild. p. 76. & conſul Hon. 6 p. 77. [s] Soz. l. vii. c. 22 p. 740. [t] Amb. ep. 15. p. 210.

ed, and confined to Lycia, his native country; and the son sentenced to death; which Theodosius no sooner knew, than he sent him his pardon: but the messenger, gained over by Rufinus, took care not to acquaint the proper officers with the emperor's order, till the execution was over [u]. Thus Zosimus. But Libanius charges both Tatianus, and his son Proculus, with cruelty and oppression [w]; and the laws enacted on this occasion by Theodosius, give us room to believe, that the charge brought against Tatianus, was not altogether groundless, as Zosimus styles it; for by one law he took off a tax which had been levied by Tatianus, without his knowledge; by another he commanded the estates and effects of such persons as had been proscribed by him, to be restored to them or their children; and by a third addressed to Rufinus, he declared those guilty of death, who, for the future, should be convicted of having plundered the people committed to their care; whereas, by former laws, they were only to pay four times the value of what they had taken [x]. As for Proculus, he must have been guilty of greater crimes than his father, since he was punished with more severity. But however just was the punishment inflicted on Tatianus, his countrymen the Lycians, who had no share in his crimes, ought not to have had any in his disgrace and misfortunes; nevertheless Theodosius, at the instigation of Rufinus, a declared enemy to the Lycians, enacted a law, declaring their whole nation infamous, depriving them of the employments they held at that time, and rendering them for ever incapable of any preferment [y]. This unjust law was afterwards revoked by Arcadius, who restored the Lycians to their former condition, ascribing the base treatment they had met with, not to their demerit, but to the hatred of an execrable man, meaning Rufinus [z]. As Tatianus is highly commended by Zosimus, and persecuted with great cruelty the catholics, while he was governor of Egypt under Valens in 367, some writers from thence conclude him to have been a pagan. He had been comes largitionum to Valens in 374, three times prefect of the east, and twice consul. He is supposed to have died soon after his disgrace. When he was deposed, Rufinus was appointed prefect of the east in his room [a]. The affair of Tatianus Tatianus banished, and his son executed.

Rufinus made prefect of the east.

[u] Zos. l. iv. p. 774. [w] Lib. orat. xvi. p. 423. [x] Cod. Theod l. ix. tit. 28. leg. 1. p. 219, 220 [y] Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 38. leg. 9. p. 278, 279. [z] Idem, tit. 3. p. 279. [a] Ambr. ep. 50. p. 309.

Tatianus and Proculus was not yet ended, when news of the death of Valentinian, and the uſurpation of Eugenius, was brought to Conſtantinople. A few days after, embaſſadors arrived from the uſurper, who, without ſo much as mentioning the name of Arbogaſtes, demanded an audience in the name of Eugenius; and being admitted to the emperor's preſence, propoſed an alliance between him and their maſter. Theodoſius received them in a very obliging manner, amuſed them, ſays Zoſimus, with fair words, and diſmiſſed them loaded with rich preſents [b]. At the head of this embaſſy was one Rufinus, an Athenian, who was attended by ſeveral biſhops ſent by Eugenius to divert the emperor from engaging in a civil war. As Theodoſius charged Arbogaſtes with the murder of Valentinian, the biſhops did all that lay in their power to clear him from that falſe, as they ſtyled it, and groundleſs aſperſion [c]. Rufinus [d], Theodoret [e], and Sozomen [f], tell us, that, upon the departure of the embaſſadors, Theodoſius diſpatched the eunuch Eutropius, of whom we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the reign of Arcadius, to conſult an holy hermit, by name John, by nation an Egyptian, whom the emperor looked upon as an oracle. Eutropius was enjoined to bring him, if poſſible, to court; but, if he could not prevail upon him to quit his ſolitude, to aſk him, whether he approved of the emperor's attacking Eugenius firſt? or, if he ſhould wait till the uſurper attacked him? The hermit declined going to court, but adviſed the emperor to begin the war without delay, aſſuring him, that he would overcome the tyrant, but not without bloodſhed; that he would die in Italy, after his victory, and in dying leave his ſon emperor of the weſt. Thus the above-mentioned writers. Theodoſius, upon the return of the meſſenger, began his military preparations; but as he confided more in the aſſiſtance of Heaven, than the number of his troops, or the bravery of his generals, he viſited in the firſt place all the churches of his capital, attended by ſeveral biſhops, and a great croud of people, imploring with them the favour and protection of the Almighty, who diſpoſes of kingdoms as he thinks fit, and beſtowes victory on whom he pleaſes [g]. The military preparations, to which Theodoſius applied himſelf with indefatigable pains, did not divert him from publiſhing ſeveral laws this year, among the reſt one condemning ſuch heretics Eugenius ſends deputies to Theodoſius.

Who prepares for war.

His piety.

[b] Zoſ. p. 776. [c] Ruf. p. 191. [d] Idem, p. 192. [e] Theodor. l. v. c. 24. p. 738. [f] Soz. p. 740. [g] Ruf. lib. 33 p. 291 heretics as ſhould confer or receive holy orders, to pay, by way of fine, ten pounds weight of gold, and declaring the places where they ſhould perform any religious ceremony, confiſcated [h]. By another law of this year, dated the eighteenth of July, he commands thoſe who ſhould raiſe diſturbances in the church, or impugn the orthodox faith, to be baniſhed, and confined to ſome deſert, if they had been guilty of the ſame fault before [i]. The law of the eighteenth of October of this year, commands ſuch criminals as ſhould have purloined the public money, and taken ſanctuary in churches, to be dragged from thence, and puniſhed, or the biſhops who protected them, to pay what they owed [k]. From this law it appears, that the cuſtom of taking ſanctuary in churches had already prevailed. Before this time, St. Auſtin, being ſolicited either to deliver up a debtor, by name Faſcius, who had fled to his church as to an aſylum, or to ſatisfy his creditors, choſe the latter [l]. By a law dated the eighth of November, the emperor revived all the antient laws againſt paganiſm, forbidding, under the ſevereſt penalties, every ceremony of the pagan religion [m].

His laws againſt heretics.

THE following year Theodoſius was conſul the third time, with Abundantius, who was, as appears from a law of the preceding year, general both of the horſe and foot [n]. In his room Eugenius was acknowledged conſul in the weſt, as we learn from an antient epitaph of this year, in which that uſurper is ſtyled the collegue of Theodoſius in the conſulſhip [o]. This year Theodoſius publiſhed many excellent laws, and among the reſt one abrogating an antient law, which puniſhed thoſe with death, who uttered ſeditious words againſt the prince. If ſuch words ſays Theodoſius in his law of this year, proceed from levity, they are to be deſpiſed; if from folly, to be pitied; if from malice, they are to be forgiven [p]. In the beginning, or, as ſome will have it, in the end of this year, that is, on the fifteenth of January, or the twentieth of November, the emperor declared his ſecond ſon Honorius, Auguſtus. The ceremony was performed with great ſolemnity in the palace of Hebdomon near Conſtantinople [q]. The poet Claudian introduces on this occaſion

He revokes the law of treaſon.

Honorius declared Auguſtus.

[h] Cod. Theod. l xvi. tit. 5. leg. 21. p. 138. [i] Idem ibid. tit. 4. leg. 3 p. 101. [k] Idem, l ix. tit. 45. leg. 1. p. 358. [l] Aug. ep. 268 p. 901. [m] Cod. Theod. l. xvi tit 10. leg. 12. p. 273. [n] Cod Theod. chron. p. 126 [o] Vide Rein p. 1021. [p] Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit 4 leg. 3 p. 42. [q] Philoſt. l. xi. c. 2. p. 146. Soſ. l. vii. c. 24. p. 741. Claud. conſ Hon 3. p. 35, 36.

caſion Theodoſius inſtructing the young prince in the art of governing [r]. This year was ended at Conſtantinople a ſquare, which bore the name of Theodoſius; and the following year a wreathed column erected in it, on which were engraved the victories of that prince over the Goths and other barbarians. On the top of the column was an equeſtrian ſtatue of Theodoſius, which was thrown down by an earthquake in the reign of the emperor Zeno; but the column was ſtill ſtanding in the thirteenth century, and is frequently mentioned in hiſtory [s]. Theodoſius paſſed this whole year at Conſtantinople, making the neceſſary preparations for the dangerous war which he was reſolved to undertake. As for Eugenius, he had gained the preceding year conſiderable advantages over the Franks, being induced to make war upon them by Arbogaſtes, who bore an old grudge to Marcomir and Sunno, two princes of that nation. This war was managed by Arbogaſtes, who paſſing the Rhine near Cologne in the depth of winter, laid waſte the countries of the Bructerians and Chamavians, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition, Marcomir ſhewing himſelf only at a diſtance on the hills, with ſome parties of the Angirvarii and Chatti [t]. Hence it appears, that theſe antient nations of Germany were at this time compriſed under the name of Franks. Eugenius himſelf approached the Rhine, at the head of a very numerous and powerful army; and having, upon the return of Arbogaſtes, renewed the antient alliance between the Romans and Franks, he left Gaul, and repaired to Italy; which he had ſcarce entered, when he was met by a deputation from the Roman ſenate, entreating him to reſtore to the temples the revenues, of which they had been deprived by Gratian, and to re-eſtabliſh the celebrated altar of Victory. Eugenius received them in a very obliging manner; but could not be prevailed upon to comply with their requeſt. The ſenate ſoon after ſent a ſecond deputation to ſolicit the ſame favour; which was denied them a ſecond time. But when by a third embaſſy they renewed their requeſt, Eugenius yielded at length to their importunity, reſtoring the pagan religion and temples to their former luſtre, and ſuffering the antient ceremonies and ſacrifices to be renewed in the ſenate of the metropolis of his empire [u]. The following year

Eugenius gains conſiderable advantages over the Franks.

Eugenius favours the pagan ceremonies.

[r] Claud. ibid. p 45—50. [s] Chron. Alex. p. 708. Cange Conſtant. antiq. l. i. p. 76—80. [t] Greg. Tur. hiſt. Franc. l. ii. c. 9. p. 61, 62. [u] Ambr. vit. p. 85. ep. 15 p. 210.

year 394, Arcadius being conſul the third time, and Honorius the ſecond, Theodoſius was ſtill at Conſtantinople on the fifteenth of May[w]; but he left that metropolis ſoon after; for he was on the thirtieth of the ſame month, at Heraclea; and on the fifteenth of June at Adrianople[x]. He bent his march through Dacia, and the other provinces between Thrace and the Julian Alps, which ſeparate Italy, from Noricum, with a deſign to force the paſſes of thoſe mountains, and break into Italy, before the army of Eugenius was in a condition to oppoſe him. Upon his arrival at the Alps, he found the paſſes guarded by Flavianus prefect of Italy, at the head of a conſiderable body of Roman troops, who, after a ſhort reſiſtance, betook themſelves to flight. Flavianus was killed at the firſt onſet. Theodoſius, having thus opened himſelf a paſſage over the Alps, was met, as he came down from thoſe mountains, by Eugenius, at the head of a very numerous army, drawn up in battle-array on the banks of the river Frigidum; which Sanſon and others take to be the river Vipao or Wiback in the county of Gorice, about thirty-ſix miles from Aquileia. The army of Theodoſius was no leſs numerous than that of the enemy, being reinforced by ſeveral bodies of Armenians, Iberians, Arabians, Goths, and other barbarians, who dwelt beyong the Danube. The Roman troops were commanded by Timaſius and Stilicho, who had married the emperor's niece; and the foreign auxiliaries by Gainas, Saul, Bacurius, and Alaric the Goth, whoſe name is famous in hiſtory. Of Gainas, who was of the ſame nation, and Saul, who was likewiſe a barbarian, we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the reigns of Arcadius and Honorius. Bacurius was a native of Armenia[a], or, as Rufinus will have it, of Iberia[b]; nay, he is ſtyled by that writer king of Iberia. Among the Romans he was comes domeſticorum, that is, captain of the guards, and univerſally eſteemed, not only for his courage and experience in war, but for the mildneſs of his temper, his affability and good-nature to all, even to his enemies[c]. Rufinus, the eccleſiaſtic hiſtorian, who lived in great intimacy with him while he was duke of Paleſtine, calls him a man of great integrity, a pious and zealous chriſtian, a worthy companion of Theodoſius, a man endowed with every good quality of the mind, and by few equalled in the perfections of his body[d]. Under Theodoſius forces the paſſes of the Alps.

[w] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 129. [x] Idem, ibid. [a] Zoſ. p. 777. [b] Ruf. l. i. c. 10. p. 166. [c] Zoſ. ibid. [d] Ruf. l. ii. c. 33. p. 192.

theſe leaders, the army of Theodoſius advanced into the plain; but the emperor, unwilling to expoſe the Romans, ordered the foreign auxiliaries to begin the action, which they did with great vigour and reſolution; but were ſoon put in diſorder by the regular and well diſciplined troops of Eugenius, headed by Arbogaſtes, who ſignalized himſelf in a very eminent manner. Bacurius however, having rallied the barbarians, led them back to the charge; and being ſupported by Timaſius and Stilicho, renewed the combat, which laſted till night coming on, both armies retired to their reſpective camps. Bacurius on this occaſion diſtinguiſhed himſelf above all the other commanders, killed great numbers of the enemy with his own hand; but being in the end ſurrounded on all ſides, he was cut in pieces, after having defended himſelf for a long time with incredible bravery. Of the Goths and other auxiliaries above ten thouſand were killed; but of the Romans, who ſupported them, only a ſmall number. Eugenius, concluding that he had gained the day, and that the army of Theodoſius was utterly defeated, gave his men leave to retire to their tents, and refreſh themſelves, that they might be the better able to purſue the enemy next morning. In the mean time Theodoſius was adviſed by his generals not to hazard a ſecond engagement, but to retire in the night, repaſs the Alps, and put off the deciſion of the war till another campaign; againſt which time he might with great eaſe recruit his army, and renew the war with freſh vigour. But the emperor, without giving ear to their remonſtrances, having aſſembled his troops by break of day, led them in perſon againſt the enemy; and entering their camp when leaſt expected, put great numbers of them to the ſword, and obliged the reſt to ſave themſelves by a precipitous and diſorderly flight [c]. Thus Zoſimus. But the eccleſiaſtic hiſtorians aſcribe the victory gained by Theodoſius, not to any ſurprize, but to the prayers of the emperor, and to the miraculous aſſiſtance of St. John the evangeliſt, and the apoſtle St. Philip, who appearing to him in the night, encouraged him to renew the fight early next morning, and aſſured him of victory. The ſame writers add, that Theodoſius no ſooner attacked Eugenius's numerous forces, than a violent ſtorm ariſing, and blowing full in the enemy's faces, turned their arrows and javelins back upon themſelves, and raiſed ſuch clouds of duſt, as quite deprived them of their ſight; ſo that having two enemies to encounter at once, they

[c] Zoſ. p. 778.

they were quickly overcome. Of this ſtorm mention is made by Theodoret [f], Oroſius [g], Sozomen [h], St. Ambroſe [i], Rufinus [k]. St. Auſtin [l], and the poet Claudian [m], who deſcribes it with great elegance in ſome verſes which he wrote eighteen months after [n]; but to flatter Honorius, will have it to have been owing to his deſtiny. Arbogaſtes behaved on this occaſion with great intrepidity; but, in ſpite of his utmoſt efforts, his men, quite diſheartened, and concluding, from the extraordinary violence of the ſtorm, that Heaven fought againſt them, either betook themſelves to flight, or, throwing down their arms, ſubmitted to Theodoſius, who readily received them into favour; but at the ſame time commanded them to apprehend, and deliver up to him, the uſurper. They no ſooner received this order, than they flew to the riſing ground where Eugenius had poſted himſelf to behold the battle, and was ſtill waiting the event of it. When he obſerved them coming in great haſte towards him, he concluded they brought him news of the victory. As they approached, he asked them, whether they had, purſuant to his orders, ſecured Theodoſius. They anſwered, that they deſpiſed the commands of a tyrant and uſurper, whom they were come to ſeize, and deliver up to their lawful ſovereign; and loading him that inſtant with irons, dragged him, ſtripped of all the enſigns of majeſty, to the emperor, who reproached him with the murder of Valentinian, with the calamities he had brought upon the empire by his unjuſt uſurpation, and with putting his confidence in Hercules, in defiance of the only true God; for on his chief ſtandard he had diſplayed the image of that fabulous deity. Eugenius begged earneſtly for his life; but while he lay proſtrate at the emperor's feet, his own ſoldiers ſtruck off his head, and carrying it about on the point of a ſpear, ſhewed it to thoſe who, remaining in his camp, had not yet ſubmited to Theodoſius. At that ſight they were all thunderſtruck; but being at the ſame time informed, that Theodoſius was ready to receive them into favour, they threw down their arms and ſubmitted [o]. Arbogaſtes, the chief author of Eugenius taken, delivered up to Theodoſius, and put to death by his own men.

[f] Theodor. l. v. c. 24. p. 739. [g] Oroſ. l vii c 35. p. 220. [h] Soz. l. vii. c. 24. p. 742. [i] Ambr. ſerm de diverſ. p 117. & in pſal. xxxvi. p. 692. [k] Ruf. l. ii. c 33. p. 100. [l] Aug. civit Dei, l. v. c. 26. p. 642. [m] Claud. conſ. Hon. 3 p. 36. [n] Idem ibid. [o] Ambr. vit. p. 86. Claud. conſ. Hon. 4 p 41. Ruf. p. 192. Theodor. p 740. Socr. l. 5. c. 25. p. 294. Chron. Alex. p. 710.

the death of Valentinian, and the evils attending it, deſpairing of pardon, fled to the mountains; but being appriſed that diligent ſearch was made after him, he laid violent hands on himſelf [p]. The children of Eugenius and Arbogaſtes, who had attended their parents in this war, having great reaſon to expect the ſame treatment, took ſanctuary in different churches; but the pious emperor, not ſatisfied with pardoning them, laid hold of that opportunity to convert them from paganiſm, which they profeſſed, to the chriſtian religion, appointing proper perſons to inſtruct them, and convince them of their errors; which they had no ſooner renounced, than he took them under his protection, put them in poſſeſſion of their paternal eſtates, and raiſed them to conſiderable employments [q]. Great numbers of the partizans of Eugenius having fled for refuge to the great church of Milan, St. Ambroſe repaired to Aquileia, where the emperor then was, to ſolicit their pardon; which was immediately granted, and a general amneſty proclaimed [r]; nay, the emperor is ſaid to have been ſo concerned for the blood that was ſhed in the battle, as to abſtain for ſome time from the holy euchariſt [s]. He probably followed therein the directions of St. Ambroſe, at leaſt his conduct was agreeable to the ſentiments of that prelate, who, in ſpeaking of judges, ſays, That tho' he does not deny them, as many have done, the holy euchariſt, after they have ſentenced criminals to death, yet he approves of their abſtaining for ſome time of their own accord from the holy myſteries [t]. The emperor, immediately after his victory over Eugenius, ſent for his ſon Honorius, whom he had left at Conſtantinople, under the care of Rufinus, who was thereby veſted with almoſt an unlimited power. Before the arrival of the young prince, Theodoſius had removed from Aquileia to Milan, where he received him and Serena; who came with him, in the great church, and committed them both to the care of St. Ambroſe [u]. Serena was daughter to Honorius, the emperor's brother. A few days after he declared his ſon Honorius emperor of the weſt, aſſigning him for his ſhare, Italy, Gaul, Spain, Britain, Africa, and Weſt Illyricum, and appointing Stilicho his firſt general and prime prime miniſter [w]. With this declaration he ſent Stilicho to Rome; on which occaſion Serena, whom Theodoſius had married to that general, and who accompanied her huſband to Rome, ſhewed a great deſire, ſays Zoſimus, to ſee the ſtatue of Cybele; but ſhe was no ſooner admitted into the temple, than ſhe ſnatched from the goddeſs a necklace of ineſtimable value, ſaying it became better the niece of an emperor, than a ſenſeleſs ſtatue. An old veſtal, who was preſent, tranſported with a blind zeal, could not forbear uttering dreadful imprecations againſt Serena, her huſband, and her children; but Serena cauſed her to be driven out of the temple, and puniſhed for her arrogance. At the ſame time her huſband Stilicho commanded the thick plate of gold, with which the gates of Jupiter Capitolinus were covered, to be taken off, and conveyed to his lodging. Under the plate were found engraved on the wood theſe words: This is reſerved for an unhappy king. Thus Zoſimus [x], who ridiculouſly aſcribes to theſe two actions, the misfortunes which afterwards befel Stilicho and Serena. The Roman ſenate ſent deputies to congratulate Theodoſius on his late victory, and to beg the conſulſhip of the enſuing year for the two brothers Olybrius and Probinus. The emperor granted them their requeſt, exhorting them at the ſame time with great zeal to renounce the errors in which they had been brought up, and yield to the force of that truth, which now generally prevailed. Zoſimus, who ſeldom agrees with other writers, ſuppoſes Theodoſius to have gone in perſon to Rome, to have ſummoned to the imperial palace all the ſenators, who ſtill continued attached to the antient ceremonies of the Romans, and to have exhorted them to get the better of the prejudice of their education, and renouncing the ſuperſtitious worſhip of the gods, to embrace the chriſtian religion, which alone could deliver them from their ſins. But not one, continues that writer, could be prevailed upon to abandon the religion and ceremonies with which Rome had been founded, and had ſubſiſted near twelve hundred years. Hereupon the emperor declared, that as the exchequer had been drained by the late war, he could ſpare no money for the ceremonies of their religion; which he therefore declared unlawful, and utterly ſuppreſſed [y]. He had before enacted ſeveral laws for the ſuppreſſion of idolatry; but Eugenius had revoked them, and reſtored to the temples their privileges and revenues. This year is remarkable for dreadful earthquakes, which were felt almoſt almoſt every day in moſt provinces of the empire, from the beginning of September to the end of November; for exceſſive and inceſſant rains, which laid whole countries under water; and ſuch a darkneſs as had not happened in the memory of man [z]: all which the writers of thoſe times ſeem to have looked upon as prognoſtics of the great loſs the Roman empire was to ſuſtain in the approaching death of the great Theodoſius.

Arbogaſtes lays violent hands on himſelf.

[p] Claud. ibid p. 41 & conf. Hon 3 p. 89 Socr. p. 295. Oroſ p. 220, 221. [q] Ambr. ep. 16. p. 211. Oroſ ibid. [r] Ambr. vit. p. 86. [s] Ruf l. ii. c. 34 p 192. Socr. l. v. c. 26. p 295. Soz. l vii. c 29. p 753. [t] Amb ep. 51. p. 309. 310. [u] Soz l v. c 26. p 295. Ruf l ii c. 34. p 192.

Honorius declared emperor of the weſt.

[w] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 773. [x] Zoſ. p. 779. [y] Idem, l. v p. 814.

The next conſuls were the two brothers Anicius Hermogenianus Olybrius and Anicius Probinus, the ſons of Petronius Probus and Anicia Proba, on whoſe conſulate Claudian wrote a poem [a]. Theodoſius, having reſtored the weſt to its former tranquillity, was preparing to return to Conſtantinople, when he was ſeized with a dropſy, occaſioned by the great fatigues he had undergone in the late war [b]. As ſoon as he perceived himſelf to be in danger, he made his will, by which he divided the empire, bequeathing the eaſt to his eldeſt ſon Arcadius, and the weſt to Honorius. He likewiſe confirmed the pardon which he had granted to all thoſe who had borne arms againſt him, and remitted a tribute, which had proved very burdenſome to the people, charging his ſons and ſucceſſors to ſee his will duly executed as to theſe two points [p]. Socrates and Sozomen write, that finding himſelf in great meaſure eaſed of his pain, he aſſiſted at a chariot-race; but his diſtemper returning with great violence, he appointed one of his ſons to preſide at the ſports in his room; and withdrawing to his chamber, died the following night [r]. He was heard a few minutes before he expired to utter the name of St. Ambroſe [s]. He died at Milan on the ſeventeenth of January of this year 395, two days before he had ended the ſixteenth year of his reign, being then at moſt in the fiftieth year of his age [t]. St. Ambroſe pronounced his funeral oration, in which he ſuppoſes him to enjoy the rewards promiſed in the goſpel to a religious and virtuous life [u]. His body was embalmed, and conveyed from Milan to Conſtantinople, where it was interred by Arcadius with extraordinary pomp and magnificence on the ninth of November of the preſent year [w]. A tomb of porphyry was to be ſeen many ages after Theodoſius divides the empire between his two children.

Theodoſius dies.

[z] Mar. chron. Amb. ſerm. de diverſ. iii. p. 116. [a] Claud. de conſ. Olyb. & Prob. p. 1--8. [b] Socr. l. v. c. 26. p. 295. Soz. l. vii. c. 28. p. 752, [q] Amb. ibid. p. 117. [r] Socr. l. v. c. 26. Soz. l. vii. c. 29. p. 752. [s] Amb. ibid. p. 122. [t] Socr. p. 295. Chr. Alex. p. 710. [u] Amb. ſer. de diverſ. iii. p. 117--121. [w] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 779. Amb. ibid. p. 125. Socr. l. vi. c. 1. p. 300.

ter, ſuppoſed to be that of Theodoſius. It ſtood in the mauſoleum of Conſtantine the Great, near the church of the apoſtles [x]. As for the character of Theodoſius, all authors, whether pagan or chriſtian, Zoſimus alone excepted, agree that he was endowed in an eminent degree with every virtue becoming a prince, without the allay of one ſingle vice. Not to mention the eccleſiaſtic hiſtorians, and the two great luminaries of the church, St. Ambroſe and St. Auſtin, who may perhaps be thought prejudiced in his favour, as he was a moſt zealous patron of the orthodox faith, Themiſtius, Symmachus, Pacatus, and Victor the younger, though greatly attached to the antient religion of the Romans, which Theodoſius diſcountenanced above all his predeceſſors, and made it his chief ſtudy utterly to ſuppreſs, propoſe him as the pattern of an excellent prince, the eminent virtues that ſhone in him overcoming the prejudice, which his zeal for the chriſtian religion, and averſion to the ſuperſtitious ceremonies, of the pagans, raiſed againſt him among thoſe, who, in ſpite of his utmoſt endeavours, continued obſtinate in their errors [y]. The teſtimony of thoſe writers, who had no leſs reaſon to be prejudiced againſt Theodoſius than Zoſimus, and who lived in thoſe times, muſt be of far greater weight with every impartial reader, than the invectives of that hiſtorian, who lived an hundred years after. Theodoſius was, as we have hinted above out of Aurelius Victor, naturally choleric, and apt in the firſt tranſports of his paſſion, to iſſue ſuch orders as ſavoured of cruelty. But as he was ſoon appeaſed, we have but one inſtance of their being put in execution before he had time to revoke them; namely, the famous maſſacre of the inhabitants of Theſſalonica, who had murdered in an inſurrection Botericus, the emperor's lieutenant in Illyricum, becauſe he refuſed to ſet at liberty a chariot-driver, who had been impriſoned for offering violence to a woman of ſome diſtinction. When this came to the emperor's ears, he ordered all thoſe who had been anyways concerned in the murder or riot, to be put to death; but at the interceſſion of St. Ambroſe, and other biſhops aſſembled in a ſynod at Milan, where the emperor then was, he revoked his orders, and pardoned them. Some time after, his miniſters repreſenting to him, that the Theſſalonians had been encouraged to this ſedition by the too great indulgence he had ſhewn to the inhabitants of Antioch; and that if he ſuffered the murder of his lieutenant to go unpuniſhed.

His character.

[x] Cange. urb. Conſt antiq. l. iv. p. 109. [y] Vide Sym. liii. ep. 81. p. 137. ep. 13. p. 65. Vict. epit. 546, 547.

puniſhed, his officers for the future would be in continual danger of their lives, and he himſelf diſturbed and alarmed with daily inſurrections; his wrath was kindled anew to ſuch a degree, that forgetful of the promiſe he had made to St. Ambroſe, he immediately ordered a body of troops to march to Theſſalonica, and revenge on the inhabitants the death of his lieutenant. The ſoldiers, entering the city, purſuant to their orders, ſurrounded the people, while they were aſſembled to behold the Circenſian games; and falling upon them ſword in hand, without regard to ſex, age, or condition, without diſtinction of guilty or innocent, cruelly maſſacred in the ſpace of three hours above ſeven thouſand perſons, many of whom were ſtrangers come to Theſſalonica on occaſion of the ſports. When news of this maſſacre was brought to Milan, St. Ambroſe wrote to the emperor, who had left that city ſome time before, upbraiding him with his cruelty, repreſenting to him the enormity of his crime, and exhorting him to atone for it by a ſincere ſubmiſſion and repentance. This the emperor took in good part; and returning a few days after to Milan, repaired, according to his cuſtom, to the great church, to perform his devotions there. But St. Ambroſe, meeting him at the door, denied him entrance, telling him, that he was cut off from the communion of the faithful, and unworthy to appear amongſt them, till he had expiated ſo public a crime by as public a repentance. To this the emperor readily ſubmitted; and returning to the palace with tears in his eyes, performed with great humility all the duties of an open penance, as enjoined by the canons of the church, and the cuſtom of thoſe times. He continued in that ſtate for the ſpace of eight months, that is, from the latter end of April to Chriſtmas, when, to make ſome amends for his crime, and to prevent both himſelf and his ſucceſſors from being guilty of the like cruelty for the future, he enacted a law, or rather enforced the obſervance of an antient law, by which all criminals were to have a reſpite of thirty days allowed them between the pronouncing of the ſentence of death and their execution[z]. It is ſurpriſing, that Zoſimus, who omits no opportunity of railing at Theodoſius, and often cenſures even the moſt commendable actions of that prince, ſhould take no notice of the above-mentioned maſſacre. The reader will find in the

The maſſacre of Theſſalonica.

An inſtance of his ſubmiſſion to the diſcipline of the church.

[z] Theodor. l. iii. c. 17. Soz. l. iii. c. 24. Niceph. l. c. xii, 34. Amb. ep. xxviii. Aug. de civ. Dei. l. v. c. 26, &c.

the eccleſiaſtic writers other inſtances of the emperor's entire ſubmiſſion to the ordinances of the church, of his piety, ſelf-denial, and other chriſtian virtues, in which he far excelled all the princes who had reigned before him. Of the writers who flouriſhed in his reign, we ſhall ſpeak in note (M).

CHAP.

(M) Among the writers, who flouriſhed under Theodoſius, the celebrated oratorSymmachus deſerves, both on account of his birth and eloquence, to be mentioned in the firſt place. He was the ſon of L. Aurelius Avianius Symmachus, prefect of Rome in 364 (1). He is ſtyled at the head of his letters, by Macrobius (2), and in an antient inſcription, Q. Aurelius Symmachus (3). He had at leaſt three brothers, who were all dead before the year 389 (4). Of theſe Celſinus Ticianus, whom in all his letters he ſtyles brother (5), ſeems to have been one. He diſtinguiſhes Flavianus, who was prefect of Italy, and joined Eugenius, in whoſe cauſe he loſt his life, with the ſame title (6); but moſt writers are of opinion, that he was no ways allied to him. Symmachus married Ruſticiana, the daughter of Orfites, who was for many years prefect of Rome under Conſtantius, and had by her one ſon, named Q. Fabius Memmius Symmachus (7). Orfites, his father-in-law was accuſed in 364, and convicted of having embezzled the public money; for which crime his eſtate was confiſcated, and he baniſhed; but he was recalled in 366, when part of his eſtate was reſtored to him, but nevertheleſs he died very poor about the year 370, leaving two daughters behind him, viz. Ruſticiana, and another, who was married to a perſon of diſtinction in Hetruria (8). Though Symmachus had no fortune with his wife, yet he was reckoned among the wealthy ſenators (9). He was high pontiff of the pagans, quæſtor, prætor, corrector or governor of Lucania and Brutium in 365, and 368, proconſul of Africa in 370, and 373, prefect of Rome in 384, and conſul in 391 (10). He is ſtyled in an antient inſcription count of the third order (11), He was a moſt zealous patron of idolatry, and on that account baniſhed by Theodoſius, but ſoon after recalled, as we have obſerved already. He brought up his ſon with with extraordinary care, and ſeems to have taken upon himſelf to inſtruct him (12). Being invited by Theodoſius, with whom he lived in great intimacy, to come to Milan, and aſſiſt at the ſolemnity of his conſulſhip in 399, he excuſed himſelf, alledging, that he could not leave his ſon (13). His ſon was made by his intereſt, firſt quæſtor and afterwards prætor (14), quæſtor about the year 392, and prætor in 397. The latter dignity coſt him two thouſand pounds weight of gold (15), and he would have ſpent on that occaſion a far greater ſum, had he not been reſtrained by Stilicho, who at that time ruled under Honorius (16). Young Symmachus was proconſul of Africa in 415, and prefect of Rome in 419 (17). In the date of a law of the year 424, he is marked conſul (18); but moſt writers take that to be a miſtake. He married, after the year 394. the grand-daughter of Flavianus, and had by her a ſon before the death of his father (19). He wrote ſome epigrams on illuſtrious men, and ſeveral letters, which are to be found among thoſe of his father, who ſubmitted his own compoſitions to the cenſure and judgment of his ſon (20). Symmachus, the father, was eſteemed the moſt eloquent orator of his time; but his ſpeeches not meeting with the applauſe he expected, he applied himſelf entirely to the writing of letters (21). His ſpeeches have been long ſince loſt; but his letters have reached our times, and are divided into ten books. They were carefully preſerved by his amanuenſis, and one of his friends, named Elpidius, and publiſhed after his death by his ſon (22). Prudentius, who wrote againſt him, while he was ſtill living, on occaſion of his endeavouring to perſuade the emperor to reſtore the altar of victory, extols his eloquence, and compares it to a goolden ſpade made uſe of to dig up ordure (23). Macrobius compares his elegant and florid ſtyle, as he terms it, to that of Pliny the younger, and equals him in that reſpect to the beſt writers of antiquity (24). Apollinaris Sidonius and Caſſiodorus admire his eloquence, and the purity of his ſtyle (25). Both theſe writers quote ſome paſſages out of him, which are not to be found in any of his works that have reached our times (26). Socrates (27), Photius (28), and Jornandes (29), mention him him with great encomiums. And truly the turn and brevity of his letters is not without ſome elegance; but the ſame thoughts, tho', generally ſpeaking, common and obvious, are often repeated; and his ſtyle ſavours much of the barbarity of the age in which he lived. Jornandes quotes the fifth book of the hiſtory of Symmachus; but as it does not appear, that either Symmachus the orator, or his ſon, ever wrote any hiſtory, moſt authors take the hiſtorian quoted by Jornandes to be different from both (30).

(1) Sym. l. ii c. 44. p. 81. Cod. Theod. chron. p. 69. (2) Macrob. l. i. c. 5. p. 176, 177. (3) Rein. p. 399. (4) Sym. l. iii. ep. 6. p. 104. (5) Idem, l. i. ep. 40, 56, 68. p. 30, 38. (6) Idem, l. ii. ep. 44. p. 81. & ep. 83. p. 97. (7) Sidon. l. ii. ep. 10. p. 54. Sym. l. ix. ep. 121 p. 386. l. x. ep. 47. p. 441, 442. (8) Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 376. Sym. l. x. ep. 47. p. 441, 442. (9) Phot. c. 80. p. 197. Sym. l. v. ep. 5, p. 187. & ep. 66. p. 214. Ammian. p. 377. Macrob p. 745. (10) Sym. l. ix. ep. 41. p. 31. Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 386. (11) Rein p 399. (12) Sym. l. vii. ep. 30. p. 273.

(13) Idem, l. viii. ep. 68 p. 335. (14) Idem, l. v. ep. 44. p. 202. & l. iv ep. 12. p. 147. (15) Idem, l. iv. ep 8. p. 146. (16) Idem ibid. (17) Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 386. (18) Idem, tit. 1. p 386. (19) Sym. l. iv. ep. 14. p. 149. (20) Idem, l. vii. ep. 21 p. 70. & appendix. ad ep. Symmachi, p. 298, 301. (21) Idem, l iv. ep. 29. p 159. & l. viii. ep. 68. p. 335. (22) Idem, l. iii. p. 101. & l. v. ep. 83, 84. p. 220. (23) Prud. in Sym. l. i. p. 220. & l. 2. p. 225. (24) Macr. l. v. c. 1. p. 364. (25) Sid. l. i. ep. 1. p. 11. & car. 9. p. 361. l. viii. ep. 10. p 231. Caſſiod. l. xi ep. 1. p. 175. (26) Sid. & Caſſiod. ibid. (27) Socr. l. v. c. 14. p. 273. (28) Phot. c. 80. p. 197.

The Latin poet Rufus Feſtus Avienus is ſuppoſed to have flouriſhed under Theodoſius, becauſe he inſcribed a work to Probus, a conſular man, whom moſt writers take to be the celebrated Probus, who died not long before the year 395 (31). St. Jerom, in his comments on the epiſtle to Titus, writes, that the phenomena of Aratus had been lately tranſlated by Avienus (32); which work, together with his tranſlation of Dionyſius's deſcription of the world, and a third poem by the ſame author on the ſea coaſts, has reached our times. To the ſame Avienus or Avianus are generally aſcribed the fables of Æſop in Latin verſe, and the whole hiſtory of Livy in Iambics; but the latter laborious performance which is mentioned by Servius, has been long ſince loſt (33). Some other poetical pieces done by the ſame author are ſtill extant. He writes with more taſte and elegance than could be expected from one of the age he lived in; but his fables are not to compare to thoſe of Phædrus (34). Rufus Feſtus, who was proconſul of Achaia under Valens, is thought to have been his ſon (35). Victor the hiſtorian, who cloſes his hiſtory with a kind of panegyric on Theodoſius, is thought to have lived in his time, and to have wrote ſoon after the death of that prince (36). The name of Sextus Aurelius Victor is common to him with another hiſtorian, who flouriſhed in the reign of the emperor Valens; but from him he is diſtinguiſhed by the ſurname of junior or the younger: in ſeveral manuſcripts he is ſtyled Victorious or Victorius, and under both theſe names he is quoted by Paulus Diaconus (37). He wrote the Roman hiſtory; but what has reached our times is but an abridgment of his work, and thence called Victor's epitome (38). Gregory of Tours quotes ſeveral things concerning the Franks out of an hiſtorian named Sulpicius Alexander (39), whom Gothofredus commends as an excellent writer, and ſuppoſes to be the ſame ſame Alexander to whom Symmachus wrote ſeveral letters; from which it appears, that he was governor of a province, and was raiſed by Valentinian II. about the year 387, to the poſt of tribune and ſecretary (40). Some writers are of opinion, that the Latin poet Manilius, who wrote on aſtrology, flouriſhed under Theodoſius, or his ſon Honorius; but from ſeveral paſſages in that poem, eſpecially from the laſt verſes of the firſt book, Extremas modo per gentes, &c. moſt critics conclude him to have lived in the time of Auguſtus, and to have writen ſoon after the defeat of Varus (41). The notitia, or ſtate of the provinces of the empire, publiſhed by Surita with the itinerary of Antoninus, is ſuppoſed to have been written in the time of Theodoſius; for mention is made there of the provinces of Arcania in Egypt, and Honorius in Pontus, ſo ſtyled from that prince's two ſons, and no notice is taken of ſeveral other provinces formed by Arcadius after the death of his father (42). The five books of Flavius Vegetius Renatus on the military art, are addreſſed to the emperor, by whoſe order the author undertook that work (43). But that prince is ſometimes named Valentinian, and ſometimes Theodoſius (44). All we know for certain is, that he wrote after the death of Gratian, and not long after the ravages committed by the Goths in that prince's reign, which he aſcribes to his having ſuffered the infantry to lay aſide their cuiraſſes and helmets (45). Vegetius is diſtinguiſhed with the title of comes or count, and even with the epithet of illuſtrious. He is commonly blamed for confounding the cuſtoms and regulations of the antients with thoſe of his time.

(29) Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 15. p. 636. (30) Vide Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. p. 724. (31) Idem, l. ii. c. 9. p. 202. (32) Hier. in Tit. i. p. 248. (33) Voſſ. poet. Lat. p. 56. (34) Vide Baillet. tom. vi. p. 475, 476, (35) Vide Spon. p. 100. (36) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 12. p. 221. (37) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 12. p. 221. (38) Vict. epit. p. 531. (39) Greg. Tur. hiſt. Franc. l. ii. c. 9. p. 58, &c.

The Philoſopher Themiſtius flouriſhed under Theodoſius, and was no leſs eſteemed by the Greeks than Symmachus by the Latins. He was ſprung from a noble family, and one of his anceſtors, a philoſopher by profeſſion, had been diſtinguiſhed with ſeveral honours by Dioclefian (46); perhaps his father Eugenius, who was no leſs famous for the profeſſion of philoſophy, than for his eloquence and learning (47). Amongſt the letters of the emperor Julian, there is one to a philoſopher by name Eugenius (48); whom ſome take to have been the father of Themiſtius; if ſo, he muſt have been too young in Dioclefian's time to be raiſed to any public employment. From his elogium, written by his ſon ſoon after his death, it appears, that he preferred Ariſtotle to all other philoſophers, and that in his old age he uſed to unbend his mind from the ſtudy of philoſophy with cultivating tivating his garden (49). Themiſtius was of the ſame age with the emperor Conſtantius (50), born in 317. He was a native of Paphlagonia, and not of Conſtantinople, tho' he ſpent almoſt his whole life in that city (51). He ſtudied rhetoric at a place on the moſt diſtant borders of Pontus and Colchis, near Phaſis, a city of Colchis, on a river of the ſame name, his father having recommended him to a celebrated profeſſor, who taught in that country (52), and under whom he made ſuch progreſs, that he was ſurnamed Euphradus or the fine ſpeaker (53). Gregory Nazianzen ſtyles him the king of eloquence and adds, that he excelled in every thing, but moſt of all in the art of ſpeaking (54). When he was yet very young, he wrote comments on Ariſtotle for his own private uſe; but nevertheleſs they were publiſhed and met with great applauſe (55). His comments on Ariſtotle, and his notes on Plato, were ſtill extant in the time of Photius, who ſtyles them an uſeful work (56). The author of the book on the categories or predicaments, falſly aſcribed to St. Auſtin, owns, that, in compiling that work, he had often recourſe to Themiſtius, a great and wiſe philoſopher of his time (57). Some fragments of the comments of Themiſtius on Ariſtotle are ſtill extant (58); and Stobæus quotes a paſſage out of that work concerning the immortality of the ſoul. When he had ended his ſtudies, he went to Conſtantinople, and reſided there for the ſpace of at leaſt forty years (60). He firſt taught philoſophy, viz. that of Pythagoras, of Plato, and of Ariſtotle; but made moſt account of the latter (61). He had an incredible number of diſciples, and a philoſopher of Sicyon in Peloponneſus, who had ſtudied under Iamblichus, ſent him all his at once (62). He taught gratis; nay, he aſſiſted his diſciples with money ſo far as his ſmall eſtate would allow him; and thence he rejected the name of ſophiſt, pretending it ought to be given only to mercenary teachers (63). After he had taught ſome time at Conſtantinople, he went firſt to the court of Conſtantius, before whom he pronounced his firſt oration at Ancyra in 347, having been introduced to that prince by Saturnius who was conſul in 383 (64). Not long after, that that is, before the year 350, he ſaw Conſtans in the weſt (65). In the year 355, Conſtantius created him ſenator of Conſtantinople, and wrote a letter in his commendation to the ſenate of that city (66). Two years after, that prince cauſed a ſtatue to be erected to his honour (67). Julian wrote frequently to him in the time of his diſgrace; and being created Cæſar, anſwered by a long letter that which Themiſtius had wrote to him from Conſtantinople, encouraging him to anſwer the mighty expectations the world entertained of him (68). Upon the acceſſion of Jovian to the empire, Themiſtius was ſent to the new prince by the ſenate of Conſtantinople, to congratulate him in their name; on which occaſion he pronounced, or deſigned to pronounce, the oration which has reached our times (69), with ſeveral diſcourſes pronounced by him before Valens, who would hear him at leaſt once every year (70). He was with that prince in 369, when he concluded a peace with the Goths, to which the philoſopher pretends to have greatly contributed (71). He attended Valens into the eaſt, and in the Perſian war in 372 (72). Socrates and Sozomen write, that he reconciled in ſome degree that prince to the catholics by a ſpeech, which he pronounced before him, ſhewing, he ought not to be ſurpriſed at the different opinions of men in points of religion, but on the contrary allow them great liberty (73). In the year 376, he was ſent by Valens to Gratian, then in Gaul. As on his return he paſſed through Rome, the inhabitants of that metropolis earneſtly preſſed him to continue there and teach philoſophy, but could not by any offers prevail upon him to accept that office; ſo that after a ſhort ſtay in their city, he returned to Conſtantinople (74). Theodoſius raiſed him in 384, to the dignity of prefect of Conſtantinople, and once had ſome thoughts of committing to his care the education of his ſon Arcadius (75). He wrote ſeveral diſcourſes in praiſe of that prince before the year 385, but as none of his orations are thought to be poſterior to that year, he is ſuppoſed to have died ſoon after. All the emperors who reigned in his time, ſhewed him great reſpect, and diſtinguiſhed him above all the other philoſophers. Of his orations thirty three have reached our times, compriſing one in the Latin tongue, which ſeveral critics ſuppoſe not to be his. In Photius's time they were in all thirty ſix, and among them one addreſſed to Valentinian II. which ſince his time has been loſt (76). Photius commends his ſtyle as grave, and at the ſame time time florid and elegant (77). He declares himself in many places an enemy to flattery; but nevertheless commends all the emperors alike, and bestows as great encomiums upon Valens, as upon Theodosius. A poet, by name Palladius, charges him with ambitiously aspiring at the dignity of prefect, notwithstanding his pretended contempt of grandeur and honours (78). When Palladius lived we know not. Themistius's thirteenth oration is altogether unworthy of a man of his character. Some writers will have him to have been an heretic, confounding him with one Eutychianus, who lived in the sixth century; but it is evident from his writings, that he professed paganism, tho' he was not perhaps such a fanatic as Libanius or Eunapius. Gregory Nazianzen, who admired his eloquence, wrote two letters to him recommending several persons to his protection (79).

(40) Cod. Theod. tit. 5. p 409. Sym. l. i. ep. 101. p. 58. & l. ix. ep. 25. p. 347. (41) Spanh. l. vii. p. 643 Voſſ. poet. Lat. p. 36. Manil. p. 160, 161. (42) Vide Noris epoch. p. 298, 302. (43) Veg. l. i. p 13. & l. ii p. 30. (44) Idem, p. 13. (45) Idem, l. i. c. 20. p. 24. (46) Orat. Conſtantii Aug. de Themiſt. p. 22. & Themiſt. or. v. p. 63. (47) Or Conſt p. 23. (48) Julian. ep. xviii. p. 135.

(49) Themiſt. or. xx. p. 234. (50) Idem, or. i. p. 375. (51) Idem, or. ii. p. 28. (52) Idem, or. xxiii. p. 292. & or. xvii. p. 214. or. xxvii. p. 332, 333. (53) Greg. Naz. ep. cxl. p 866. (54) Idem, ep. cxxxix. p. 865. (55) Idem, or. xxvii. p. 333. or. xxiii. p. 294, 295. (56) Phot. c. 73. p. 164. (57) Aug. de categ. c. 2. p. 23. & c. 22. p. 34. (58) Phot. c. 74. p. 161. (59) Euſeb. p. 241. (60) Idem, or. xvii. p 214. (61) Idem, or. xxiii. p. 298. & or. Conſt. p. 22. (62) Idem, or. xxiii p 295. (63) Idem ibid. p. 294. (64) Idem, or. xiii. p. 165. & or. xxxi. p. 352.

(65) Idem, or. xiii. p. 165. or xxxi. p. 354. or. Conſt. p. 18. (66) Or. Conſt. ibid. (67) Themiſt. or. iv. p. 54. (68) Julian ad Themiſt. p. 479. (69) Themiſt. or. v. p. 69. (70) Idem, or. xi. p. 129. (71) Idem ibid. p. 133. & or. xiii. p. 166. (72) Idem ibid. (73) Socr. l. iv. c. 32. p. 250. Soz. l. vi. c. 36. p. 696. (74) Themiſt. or. xxiii. p. 298. & or. xxxi. p. 354. (75) Idem, or. xvii. p. 215. (76) Phot. c. 76. p. 164.

Eunapius, who wrote the lives of the sophists of the fourth century, was a native of Sardes, the metropolis of Lydia; but studied at Athens for the space of five years, under Procæses, of whom we have spoken elsewhere, professor of eloquence in that city. He returned afterwards to Lydia, and there taught rhetoric. He applied himself likewise to the study of physic, and to that of magic, under Chrysanthus, who had married his cousin. He was initiated in the mysteries of Eleusina, and blindly attached to all the ceremonies of the pagan superstition (80). By Chrysanthus he was induced to write the lives of the sophists; which work he begins with the life of Plotinus, who flourished in the middle of the third century. From Plotinus he proceeds to the lives of Porphyrius, of Iamblichus, and his disciples, who were all addicted to the study of magic, as evidently appears from the account he gives us of them (81). He mentions the ravages committed in Greece by Alaric in 395 and 396, whence it is plain, that he did not put the last hand to his work till the latter end of the fourth century. He wrote the history of the emperors, which consisted of fourteen books and extended from the beginning of the reign of Claudius, the successor of Gallienus, where the history of Dexippus ended, to the death of Eudoxia, the wife of Arcadius; that is, from the year 268, to 404 (82). His life of the emperor Julian was rather a panegyric, than a history (83). Some fragments of this history are still to be found in Suidas (84), and in the abstracts of Constantine Porphyrogenitus on embassies. Vossius writes, that the entire history of Eunapius is lodged in the public library of Venice (85). The history of Zosimus is but an abridgment of that of Eunapius (86). They were both declared enemies to all chriſtian princes, eſpecially to Conſtantine the Great, tho' Eunapius retrenched, in the ſecond edition of his work, moſt of the invectives againſt the chriſtians, which he had inſerted in the firſt (87). In his lives of the ſophiſts, he betrays the ſame prejudice againſt the chriſtian religion, and in ſeveral places inveighs with great bitterneſs againſt the monks. Photius commends his ſtyle as elegant, conciſe, and expreſſive; but finds fault with his endleſs metaphors, which better ſuit an orator than an hiſtorian (88). In the lives of the ſophiſts, his ſtyle is often obſcure, and not eaſily underſtood, which has led ſeveral able writers into groſs miſtakes (89). He frequently diſagrees with the hiſtorians of his own time; nay with thoſe who were eye-witneſſes of the events they relate. The two philoſophers, Pappus and Theo, flouriſhed at Alexandria, in the reign of Theodoſius, the former wrote a general deſcription of the earth, a treatiſe on the rivers of Lydia, and ſome other books on different ſubjects (90). Theo, or Theon, belonged to the muſeum, ſays Suidas (91); that is, to the ſociety of learned men who compoſed the academy of Alexandria. He wrote a book on the overflowing of the Nile, and others on mathematics, arithmetic, aſtrology, on Ptolemy's canon and on other ſubjects (92). Dodwel publiſhed a fragment of Theo of Alexandria on Ptolemy's canon, with a book of faſti, which he ſuppoſes to have been done by the ſame writer (93).

(77) Idem ibid. (78) Antholog. l ii. c. 52. p. 188. Voss. poet. Græc p 93. (79) Greg. Naz. ep. 139, 140. p. 865. (80) Eunap. c. 8. p. 82, 102, 103. Phot. c. 77. p. 169. Jons. l. iii. c. 17. p. 296 - 299. (81) Eunap. c. 21. p. 144 (82) Phot. ibid. Eunap. p. 75. (83) Phot. ibid. (84) Suid. p. 1099, 2237. (85) Voss. hist. Græc l. ii. c. 18. p. 252.

(86) Phot. c 98. p. 272. (87) Phot. ibid. Suid. p. 1515. (88) Phot. p. 169, 172. (89) Vide Jonſ. l iii. c. 17. p. 298. (90) Suid. p. 424 & p. 1307. (91) Idem ibid. (92) Idem ibid. & Jonſ. l iii. c. 2. p. 219. (93) Append. ad Cypr. diſſ. p 1, 10, 98, 106.

CHAP. XXIX.

The Roman hiſtory from the death of Theodoſius the Great, to the taking of Rome the firſt time by the Goths.

Rufinus prime miniſter to Arcadius.

THEODOSIUS divided, as we have obſerved above, the empire at his death between his two ſons Arcadius and Honorius; but as they were too young to govern of themſelves, Arcadius being but eighteen years old, and Honorius not yet eleven, he committed the former to the care of Rufinus, and the latter to that of Stilicho,

Stilicho [a]. Rufinus was a native of Eauſe in Gaſcony [b], and not of Euſa in Boſphorus, as ſome have imagined, miſled by the authority of Tiro Proſper [c]. He appeared firſt at court in the reign of Theodoſius, who, being taken with his uncommon addreſs, and extraordinary qualities, raiſed him, about the year 390, to the poſt of magiſter officiorum, to the conſular dignity in 392, and the ſame year to that of prefect of the eaſt, leaving him at Conſtantinople veſted with almoſt an abſolute and unlimited power, when he ſet out for the weſt in 394, to make war on Eugenius [d]. Rufinus was well-ſhaped in his perſon, tall, of a graceful mien, and ſprightly genius [e]. He profeſſed the chriſtian religion, and was baptized in 394, on occaſion of the ſolemn conſecration of a church, which he had built, together with a palace, near Chalcedon [f]. He could never have gained the eſteem and confidence of Theodoſius, without the appearance, at leaſt, of piety, joined to his uncommon talents. St. Ambroſe ranked him among his friends, and was glad to ſee him preferred [g]. He lived in great intimacy with Symmachus, if the laſt letters of that writer's third book are, as they are commonly thought, addreſſed to him. In thoſe letters Symmachus commends his lively genius, his eloquence, and the delicacy of his raillery [h]. He likewiſe extols his virtue, his ſincerity, and diſintereſtedneſs, and the penetration of Theodoſius in chuſing ſo worthy a miniſter [i]. But the ſame writer blames him more after his death, than he had flattered him in his life-time [k]. Claudian charges him with avarice, ambition, cruelty, perfidiouſneſs, and all the crimes and evil qualities, of which human nature is capable [l]. Suidas and Zoſimus ſpeak of him as a great diſſembler, and one who trampled under foot all laws, both human and divine, when they ſtood in the way of his unbounded ambition and inſatiable avarice [m]. St Jerom likewiſe charges him with avarice [n]; Oroſius [o], Philoſtorgius [p], and Marcellinus in his cronicle [q], with having ſtirred up the barbarians againſt the empire, in order to raiſe himſelf, in that confuſion of affairs, to the ſovereignty. St. Ambroſe reproaches him in Theodoret as the author of the maſſacre of the inhabitans of Theſſalonica [r]. Zoſimus aſcribes to his treachery the death of Promotus, killed by the barbarians in 391, and the downfal aud misfortunes of Tatianus and his ſon Proculus, in 392 [s]. But other writers queſtion the innocence both of the father and ſon, as we have already obſerved.

His character.

[a] Oroſ. l. vii. p. 221. Ambr. ſerm. de diverſ. p. 117. Zoſ. p. 780. [b] Claud. in Ruf. l. i. p. 12, 13. [c] De Marca hiſtoire de Bearn, p. 24. [d] Zoſ. l. vi. c. 773. Cod. Theod tit. 6 p. 382. Amb. ep. 50. p. 309. [e] Philoſt l. xi. c 3 p. 528. Soz. l. viii. c. 17. p. 780 [f] Pallad hiſt. Lauſ c. 12 p. 915. [g] Amb. ep. 50. p 309. [h] Symm. l iii. ep. 83, 88 p. 197. [i] Idem, ibid. [k] Idem, l. vi. ep. 15. p 233. [l] Claud. in Ruf. l i & ii. [m] Suid. p 691, 692. Zoſ l v p. 780 [n] Hier. ep. 3. p. 26. [o] Oroſ. p. 221. [p] Philoſt. p 528. [q] Mar. chron. p. 79.

Stilicho firſt miniſter to Honorius.

Stilicho, who ruled with no leſs abſolute ſway in the weſt under Honorius, than Rufinus did in the eaſt under Arcadius, was originally a Vandal, whence he is ſtyled by St. Jerom a demi-barbarian [t]. Claudian, who was no leſs biaſſed in his favour, than prejudiced againſt his rival Rufinus, mentions none of his anceſtors, beſides his father, who had a conſiderable command in the army under Valens [u]. Stilicho himſelf bore arms from his childhood, and roſe by degrees to the poſt of magiſter utriuſque militiæ, that is, of general both of the horſe and foot [w]. He commanded the Roman troops, according to Zoſimus, for the ſpace of twenty-three years; that is, from 385, to 408; and attended Theodoſius in all his wars [x]. That prince muſt have entertained a great opinion of him, ſince he preferred him to all thoſe who courted his niece Serena, whom he had adopted after the death of her father Honorius. By her Stilicho had a ſon, named Eucherius, born at Rome in 389, while Theodoſius was in that city, and two daughters, Maria and Thermantia, of whom we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the ſequel of our hiſtory. Theodoſius would not have honoured Stilicho with his alliance, had he not profeſſed the chriſtian religion; but as he is more commended by the pagan than chriſtian writers, and his ſon Eucherius openly declared himſelf againſt chriſtianity, we cannot, upon the bare teſtimony of Baronius, believe him to have been, not only a zealous, but a pious, chriſtan. Zoſimus writes, that, during the twenty-three years he commanded the Roman armies, he never ſold any military employments, or deprived the ſoldiers, as others had done to enrich themſelves, of the leaſt ſhare of their pay. The ſame writer extols his moderation, in not preferring his ſon Eucherius to any conſiderable employments, tho' he had a juſt title to the firſt in the ſtate [y]. But

His character.

[r] Theodor. l. v. c. 17. p. 728 [s] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 773. [t] Hier. ep. xi. p 93. Val. rer. Franc. l. i. p. 194. Oroſ. l. vii. c. 38. p. 222. [u] Claud. de laud. Stilic. l. ii p. 124 [w] Proſp. l. iii. c. 38. p. 150. Grut p. 112. [x] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 777. [y] Idem, l. v. p. 110, 111.

But other writers [z] charge him even with a deſign of raiſing his ſon to the empire, and depoſing his lawful ſovereign Honorius, his ward and his ſon-in-law; for that prince married ſucceſſively both Stilicho's daughters. Zoſimus endeavours to clear him from this charge; but at the ſame time owns him to have been in the higheſt degree corrupt and partial in the adminiſtration of juſtice; to have countenanced thoſe who plundered the provinces, provided they ſhared with him the ſpoils; and to have in a ſhort time acquired, by the moſt unlawful means, immenſe riches [a]. We read the ſame thing in Suidas [b], who ſeems to have copied it from Eunapius. To reſume now the thread of our hiſtory: Upon the death of Theodoſius, Arcadius, to whom the eaſtern provinces had been allotted, repaired immediately to Conſtantinople, while Honorius continued at Milan, to awe with his preſence the barbarians inhabiting the countries bordering on Rhætia, who were ſaid to be in arms, and ready to break into the empire. As Honorius was but a child, and Arcadius a youth, without either parts or experience, both princes bore the bare name of emperors, the whole power being lodged in Rufinus and Stilicho, of whom the former ruled with an abſolute ſway in the eaſt, and the other in the weſt. Theſe two miniſters agreed, ſays Zoſimus, in plundering the provinces, and impoveriſhing whole nations, to enrich themſelves; but at the ſame time, jealous of each other's grandeur, neither of them thought himſelf ſafe, while his rival continued in power [c]. Stilicho pretended, that Theodoſius in dying had committed to his care both princes, and the management of the affairs of both empires: hence looking upon the power which Rufinus enjoyed in the eaſt as a mere uſurpation, he was conſtantly meditating with himſelf in what manner he might compaſs his ruin, and engroſs the whole authority to himſelf [d]. On the other hand, Rufinus, not ſatisfied to rule with an abſolute ſway under Arcadius, began to aſpire at the ſovereignty; and thinking the readieſt way to attain it, was to marry his daughter to the young prince, who, he imagined, would not look upon it as any diſparagement to aſſume his father-in-law for his collegue, he cauſed overtures concerning this match to be made to him with the utmoſt ſecrecy; which, however, ſoon became the public talk, and heightened the averſion which the people had already conceived againſt him, on account of his arrogance, avarice, and arbitrary proceedings [c]. While this affair was on foot, Eucherius, the emperor's uncle, thinking himſelf ill-uſed by Lucianus, count of the eaſt, complained of him to Arcadius, who caſt the whole blame upon Rufinus, by whoſe intereſt he had been raiſed to that poſt. Lucianus was the ſon of Florentius, prefect of Gaul in the latter end of the reign of Conſtantius; and having purchaſed the favour of Rufinus, by preſenting him with rich poſſeſſions, had been recommended by him to the emperor, who thereupon made him count of the eaſt, in which office he is ſaid to have acquitted himſelf with the greateſt juſtice, moderation, and integrity; inſomuch, that he refuſed even to comply with a requeſt of the emperor's uncle, which appeared to him inconſiſtent with equity. This being miſrepreſented to Arcadius, Rufinus, inſtead of protecting one who had purchaſed his favour at ſo great a price, left Conſtantinople, without imparting his deſign to any one; and haſtening to Antioch with a ſmall retinue, entred that city in the dead of the night, cauſed Lucianus to be apprehended, and when he was brought before his tribunal, commanded him, tho' no one appeared againſt him, to be beaten with leaden balls faſtened to cords, till he expired. This barbarous proceeding highly provoked the inhabitants of Antioch, and Rufinus, to appeaſe them, ordered a magnificent portico to be built, which was deemed the moſt ſtately edifice in all Syria [i]. From Antioch Rufinus returned in great haſte to Conſtantinople, pleaſing himſelf with the thoughts of his future affinity with the emperor; but, upon his arrival, he found Arcadius immoveably determined to marry Eudoxia, who had been propoſed to him by the eunuch Eutropius; and accordingly the nuptials were celebrated on the twenty-ſeventh of April of this year 395, to the great diſappointment of Rufinus [g]. Eudoxia was a Frank by nation, the daughter of the famous count and general Bauto, who had been conſul in 385. and not of the emperor Gratian, or of the famous general Promotus, as ſome have advanced without ſufficient grounds [h]. As ſhe was a woman of great addreſs, of an haughty and imperious temper, ſhe ſoon gained an abſolute ſway over the weak prince her husband.

Both miniſters agree in plundering the people.

Rufinus aſpires at the ſovereignty.

[z] Philoſt. p. 461, 465. [a] Zoſ. p 780—789. [b] Suid. p. 690, 691 [c] Zoſ l. v p. 780. [d] Idem, ibid p. 782. Claud. in Ruf. l ii p. 20. & conſ. Hon. 3. p 38.

A remarkable inſtance of Rufinus's cruelty and arbitrary proceedings.

Arcadius marries Eudoxia.

Her character.

[e] Zoſ. p. 780. [f] Idem, l. v. p 780, 781. [g] Idem, p. 781, 782. Chron. Alex. p 710. [h] Vide. Val. rer. Franc. l. ii. p. 65. Philoſt. l. xi c. 6. p. 529.

huſband [i]. Some writers have queſtioned her modeſty [k]; but from that charge ſhe is cleared by others, tho' all agree in accuſing her of an inſatiable avarice, which often prompted her to moſt flagrant acts of injuſtice. However, ſhe had ſome outward appearance of piety, favoured the catholics, ſhewed great reſpect to prelates and clergy; and having prevailed upon the emperor in 401, to demoliſh the temple of Marnas, and other temples at Gaza, ſhe built in that city a moſt ſtately and magnificent church, which from her was called Eudoxiana. Hence St. Chryſoſtom publicly commended her as the mother of the church, the patroneſs of the ſaints, the ſupport of the poor, &c [l]. But the cruel perſecution ſhe afterwards raiſed againſt her panegyriſt, has rendered her name infamous in the hiſtory of the church. But to return to Rufinus: That miniſter found himſelf diſappointed as to the marriage of his daughter, and his alliance with the imperial family; and at the ſame time dreaded the credit of the eunuch Eutropius, but more the arms of Stilicho, who pretended to have been by Theodoſius appointed guardian to both his children, and was preparing to march into the eaſt, to diſpoſſeſs his rival of the authority he had uſurped. In order therefore to defeat the deſigns of Stilicho, and to have an opportunity of getting rid of Eutropius, and even of ſeizing the ſovereign power, he reſolved to ſet all in a flame, and involve the whole empire in the utmoſt confuſion [m]. With this view he privately ſtirred up by his emiſſaries the Hunns, who penetrated as far as Antioch, deſtroying all with fire and ſword, and committing every-where unheard of cruelties [n]. At the ſame time he encouraged the famous Alaric to put himſelf at the head of his country-men the Goths, and drawing together as many barbarians of other nations as were willing to follow his ſtandard, to break into Greece, aſſuring him, that he ſhould meet with no oppoſition. Alaric at that time commanded a body of Goths in the Roman ſervice; but being diſſatisfied that he had been rewarded with no better preferment, ſince he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the late war with Eugenius, he readily cloſed with the propoſal of Rufinus; and being by him ſupplied with large ſums, he aſſembled an incredible number of barbarians of different nations; and putting himſelf at their head, he ravaged vaged all Thrace, Pannonia, Macedon, and Theſſaly. As he drew near the famous ſtreights of Thermopylæ, Gerontius, who guarded them, and was privy to the wicked deſigns of his patron Rufinus, immediately withdrew, and opened a free paſſage for the barbarians into Greece, where they raged with incredible fury, putting thoſe to the ſword who offered to oppoſe them, and ſending into their reſpective countries all the women and children that fell into their hands, together with the whole wealth of that opulent province. As Antiochus, at that time proconſul of Achaia, and another of Rufinus's creatures, did not offer to make head againſt them, they over-ran the whole country, rifling the temples, pillaging the cities, and committing ſuch ravages and devaſtations, as were felt by the unhappy inhabitants for many years after. The whole country between Dalmatia, the Adriatic gulf, and the Euxine ſea, was laid waſte, and turned into a deſart, the inhabitants concealing themſelves in dens and caves, through fear of being either inhumanly murdered, or carried into captivity. The city of Conſtantinople itſelf was in a manner beſieged, parties of the barbarians advancing with great boldneſs to the very gates of that metropolis. Rufinus, attired after the Gothic manner, went out, as he ſaid, to treat with them, and was received by the barbarians with extraordinary marks of eſteem; which confirmed the ſuſpicion moſt people entertained of his treachery [o].

Stilicho claims the ſame power in the eaſt as in the weſt.

Rufinus ſtirs up the Hunns and Goths to invade the empire.

[i] Cedren. p. 334. [k] Zoſ. l. v. p. 795. [l] Chryſ. tom. 4. p. 853. [m] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 37. p. 221. Claud. in Ruf. l. ii. p. 20. [n] Socr. l. vi. c. 1. p. 300. Soz. l. viii. c. 1. p. 753.

Dreadful ravages committed by the Goths, under the conduct of Alaric.

WHILE theſe things paſſed in the eaſt, Stilicho was buſied on the bank of the Rhine, in renewing the antient alliances of the Roman people with the Franks, and other German nations. This he accompliſhed, ſays Claudian [p], in leſs than fourteen days; which Mr. Valois maintains to be abſolutely impoſſible [q]. That writer ſpeaks much at length of Marcomir and Sunno, two princes or chiefs of the Franks in thoſe days [r], as does likewiſe Gregory of Tours [s]. Claudian who diſtinguiſhes them with the title of kings, and informs us, that they were brothers, ſays, that they endeavoured to raiſe new diſturbances after the peace concluded with Stilicho; but that one of them, after having been kept ſome time in priſon, was baniſhed into Tuſcany; that the other, attempting to revenge the affront offered to his brother, was killed by his own people; and that Honorius appointed other kings kings over the Franks in their room [t]. This ſeems to have happened, according to Claudian, before the revolt of Gildo; that is, before the end of the year 397. Valeſius writes, that Marcomir outlived Sunno; and conſequently that it was he who was baniſhed into Tuſcany. He is thought to have been the father of Faramond, ſuppoſed to have been the firſt king of France [u]. Stilicho, having thus renewed the antient treaties with the Franks and Germans, reſolved to march to the ſuccour of Greece; in which undertaking he embarqued the more readily, as he hoped to have an opportunity of ruining Rufinus, and getting the whole power of both empires into his own hands. Leaving therefore Gaul about the latter end of the ſpring, he ſet forward with all the weſtern troops, and thoſe likewiſe of the eaſt, that had been left in the weſt after the defeat of Eugenius. He marched, according to Claudian, over the Alps, no doubt, the Julian-Alps, and conſequently through Dalmatia. The barbarians, hearing of his arrival in thoſe parts, reſolved to make a ſtand in Theſſaly, and with this view aſſembled into one body all their troops, that were in ſeveral parties diſperſed about the country. Stilicho was already within a ſmall diſtance of the enemy's army, and his men ſhewed a great forwardneſs to engage them, when Rufinus, concluding, that, if the barbarians were overcome and repreſſed, the ſtorm would fall upon his own head, prevailed upon Arcadius to ſend for the oriental troops. Accordingly an officer was diſpatched to Stilicho, with a peremptory order from the emperor to ſend them forthwith, and return with the reſt into the weſt. Stilicho was greatly ſurprized at this order, which, he thought, ſnatched out of his hands a certain victory, and expoſed the empire to imminent danger. However, not daring to diſobey, he not only ſent the troops, but half the treaſure which Theodoſius had left [w]. In diſmiſſing the forces, he appointed one Gainas, by nation a Goth, and his intimate friend, to conduct them to Conſtantinople, after having imparted to him his deſign of diſpatching Rufinus, and, no doubt, encouraged him to lay hold of the firſt opportunity that offered to put it in execution. Under his conduct the army arrived in the neighbourhood of Conſtantinople on the twenty-ſeventh of November; and the emperor, according to cuſtom, went out Stilicho marches to the relief of Greece.

Stilicho renews the antient alliances with the German nations.

[o] Zoſ. p. 783. Claud. in Ruf. l. ii. p. 21. Philoſt. p. 154. [p] Claud. de laud. Stil. p. 128. [q] Val. ibid. p. 94. [r] Idem, p. 86—90. [s] Greg. Tur. hiſt. Franc. l. ii. c. 9. p. 59—61.

He is ordered by Arcadius to return into the weſt.

[t] Claud. ibid. p. 129. [u] Val. ibid. l. iii. p 119. [w] Claud. conſ. Hon. 4 p. 50, 51. & laud. Stil l. i. p. 128, 129. & l. ii. p. 135. Ruf. l. ii. p. 22. Zoſ. p. 782, 783.

out in perſon to meet them, attended by Rufinus, who, as he had gained over ſome of the chief officers to proclaim him emperor on this occaſion, had already prepared the purple, the diadem, and the donative for the ſoldiery. The army received the emperor with all the reſpect due to the ſon of Theodoſius the Great; but at the ſame time, upon a ſignal given by Gainas, they fell upon Rufinus, and cut him in pieces, while he was preſſing Arcadius to declare him his collegue [x]. This happened, according to Claudian, at the palace of Hebdomon [y], where the emperors of the eaſt were uſually crowned. After his death, they cut off his head, and putting a ſtone in his mouth to keep it open, they carried it on the point of a ſpear to Conſtantinople, where it was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy [z]. They likewiſe cut off his right hand, and carrying it about the ſtreets of Conſtantinople, aſked alms for the inſatiable Rufinus, reduced to beggary. By this invention they collected conſiderable ſums, every one being glad to reward with ſome ſmall acknowledgement thoſe who had contributed to the death of a perſon they ſo much abhorred [a]. His eſtate and all his effects were confiſcated; and the decree iſſued on that occaſion was ſent to Rome, where the people expreſſed the greateſt joy at the death and deſerved end of that inſatiable robber, to uſe the expreſſion of Symmachus, who had plundered the world [b]. His wife and daughter, fearing they ſhould fall a ſacrifice to the fury of the people, took ſanctuary in a church, whence they were ſuffered to retire to Jeruſalem, where they ſpent the reſt of their days [c]. Palladius beſtows great encomiums on Salvia or Silvia, the ſiſter of Rufinus, who had embraced the ſtate of virginity [d]. From a law dated the fifth of Auguſt of the enſuing year 396, it appears, that his wife's fortune was reſtored to her [e]. Neither Stilicho nor the empire gained any thing by the death of Rufinus, he being ſucceeded, not only in his power and employments, but in his cruelty, avarice, and other deteſtable qualities, by the eunuch Eutropius, who had concurred with Stilicho in all his meaſures againſt their common rival. Eutropius was by birth an Armenian, by condition a ſlave, Rufinus murdered.

And his eſtate confiſcated.

He is ſucceeded in his power and employments by Eutropius.

[x] Socr. p. 300. Philoſ. p. 528. Chron. Alex. p. 710. Claud. in Ruf. l ii. p. 29. Zoſ p. 785. [y] Idem ibid. [z] Philoſ. p. 528. Hier. ep. 3. p. 26. Claud. in Ruf. l ii p. 31. Aſterii orat. iv. p. 76. [a] Hier. Philoſt Zoſ. ibid. [b] Symm. l. vi. ep. 15. p. 232. [c] Zoſ. l. v. p. 785, 786. [d] Pallad. hiſt Lauſ. c. 143. p. 1046. [e] Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 42. leg. 15. p. 342.

ſlave, and had been made an eunuch ſoon after his birth, eunuchs being then more in requeſt, and conſequently more advantageous to the ſeller, than common ſlaves. He had frequently changed maſters, having been often bought and ſold. When he was already ſtricken in years, a ſoldier, named Ptolemy, gave him as a preſent to his general Arintheus, who was famous under Valens: Arintheus preſented his daughter with him when ſhe was married, to comb her hair, and perform ſuch-like mean offices about her; which when he could no longer diſcharge on account of his age, ſhe gave him his liberty. Being now his own maſter, he found means to get into the court, where he was employed in the loweſt offices, till he was raiſed by the intereſt of Abundantius, who was conſul in 392, to a more creditable poſt [e]. Theodoſius ſent him in 392, as we read in Sozomen, to conſult the holy hermit John in the wilderneſs of Thebais [f]. That prince ſeems to have repoſed ſome confidence in him. After the marriage of Arcadius with Eudoxia, he was made, no doubt at her recommendation great chamberlain, and upon the death of Rufinus, veſted with the ſame power and authority which that miniſter had enjoyed [g]. Rufinus ſeemed to ſurvive in this wicked eunuch, who was, according to Eunapius, a declared enemy to virtue, and every virtuous man [h]. That writer, after having drawn his portrait in the blackeſt colours, concludes, that he has not painted him ſuch as he really was, there being no crime with which he might not deſervedly charge him [i]. He ſurpaſſed in avarice Rufinus himſelf, expoſing to public ſale the chief employments, and entertaining an incredible number of informers to accuſe ſuch perſons as were poſſeſſed of eſtates; by that means he conveyed the whole wealth of the empire into his own coffers [k]: the priſons, and places of baniſhment, were all filled with unhappy exiles, and ſtripped their wealth, the only crime for which they had been condemned [l]. As for Arcadius, who was a prince of very ſlender parts, he ſuffered himſelf to be entirely governed by this wicked miniſter, not daring in a manner to enquire into his conduct, or give ear to thoſe who had the boldneſs to complain of his arbitrary proceedings. However, by ſeveral laws of this year, he confirmed thoſe that had been enacted by by his father againſt heretics [m]; and by one addreſſed to Marcellus, then magiſter officiorum, he commanded that officer to enquire with great care whether any employments at court were held by heretics, and not only to diſmiſs, but to baniſh ſuch as he ſhould diſcover in the palace, with thoſe who had recommended them [n]. Honorius continued all this year at Milan, or in the neighbourhood of that city, as appears from the dates of his laws.

His extraction, employments, and character.

[e] Claud. in Eutrop. l. i. p. 49, 95—97. [f] Soz. l. vii. c. 22. p. 740. [g] Zoſ. p. 781. Philoſt. l. xi. c. 4. p. 528. Suid. p. 1099. [h] Eunap. p. 183. [i] Idem, ibid. [k] Claud. ibid. p. 97, 98. [l] Zoſ. p. 786. Suid. p. 1099.

Stilicho returns to the relief of Greece.

THE next conſuls were, Arcadius the fourth time, and Honorius the third. This year Stilicho, who was returned to Italy with the weſtern troops, ſet out anew with a deſign to ſuccour Greece, reduced to a moſt deplorable condition by Alaric, and the barbarians under his command. He embarqued on the Adriatic ſea; and landing without oppoſition in Peloponneſus, cut off great numbers of the enemy in various ſucceſsful encounters; and in the end obliged them to retire to a mountain in Arcadia, named Pholoe, at a ſmall diſtance from Piſa. There he ſhut them up on all ſides, cut off their communication with the neighbouring country, and even turned the courſe of the river that ſupplied them with water [o]. But when he had them thus in his power, he ſuffered them to eſcape, to retire out of Peloponneſus, and to pillage Epirus in their retreat [p]. Oroſius ſuppoſes him to have connived at their eſcape, and therefore thinks him no leſs guilty than Rufinus, who firſt ſtirred them up againſt the empire [q]. Zoſimus writes, that they owed their ſafety to the negligence and miſconduct of Stilicho [r]. But Claudian tells us, that Eutropius, looking upon Stilicho as a more dangerous enemy than Alaric, perſuaded Arcadius to conclude a peace with the latter, to take him and the barbarians, who had ravaged the beſt provinces of the empire, under his protection, and to order Stilicho to withdraw his troops forthwith out of Greece, which belonged to Arcadius. Thus was Stilicho robbed the ſecond time by a jealous rival of the glory of delivering the empire, and triumphing over the barbarians [s]. Soon after, Alaric was by Arcadius, or rather by his governor Eutropius, appointed commander of the troops in Eaſt-Illyricum, which compriſed Greece, as we read in Claudian

But ſuffers Alaric to eſcape.

[m] Cod. Theod. l. ii. tit. 9. leg. 8. p. 133. & l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 25. p. 142. 144. [n] Idem, l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 29. p. 148. [o] Zoſ. l. 5. p. 784. Claud. conſ. Hon. 4. p. 51. [p] Zoſ. ibid. [q] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 37. p. 221. [r] Zoſ. p. 784. [s] Claud. bell. Goth. p 170. & in Eutrop. l. ii p. 113.

Claudian [t] (N). As for Stilicho, though he immediately retired with his troops out of Greece, pursuant to the orders of Arcadius, yet that prince, in obedience to the commands of Eutropius, as Zosimus expresses it, caused him to be declared a public enemy by a solemn decree of the senate of Constantinople [u], ordering at the same time all the lands and palaces he had in the east to be seized and confiscated [w]. Claudian adds, that Stilicho discovered an assassin, who had been hired to murder him, and several letters dispersed among his troops, in order to debauch them, and stir them up against him [x]. Eutropius, not satisfied with having thus defeated all the measures of Stilicho, aspiring at the same post in the court of Arcadius which he held in that of Honorius, resolved to remove all those out of the way, in whom Arcadius seemed to repose any confidence. He began with Abundantius, by whose means he had been first raised at court, and who on that account deserved, according to Claudian [y], tho' not at his hands, the treatment he met with. Abundantius had served in the army with great reputation in the time of Gratian, and had been raised by Theodosius to the post of general both of the horse and foot, to the prætorship, and in 393, to the consular dignity [z]. But Eutropius, jealous of the authority and credit which his experience, and known integrity, procured him at court, and panting after the immense wealth with which his eminent services had been rewarded, prevailed on the weak prince with his crafty and malicious insinuations, to banish him to Pityus, a city of Bosphorus, to the north of the Euxine sea, and beyond Colchis; where he led a miserable Stilicho, at the instigation of Eutropius, declared a public enemy.

Eutropius causes Abundantius to be banished.

[t] Idem in Eutrop. ibid. [u] Zos. p. 788. [w] Claud. de laud. Stil. l. i. p. 130. [x] Idem ibid. [y] Idem in Eutrop. l. i. p. 57. [z] Claud. ibid. Zos. l. 5. p. 788. Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 347.

(N) His words are,

——————— At nunc qui fœdera rumpit,
Ditatur; qui servet, eget. Vastator Achivæ
Gentis, & Epirum nuper populatus inultam,
Præsidet Illyrico. Jam quos obsedit, amicus
Ingreditur muros, illis responsa daturus,
Quorum conjugibus potitur, natosque peremit.
Sic hostes punire solent, hæc præmia solvunt
Excidiis——————— (89).

(89) Claud. in Eutrop. p. 113.

miſerable life, ſtripped of all his effects, till the death of Eutropius, when he was removed from thence, and confined to Sidon in Phœnicia, in which city he died [a]. The credit which Timaſius had at court, and with the army, gave the wicked miniſter, who could bear no competitor, more jealouſy than that of Abundantius. He had been long one of the chief commanders of the army, had ſerved Valens and Theodoſius in all their wars with great honour and integrity, and been rewarded by the latter in 389, with the conſular dignity [b]. Eutropius, reſolving to procure by ſome means or other the ruin of ſo powerful a rival, had recourſe to one Bargus, who lived in great intimacy with Timaſius. Bargus was a perſon of a mean deſcent, and had been obliged for ſome notorious crime to fly from Laodicea in Syria, his native city, and retire to Sardes in Lydia. There Timaſius accidentally met him; and being pleaſed with his facetious converſation, without enquiring farther into his character, admitted him to his confidence, gave him the command of a cohort, and took him with him to Conſtantinople; at which the magiſtrates were highly diſpleaſed, becauſe he had been formerly baniſhed that city [c]. To this man, as a proper inſtrument for his villainous purpoſe, Eutropius applied, and eaſily prevailed upon him to betray his friend and benefactor, by accuſing him of treaſon, and producing againſt him a counterfeit writing, upon which he was without delay brought to his trial. Eutropius perſuaded the emperor to judge him in perſon; but perceiving the people were highly provoked to ſee a perſon of Timaſius's dignity and character arraigned upon the depoſition of ſuch an infamous and mercenary wretch as Bargus, he adviſed the prince, whom he managed as he pleaſed, to withdraw, and ſubſtitute Saturninus and Procopius in his room. Of theſe the former had diſcharged the chief employments in the ſtate, and the conſulſhip in 383, but is ſaid to have diſhonoured his old age by a general and mean compliance with the will of the ruling miniſter [d]. Procopius was ſon-in-law to the emperor Valens, of a rough and ſavage temper, but not eaſily prevailed upon to ſwerve from what he thought juſt and equitable, as appeared in this caſe; for he boldly maintained, that ſuch an infamous wretch as Bargus ought not to be admitted as evidence againſt a perſon of Timaſius's rank, againſt

His treacherous practices againſt Timaſius.

[a] Claud. Zoſ. ibid. Hier. ep. iii. p. 26. Aſt or. iv. p. 76. [b] Zoſ. p. 786, 787. Aſt. p. 76. Soz. l. viii. c. 7. p. 766. [c] Zoſ. p. 786, 787. [d] Idem ibid.

againſt his friend and benefactor. But Saturnius prevailing, the unhappy Timaſius was ſtripped of all his wealth, and baniſhed to Oaſis, a barren and inhoſpitable place in Libya, from which there was no poſſible means of eſcape, it being ſurrounded by a vaſt deſert, full of ſand, which moving to and fro with the wind, ſuffered no track or footſtep of any former traveller to be ſeen. Of this place, to which criminals began to be confined about this time, Zoſimus gives us, on occaſion of the exile of Timaſius, a moſt frightful deſcription [e]. The ſame hiſtorian adds, that a report was ſpread, that Syagrius, the ſon of Timaſius, accuſed as privy to the crime of his father, having eſcaped from thoſe who had been ſent to ſeize him, reſcued his father, with the aſſiſtance of ſome robbers, out of the hands of the ſoldiers, who were conducting him to the place of his exile; and that neither the father nor the ſon were ever after heard of [f]. Others write, that Timaſius was found dead in the ſand that ſurrounded Oaſis, having perhaps attempted to make his eſcape [g]. St. Jerom, writing in this year 396, ſays, that Timaſius lived then an exile at Aſſus a city of Aſia [h]. But as Sozomen, Zoſimus, and Aſterius agree, that he was confined to Oaſis, ſome, inſtead of Aſſus, read, in the text of St. Jerom, Oaſis; while others, to reconcile that writer with the other three, pretend, that he was firſt baniſhed to Aſſus, and afterwards, by Eutropius's orders, conveyed to Oaſis. Bargus did not long enjoy the price of his treachery and wickedneſs; for Eutropius, who was a man of too great diſcernment to truſt a traitor, and well knew, that one who had betrayed his friend and benefactor, would not prove faithful to him, reſolved to get rid of him as ſoon as poſſible; and accordingly having ſent him upon ſome advantageous commiſſion out of Conſtantinople, during his abſence, he induced his wife, who was then at variance with her huſband, to preſent to the emperor ſome treaſonable papers, which ſhe pretended to have found in his cuſtody. Hereupon Bargus was upon his return arraigned, ſentenced to death, and executed. Thus was the crime of that treacherous wretch puniſhed, as it deſerved, by the very perſon who had induced him to commit it [k]. Pentadia, the wife of Timaſius, was deaconeſs

Timaſius baniſhed.

His accuſer Bargus put to death.

[e] Zoſ. ibid. [f] Idem ibid. [g] Aſt. or. iv. p. 76. Soz. l. viii. c. 7. p 766. [h] Hier. ep. iii. p. 26. [i] Soz. Zoſ. Aſt. ibid. [k] Zoſ. p. 787.

deaconeſs of the church of Conſtantinople in 404, when St. Chryſoſtom was baniſhed that city: he wrote, while in his exile, ſeveral letters to her, in one of which he enquires after her family and relations, and calls her houſe an houſe of bleſſing [l]. It was according to Sozomen, in order to apprehend Pentadia, and ſome others who had taken ſanctuary in the church, that Eutropius perſuaded the emperor to enact a law, forbidding any one to fly to the churches for refuge; and commanding thoſe who ſhould, to be dragged from the altars, and puniſhed the more ſeverely [m]. This law raiſed a general odium againſt Eutropius [n]: Socrates pretends, that it drew down from heaven all the misfortunes that afterwards befel him [o]: Sozomen and Chryſoſtom exclaim loudly againſt it [p], and obſerve, that, in a few years after, Eutropius himſelf was forced to fly to that aſylum from which he had excluded others, owning, ſays Chryſoſtom, more by his actions than his words, the injuſtice of his law [q]. It was revoked immediately after the diſgrace and downfal of Eutropius, and eraſed out of all the public regiſters [r]. Churches are ſtill held as aſylums in Italy, and the two kingdoms of Spain and Portugal; which, not to mention other crimes, is the true cauſe of many murders committed in thoſe countries. This year, dreadful earthquakes were felt in moſt provinces of the eaſt, and the ſky, appearing all in a flame over the city of Conſtantinople, terrified the inhabitants and the emperor himſelf to ſuch a degree, that abandoning the city, they retired to the fields. It was revealed, as St. Auſtin writes to a pious perſon, that the city of Conſtantinople was on a certain day to be conſumed by fire ſent from heaven: when the day came the above-mentioned phænomenon appeared over the city, but vaniſhed ſome time after, leaving it unhurt, the inhabitants, who had given credit to the prediction, having by a ſincere and timely repentance prevented the execution of the ſentence pronounced againſt them. Thus St. Auſtin, in a ſermon which he preached a few years after [s]. From the ſeveral laws of this year, moſt of which tend to the utter ſuppreſſion of idolatry, and the curbing of heretics, it appears, that Arcadius continued the whole time at Conſtantinople, or in the neighbourhood of that city. The law of the twenty-ſecond of March is dated from Regium, which is ſuppoſed to have been an imperial palace about fifteen miles from the metropolis. Nothing happened this year in the weſt worthy worthy of notice, except the converſion of Fritigil, queen of the Marcomans, to the chriſtian religion. At the requeſt of St. Ambroſe, who wrote ſeveral letters to her, inſtructing her in the holy myſteries, ſhe is ſaid by Paulinus Diaconus to have introduced the king her huſband to enter into an alliance with the Romans [t]: it is certain, that amongſt the barbarous nations that in the preſent reign broke into the empire, no mention is made of the Marcomans. Some miſunderſtanding aroſe this year between St. Ambroſe and Stilicho, the latter having cauſed a criminal by name Creſconius, to be apprehended in a church, to which he had fled for refuge: but Stilicho in the end acknowledged his fault, and attoned for it [u]. Honorius continued all this year at Milan, as is evident from the dates of his laws.

Great earthquakes, &c. in the eaſt.

[l] Chryſ. ep. xiv, xciv, civ, clxxv. Vit. l. iv. c. 3. p. 257. [m] Zoſ. p. 766. [n] Chryſ in Eutrop. tom. iv. p. 484. [o] Socr. p. 264. [p] Soz. Chryſ. ibid [q] Idem ibid. [r] Soz. ibid. [s] Aug. de. urb. Rom. excid c. 6. p 322.

Fritigil, queen of the Marcomans, converted to the chriſtian religion.

THE next conſuls were Cæſarius and Atticus; the former had ſucceeded Rufinus in the prefecture of the eaſt, Eutropius being, as an eunuch, excluded from that office; and the latter had been governor of Weſt Illyricum under Valentinian II. in 384; Cæſarius ſeems to have entered upon his conſulſhip at Conſtantinople, and Atticus at Rome [w]. This year 397, Arcadius, leaving Conſtantinople in the month of July, went to Ancyea, and ſtaid there till the latter end of September, when he returned to the metropolis, with as much pomp and ſhew as if he had conquered the Perſians, ſays Claudian, who ſuppoſes him to have conſtantly paſſed the ſummer at Ancyra, Eutropius diverting him by that progreſs from applying his mind to affairs of ſtate [x]. Stilicho ſtill claimed the adminiſtration of affairs in the eaſt, and was preparing to march anew into the dominions of Arcadius, in order to make good his claim by force of arms, and revenge on Eutropius the injurious decree iſſued againſt him by the ſenate of Conſtantinople. But that wicked and crafty miniſter, not ſcrupling, for the ſupport of his own power, to kindle a war between the two brothers, privately perſuaded Gildo, who commanded the Roman troops in Africa, to revolt from Honorius, and ſubmit to Arcadius, hoping by that means to divert Stilicho from purſuing his intended expedition into the eaſt [y]. Gildo was brother to the famous Firmus, who made war upon the Romans in 373, but was overcome by count Theodoſius, the father of the Eutropius perſuades Gildo to revolt from Honorius.

[t] Paul. Diac. vit. Amb. c. 36. p. 10. [u] Idem, c. 434. p. 9. [w] Sym l. vii ep. 30. p. 273. Cod. Theod. chronol. p. 136. Proſp. p. 470. Icat. in faſt. [x] Claud. in Eutrop. l, ii. p. 110. [y] Zoſ. p. 781.

emperor of that name. In that war Gildo sided with the Romans, and was afterwards, that is about the year 387, by Valentinian II. or rather by Theodosius, who governed in his name, appointed count of Africa, and commander of all the troops of that province. Theodosius, that he might have, as it were, some pledge of his fidelity, in conferring that dignity upon him, married Salvina, the daughter of Gildo, to Nebridius, nephew by the mother to the empress Flaccilla [z]. St. Jerom, in a letter which he wrote to Salvina about the year 400, styles her a virtuous and truly christian widow; and at the same time commends the piety of her mother, and her father's sister, who had embraced the state of virginity [a]. As for Gildo himself, he was, if not by religion, as Marcellinus will have it, at least in his manners, a pagan. Claudian charges him with avarice, cruelty, luxury, and all manner of lewdness, the more shameful and scandalous, as he was already stricken in years [b]. St. Austin speaks of him as one famous for wickedness and debauchery [c]; and in one of his sermons styles him, tho' without naming him, a wicked wretch [d]. When Eugenius usurped the empire of the west, Gildo acknowledged Theodosius; but when that prince marched against the usurper in 394, he declined sending him any succours, as other governors of provinces had done in obedience to the emperor's orders, expecting the issue of the war, as was supposed, in order to join the party that should prevail; insomuch, that Theodosius would have treated him as an open enemy, according to Claudian, had he not been prevented by death [e]. Eutropius having induced him to revolt from Honorius, as we have related above, he obliged most of the cities of Africa and Carthage itself to acknowledge Arcadius, placing such governors in them as he knew were attached to his own interest, with a design of seizing, when an opportunity offered, the provinces for himself, as he had but a very mean opinion of both princes [f]. When news of his revolt was brought to Honorius, he acquainted the senate of Rome with it, who immediately declared Gildo a public enemy, and dispatched a solemn embassy to Arcadius, entreating ting him to reſtore Africa to its lawful ſovereign [g]. Symmachus at the ſame time wrote to Arcadius, probably by order and in the name of the ſenate, exhorting him not to quarrel, but to live in friendſhip and amity, with his brother [h]. In the mean time, a famine began to rage in Rome, Gildo not ſuffering any corn to be conveyed thither from Africa. Two fleets were therefore equipped with great expedition, the one to be employed againſt Gildo, and the other in bringing corn and other proviſions to Rome from Gaul and Spain [i]. The former ſailed this year, and, with a ſeaſonable ſupply, quieted the populace, ready to riſe; but the latter could not be equipped till the following year. During theſe warlike preparations, died the celebrated biſhop of Milan St. Ambroſe, by no one more regretted than by Stilicho, who, looking upon the death of that prelate as the greateſt misfortune that could befal Italy, had, upon the firſt news of his illneſs, cauſed public prayers to be offered for him in all the churches of Milan [k]. Honorius continued this whole year at Milan. Some of his laws are indeed dated from Rome; but that is generally thought to be a miſtake [l]. By one of theſe ſet up in the ſquare of Trajan on the ninth of March, he forbids the Romans to follow in their dreſs foreign faſhions [m], for it is to be obſerved, that the Romans, by converſing familiarly with the Goths, grew, by degrees, fond of their faſhions, and began to adopt them; which was looked upon as a fatal prelude to what happened ſoon after. A blind ſubmiſſion to the modes and faſhions of a foreign nation, has but too often been the forerunner of a more dreadful ſlavery: may it not prove ſuch in our days! By another law, he confirms all the privileges and exemptions, which his predeceſſors, moved by a due reſpect for religion, had granted to the churches, to the eccleſiaſtics, and particularly to the biſhop of Rome [n]. In the eaſt, Arcadius, by a law dated the firſt of April, commanded all the Appollinarian teachers to be baniſhed Conſtantinople, and the houſes where they had held their private aſſemblies to be confiſcated [o]. That of the ſeventeenth of June forbids any one to inſult the Jews, or their their patriarch, whom he had honoured the preceding year with the title of illuſtrious, which was given to the firſt officers of the empire [p]. The law dated the firſt of July, exempts the miniſters of their religion from the ſame burdens, from which the biſhops, prieſts, and deacons were exempted [q]. By a law dated the eighth of November, Arcadius commanded all domeſtics, whether free-born or ſlaves, to be ſentenced to death, who ſhould inform againſt their maſters, except in caſes of treaſon [r]. This year, on the ſeventeenth of June, the empreſs Eudoxia was delivered of a daughter, named Flaccilla from the emperor's mother, and diſtinguiſhed with the title of nobiliſſima, or moſt noble [s].

Gildo's character.

Arcadius is acknowledged in most cities of Africa.

[z] Ammian. l. xxix. p. 399 Zos. l. v. p. 788. Hier. ep. xi. p. 94. Cod. Theod. chron. p. 128. Claud. bell Gild. p. 70—78 [a] Hier. ep. ix p 73—76. [b] Claud. bell. Gild. p 74, 84. [c] Aug ep. lxiv. p. 285. [d] Idem in Jo. hom. v. p. 20. [e] Claud. ibid. p 76. [f] Idem ibid. & de laud. Stil. l. i. p. 130. Oros. l. vii. c. 36. p. 221.

St. Ambroſe dies.

Some laws enacted this year.

[g] Claud. de laud. Stil. p. 131. Sym. l iv. ep. 4. p. 143. [h] Sym. ibid p. 144. [i] Idem, p. 143. Claud. de laud. Stil. l. i. p. 131. l. iii. p. 148. in Eutrop. p. 103. bell. Gild. p. 70. [k] Ambr. vit. c. 34. p. 10 c. 45. p. 12. [l] Cod. Theod. chron., p. 136, 137. [m] Cod. Theod. l. xi. tit. 16. leg. 22. p. 215. [n] Idem, ibid. p 133. [o] Idem, l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 33 p. 151

Flaccilla born.

THE following year 398, when Honorius was conſul the fourth time, with Eutychianus, who entered upon that dignity at Conſtantinople, Stilicho purſued with the utmoſt vigor his warlike preparations againſt Gildo; but was greatly at a loſs how to manage that expedition with ſucceſs, and whom to truſt with the command of the troops. But from this perplexity he was ſoon delivered by the ſeaſonable arrival in Italy of Maſcezel, brother to Gildo, who gave him a true account of the ſtate of affairs in Africa, and ſuggeſted to him the moſt proper mains for ſuppreſſing the rebellion. Maſcezel was not only a chriſtian, but a perſon of extraordinary piety; and therefore could not by any means be prevailed upon to join his brother in the rebellion, who thereupon reſolved to murder him; but he, by a timely flight, defeated his wicked deſign [t]. Gildo, however, vented his rage on the two ſons Maſcezel had left behind him, cauſing them both to be put to death, and leaving their mangled bodies to be devoured by the wild beaſts. Stilicho, not doubting but, to revenge the death of his children, and the attempt upon his own life, he would carry on the war with vigor, and ſerve the republic with unſhaken fidelity, committed to him the whole management of the intended expedition againſt his brother [u]. Zoſimus writes, that Maſcezel was attended by a very numerous army [w]; but Oroſius [x] and the chronicle of Alexandria [y] aſſure us, that it was but five thouſand ſtrong. Their authority is confirmed by Claudian

Maſcezel brother to Gildo, ſent againſt him.

[p] Idem, l. xvi. tit. 8. leg. 12 p. 227. [q] Idem, leg. 13. p. 228. [r] Idem, l. ix. tit. 6. leg. 3. p. 52. [s] Mar. & Alex. chron. p. 712. [t] Ammian. l. xxix p 400 Oroſ l vii. c. 36 p. 221. Claud. bell. Gild. c. 79. p 788. [u] Idem ibid. [w] Zoſ. p. 788. [x] Oroſ. p. 221. [y] Chron. Alex. p. 713.

dian, who ſays, that Stilicho made ſmall preparations for this firſt expedition, but had in readineſs another fleet, and a more renowned general, to be employed, in caſe any misfortune ſhould befal the firſt [y]. That poet names the ſeveral corps, or, as we may now call them, regiments, of which Maſcezel's army was compoſed [z]. It embarqued at Piſa, and putting to ſea, tho' a ſtorm, if we may depend upon a poet [a], was then apprehended, ſteered along the eaſt coaſt of Sardinia, and landed ſafe in Africa. Maſcezel, without loſs of time, led his troops againſt Gildo; and falling upon him before he could draw up his army, gained, after a bloody and obſtinate fight, a complete victory. Thus Zoſimus [b]. But Oroſius [c], Marcellinus [d], and Paulus Diaconus [e], aſcribe this ſucceſs to the miraculous aſſiſtance of St. Ambroſe, who, appearing to Maſcezel, aſſured him, that in three days time he ſhould gain a complete victory, in the very place where he was then encamped. Hereupon he continued, ſay they, in the ſame poſt; and the third day, after having ſpent the preceding night in praying, and ſinging hymns with ſome holy hermits, whom he had brought with him from the iſland Capraria, now Capraia, he ſaw himſelf ſurrounded on all ſides by the numerous forces of the enemy; but not in the leaſt daunted, he marched againſt them with his ſmall army in battle-array. His piety prompted him to try firſt, whether he could by fair means bring them back to their duty; but one of the ſtandard-bearers anſwering him with great arrogance, he drew his ſword, and wounded him in the arm; which obliged him to lower the enſign. The other ſtandard-bearers, imagining he had ſubmitted, ſtrove who ſhould be the firſt in following his example, and lowering their enſigns threw themſelves at the feet of Maſcezel. Some of the barbarians, however, encouraged by Gildo, attempted to make a ſtand; but were ſoon put to the rout. Thus were ſeventy thouſand men, ſays Oroſius, defeated by five thouſand, without any ſtratagem or treachery, nay, and almoſt without bloodſhed. This miraculous ſucceſs, continues that writer, would hardly be credited, were there not many perſons ſtill living, who were eye-wittneſſes of it [f]. Paulinus aſſures us, that he had this account from Maſcezel's own mouth, after his return to Milan [g]. However, we will not take upon us to prefer it to that of Zoſimus. Gildo made his eſcape, and reaching the ſea, went on board the firſt veſſel he found; but being by a contrary wind driven into the harbour of Tabraca near Hippo in Africa, he was there apprehended, expoſed to the inſults of the populace, and then thrown into priſon, where he ſtrangled himſelf, to avoid a more cruel and ignominious death [h]. Upon the defeat and death of Gildo, all Africa ſubmitted anew to Honorius. Claudian, who omits no opportunity of flattering his great hero Stilicho, aſcribes the whole ſucceſs of this expedition to the prudence and vigilance of that miniſter. He wrote a poem on the war with Gildo; but that piece is imperfect, ſince the poet leaves the Roman fleet on the coaſt of Sardinia in their way to Africa. The leading men of Gildo's faction were ſent to Rome, to be tried there; and ſome of them were publicly executed. Optatus, biſhop of the Donatiſts at Tamugadi in Numidia one of Gildo's moſt zealous partizans, died in priſon. As ſeveral innocent perſons were, as it frequently happens on ſuch occaſions, accuſed, and dragged to priſon, Honorius, by a law addreſſed to Victor proconſul of Africa, put a ſtop to ſuch unjuſt proſecutions, ordering falſe informers and witneſſes to be puniſhed, according to the rigor of the ſeveral laws enacted againſt them [i]. Gildo's eſtate fell to the exchequer, and proved ſo large, that a particular treaſurer was appointed to manage it, with the title of comes Gildoniaci patrimonii, or count of Gildo's patrimony [k]. Africa being thus reſtored to its former tranquillity, Maſcezel returned to Italy, and was received at Milan by Stilicho, in appearance with the greateſt demonſtrations of friendſhip and eſteem; but the glory he had acquired by putting ſo ſpeedy an end to a war, which the miniſter had ſo much apprehended, giving him no ſmall jealouſy, he reſolved to diſpatch without delay this new rival. Accordingly, as he was one day paſſing a bridge in the neighbourhood of Milan, Maſcezel, who attended him, with many other perſons of diſtinction, was, by his private orders, puſhed into the river, and drowned [l]. Oroſius writes, that Maſcezel, elated with his ſucceſs, had fallen from his former piety, and even dragged from the altars Gildo is taken, but lays violent hands on himſelf.

Gildo entirely defeated.

[y] Claud. de laud. Stil. l. i. p. 131, 132. [z] Idem, bell. Gil. p. 80. [a] Idem ibid. [b] Zoſ. ibid. [c] Oroſ. p. 221 [d] Mar. in chron. [e] Amb. vit. c. 15. p. 13. [f] Oroſ. p. 221, 222. [g] Amb. vit. c. 51.

His eſtate confiſcated.

Maſcezel put to death by Stilicho's orders.

[h] Claud. de laud. Stil. l. i p. 132. Zoſ. p. 788. Oroſ. Paulin. ibid Mar. chron. [i] Cod. Theod. tit. 3. p. 288. Claud. ibid. p. 148 [k] Idem, tit. 2 p. 349, 352. & tit. 3. p. 347. [l] Zoſ. l. v. p. 788, 789.

altars ſeveral criminals, who had fled to them for refuge; which that writer looks upon as an enormous crime, and the true cauſe of his unfortunate end [m]. About the time of the defeat of Gildo, Honorius married at Milan, Maria the daughter of Stilicho by Serena, couſin-german to that prince [n]. He was then but thirteen, and Maria not yet marriageable [o]; whence ſome authors pretend that the marriage was never conſummated, ſince Maria died very young long before the year 408 [p]. Claudian wrote ſeveral poems on this marriage [q], which, according to him, was firſt propoſed, nay, and commanded by Theodoſius [r]. But his predictions concerning the kings who were to proceed from it [s], ſhew he was a poet, and not a prophet. By the defeat of Gildo, an entire harmony was re-eſtabliſhed between the two brothers, as that poet tells us [t]; but the ſame miſunderſtanding continued between the two miniſters, who nevertheleſs agreed in plundering the unhappy people, and conveying into their private coffers the whole wealth of the two empires [u]. Eutropius perſuaded Arcadius to name him, tho' an eunuch, for the conſulſhip of the enſuing year; but Stilicho would not ſuffer him to be acknowledged in the weſt [w]. Claudian writes, that when news of the conſulate of Eutropius was brought to the court of Honorius, that prince was buſied with Stilicho in receiving the ſubmiſſions of the Alemans, Suevians, and Sicambrians; in giving kings to ſome; and commanding others to raiſe levies for recruiting his armies [x]. Whether this may be founded on truth, or ought to be looked upon only as a poetical fiction, we will not take upon us to determine. The ſame poet, in enumerating the great things Stilicho had performed by himſelf or others before his conſulſhip, that is, before the year 400, ſays, that he ſuccoured Britain, attacked by the neighbouring nations, namely by the Scots, who, arming all Ierne or Ireland againſt it, had covered the ſea with their fleets; that he put it in a condition not to fear their arrows, nor the efforts of the Picts; and that he had ſecured the Britiſh coaſt againſt the deſcents of the Saxons, which the inhabitants apprehending before were conſtantly on their guard; through Honorius marries Maria, the daughter of Stilicho.

Eutropius conſul.

Stilicho provides for the ſafety of Briton againſt the Scots, Picts, and Saxons.

[m] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 36. p. 221. [n] Claud. conſ. Hon. 4. p. 55. [o] Zoſ. p. 804. [p] Idem ibid. [q] Claud. p. 56—69, [r] Idem, p. 57. [s] Idem, p. 63. [t] Idem, bell Gild. p. 76. [u] Zoſ. l. v. p. 789. [w] Claud. in. Eutrop l. ii. p. 111. [x] Idem de laud. Stil. l. ii. p. 140.

through fear of a ſurprize [y]. He adds elſewhere [z], that the Saxons being overcome, the ſea was quiet; that the Picts having loſt their ſtrength, Britain was delivered from her fears. The learned Uſher aſcribes to Stilicho the eſtabliſhing of a legion in Britain, to defend it againſt the Picts, the Scots, and the Saxons [a]. This legion is mentioned by Claudian [b]. About the ſame time, a proper officer was appointed to guard the coaſt againſt the attempts of the Saxons, with the title of comes limitis Saxonici, or count of the Saxon coaſt, that is, of the coaſt over againſt the country of the Saxons [c].

Earthquakes and other calamities in the eaſt.

In the eaſt, the cities of Conſtantinople and Chalcedon were ſhaken with violent earthquakes; ſeveral buildings were conſumed with lightning; and the ſea, breaking in upon the land, laid whole countries under water. Claudian mentions ſeveral other prodigies, which were all the forerunners, ſays the poet, of a prodigy never before heard of, viz. an eunuch conſul [d]; for the following year 390, Eutropius prevailed upon Arcadius to create him a patrician, to honour him with the title of father to the emperor, and to raiſe him to the conſular dignity. He was the firſt and the laſt eunuch that ever held, or rather diſgraced, the faſces. His image, with the enſigns of his dignity, was carried as it were in triumph, through all the cities of the eaſt; but Stilicho refuſing to acknowledge him in the weſt, Manlius Theodorus alone is named conſul in ſome faſti, and in the laws of Honorius. Some writers, miſtaking his two names for the names of two different perſons, mark Manlius or Mallius, Manlius Theodorus conſul in the weſt.

and Theodorus, as conſuls of this year [e]. Manlius Theodorus is famous from the praiſes beſtowed upon him by Claudian, in a poem which he wrote on his conſulſhip [f]; and by St. Auſtin, who, having known him at Milan in 384, inſcribed to him in 386, his book de beata vita, of a happy life, which he publiſhed ſoon after his converſion [g]. Claudian does not commend him on account of his family, but for his learning, his eloquence, and his virtue [h]. After he had pleaded ſome time at the bar, he governed, firſt part of Libya, in quality of proconſul of Africa, and afterwards Macedon; whence he was called to court, and created quæſtor, whoſe province it was to draw draw up the laws that were enacted by the emperor. To this dignity he was raiſed by Gratian in 380 [i]. Upon the death of that prince, he withdrew from public affairs, and led a retired life, till he was recalled to court by Honorius, or rather by Stilicho, who appointed him prefect of Gaul in 395, and prefect of Italy in 397 [k]. Symmachus beſtows great encomiums upon him [l]; and St. Auſtin, who informs us that he was a chriſtian, extols his modeſty, his learning, his eloquence, and generoſity [m]. Claudian, in the poem he wrote on his conſulſhip, admires his integrity, moderation, affability, and other virtues [n]; but elſewhere [o], deveſting himſelf of the character of a panegyriſt, he owns, that Italy would have reaped greater advantages from the prefecture of Theodorus, had he ſlept leſs.

[y] Idem ibid. l ii p. 130. [z] Idem in Eutrop. l. i. p 102, 103. [a] Uſſ. eccleſ Britan. antiq. p. 595. [b] Claud bell. Get. p. 167 & epith. in Pallad. & Celer. nupt. p. 200. [c] Uſſ. ibid. p. 336 [d] Claud. in Eutrop. l. ii. p. 108, 109. [e] Idat. Proſp. Cañdor. faſt [f] Claud in Man. Theod. conſ. p. 84—90. [g] Aug. de beat vit. p. 212, [h] Claud. ibid. p. 84.

DURING the conſulſhip of Theodorus in the weſt and Eutropius in the eaſt, died Varanes, or Vararanes IV. king of Perſia, who during the eleven years of his reign, had lived in friendſhip with the Romans. He was killed, we know not upon what provocation, by his own ſubjects, and ſucceeded by his brother Iſdegerdes, or, as Abulfaragius ſtyles him, Yaſdejird [p]. Eutychius, who calls him Al Aitham, ſuppoſes him to have been the ſon of his predeceſſor [q]. He reigned twenty-one years, ever maintaining a friendly correſpondence with the Romans; but was, according to Eutychius, a prince of great ſeverity, or rather cruelty; whence he was ſurnamed Al Aitham, or Athim, that is, the bad [r]. Procopius gives him a quite different character, deſcribing him as a generous-ſpirited prince [s]. He is famous in the hiſtory of the church, on account of the perſecution which he raiſed about the end of his reign againſt the chriſtians in his dominions. The moſt remarkable event that happened in the eaſt during the conſulſhip of Eutropius, was the downfal of that famous and powerful miniſter, which Zoſimus aſcribes chiefly to Gainas. He had commanded the Goths, and other barbarians, under Theodoſius; and, after the defeat of Eugenius, reconducted the eaſtern army to Arcadius, on which occaſion he cauſed Rufinus to be cut in pieces, in the manner we have related above. For this eminent Varanes king of Perſia, murdered, and ſucceeded by Iſdegerdes.

[i] Cod Theod tit. 6. p 368 [k] Claud ibid. p. 87, 88. Cod. Theod. ibid. & l. xi. tit. 6. leg 21. p 33. [l] Sym l. v. ep p. 10, 189 ep. 4, 8. p. 11, 15. [m] Aug. ibid. [n] Claud. ibid. p. 89, 90. [o] Idem, epig. xxix. p 261. [p] Abulfar. p. 91. Eutych. tom. 1. p 548. Agath, de imper. Juſt. p. 137. [q] Eutych. ibid. [r] Idem, tom. 2. p. 79. [s] Procop. bell. Perſ. l i c. 2, p. 8,

nent piece of ſervice he did not think himſelf ſufficiently rewarded by Eutropius, who, as he uſed to brag, was indebted to him for all his grandeur. From a common ſoldier he had been raiſed by Theodoſius to the chief command of all the Goths, and other barbarians, in the Roman ſervice, and by Eutropius, after the death of Rufinus, to the poſt of general of the Roman horſe and foot; but yet not ſatisfied, and ſcorning to depend upon a ſlave and an eunuch, he reſolved, by ſome means or other, to diſpatch him, hoping, if he were once removed, to ſucceed him in his power and authority [t]. While he was pleaſing himſelf with theſe thoughts, count Tarbigild, or Tribigild, who was by nation a Goth, and commanded a numerous body of his countrymen at Nicola in Phrygia, came to court; and, after a ſhort ſtay at Conſtantinople, was preparing to return to his quarters, highly diſſatisfied with the haughty behaviour and arbitrary conduct of the prime miniſter, when Gainas, to whom he was allied, according to Socrates [u], reſolving to improve his diſcontent to the ruin of Eutropius, imparted to him the deſign he had formed againſt Eutropius, and encouraged him to revolt, aſſuring him, that he would, to the utmoſt of his power, aſſiſt and ſupport him under-hand. Tribigild, who was a man of great intrepidity and reſolution, and ready to embarque in any deſperate undertaking, immediately cloſed with the propoſal; and returning to Nicola, took arms early in the ſpring, pillaged that and ſeveral other cities in Phyrgia, and putting all to the ſword who fell into his hands, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition, he threw the whole province of Aſia into the utmoſt confuſion, the inhabitants, ſtruck with terror and diſmay, abandoning their habitations, and flying for refuge to the moſt diſtant provinces. When news of theſe diſorders was brought to court, Eutropius endeavoured firſt to gain Tribigild with large preſents, and great promiſes; but finding he could not, by fair means, bring him back to his duty, he diſpatched a body of troops againſt him, under the conduct of one Leo, a perſon greatly attached to his intereſt, but in every reſpect unfit for that command. Leo, having paſſed the ſtreights of the Helleſpont, continued in that neighbourhood, not daring to encounter the enemy. Gainas, who pretended to be highly provoked againſt Tribigild, on account of his revolt, was enjoined to guard Thrace and the ſea-coaſt, in order to prevent an irruption on that ſide; but he, keeping the whole time

Gainas diſſatisfied with Eutropius.

He induces Tribigild to revolt.

Tribigild pillages ſeveral provinces.

[t] Zoſ. l. v. p. 789, 807. l. viii. c. 4. p. 760, 761. Socr. l. vi. c. 6. p. 316. [u] Socr. ibid.

time a private correſpondence with the rebels, inſtead of defending Thrace, adviſed Tribigild to march his forces without delay to the ſea-ſide, and, croſſing the Helleſpont, to enter that province. Had his advice been followed, the rebels would have made themſelves maſters of Conſtantinople without oppoſition; but Tribigild, bending his march towards Piſidia, was met there by one Valentine, a citizen of Selga, at the head of a ſmall body of ſlaves and peaſants. Tribigild deſpiſed them at firſt; but as they were well acquainted with that mountainous country, and had, by their frequent diſputes with the robbers in thoſe parts, learnt to make ſudden onſets, and lay ambuſhes, they cut off great numbers of his men, and at length ſhut him up on all ſides, in ſuch manner, that no room being left for him to eſcape, he muſt inevitably have periſhed, had he not, by a large ſum, prevailed upon one Florentius, who guarded a narrow paſs called Coghlea, to withdraw, and ſuffer him to retire. However, his men, by the ambuſcades, frequent skirmiſhes, and ſudden onſets of the Piſidians, were now reduced to three hundred. With theſe he marched into the plain, where he was again ſhut up between the two rivers Melane and Eurymedon. In this extremity, he found means to acquaint Gainas with the deſperate poſture of his affairs, who thereupon, under colour of reinforcing Leo's army, detached a ſtrong body of barbarians, with private orders to join Tribigild; which they did accordingly. With their aſſiſtance Tribigild opened himſelf a paſſage out of Piſidia, and falling unexpectedly upon Leo, cut moſt of his men in pieces. Leo himſelf, attempting to make his eſcape, periſhed among the marſhes [w]. From Piſidia, Tribigild returned into Phrygia, where Gainas, who had advanced into that province, as if he deſigned to attack him, ſuffered him to rage with greater fury than ever, magnifying, in all the letters he wrote to the emperor, his conduct, his exploits, and the number of his troops, and ſuggeſting, that the only means to ſave the empire from imminent ruin, was to comply with his demands, the chief of which was, that Eutropius, the author of all the preſent calamities, ſhould be delivered up into his hands. At the ſame time, news was brought to court of the death of Varanes king of Perſia, and a report ſpread, that his ſucceſſor was preparing to invade Syria. Upon this falſe alarm, and the

Is reduced to great diſtreſs.

But eſcapes and defeats Leo, ſent againſt him.

Gainas lays the whole blame on Eutropius.

[w] Zoſ. l. v. p. 589. Philoſt. p. 531. Claud. in Eutrop. l. ii. p. 110, 116, 119.

the accounts that were by Gainas daily tranſmitted to Conſtantinople of the progreſs made by Tribigild, ſome were for recurring to Stilicho, and others for ſatisfying the rebels, by ſacrificing the miniſter to the welfare of the ſtate [x]. Arcadius, who was under the greateſt perplexity, choſe the latter; and ſending for Eutropius, cauſed him to be ſtripped of the conſular enſigns, and diſcharged him [y]. Thus Zoſimus. But Socrates, Philoſtorgius, Sozomen, and Chryſoſtom, relate the downfal of Eutropius, without mentioning either Gainas or Trigibild. Socrates only ſays, that he had offended Arcadius [z]; Sozomen, that he had affronted the empreſs [a]; and Chryſoſtom, who was then at Conſtantinople, that he had injured the emperor [b]. Philoſtorgius writes, that Eutropius having inſolently threatened to drive the empreſs out of the palace, ſhe went, with her two little daughters, Flaccilla and Pulcheria, in her arms, to throw herſelf at the emperor's feet, and demand ſatisfaction. Arcadius, moved with the tears of his wife and children, remembered at length, that he was emperor; and ſending for Eutropius, diſcharged him, and commanded him that inſtant to quit the palace; which he did accordingly, without being attended by a ſingle perſon, tho' he had been hitherto conſtantly ſurrounded with crouds of pretended friends and adorers [c], Claudian ſeems to favour the opinion of Zoſimus; for in the ſecond book againſt Eutropius, he deſcribes at length the war of Tribigild, which would have been quite foreign to his purpoſe, had it not had any connection with the downfal of Eutropius, which he mentions in his preface to that book. However, the poet, after having expatiated on that war, only deſcribes the conſternation it occaſioned at Conſtantinople, and introduces the eaſt recurring to his hero Stilicho [d]. Perhaps he wrote, or intended to write, a third book. Eutropius, thus diſgraced, and apprehending his life to be in danger, took ſanctuary in a church. But the people exclaiming againſt him in the theatre, and Gainas with the ſoldiery, preſſing the emperor to reſtore the ſtate to its former tranquillity, by either putting to death or baniſhing the abhorred miniſter, a band of ſoldiers was ſent to drag him from his aſylum, ſome of thoſe who

Who is diſgraced and depoſed.

He takes ſanctuary in a church.

[x] Zoſ. p. 793. Claud. in Eutrop. l. ii. p. 119, 120. [y] Zoſ. ibid. [z] Socr. l. vi c. 5. p. 304. [a] Soz. l. viii. c. 7. p. 767. [b] Chryſ. in Eutrop. tom. 4. p 486. [c] Philoſt. l xi. c 6. 529. [d] Claud. ibid p. 120—122.

who had appeared all that time moſt zealouſly attached to him, taking upon them that province [e]. But Chryſoſtom, then biſhop of Conſtantinople, preſenting himſelf before them, and reſolutely declaring, that he would not ſuffer them to profane the church, they ſeized him, and carried him to the emperor, who was by him prevailed upon to grant that protection to Eutropius, from which many guilty of ſmaller crimes had, by his means, been excluded [f]. The next day, incredible multitudes of people flocked to the church, to have the ſatisfaction of ſeing Eutropius, whom they all hated, deveſted of his power, and, by a juſt retaliation, brought to that deplorable condition, to which he had reduced many of their friends and relations. On this occaſion Chryſoſtom made a ſpeech to the aſſembled multitude, on the vanity of all human grandeur, endeavouring at the ſame time to awake in the hearts of his auditors ſentiments of compaſſion for the unhappy criminal. When he ſaw them begin to relent, he ended his ſpeech, by exhorting them to go all in a body to the imperial palace, and, throwing themſelves at the prince's feet, to beg his life [g]. Whether they complied with this exhortation, we are no-where told. All we know is, that a few days after, Eutropius, having privately left his aſylum, in order to make his eſcape, was taken, and baniſhed to the iſland of Cyprus [h]. Zoſimus writes, that when he was baniſhed, he was aſſured, that his life ſhould not be taken from him [i]; and Claudian, who wrote at the time they were conducting him to Cyprus, ſays, that though he had cauſed an eunuch to be beheaded, yet he ſhould not undergo the ſame puniſhment [k]. The law has reached our times, by which Arcadius confiſcated his eſtate, ſtripped him of the dignity of great chamberlain, degraded him from the rank of patrician, and ordered his name to be eraſed where-ever he was ſtyled conſul, his ſtatues to be pulled down, and his images to be removed. By the ſame law Aurelian, the præfectus prætorio, is einjoined to cauſe him to be conducted under a guard to the iſland of Cyprus, and to be there narrowly watched, leſt he ſhould raiſe new diſturbances [l]. This law is dated the ſeventeenth of January of the preſent year; which muſt certainly be a miſtake, ſince all hiſtorians agree, that he was baniſhed after the

Where he is protected by St. Chryſoſtom.

He is taken in endeavouring to make his eſcape, and baniſhed.

[e] Chryſ. tom. 3. p. 671, 676. [f] Idem, tom. 4. p. 486. [g] Socr. p. 304. Soz. p. 767. Chryſ. tom 4. p. 482—487. [h] Chryſ. in pſal. xliv. hom. 2. p. 667. Zoſ. l. v. p 797. [i] Zoſ. p. 793, 794. [k] Claud. ibid. p. 107. [l] Cod Theod. l. ix. tit. 11. leg. 17. p. 312.

the revolt of Tribigild, who took arms in the ſpring. Chryſoſtom gives us room to believe, that ſeveral other perſons were baniſhed with Eutropius [m]; and truly a favourite ſeldom falls alone. However, his ſiſter, tho' very rich, was ſuffered to continue at Conſtantinople [n]. Gainas, not yet ſatisfied, cauſed ſeveral charges to be brought againſt him; upon which he was conducted from the iſland of Cyprus to a place called Pantychium, between Chalcedon and Nicomedia, where he was tried by the prefect Aurelian and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, who, upon his being convicted of having in his conſulſhip made uſe of ornaments peculiar to the imperial dignity, condemned him, and he was beheaded on the laſt day of the preſent year [o]. Zoſimus, who pretends he had been promiſed his life upon oath, ſays, that, to cover that perjury, they gave out, that the oath was only with reſpect to Conſtantinople, and cauſed him to be beheaded at Chalcedon [p]. This year is remarkable in the hiſtory of the church, for the many temples that were demoliſhed both in the eaſt and weſt, and the ſevere laws that were enacted by the two princes againſt all manner of idolatrous worſhip; which may be ſaid to have given the laſt blow to the pagan ſuperſtition. The temples, ſays Tiro Proſper in his chronicle, were this year demoliſhed throughout the Roman world [q]. By a law dated the thirteenth of July, Arcadius commanded all the temples throughout his dominions to be pulled down, not only in the cities, but likewiſe in the country [r]; and by another dated the firſt of November, the materials were to be employed in repairing the bridges, highways, aqueducts, and the walls of the cities [s]. By other laws, all manner of ſuperſtitious worſhip was forbidden, both in public and private, under the ſevereſt penalties, and the prieſts and miniſters of the idols deprived of all the privileges granted them by former princes [t]. In the weſt Honorius enacted a law, dated the twenty-ninth of January of this year 399, forbidding heatheniſh ſacrifices on pain of death, and commanding the temples to be every-where pulled down, and the ſtatues of the idols to be broken in pieces, that no footſteps might remain of the antient ſuperſtition [u]. Notwithſtanding this law, ſeveral temples were ſpared

He is accuſed anew, tried and executed.

Many temples pulled down.

[m] Chryſ. ibid. & p. 671. [n] Claud. ibid. p. 107. [o] Zoſ. p. 739. Philoſtorg l. xi. c. 6. p 529. Socr. l. vi. c. 5. p 305. Aſt orat. iii p. 76, 77. [p] Zoſ. p. 794. [q] Proſp. in chron. [r] Cod. Theod l. xvi tit. 10. leg 16. p. 283. [s] Idem, l. xv. tit. 1. leg. 16. 310. [t] Idem. tit. 10 leg. 13. p. 277. & leg. 14 p 278. [u] Idem, l. xvi. tit. 10. leg. 15. p. 280.

ſpared at the requeſt of the biſhops, who begged them, and conſecrated them to the worſhip of the true God. Among theſe was the famous temple of the goddeſs Cœleſtis, the chief deity of Carthage, one of the moſt ſtately edifices in the whole empire; for it is ſaid, with the buildings belonging to it, to have taken up the ſpace of two miles, the whole being incloſed by a wall of an extraordinary height and beauty. This temple was with great pomp and ſolemnity conſecrated on Eaſter-day by Aurelius, biſhop of Carthage, attended by ſeveral other biſhops, and an incredible multitude of chriſtians, who had flocked from all parts to aſſiſt at that ceremony [w]. Beſides the deſtruction of ſeveral temples recorded by the eccleſiaſtic writers, nothing happened this year in the weſt, which hiſtorians have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity. Honorius was, as appears from the dates of his laws, on the twenty-ninth of January at Ravenna, from the ſixteenth of February to the fourth of June at Milan, at Brixio or Breſcia on the ſixth of June, at Verona in July, in Auguſt at Padua, and at Altini in September; whence he returned to Milan, and there paſſed the winter [x].

The temple of Cœleſtis at Carthage turned into a church.

THE next conſuls were Stilicho and Aurelianus; the latter entered upon this new dignity at Conſtantinople, and the former at Milan, with the greateſt pomp that had ever been ſeen in that city [y]. In the eaſt no advantage accrued to the public from the death of Eutropius, the empreſs Eudoxia, a bold, enterpriſing, and avaricious woman, as Zoſimus ſtyles her, having, upon the downfal of that miniſter, gained an abſolute aſcendant over her huſband. She was conſtantly beſet by women, eunuchs, and informers, who prompted her to ſuch crying acts of violence and injuſtice, that every good man wiſhed for death, to avoid ſeeing ſuch enormous diſorders [z]. In the mean time, Gainas, having concluded a pretended peace with the rebels, began to march back to Conſtantinople, followed by Tribigild, whom he joined at Thyatira, where they both agreed to march to Sardis in Lydia, and plunder that metropolis; but not being able to paſs the rivers that were ſwelled by the heavy rains, they parted once more; and bending their march to the ſea, Tribigild took his rout towards Lampſacus on the Helleſpont, and Gainas towards Chalcedon, allowing their ſoldiers to plunder all the countries

Stilicho conſul.

Gainas and Tribigild join their forces, and plunder ſeveral provinces.

[w] Proſp. chron. p. 149, 150. [x] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 140, 141, 147. [y] Sym. l. iv. ep. 31 p. 161. [z] Zoſ. p. 800, 832.

countries through which they paſſed. Their approach cauſed a general conſternation at Conſtantinople; nay, the whole empire ſeemed to be in imminent danger. As Arcadius had no troops to make head againſt them, and prevent their entering Thrace, he was adviſed to ſend deputies to Gainas, and to ſave the empire from utter ruin, by granting him what ever he demanded. Gainas, with great inſolence, required three of the moſt eminent men in the ſtate, whom he thought capable of thwarting his ambitious deſigns, to be delivered up to him, in order to be put to death. Theſe were Saturninus, who had been conſul in 383, and employed for the ſpace of thirty years in public affairs; Aurelianus, this year's conſul, who had been prefect of Conſtantinople in 393, and the preceding year the præfectus prætorio; and John, ſecretary to the emperor, and in whom the prince repoſed great truſt [a]. The emperor complied, tho' much againſt his will, with this arrogant and tyrannical demand, thoſe three illuſtrious perſons requeſting him of their own accord to ſacrifice them to the public welfare [b]. With the emperor's conſent they left Conſtantinople, and preſented themſelves before Gainas, encamped in the neighbourhood of Chalcedon, who immediately ordered them to be beheaded, but changed the ſentence of death into that of perpetual baniſhment, when the executioner had already lifted up his arm to diſcharge the fatal blow [c]. They were chiefly indebted to Chryſoſtom for their lives, which were granted them at his interceſſion [d]. They were all three ſent under a guard towards Epirus; but having, either by corrupting the Goths that guarded them, or by ſome other means, made their eſcape, they appeared, when leaſt expected, at the court of Conſtantinople, to the great joy of the emperor and the whole city [e]. Zoſimus is the only writer who mentions John among thoſe whom Gainas demanded; all other writers ſpeak only of Aurelianus and Saturninus. Gainas, not yet ſatisfied, demanded a conference with the emperor in perſon; and with this demand too the emperor was obliged to comply, paſſing for that purpoſe over to Chalcedon, in the neighbourhood of which city he had an interview with Gainas, in the church of St. Euphemia, where it was agreed, that both Gainas and Tribigild ſhould lay down their arms, and return, if they pleaſed, to Conſtantinople;

Arcadius forced to comply with his unjuſt demands.

And to confer with him in perſon.

[a] Zoſ. p. 793—795. Zoſ l. viii. c. 4. p. 760. Socr. l. vi. c. 6. p 306. Syneſ. ep. xxxi, xxxiv, xxxviii. p. 177—179. [b] Socr. ibid [c] Zoſ. l. v. p. 795. [d] Socr. ibid. Soz. p 761 Chryſ. tom. v. hom. 72. p. 825. [e] Zoſ. p. 799.

ſtantinople; and that the former, beſides the command of all the Goths in the Roman ſervice, ſhould have that of the Roman horſe and foot, with the conſular ornaments, and an authority almoſt unbounded [p]. We find nothing henceforth in hiſtory relating to Tribigild, except that he periſhed in Thrace ſoon after [q]. As for Gainas, upon his return to Conſtantinople, he demanded a church in that city for the Arians, whoſe doctrine was held by him, and moſt of the Goths his countrymen. The timorous emperor, not daring to give him an abſolute denial, referred him to Chryſoſtom, biſhop of the city, who ſhewed him the edict of the emperor Theodoſius, forbidding all heretics and ſectaries to hold any aſſemblies in the city. Gainas replied, that the ſervices he had rendered the empire deſerved at leaſt one church, in which he and thoſe of his perſuaſion might have the free exerciſe of their religion. To this the prelate replied boldly, that his rewards had already exceeded his deſerts; that from the mean condition of a common ſoldier, he had been raiſed to the high ſtation of commander in chief of all the Roman forces; and ought to be ſatisfied with the honours he enjoyed, without demanding what could not be granted without a notorious breach of the laws. Gainas, finding he had not to deal with an Arcadius, but a Chryſoſtom, thought it adviſeable to drop his demand [r]. Socrates and Sozomen mention a church in Conſtantinople belonging to the Goths [s]; but they muſt be underſtood not of the Arian, but the orthodox Goths, ſince Marcellinus, a zealous catholic, ſtyles it in his chronicle "our church." However the Arians were, it ſeems, at this time allowed to aſſemble without the walls of the city [t]. About this time appeared over Conſtantinople a comet of unuſual magnitude, portending, as was ſaid, the great danger the city was in from the perfidiouſneſs of Gainas. For that barbarian, who commanded in chief the armies of Arcadius, having filled Conſtantinople with his Goths, and removed from thence all the Roman troops, formed a deſign of ſeizing firſt the wealth of the bankers, and then ſetting fire to the palace. But this wicked project being fruſtrated by a miracle, which the reader will find related at length by Socrates [u], Sozomen [w], and Philoſtorgius [x], he withdrew from the city on

The intrepidity of St. Chryſoſtom.

Gainas forms a deſign of ſeizing Conſtantinople.

[p] Idem, p. 794. Socr. p. 306, 307. Soz. p. 761. Theodor. l. v. c. 32. p 744. [q] Philoſ. l. xi. c. 9. p. 551. [r] Philoſ. l. xi. c. 8 p. 531. Soz. p. 761. Theodor p. 774, 775. [s] Socr. p. 308. Soz. p. 762. [t] Theod. l. v. c. 30. p. 743. Soz. p. 761. [u] Socr. l. vi. c. 6 p. 307. [w] Soz. l. viii. c. 4. p. 762. [x] Philoſt. l. i. c. 8. p. 531.

on the tenth of July, as it were to take the air, ſays Zoſimus [y], or to perform his devotions, as we read in Socrates [z], in the church of St. John Baptiſt, ſeven miles from the city, pretending to be poſſeſſed, ſay Sozomen [a] and Socrates [b], with an evil ſpirit. He left in the city the greater part of the Goths, with private orders to fall upon the inhabitants immediately after his departure, and to give him a ſignal, that he might return and join them with thoſe who attended him [c]. Gainas defeated his own deſign, according to Zoſimus, by returning to force the gate before the ſignal agreed on; which alarmed the city [d]. Socrates [e] and Sozomen [f] write, that the ſoldiers who guarded the gates, obſerving thoſe, who went out with Gainas, loaded with arms, which they endeavoured to conceal, attempted to ſtop them. Hereupon the Goths, having killed ſeveral of the guards, opened themſelves a way ſword in hand; but the citizens, in the mean time, taking the alarm, flew to arms; and Arcadius, acquainted with what had happened, declared Gainas a public enemy, and ordered all the Goths in the city to be put to the ſword. Upon this Gainas returned in great haſte; but not being able to force the gate, which he found barricaded, and defended by a numerous body of citizens, he was obliged to drop the enterprize, and retire. Philoſtorgius ſuppoſes him to have been ſtill in the city, and to have retired in the night [g]. What happened the day following, we are no-where told; but the day after, the twelfth of July, the citizens fell upon the Goths, who were ſtill remaining in the city to the number of ſeven thouſand, and cut moſt of them in pieces; the reſt, over-powered with numbers, took ſanctuary in the church of their nation, which ſtood cloſe to the palace; but the citizens having obtained leave of the emperor to attack them even in their aſylum, they firſt uncovered the roof; and after having for ſome time plied them warmly with ſhowers of darts and arrows, they ſet fire at laſt to the church, which was reduced to aſhes, with all who were in it [h]. This was looked upon, ſays Zoſimus, by every good chriſtian as an enormous crime [i]. Gainas, highly provoked at the maſſacre of his friends and countrymen, pulled off the maſque; and making open war upon the ſtate, ravaged all Thrace; but not being able to make himſelf

But fails in his attempt.

His men maſſacred.

He ravages Thrace.

[y] Zoſ l. v p. 795. [z] Socr. p. 307, 308. [a] Soz. p. 762. [b] Socr. ibid. [c] Zoſ. p, 795. [d] Idem ibid. [e] Socr. 307. [f] Soz p. 762. [g] Philoſt. p. 531. [h] Socr. p 308 Chron. Al. p. 712. Soz. p. 762. Zoſ. p. 796. Marc. chron. [i] Zoſ. ibid.

ſelf maſter of a ſingle city there, the inhabitants, who were accuſtomed to ſuch incurſions, having learned how to defend their walls, how to ſally out, and diſtreſs the enemy, he left that province, and marched into the Cherſoneſus, with a deſign to croſs the ſtreights of the Helleſpont, and enrich himſelf and his army with the ſpoil of Aſia. But Fravitus, who commanded in thoſe parts, having aſſembled in great haſte a conſiderable number of veſſels, attacked him in his paſſage; and being favoured by the wind, obliged him to return to the coaſt whence he had ſailed, with the loſs of many thouſands of his men, either killed or drowned [i]. Fravitus was himſelf a Goth, and a pagan, according to Zoſimus [k], but greatly attached to the Roman intereſt, having married a Roman of diſtinction in 380, and ever ſince that time ſerved the empire with great fidelity. He was one of the chiefs of thoſe Goths, who, being driven out of their own country by the Hunns, were allowed by Theodoſius to ſettle in Thrace. Eunapius writes, that ſoon after he killed with his own hand Eriulphus, another of their chiefs, becauſe he was for taking arms againſt Theodoſius, purſuant to an oath, by which they had all bound themſelves, before they left their own country in 376, to do the Romans, however kindly by them received, all the miſchief that lay in their power [l]. As he was a man of great courage, a ſtrict obſerver of military deſcipline, vigilant, and indefatigable, he had been employed on ſeveral occaſions, and acquitted himſelf in every command with great reputation: he had lately cleared the eaſt of the robbers who had long infeſted it, roving up and down the country in great bodies [m]. However, he was ſuſpected of having ſuffered Gainas and the reſt of his countrymen to eſcape, when he might have eaſily cut them all off: But Zoſimus [n], and moſt hiſtorians, clear him from this charge, which ſeems the more groundleſs, as he was for his conduct on that occaſion rewarded the following year with the conſulſhip. From the Cherſoneſus, Gainas returned to Thrace, and was there, according to Socrates and Sozomen [o], cut in pieces, with all his men, by the Romans, who purſued him. Zoſimus writes, that after he had maſſacred all the Romans whom he found in his army, leſt they ſhould betray him, he paſſed the Danube, being deſirous to end his days in the antient country of the Goths. But Uldes or Uldin, king of the Hunns, then maſters of thoſe countries, thinking it highly impolitic to receive into his dominions ſo renowned a commander, with an army of his own nation, met him with all his forces on the frontiers, gave him battle, and, after a ſharp diſpute, put him and all his men to the ſword. His body being found, Uldes cauſed his head to be cut off, and ſent it to Arcadius [p], who received it at Conſtantinople on the third of January of the enſuing year 401 [q]. During theſe troubles, Eudoxia, who had been hitherto diſtinguiſhed only with the title of Nobiliſſima, received that of Auguſta on the ninth of January; on which occaſion ſhe cauſed her image to be carried through all the provinces of the empire, to receive the ſame honours that were paid to the images of the emperors. This no empreſs before her had preſumed to do; whence many complained of it as an innovation, and among the reſt Honorius, in a letter which he wrote to his brother [r]. But not many years after, the empreſſes claimed the ſame honours; nay, and aſſumed the ſame titles of pious, happy, moſt pious, perpetual, victorious, &c. that were given to the princes their huſbands. On the third of April of this year, Eudoxia was delivered of Arcadia, her third daughter [s]. In the beginning of this year, the city of Conſtantinople was ſhaken with violent earthquakes, which laſted three days; on which occaſion great numbers of pagans demanded and received the ſacrament of baptiſm [t].

Is defeated with great loſs by Fravitus.

His death.

[i] Zoſ Socr. Soz. ibid. Philoſt. p. 531. [k] Idem ibid. [l] Eunap. p. 21. [m] Eunap. ibid. Zoſ. p. 769. Philoſ. p. 531. Socr. p. 309. [n] Zoſ. p. 798 [o] Socr. p. 309 Soz. p. 763.

Eudoxia created Auguſta.

Arcadia born.

DURING the above-mentioned diſturbances raiſed by Gainas in the eaſt, the weſtern provinces, eſpecially Italy, were alarmed by a ſudden irruption of the barbarians, under the conduct of the celebrated Alaric, and Radagaiſus king of the Hunns. Of the former we have already made frequent mention; but as he is to act a chief part in the hiſtory of Honorius's reign, we ſhall here acquaint our readers with what we have copied from the beſt writers concerning a man ſo famous in the records of thoſe times. Alaric was by nation a Goth, born in the iſland of Peuce at the mouth of the Danube, whence Claudian calls that river his paternal god [u]. He was not ſprung from the family of the Amali, the moſt illuſtrious of the Gothiſh nation, but from that of the Balthi, which held the ſecond rank; and to him, in particular, his countrymen had given the name of Balt, which in their language language ſignified bold and enterpriſing [w]. Though Claudian introduces him ſpeaking in the language of a pagan [x], yet it is certain he was a chriſtian, but an Arian, the doctrine of that hereſiarch having prevailed among the Goths ever ſince the year 375 [y]. Long before the year 410, in which he took Rome, he uſed to brag, that he would one day extend his conqueſts to that great metropolis, purſuant to the prediction of an oracle [z]. This we learn of the poet Claudian, who little imagined then, that the prediction would ever be fulfilled. Prudentius likewiſe, who wrote ſome years before Alaric took Rome, tells us, that he was often heard to ſay, he ſhould one day ſet fire to that city [a]. He paſſed the Danube in 376, with his countrymen, driven out of their own country by the Hunns. Claudian ſays, that he often engaged the imperial troops, and once ſhut up the emperor Theodoſius in the windings of the Hebrus in Thrace [b]. However, in 382, he ſubmitted to him with the other Goths, and received lands in Thrace, where they were allowed to ſettle, upon condition of their ſerving, when wanted, in the Roman armies. Purſuant to this agreement, they attended Theodoſius in his laſt expedition againſt the uſurper Eugenius in 364, on which occaſion Alaric commanded a body of his countrymen [c]. He had no other rank in the beginning of the reign of Arcadius and Honorius; whence Rufinus, finding him diſſatisfied, eaſily prevailed upon him to revolt, and plunder Greece in 395. Stilicho gained ſeveral advantages over him in Peloponneſus; but ſuffered him to eſcape in 396, as we have related elſewhere. Arcadius entered into a treaty with him, and appointed him general of the Roman troops in Eaſt-Illyricum, which poſt he held when Tribigild revolted, that is, in 399. The Goths, who were ſubject to the empire, created him about the ſame time, if Jornandes is to be credited, their chief and general, with the title of king of the Viſigoths [d]. The ſame writer adds, that the Goths, deſpiſing both Arcadius and Honorius, and diſcontented becauſe they had not ſent them the uſual preſents, began to mutiny, and reſolved to make war upon the empire, in order to enrich themſelves with the ſpoils of ſo many wealthy provinces [e]. Whatever was the motive that prompted them to take arms, it is certain, that this year 400, the Goths, under the conduct of Alaric, and Radagaiſus king of the Hunns, entered Italy in an hoſtile manner on the ſide of Pannonia, leaving Sirmium on their right [f]. Jornandes writes, that they met with no oppoſition [g]: according to St. Jerom, they beſieged Aquileia; and after having opened themſelves a way into Italy, they laid the country waſte far and near [h]. This happened the preſent year; but they were ſtill in Italy in the beginning of the following year 401, for Paulinus, in his annual poem on the birth-day of Felix of Nola, the fourteenth of January, writes in 401, that the Goths and other foreign nations were ſtill purſuing their ravages in Italy [i]. As we have no diſtinct account of this firſt irruption of Alaric into Italy, we know not how it ended; but as it ſeems altogether improbable, that he continued in that country till the battle of Pollentia, fought two years after, in which no mention is made of Radagaiſus, we are inclined to believe, that Stilicho induced them both, by ſome means or other, to retire, and that Alaric returned about the end of the year 402.

The origin, birth and employments of Alaric.

[p] Zoſ. p. 798, 799. [q] Socr. p. 309. Chron. Al. p. 12. Marc. chron. [r] Vide Val. rer. Franc. l. ii p. 66. & ſpicileg. veter. ſcript. tom. x. p. 8. [s] Chron. Al. p. 712. [t] Syn. ep. lxi. p. 204. Chryſ. in Act. hom. vii. xli. p. 69, 360. [u] Claud. conſ. Hon. 6. p. 177. Baudr. Prud. in Sym. l. ii p. 242.

[w] Jorn. rer. Goth c. 14, 29. p. 630, 651. [x] Claud. bell. Get. p. 170. [y] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 37. p. 222. [z] Claud. ibid. p. 159. [a] Prud. in Sym. l. ii. p 242. [b] Claud. ibid p. 170. [c] Idem conſ. Hon. 6. p. 177. Socr l. vii. c 10 p. 346. Zoſ. l. v. p. 783. [d] Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 29 p. 651. & de regn. ſucc. c. 43. p. 653.

He enters Italy, with Radagaiſus, and lays waſte ſeveral provinces.

He retires.

Theodoſius born.

THE next conſuls were Vicentius prefect of Gaul, and Fravitus or Fravita, of whom we have ſpoken above. This year is remarkable for the birth of Theodoſius, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Arcadius, born, according to Socrates [k] and the chronicle of Alexandria [l], on the tenth, according to Marcellinus, on the eleventh, of April, and, ſoon after his birth, declared Cæſar [m], and baptized with extraordinary pomp and ſolemnity. This year Arcadius publiſhed a law forbidding any one to beg the eſtates of condemned perſons, till two years after they had been confiſcated [n]. The Euxine ſea was this year frozen over for the ſpace of twenty days [o]. A band of ſlaves and deſerters pillaged part of Thrace, pretending to be Hunns: but Fravitas marching againſt them, put moſt of them to the ſword, and diſperſed the reſt [p]. In the weſt, Honorius, by a law dated the twenty-firſt of June, forgave all the debts owing to the exchequer before his firſt conſulſhip; conſulſhip; that is, before the month of September 386. By the ſame law, he ordered all proſecutions and ſuits for what was owing from that time, to the year 395, that is to his acceſſion to the empire, to be ſuſpended, till he had enquired into the circumſtances of the debtors [q]. The following year, when Arcadius and Honorius were both conſuls the fifth time, nothing remarkable happened in the eaſt, except the promoting of young Theodoſius to the imperial dignity; which ceremony was performed with extraordinary magnificence in the palace of Hebdomon, on the tenth or eleventh of January [r]. In the weſt, Alaric entered Italy anew. Claudian who wrote a poem on this war, ſuppoſes, that he ſet out from Theſſaly [s]; but Socrates tells us in a very confuſed manner, that not preſuming to take upon him the title of emperor, he left Conſtantinople, and upon his arrival in Illyricum, put all to fire and ſword; but as he was paſſing out of Theſſaly into Epirus, he was attacked in the narrow paſſes of mount Pindus by the Theſſalians, who killed three thouſand of his men in the neighbourhood of Nicopolis. Notwithſtanding this loſs, he purſued his march, carrying all before him [t]. What prompted him to theſe acts of hoſtility, we are no-where told. Claudian lays the whole blame on Alaric, charging him with treachery [u]. On the other hand Oroſius accuſes Stilicho, as if he had been the chief author of this war, and had provoked the Goths, by refuſing to grant them certain lands, which they demanded upon terms very advantageous to the empire [w]. He hoped, ſays that writer, when a war was once kindled in the bowels of the empire, to improve it to his own advantage, and ſettle the ſovereignty on his ſon Eucherius [x]. Be that as it will, Alaric entered Italy in the latter end of the autumn, the winter being more favourable to his men, enured to a cold climate, than to the Romans, not accuſtomed to bear the hardſhips of war in that ſeaſon [y]. He paſſed the Alps without oppoſition, the Roman troops being then employed in driving out a body of barbarians, who had made an irruption into Rhœtia. As there was then no army in Italy to oppoſe him, he ravaged without controul the provinces of Venetia and Liguria which threw Rome itſelf into the utmoſt conſternation:

[e] Idem ibid. [f] Proſp. chron. Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 29. p. 651 Ruf p 15. Hier. in Ruf. l. iii. c. 6. p. 239. Paulin car. xxiii p. 585 [g] Jorn. ibid p 651. [h] Hier. in Ruf l iii c. 6. p. 239 [i] Paulin carm. xxiii p 585——588. [k] Socr. p. 763. [l] Chron. Al. p. 712 [m] Theod. l ii. p. 568. Soz. p. 763 [n] Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 42. leg. 17. p. 345. [o] Chron. Alex. p. 713. [p] Zoſ. p. 799.

An inſtance of the generoſity of Honorius.

Alaric enters Italy anew.

And ravages ſeveral provinces without oppoſition.

[q] Cod. Theod. l. xi. tit. 28. leg. 3. p. 196 [r] Soz. l. viii c. 4 p. 763. Chron. Alex. p. 712. [s] Claud. bell Get. p. 169. [t] Socr l vii c 10. p 346. [u] Claud. ibid. p. 171. [w] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 37, 38, p. 221, 222. [x] Idem, ibid. [y] Claud. ibid. p. 165. & conf. Hon. 6. p. 186.

conſternation: the walls of that metropolis were repaired with great expedition by Flavius Macrobius Longinianus, then prefect of the city [z]; and the citizens, not being ſuffered to retire with their families and effects, were buſied night and day in preparing arms, and putting themſelves in the beſt poſture of defence they could [a]. The court was no leſs alarmed than the people, Alaric threatening to beſiege the emperor himſelf, and force him to comply with his demands [b]. Honorius was for retiring into Gaul; but Stilicho would neither ſuffer him, nor his own wife and ſon, to abandon Italy [c]. However, the emperor left Milan, and retired to Ravenna, which thenceforth became the uſual place of his reſidence [d]. The news of this irruption ſoon reached the moſt diſtant provinces of the eaſt; for we are told that this very year the chriſtians of Edeſſa in Meſopotamia, repairing to the church of St. Thomas, begged in their public prayers, that the Arian robber, who plundered Italy, might meet with the juſt doom which had overtaken his countrymen of the ſame ſect, meaning no doubt Gainas [e].

The emperor retires to Ravenna.

THE next conſuls were Theodoſius Auguſtus and Rumoridus. Who the latter was, we are no-where told; but his name gives us room to think he was a Goth, probably in the ſervice of Honorius; for, generally ſpeaking, one of the conſuls belonged to the eaſtern, and the other to the weſtern empire. This year 403, Eudoxia was, on the tenth or eleventh of February, delivered of Marina, her fourth and laſt daughter [f]. A ſtatue of ſilver was erected to the empreſs on a column of porphyry, near the church of St. Sophia; which occaſioned a miſunderſtanding between Eudoxia and St. Chryſoſtom, biſhop of the city, who could not endure the profane ſports that were exhibited before the ſtatue at the very entry of the church [g]. Arcadius cauſed likewiſe his own ſtatue to be placed on a column, which, according to ſome writers, was reared this year in the quarter of the city called Xerelophos, and is deſcribed by Gyllius [i]. The ſame year Arcadius built the city of Arcadiopolis in Thrace [k], or rather rather gave that name to the ancient city of Bergulæ [l]. To return to Italy, Stilicho, having in ſome degree removed the young emperor's fears, ſays Claudian, croſſed the lake of Como, and paſſing the Alps in the depth of winter, entered Rhœtia, where, with his unexpected arrival, he alarmed the barbarians and not only obliged them to ſue for peace, but perſuaded great numbers of them to join him. At the ſame time he diſpatched meſſengers to the troops that guarded the coaſt of Britain, and the banks of the Rhine, ordering them to march immediately, and with all poſſible expedition, into Rhœtia. Upon their arrival, he commanded them to purſue their march into Italy; but ſet out himſelf before them, attended by a ſmall number of troops in order to return with all ſpeed to court. When he came to the Adda, he found the enemy encamped on the oppoſite bank and maſters of the bridge; but not in the leaſt daunted, he threw himſelf into the river as ſoon as it was dark, and forcing his way ſword in hand through the midſt of the barbarians, appeared unexpectedly at court to the inexpreſſible joy of the emperor [m].

Marina born.

[z] Grut. p. 165. Prud. in Sym. l ii. p. 242. [a] Claud. bell Get. p. 158, 159, 164, &c. [b] Idem. conſ. Hon. 6. p. 186 [c] Idem bell. Get p. 166. [d] Cod. Theod chron. p 146. [e] Chryſoſtom. 6. p 272 -274. [f] Chron Alex. ibid. Socr. l. vi. c. 1 p. 325. [g] Socr. ibid Theoph. p. 68. [i] Gyil. de Conſtan geograph. l. iv. c. 7 p. 300. [k] Theoph p. 66.

Stilicho aſſembles an army.

The troops arrived ſoon after out of Rhœtia; and Stilicho, putting himſelf at their head, marched againſt the enemy; but could not hinder Alaric from paſſing the Po, and advancing to Pollentia, now Pollenza, on the Tanaro in Piedmont [n], where the two armies engaged, almoſt on the ſame ſpot, ſays Claudian, where Marius had formerly defeated the Cimbrians [o]; but he was therein miſtaken, for the Cimbrians were overcome in the neighbourhood of Vercelli [p]. There is a great diſagreement among authors in the accounts they give us of this battle: Jornandes writes, that Alaric having advanced to Pollentia, in virtue of a treaty, by which Honorius had yielded to him the provinces of Gaul and Spain, then held by the Vandals, Stilicho followed him, and without any regard to the faith of treaties, or law of nations, fell upon him, while he was under no apprehenſion of an enemy [q]. But it is certain, that the Vandals had not yet entered either of thoſe provinces. Claudian, Caſſiodorus and Prudentius ſuppoſe Stilicho to have been preſent, and to have commanded the army in perſon; but Oroſius tells us, that Saul, a pagan and barbarian, was veſted

And marches againſt Alaric. The battle of Pollentia.

[l] Vide Baudr. p. 60, 114. 168. conf Hon 6. p. 186, 187.
[m] Claud. bell. Get p. 165——
[n] Idem ibid. p. 170—180.
[o] Idem, bell. Get p. 171. Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 30. p. 653.
[p] Plut. vit. Mar. p. 767.

veſted with the chief command; and that he, imagining the Goths, out of reſpect to their religion, (for they were forthe moſt part chriſtians, tho' Arians) would not fight on Eaſter-day, attacked them on that ſolemn feſtival [r]. In the preſent year 403, Eaſter fell on the twenty-ninth of March [s]; which is agreeable to what we read in Claudian, viz. that the war of Alaric began and ended with the winter [t]. In the Roman army ſerved a body of Alan horſe, commanded by an officer of that nation, who advancing with more courage than prudence, was ſlain at the head of his men; which put them into no ſmall confuſion: but Stilicho coming ſeaſonably with the foot to their aſſiſtance, they rallied, and returned to the charge [u]. Claudian and Prudentius [w] ſuppoſe the battle to have been gained by the Romans; but Caſſiodorus in his chronicle writes, that Stilicho and the Roman army were defeated, and put to flight; and Jornandes, that the Goths, when ſurpriſed by Stilicho, betrayed no ſmall fear, but afterwards took courage, and put moſt of his men to the ſword, obliging the reſt to ſave themſelves by a precipitous and diſorderly flight [x]. According to Oroſius the Romans gained the battle; but were overcome after the victory [y]. The Romans, while victorious, forced and plundered the enemy's camp, in which they found the ſpoils of ſeveral provinces, and the wife of Alaric, with his children and daughters-in-law, whom they took priſoners. Alaric was no ſooner informed of their misfortunes, than he ſent deputies to Stilicho to ſue for peace; which was readily granted him upon condition of his marching forthwith out of Italy [z]. Purſuant to this agreement, Alaric repaſſed the Po, and retired as far as Verona, where, in defiance of the late treaty, he began to plunder the country, and commit other acts of hoſtility. Hereupon Stilicho detached againſt him a ſtrong body of barbarians, by whom he was overcome and obliged to take refuge among the mountains. He endeavoured to paſs the Alps, and ſeize on Gaul or Rhœtia; but found all the paſſes guarded by Stilicho, who kept him blocked up, till moſt of his men forſaking him, and joining the Romans, he thought it adviſeable to withdraw in the night-time, and return through by-ways into Pannonia. Thus Claudian [a]. Oroſius writes, that Alaric ſues for peace.

Abandons Italy, and returns to Pannonia.

[r] Oroſ l. vii. c. 37. p. 221. [s] Buch cycl. [t] Claud. ibid. p. 160, 161. [u] Prud. in Symm. p. 243 [w] Idem ibid. [x] Jorn. ibid [y] Oroſ. ibid [z] Claud. p. 172. & conſ. Hon. p 181, 182. Prud. ibid. [a] Claud. conſ. Hon. 6. p. 178-183.

that the barbarians could not agree among themſelves; that the Goths were divided into two factions; and that the Alans and Hunns, who ſerved under Alaric, often quarrelled, and deſtroyed each other [b]. Italy being thus delivered from the barbarians, Honorius, to ſatisfy the ſenate and people of Rome, who, by frequent embaſſies, had entreated him to honour their city with his preſence, left Ravenna, and ſet out for that metropolis; which he entered in triumph, having Stilicho with him in the chariot, about the beginning of December. He was received with loud acclamations by the ſenate in a body, by the nobility and people in their beſt apparel. He would not ſuffer the ſenate to attend, according to cuſtom, his triumphal chariot on foot; but allowed his ſiſter Placidia, and Eucherius his brother-in-law, to pay him that honour [c]. While he was ſtill at Ravenna, he ſuppreſſed and utterly aboliſhed the ſhews of gladiators, which, tho' forbidden by Conſtantine the Great in 325, had been tolerated by his ſucceſſors, even by Theodoſius himſelf, out of complaiſance to the people, fond beyond expreſſion of that inhuman diverſion [d]. Theodoret writes, that an anchoret, by name Telemachus, attempting to prevent the gladiators from engaging in the amphitheatre at Rome, whither he was for that purpoſe come out of the eaſt, was by the incenſed populace ſtoned to death; and hence Honorius, according to that writer, took occaſion to ſuppreſs thoſe ſports [e]. Be that as it will, they were forbidden after the battle of Pollentia, as appears from Prudentius [f], and before Honorius's triumphal entry into Rome; ſince Claudian, in deſcribing the ſhews that were exhibited on that occaſion, makes no mention of gladiators [g].

Honorius enters Rome in triumph.

He aboliſhes the ſhews of gladiators.

THE following year 404, Honorius was conſul the ſixth time, with Ariſtænetus, of whom we find no further mention in hiſtory. The empreſs Eudoxia died this year of a miſcarriage, on the ſixth of October, a few days after ſhe had prevailed upon the weak prince her husband to baniſh St. Chryſoſtom, whom ſhe had for ſome time perſecuted with great bitterneſs, on account of his reflecting in his ſermons, as ſhe imagined, and perhaps not without reaſon, on her conduct, and his exclaiming againſt the profane ſports that were exhibited before her ſtatue, which ſtood near the church.

The empreſs Eudoxia dies.

[b] Oroſ. p. 221. [c] Claud. conſ. Hon. 6. p. 188, 189. [d] Socr. l. i. c. 18. p 48 Soz. l. i. c. 8. p. 411. Cod Theod. l. xv. tit. 11. leg. 2. p. 395. [e] Theod. l. v. c. 26. p. 741. [f] Prud. in Symm. l. ii. p. 242. [g] Claud. in conſ. Hon. 6 p 190, 191.

church. On the very day he left Conſtantinople, a fire broke out in the great church, which entirely conſumed it with the palace where the ſenate uſed to aſſemble, and the neighbouring edifices. This calamity was imputed to the exiled biſhop's friends, and ſeveral of them were thrown into priſon, and racked to death. But of theſe violent proceedings againſt Chryſoſtom and his friends, the reader will find a diſtinct account in the eccleſiaſtic writers [h]. The empreſs was interred on the twelfth of October, in the church of the Apoſtles, where her tomb was to be ſeen many ages after [i]. Before her death the Hunns had broken into Thrace, and the Iſaurian robbers committed great diſorders in Aſia and Syria. The former having pillaged great part of Thrace and eaſt Illyricum, retired of their own accord beyond the Danube, loaded with booty [k]. Againſt the latter was ſent Arbazacius, who cut great numbers of them in pieces, and ſhut them up on all ſides; but ſuffered them in the end to eſcape, being bribed by the large ſums they offered him [l]. Suidas, who calls him a native of Iſauria, and a few lines after an Armenian, ſays, that, from his inſatiable rapaciouſneſs and avarice, he was nicknamed Harpazacius, or the Harpy [m]. The Iſaurians, having now nothing to fear from Arbazacius, over-ran the provinces of Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Lycaonia, Piſidia, Cappadocia, and Lower Syria, extening their ravages to the frontiers of Perſia on one ſide, and to the Euxine ſea on the other, ranſacking every-where, and pillaging the open country, with the villages, and unfortified towns. They even paſſed over into the iſland of Cyprus, and cauſed a general conſternation in Phænicia, Caria, Juda, and Jeruſalem itſelf; inſomuch that the people were every-where buſied in building walls, in preparing arms, and putting themſelves in a poſture of defence: but, upon the approach of winter, they withdrew to their inacceſſible mountains, with an immenſe booty, which they took care to ſhare with Arbazacius [n]. In the weſt, Honorius began his ſixth conſulſhip at Rome, which is the ſubject of the poem that Claudian pronounced on occaſion of that ſolemnity [o].

Moſt of the eaſtern provinces ravaged by Iſaurian robbers.

Honorius his ſixth conſulſhip.

The

[h] Socr. l. v. c. 4. p. 34. & l. vi. c. 4. p. 16. Pallad. vit. Chryſ. [i] Cedr. p. 334. Chron. Alex. p. 714. Cange de Conſtant. l. iv. p 110. [k] Socr. l. viii. c. 25. p. 793. Philoſt. l. xi p 530. [l] Zoſ l. v. p. 802. Chryſ. ep. 120. p. 764. [m] Suid. p. 412. [n] Theod. vit. patr. c. 10, 21. p. 828. 865. Zoſ. p. 802 Pallad. dial. vii. p. 147. Chryſ. ep. xiv. p. 683, 684. [o] Claud. conſ. Hon. 6. p. 191.

The emperor continued at Rome at leaſt till the fifteenth of July, as appears from the dates of his laws. From Rome he returned to Ravenna, and there fixed his reſidence, notwithſtanding the earneſt entreaties of the inhabitants of Milan inviting him back to their city. From this time Ravenna became the ſeat of the weſtern Roman empire; whence the country in which it ſtood was called Romania, which name it ſtill retains (N).

The ſeat of the weſtern empire transferred to Ravenna.

THE next conſuls were Stilicho the ſecond time, and Anthemius, who was ſoon after appointed prefect of the eaſt, and is mightily commended by St. Chryſoſtom [p]. We ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak of him in the reign of Theodoſius

[p] Chryſ. ep. 147. p. 780.

(N) The city of Ravenna is ſaid by ſome to have been founded by the Theſſalians; but Pliny calls it a colony of the Sabines. It was once reckoned amongſt the cities of Umbria; but afterwards became the capital of a particular province, called Flaminia, and belonging to Ciſalpine Gaul, and the vicarſhip of Italy (1). It was incloſed on all ſides, either by the ſea, by an arm of the Po, conveyed thither by Auguſtus, or by marſhes, through which there was but one way, and that very narrow, leading to the city; ſo that it was, in a manner, a peninſula, and acceſſible only on one ſide (2). The ſea waſhed the walls of the city, and formed a ſpacious harbour in which two hundred and fifty ſhips could ride ſafe (3). Auguſtus, and after him ſeveral other emperors, kept conſtantly two fleets for the defence of Italy, one of which was ſtationed at Ravenna on the Adriatic, and the other at Miſenum on the Mediterranean ſea. But Jornandes, who was biſhop of Ravenna about the middle of the ſixth century, tells us, that the harbour was then become a garden, and the city divided into three quarters, or rather cities, of which the higheſt was ealled Ravenna, the ſecond, in which was probably the imperial palace, Cæſarea, and the third Claſſis, becauſe in that place, then diſtant three miles from Ravenna, was formerly the harbour with the fleet (4). A city, thus ſituated amidſt waters and marſhes, could not be healthy; but, on the other ſide, it could not be eaſily attacked, and might with great eaſe be ſuccoured by ſea, affording at the ſame time a ſafe retreat into the eaſt, when it could be no longer maintained. Theſe reaſons, without all doubt, prompted Honorius to fix the ſeat of the empire there, notwithſtanding the preſſing and reiterated remonſtrances of the inhabitants of Milan and Rome.

(1) Vide Ughell p. 319–325. (2) Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 29. p. 652. (3) Idem, ibid. (4) Idem, ibid.

dosius II. This year the Mazichi and Auxoriani, two nations of barbarians inhabiting the country between Cyrenaica and Tripolitana, laid waste great part of Egypt [q]. Arcadius was on the twelfth of June at Nice; on the tenth and twenty-third of July, and twelfth of August, at Ancyra in Galatia, whence he returned in the beginning of autumn to Constantinople [r]. This year Italy was again alarmed with a sudden irruption of barbarians, led by Radagaisus, or Rhodogaisus, as the Greeks style him. He was one of the kings or chiefs of the Goths, a pagan by religion, and a sworn enemy to the Roman name [s]. He is by some writers styled king of the Hunns [t]. He entered Italy, as we have observed above, with Alaric, in the year 400, but returning afterwards beyond the Danube, he assembled an army, consisting, according to Zosimus [u], of four hundred thousand, according to Orosius and Marcellinus [w], of two hundred thousand barbarians, of the various nations dwelling beyond the Danube and the Rhine, who were then all blended under the common name of Goths [x]. The commanders, who were distinguished with the title of lords, amounted, according to Photius a contemporary writer, to the number of twelve hundred [y]. With this formidable host he broke suddenly into Italy, vowing to sacrifice to his gods, says Orosius, all the Roman blood he could shed [z]. The news of his approach threw all Italy, and Rome itself, into the utmost consternation. As Radagaisus was a zealous worshipper of the gods, and sacrificed every morning to Jupiter, the pagans in Rome gave out, that he would, without all doubt, prevail, not so much by his numerous forces, as the protection of the gods, whom the ungrateful Romans had banished from a city, which they had so often defended. Unless the antient religion, said they, be restored, and christianity, the only cause of our calamities, utterly abolished, the city must fall into the hands of the barbarians, who have the gods on their side, whom we have forsaken [a]. With these complaints the whole city was filled, and the name of Christ every-where blasphemed, as the true cause of the present calamities [b]. In the mean time Stilicho, having assembled at Pavia all the Roman forces, amounting to thirty legions, and reinforced them them with great numbers of Goths, Hunns and Alans, under the command of Sarus a Goth, and Uldin king of the Hunns, he left that place, bending his march towards Hetruria, where Radagaiſus was buſied in the ſiege of Florence, which city was already reduced to the utmoſt extremity. As Stilicho came unexpectedly upon the enemy, he immediately ordered the Hunns, and other auxiliaries, to fall upon one of the three bodies into which he found their army divided. His orders were executed, and an hundred thouſand of the enemy cut in pieces, without the loſs of one man on the ſide of the Romans [c]. Thus St Auſtin, Zoſimus and Proſper. Radagaiſus retired with the reſt to the neighbouring mountains of Feſulæ, where he was cloſely beſieged by Stilicho, and reduced, with his numerous army, to ſuch extremity, that he attempted to eſcape ſecretly, and leave his men to the mercy of the Romans; but, as all the paſſes were well guarded, he fell in to Stilicho's hands, and was by his orders put to death ſoon after. His men, finding themſelves abandoned by their leader, and deſtitute of all manner of proviſions, ſubmitted to the Romans in ſuch numbers, that they were ſold like beaſts, in droves, at a crown a head [d]; but, as by the famine that had raged among them while ſhut up in the mountains, they had contracted an ill ſtate of health, they all died in a few days. Oroſius [e] and St. Auſtin [f] aſcribe this victory to a miracle.

Radagaisus enters Italy with a numerous army.

[q] Philost. l xi. c. 8 p. 350, 351: [r] Cod. Theod. chron. p 148. [s] Aug in psal cv. c. 10. p. 547. [t] Prosp. chron. [u] Zos l. v. p. 803. [w] Oros. l. vii. c. 37. p. 222. [x] Zos. Oros ibid. [y] Phot. c. 80. p 180. [z] Oros. ibid. [a] Aug. p. 547. Oros. ibid. [b] Aug de civit. Dei, l. v. c. 23. p. 63.

Which is defeated by Stilicho.

And he himſelf taken priſoner, and put to death.

THE following year Arcadius was conſul the ſixth time, with Anicius Probus, the younger brother of Olybrius and Probinus, conſuls in 395 [g]. A dreadful fire happened this year at Conſtantinople on the twenty-fifth of October [h]; and Paleſtine was infeſted with ſuch multitudes of graſhoppers, as quite darkened the ſky, and turned day into night. St. Jerom, who was then compoſing his comments on the prophet Joel, writes, that, after they had done great miſchief, they were driven by the wind, partly into the Dead ſea, partly into the Mediterranean, and thrown ſoon after on both ſhores in ſuch heaps, that they infected the air, and occaſioned a plague [i]. This year Arcadius enacted, amongſt ſeveral others, a law, dated the twenty-eighth of April, threatening with death, not only the authors of libels, but ſuch as ſhould read ſuch defamatory writings, without tearing or burning them [k].

Paleſtine infeſted with multitudes of graſhoppers.

Honorius

[c] Aug. ibid. Zoſ. p 803. [d] Aug ibid, Oroſ. p. 222. Marc. chron [e] Oroſ. ibid. [f] Aug. civ. dei. p 63. [g] Idat. & Hier. in Am. l. iii. p. 99. [h] Chron. Alex. p. 714. [i] Hier. in Joel. c. 2. p. 60. [k] Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 34. leg. 10. p. 246.

Honorius continued all this year at Ravenna, where he enacted a law dated the ſeventeenth of April, encouraging all perſons, whether free-men or ſlaves, to take arms in defence of their country, and promiſing to the latter their liberty, to the former three pieces of gold to be paid immediately, and ſeven more after the war [l]. This law was, without all doubt, occaſioned by the motions of the northern nations, who, on the laſt day of this year 406, entered Gaul, and fixing their abode there, gave beginning to the utter ruin of the Roman empire in the weſt. Oroſius, Marcellinus, Tyro Proſper, and St. Jerom, aſſure us, that they were ſtirred up, and invited into Gaul by Stilicho, who even ſupplied them with large ſums, hoping, by their means, to raiſe his ſon Eucherius to the empire [m]. The barbarians who, at his inſtigation, broke into Gaul this year, were the Alans, the Vandals, and the Suevians. The Vandals, in attempting to croſs the Rhine, were attacked by the Franks, who cut twenty thouſand of them in pieces, with their king Godigiſcles, and would have put them all to the ſword, had not the Alans and Suevians, haſtening to their aſſiſtance, obliged the Franks to retire. Upon their retreat, the barbarians paſſed the Rhine without oppoſition, and entered Gaul. Thus Gregory of Tours, upon the authority of an antient writer named Renatus Profuturus Frigeridus [n]. The Vandals appointed Gonderic or Gontharius, the ſon of Godigiſcles, king in his room. The following year, when Honorius was conſul the ſeventh time, and Theodoſius the ſecond, the eaſtern empire enjoyed a profound tranquillity; but in the weſt the Vandals, Alans and Suevians, committed dreadful ravages in Gaul, where they were joined by the Burgundians, and many other nations, ſtirred up, ſays Oroſius [p], by Stilicho. The firſt city that felt their fury was Mentz, which they took by ſtorm, and levelled with the ground, after having inhumanly maſſacred many thouſands of the inhabitants in the churches, to which they had fled for refuge. Worms held out for a conſiderable time; but was in the end taken, and laid in aſhes. Strafbourg and Spires underwent the ſame fate. Thence they marched to Rheims, to Tournay, to Amiens, to Arras, made themſelves maſters of all Aquitain, Gaſcony, the provinces of Lions and Narbonne, and extended their ravages ravages from the Alps to the ocean, the governors of the provinces having no troops to oppoſe them [q]; for Stilicho had withdrawn, as we have related above, the forces that guarded the banks of the Rhine, on occaſion of the war with Alaric. The whole country, ſays St. Jerom, writing about this time, between the Alps and the Pyrenees, between the Rhine and the ocean, is over-run and pillaged by the Quadi, the Vandals, the Sarmatians, the Alans, the Gepidæ, the Heruli, the Saxons, the Burgundians, and the Alemans [r]. In the mean time the Roman troops quartered in Britain, apprehending the barbarians would, after the entire reduction of Gaul, croſs the ſea, and jointly with the Scots and Iriſh, fall upon them, and expecting no aſſiſtance from Honorius, reſolved to ſet up an emperor of their own; and accordingly conferred that dignity on one Mark, whom after a few days they murdered, upon ſome diſlike, and placed Gratian, a native of Britain, in his room [s]. Gratian, after a ſhort reign of four months, underwent the ſame fate, and was ſucceeded by Conſtantine, a common ſoldier, who was choſen merely for the ſake of his name, which was common to him with Conſtantine the great, who being advanced to the imperial dignity in Britain, had made himſelf maſter of the whole empire, and governed it with great proſperity and ſucceſs [t]. The new prince, immediately after his promotion, paſſed over into Gaul, taking with him all the Roman forces quartered in the iſland, and the flower of the Britiſh youth; by which means the country, thus left quite naked and defenceleſs, was not long after obliged to ſubmit to the yoke of new lords. Conſtantine landed at Bologne, and continued there, till he was joined by the Roman troops, who were diſperſed up and down Gaul, and who choſe rather to ſubmit to him, than to the barbarians. Hereupon Limenius, prefect of Gaul, and Cariobaudes, commander of the Roman forces, fled into Italy, leaving the barbarians to waſte the country on one ſide, and Conſtantine to purſue his ſucceſs on the other [u]. Honorius, who was at Rome when news of this revolt was brought him, immediately diſpatched an expreſs to Stilicho then at Ravenna, who haſtening to Rome, ordered Sarus, by nation a Goth, but an officer of known valour, bold an enterpriſing, to march with a ſufficient force into Gaul, and make head againſt the uſurper. Sarus was met on the frontiers of Gaul by Juſtin, one of Conſtantine's commanders, whom he eaſily defeated and killed, after having put to the ſword the greateſt part of his forces. He then led his men, encouraged with this ſucceſs, to beſiege Valence in Dauphiny, whither the uſurper had retired. Upon his approach, Conſtantine ſent Neobigaſtes, another of his generals, to treat with him of an accommodation; but him Sarus cauſed to be murdered, contrary to the law of nations, and the aſſurances he had given him [w]; but Conſtantine having placed, in the room of the two generals he had loſt, Edobincus and Gerontius, the former a Gaul, the latter of Britain, Sarus, ſays Zoſimus with little appearance of truth, dreading their courage and experience, raiſed the ſiege of Valence, and retired in great haſte. Conſtantine's army purſued him to the Alps, over which he was obliged to purchaſe a paſſage of the Bagaudæ, by quitting to them all his booty [x]. However that be, it is certain, that Sarus raiſed the ſiege, and repaſſing the Alps with his army, returned to Italy, Upon his retreat, Conſtantine fixed his reſidence at Arles [y], over-came the barbarians in ſeveral battles, and in the end forced them to ſue for peace; which he granted, without obliging them to quit Gaul, probably becauſe he deſigned to maintain himſelf by their means in his uſurped power [z]. Theſe diſturbances did not prevent Honorius from enacting this year ſevere laws againſt the Donatiſts, Manichees, Phrygians, Priſcillianiſts, and all ſectaries in general [a].

The Alans, the Vandals, and Suevians, break into Gaul.

And take ſeveral cities.

[l] Nem. l. vii. tit. 13 leg. 16, 17. p. 387, 388. [m] Oroſ. ibid. Ener ep. 11 p. 93. Mar. Proſp. in caron. [n] Greg. Tur. Hiſt. Franc. l. ii. c. 9 p. 62. [o] Idem ibid. & Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 3. p. 134. [p] Oroſ. ibid.

The Romans in Britain revolt, and ſet up Conſtantine for emperor.

Who paſſes over into Gaul, which ſubmits to him.

[q] Hier. ep. 11. p. 95 [r] Idem ibid. [s] Soz. l. ix. c. 11. p. 813. Phot. c. 80. p. 180 [t] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 40. p. 223 Bed. hiſt. gent. Aug. l. i. c. 10. p. 12. Soz. Zoſ. ibid. [u] Oroſ. Soz. Zoſ. ibid. Phot. p. 181.

His army defeated by Sarus, and he himſelf beſieged in Valence.

The ſiege raiſed.

Conſtantine maſter of all Gaul.

THE following year 408, when Anicius Baſſus and Flavius Philippus were conſuls, is remarkable for many memorable events. In the eaſt died at Conſtantinople, on the firſt of May, the emperor Arcadius, after having lived thirty-one years, and reigned twelve years with his father, and fourteen after his death [b], or rather thirteen years, three months, and fourteen days. He was buried near the empreſs Eudoxia, in the church of the Apoſtles [c], where their tombs of porphyry were to be ſeen ſeveral ages after [d]. He left behind him but one ſon, viz. Theodoſius, then eight years old, but juſt weaned, ſays Sozomen [e]. We ſhall examine elſewhere Arcadius dies.

His iſſue.

[w] Zoſ. p 803, 804. Phot. p. 181. Oroſ. p. 223. Soz. ibid. [x] Zoſ. p. 824. [y] Idem. p 807. [z] Oroſ l. vii. c. 40. p. 223. [a] Cod. Theod. l xvi. tit. 5. leg. 40. p. 160. leg. 48. p. 168, 169. leg. 41. p. 160, &c. [b] Theod. l. ii. p. 568. Socr. l. vi. c. 23. p. 332. [c] Theod. ibid. [d] Cange de Conſt. l. iv. p. 110. [e] Soz. l. ix. c. 1. p. 799. Chron. Alex p. 712.

where what we read in Procopius, viz. that Arcadius by his laſt will appointed Iſdegerdes, king of Perſia, guardian to the young prince. We have obſerved in the hiſtory of his reign, that he had four daughters, Flaccilla, Pulcheria, Arcadia, and Marina: Flaccilla is never mentioned by hiſtorians but on occaſion of her birth; whence we may conclude, that ſhe died ſoon after. The other three embraced the ſtate of virginity, and led exemplary lives [f]. They were all ſtyled queens, as appears from the councils [g]; but only by courteſy; for, excepting Pulcheria, who was declared Auguſta in 414, they had no other title but that of moſt noble. Arcadia and Marina built a palace at Conſtantinople, which for many ages retained their name. The former built likewiſe a church in honour of St. Andrew, which was many ages after, when become a monaſtery, re-built by Theodora, the niece of Michael Paleologus [h]. Arcadia died in 444, and Marina on the third of Auguſt 449 [i]. Arcadius himſelf was a prince naturally inclined to virtue, and an enemy to vice, but of very ſlender parts, and therefore entirely governed, and ſhamefully impoſed upon, by his miniſters, and the empreſs, who abuſed his authority to oppreſs the people in a moſt deſpotic and tyrannical manner. To return to the weſt: Conſtantine, having reduced all Gaul to his obedience, ſent a body of troops into Spain, in order to oppoſe Didymius, and Verianus or Verinianus, who having aſſembled the few troops that were quartered in that province, and reinforced them with ſuch ſlaves and peaſants as were willing to take arms, had ſeized on the paſſes of the Pyrenees. Didymius and Verinianus were brothers, natives of Spain, and nearly allied to Honorius, for whom they openly declared, while moſt of the cities of that province were ready to revolt from him, and ſubmit to the uſurper [k]. The troops that were firſt ſent againſt them not being able to open themſelves a paſſage through the Pyrenees, which were carefully guarded by the two brothers, Conſtantine obliged his eldeſt ſon, by name Conſtans, who profeſſed a monaſtic life, to quit his retirement, created him Cæſar, and diſpatched him with the flower of his army, commanded by Gerontius, an experienced officer, into Spain. Didymius and Verinianus defended the paſſes for ſome time with great reſolution and intrepidity; but being overpowered with numbers, were in the end obliged to retire. Conſtans purſued them cloſe; and coming up with them in Luſitania, now Portugal, cut moſt of their men in pieces, and took both them and their wives priſoners. Upon the news of their defeat and captivity, their brothers Theodoſius or Theodoſiolus, and Lagodus, who had taken arms in another province, abandoned Spain to the uſurper, and retired, the former to the court of Honorius, and the latter to that of Theodoſius, who had ſucceeded his father Arcadius in the empire of the eaſt [l]. Conſtans, having thus reduced all Spain, and appointed Gerontius to command the army and guard the Pyrenees, returned to Gaul, where he preſented the two illuſtrious captives to his father, who immediately ordered them to be privately put to death. To reward his ſon for his eminent ſervices, he created him Auguſtus, honouring him, ſays Zoſimus [m], with a diadem. At the ſame time he ſent a ſolemn deputation to Honorius, excuſing his revolt, as if he had been forced by the ſoldiery to accept of the ſovereignty, and demanding to be acknowledged by him as his partner in the empire. Honorius, not finding himſelf in a condition to make war upon the uſurper, thought it adviſable to comply with his requeſt; and accordingly ſent him the imperial purple, honouring him, at the ſame time, with the title of Auguſtus [n]. Italy was at this time threatened with a new invaſion of the barbarians, under the conduct of the famous Alaric, who, at the inſtigation of Stilicho, leaving Pannonia and Dalmatia, where lands had been granted to him and his Goths, paſſed unexpectedly the Alps, and breaking into Noricum, threatened to invade Italy, and lay all waſte before him, unleſs a certain ſum, which he pretended to be due to him and his troops, were immediately ſent him. Upon this demand, Honorius, who was then at Rome, aſſembled the ſenate, when ſeveral ſenators of great diſtinction were for rejecting his demand, and marching the army without delay againſt him, urging, that to comply with an arrogant and unreaſonable demand was not buying a peace, but ſigning a contract of perpetual ſlavery. However Stilicho, who maintained a private correſpondence with Alaric and his party, pleading with great warmth in his favour, as if the money he demanded were really due, it was agreed, that four thouſand pounds weight of gold ſhould be ſent him.

His character.

Conſtans, the ſon of Conſtantine, declared Cæſar.

[f] Soz. ix. c. 5. p. 804. [g] Concil. tom. iii. p. 105. [h] Cange. ibid. l. iv. p. 111, 112. [i] Man. chron. & chron. Al. p. 734. [k] Zoſ. l. vi. p. 826. Oroſ. l. vi. c. 40. p. 223. Soz. l. ix. c. 11. p. 813. Phot. p. 184.

He reduces Spain, and is declared Auguſtus.

Honorius acknowledges Conſtantine for his colleague.

Alaric threatens Italy.

Lampadius,

[l] Zoſ. p. 830. Soz. Phot. Oroſ. ibid. Greg. Tur. hiſt. Fr. l. ii. c. 9. p. 62. [m] Zoſ. ibid. [n] Idem, p. 831. Phot. p. 180. Greg. Tur. ibid.

Lampadius, who had with great liberty of ſpeech oppoſed this motion, and by that means incurred the diſpleaſure of Stilicho, as ſoon as the ſenate broke up, took ſanctuary in a neighbouring church °. A few days after Honorius, leaving Rome, ſet out for Bononia; whence, after a ſhort ſtay, he removed to Ticinum, now Pavia, attended by one Olympius, who, by an outward ſhew of chriſtian piety, ſays Zoſimus, had gained the confidence of the emperor, and was by him employed about his perſon. As every one was now well appriſed of the wicked deſigns of Stilicho, Olympius, thought himſelf obliged to diſcloſe them to the emperor, which he did accordingly on the road from Bologna to Pavia, and ſo thoroughly convinced him of the treachery of his miniſter, that the prince, awaked, as it were, out of a deep lethargy, no ſooner arrived at Pavia, than he diſpatched an expreſs to Ravenna, where Stilicho then was, with two different orders, the one commanding him to be ſecured, and the other to be put to death. Upon the arrival of the meſſenger, Stilicho took ſanctuary in a church; but the next day, being, in the preſence of the biſhop, aſſured by the ſoldiers upon oath, that they had orders only to arreſt him, he left his aſylum, and delivered himſelf into their hands; which he had ſcarce done, when the meſſenger produced the warrant for his death; whereupon he was beheaded the ſame day, the twenty-third of Auguſt of the preſent year 408 P. It was no ſooner known at Pavia, that the emperor had ordered him to be arreſted, than the army encamped there, encouraged by Olympius, ſays Zoſimus q, flew to arms, and in a tumultuous manner ſlew all thoſe who were known to be well-affected to the diſgraced general, and amongſt the reſt Limenius, prefect of Gaul, Chariobaudes, commander of the troops in the ſame province, who had both been lately driven out of that province by Conſtantine, Longinianus, formerly prefect of Italy, Vincentius, general of the horſe, Salvius and Petronius, the one comes domeſticorum, the other comes largitionum, another Salvius, who was quæſtor, Nemorius, then magiſter officiorum, and many other perſons of great diſtinction r. All authors, except Zoſimus and the poet Claudian, agree, that he was guilty of the crimes laid to his charge, viz. that he maintained a private correſpondence with Alaric; that he invited the barbarians into Stilicho diſgraced, and put to death.

Several of his friends put to death by the army.

Stilicho ſuppoſed by ſome guilty, others innocent.

° Zoſ. p. 805. Philoſt. l. xii c. 2. p. 522. Rutil l. ii. p. 142.
P Zoſ. p. 810 Soz. l. ix. c 4. p. 806. Oroſ. l. vii. c. 38. p. 222
q Zoſ p 808, 809. r Zoſ Socr. Oroſ ibid.

into Gaul, hoping the emperor would reward his eminent ſervices, after he had driven them out, with aſſuming him for his collegue; that he had formed a deſign of murdering the two princes Honorius and Theodoſius, and ſeizing on both empires for himſelf; that by a potion given to Honorius he prevented his having any iſſue, &c. But Zoſimus pretends theſe crimes to have been all feigned by his enemies, in order to prejudice Honorius againſt him, and procure his ruin, to which the credulous prince in the end conſented. The ſame writer adds, that, after his death, ſeveral of his friends were cruelly tortured, and amongſt the reſt Deuterus, the emperor's great chamberlain, and Peter his chief ſecretary, who died on the rack without owning any of the ſeveral charges that were brought againſt him or them as privy to his wicked deſigns [s]. Stilicho profeſſed the chriſtian religion; but his ſon Eucherius was not only a pagan, but a profeſſed enemy to the chriſtians; nay, he uſed to brag amongſt the pagans, ſays Oroſius, who wrote about that time, that if he ever attained the empire, he would ſignalize the beginning of his reign with the reeſtabliſhment of the pagan, and utter extirpation of the chriſtian, ceremonies [t]. If what that author writes be true, the partiality which Zoſimus, a zealous patron of paganiſm, ſhews for Stilicho and Eucherius, may be eaſily accounted for. The emperor had married in the beginning of this year Thermantia, Stilicho's ſecond daughter, Maria, his eldeſt daughter, whom Honorius had married in 398, being dead ſome years before [u]; perhaps when the emperor was at Rome, in 404, for her body was diſcovered in the Vatican church on the fourth of February 1544, with ſeveral things of great value; her body, when expoſed to the air, mouldered away; but the gold of her garments remaining, when the reſt fell to aſhes, weighed thirty-ſix pounds [w]. Honorius married Thermantia at Rome, where the match was concluded by Serena, alledging, ſays Zoſimus, to her huſband Stilicho, who was averſe to it as inceſtuous, that the other ſiſter died a virgin [x]. Upon the death of Stilicho, Honorius divorced his daughter, and ſent her back untouched to her mother Serena [y]. Zoſimus writes, that ſhe died ſoon after; but, according to the chronicle of Alexandria,

Honorius divorces his daughter Thermantia.

[s] Zoſ. p 811, 819. [t] Oroſ. p. 222. [u] Zoſ. p. 804. Phot. c. 80. p. 177. [w] Anaſt. Childerici, p. 53. Aringhii Rom. ſubterr. l. ii. c 9. p. 173. Mabill. iter. Italic. p. 145. [x] Zoſ p. 804. [y] Idem, p. 811, 804.

dria, news of her death was brought to Conſtantinople on Friday the thirtieth of July 415 [z]. Her body too was found in the Vatican in 1543, adorned with the imperial robes, and all the enſigns of majeſty [a]. As for Eucherius, when he heard the news of his father's death, he fled to a church for protection; but being dragged from thence by the emperor's orders, he was ſent under a ſtrong guard to Rome, and there executed [b]. Thus were the empire, ſays Oroſius [c], and the church, by the death of a few perſons, delivered, from the wicked attempts of their enemies. However, we could wiſh for the reputation of Honorius, a pious and well-meaning prince, that the pretended criminals had been tried in due form; for ſuch as ſuffer without being heard, have a right to be deemed innocent. All the eccleſiaſtic writers ſuppoſe Stilicho to have been guilty; but the crimes laid to his charge were never proved either in his life-time, or after his death; and hence Zoſimus looks upon them as falſe imputations and groundleſs ſuſpicions. Stilicho's eſtate was confiſcated, and likewiſe the eſtates of all his avowed partizans, and of ſuch as had been preferred by him for money [d], and Heliocrates was ſent to Rome to ſeize them which; commiſſion he diſcharged with great humanity and good-nature, warning underhand thoſe who were the leaſt guilty to remove their effects out of the way: but his moderation coſt him dear; for he was not only deprived of his commiſſion, but ſent in bonds to Ravenna, and would have been put to death, had he not found means to eſcape out of priſon, and ſave himſelf in a church [e]. Such was the end of Stilicho, after he had commanded in chief the Roman armies for the ſpace of twenty-three years. He was no doubt a perſon of extraordinary qualities, a great ſtateſman, a valiant ſoldier, and experienced officer. He gained ſuch an aſcendant over Honorius, who was blindly guided by his counſels, that, till the time of his diſgrace, he governed with a more abſolute ſway, than the emperor himſelf. Zoſimus, however partial to his memory, accuſes him of rapine and oppreſſion, of great partiality in the adminiſtration of juſtice, and of conveying by degrees into his own coffers the whole wealth of the empire [f]. Stilicho was ſucceeded in the adminiſtration by Olympius, the chief author of his ruin. He was a native of the country

Eucherius, his ſon, executed.

Stilicho's eſtate confiſcated.

His character.

Olympius prime miniſter.

[z] Chron. Al. p. 716. [a] Aringh. Mabill. ibid. [b] Philoſ. l. xii. c. 3. p. 523. Zoſ p. 813. [c] Oroſ. p. 222. [d] Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 40. leg. 20. p. 319. [e] Zoſ. p. 811, 819. [f] Idem, p 780, 789.

try bordering on the Euxine ſea, and not only profeſſed the chriſtian religion, but outwardly affected an extraordinary piety, ſays Zoſimus [g], inſinuating thereby, that his piety was counterfeit: but St. Auſtin entertained a very favourable opinion of him, as appears from the commendations he beſtows upon him [h]; as did likewiſe Symmachus, tho' a zealous pagan [i]. Olympiodorus writes, that he owed his firſt preferment to Stilicho, who recommended him to Honorius [k]; which would render the return he made that miniſter highly criminal, if he had any thing in view but the public welfare. He had in Stilicho's life-time a conſiderable employment at court, and was after his death raiſed to the poſt of magiſter officiorum, or ſteward of the emperor's houſhould, one of the greateſt employments in the ſtate [l]. Soon after his promotion, he wrote to St. Auſtin, deſiring that zealous prelate to ſuggeſt to him from time to time what he thought would conduce to the good of the church [m]. In the very beginning of his adminiſtration, he cauſed ſeveral laws to be enacted againſt the pagans, Jews, and heretics, eſpecially the Donatiſts in Africa [n]. By a law dated the fourteenth of November, all thoſe who were not of the catholic communion, or did not conform to the religion of the prince, were excluded from all employments at court [o]. When this law was enacted, one of the chiefs of the barbarians in the Roman ſervice, reſigned his command; and his example, if Zoſimus is to be credited [p], was followed by many others, who were either pagans or Arians. Amongſt the ſeveral laws of this year, relating both to civil and eccleſiaſtical matters, one was enacted forbiding all perſons of quality to trade, not that trade was by any means looked upon as degrading, but becauſe others, in dealing with men of power and authority, were liable to be injured by them without redreſs [q].

He favours the church.

The wives and children of the barbarians in the Roman ſervice murdered.

WHEN the Roman ſoldiers, quartered in the cities of Italy, heard of Stilicho's death, they flew to arms, and, out of hatred to him, inhumanly murdered the wives and children of the barbariuns, whom he had taken into the ſervice, and whom they on that account looked upon as privy to his wicked deſigns, and public enemies. The barbariuns, highly provoked provoked at this unheard-of cruelty, vowed revenge; and quitting the emperor's ſervice, retired, to the number of thirty thouſand and upwards, to Alaric, who, tho' thus reinforced, ſent deputies to Honorius, offering to conclude a laſting peace with him, and never more to diſturb the tranquillity of the empire, provided he would ſend him a ſufficient ſum to pay his army their arrears [s]. Honorius refuſing to comply with his demand, he diſpatched an expreſs to Athulphus or Athaulphus, his brother-in-law, who was quartered on the frontiers of Pannonia, ordering him to haſten with his troops, conſiſting of Goths and Hunns, into Italy. In the mean time, Alaric himſelf advancing with long marches from Noricum to the Po, croſſed that river without oppoſition; and paſſing in ſight of Ravenna, where the emperor then was, purſued his march almoſt without halting till he arrived at Rome, which he immediately inveſted, blocking up all the roads and avenues leading to it, and placing guards at the mouth and on the banks of the Tiber, to prevent the inhabitants from receiving any ſupplies or proviſions by water [t]. By this means the city, which was crouded with people, was ſoon reduced to great diſtreſs: a famine began to rage, which was attended with a plague, ariſing from the great number of dead bodies that lay in the ſtreets unburied [u]. Olympiodorus writes, that the unhappy citizens were reduced to the fatal neceſſity of feeding upon human fleſh, and devouring each other [w]; and Zoſimus, that they were almoſt brought to that extremity [x]. During this calamity, the pagans, and among the reſt Pompeianus, prefect of the city, began to cry aloud, that recourſe ought to be had to the gods of their anceſtors, who had ſo often relieved the city, and delivered it from the greateſt dangers. Zoſimus adds, that Innocent, at that time biſhop of Rome, conſented to their offering ſacrifices to the gods, provided it were done privately; but that they were, notwithſtanding his conſent, afraid to perform the ceremony [y]. Sozomen writes, that at the inſtigation of ſome Hetruſcan aruſpices, they actually revived the antient ſacrifices; which were ſo far from relieving the city, that thenceforth it laboured under greater difficulties than ever [z]. Be that as it will, the unhpapy citizens were in the end obliged to ſend out deputies to treat with Alaric. Theſe

[g] Idem, p. 810, 811. [h] Aug. ep. cxxiv, cxxix. p. 242, 245. [i] Symm. l. ix. ep. 60. p. 362. [k] Phot. c. 80. p. 177. [l] Zoſ. p. 808. [m] Aug. ep. cxxix. p. 245. [n] Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 44 p. 165. [o] Idem ibid. leg. 42 p. 163. [p] Zoſ. l. v. p. [illegible]. [q] Cod. Juſt. l. iv. tit. 63. leg. 3. p. 395

The barbarians join Alaric, who enters Italy, and beſieges Rome.

Which is reduced to great ſtraights.

[s] Zoſ. l. v. p. 811. [t] Idem, p. 814, 815. Soz. l. ix. c. 6. p. 807. [u] Soz. l. ix. c. 6 p. 807. Aug. ep. cxxxiii. p. 248. [w] Phot. p. 180. [x] Zoſ. p. 815. [y] Idem, p. 816. [z] Soz. p. 807, 808.

Theſe were Baſilius, who had been prefect of Rome in 395, and John, the emperor's firſt ſecretary. Alaric hearkened to their propoſals, and agreed to raiſe the ſiege, and ever after continue faithful to the Romans, upon their delivering up hoſtages, and paying to him five thouſand pounds weight of gold, thirty thouſand of ſilver, four thouſand ſilk garments, three thouſand ſkins of purple dye, and as many pounds of pepper [a]. For the raiſing of the required ſum, the ſenators were taxed according to their eſtates; but as they had not ſo much ready money by them, that wicked genius, ſays Zoſimus [b], which then governed the affairs of mankind, prompted thoſe, who were concerned in levying the ſaid ſum, to the height of iniquity; for, to make good the deficiency, they had recourſe to the ornaments of the temples and images of the gods: ſome of the latter, that were of gold or ſilver, they melted down, and among the reſt that of Valour, which being deſtroyed, the antient Roman valour was utterly extinguiſhed, as had been foretold by perſons ſkilled in divine matters, and well verſed in the rites and ceremonies of their country. The treaty was ratified by Honorius, and the ſum thus raiſed ſent to Alaric, who thereupon raiſed the ſiege, and retired with his army into Hetruria [c]. When he firſt appeared before Rome, the ſenate, with the conſent and approbation of Placidia, the emperor's ſiſter, then in the city, cauſed Serena, the widow of Stilicho, to be put to death, upon a falſe ſuppoſition, ſays Zoſimus, of her privately correſponding with the enemy [d]. Læta, the widow of the emperor Gratian, and her mother Piſſamene, ſignalized their good nature during the ſiege, relieving with great generoſity, as Zoſimus himſelf owns [e], the famiſhed citizens.

And complies with the demands of Alaric.

The ſiege raiſed.

Serena, the widow of Stilicho, put to death.

WHILE the weſtern empire was thus miſerably haraſſed by the barbarians, and rent into two empires by the uſurpation of Conſtantine, whom Honorius had been obliged to acknowledge for his partner in the ſovereignity, a profound peace reigned over all the provinces ſubject to young Theodoſius, though not yet eight years old. They were chiefly indebted for the happineſs they enjoyed to Anthemius, who taking upon him the adminiſtration, diſcharged the office of prime miniſter with an integrity hardly to be matched in hiſtory. He was grandſon to Philippus, who had been prefect of the eaſt eaſt under Conſtantius, which office Anthemius himſelf diſcharged from the year 405, to 414 [h]. Ammianus Marcellinus mentions one Simplicius, the ſon of Anthemius the elder, and probably the father of Anthemius the younger, who was diſgraced in 359 [i]. The latter was magiſter officiorum before the year 404, embaſſador to the king of Perſia before the year 405 [k], conſul in that year, and ſoon after præfectus prætorio [l]. He had at leaſt one daughter, who was married to Procopius, by whom ſhe had Anthemius, advanced to the empire in 465 [m]. Anthemius, who governed the eaſtern empire during the minority of Theodoſius, is commended by all the writers of thoſe times as an experienced commander, an able ſtateſman, a zealous chriſtian, and one who had nothing ſo much at heart as the glory of his prince and the happineſs of the people [n]. He was, ſays Syneſius, who conſtantly ſtyles him the great Anthemius, in my opinion, and in that of all men the greateſt, the beſt, the moſt virtuous, diſintereſted, and well-meaning miniſter, that ever governed a ſtate [o]. Procopius writes, that Arcadius, either diſtruſting his brother Honorius, or appriſed that the diſtracted ſtate of his own affairs would divert him from minding thoſe of the eaſt, begged in his will Iſdegerdes, king of Perſia, with whom he had entered into a ſtrict alliance, to take upon him the care and tuition of the young prince: the ſame writer adds, that Iſdegerdes, who was a prince of great generoſity, ſent embaſſadors to acquaint the ſenate of Conſtantinople, that he accepted the charge, and was reſolved to make war upon ſuch as ſhould preſume to raiſe diſturbances in the ſtate [p]. Theophanes, who wrote after Procopius, and has borrowed from him the greateſt part of his hiſtory, adds, that Iſdegerdes, not being at leiſure to attend the adminiſtration in perſon, ſent Antiochus to Conſtantinople in his room, a perſon of extraordinary abilities, and of an unblemiſhed character, who diſcharged the truſt repoſed in him with the greateſt integrity till the year 414, when Pulcheria taking upon her the adminiſtration, he was deprived of his authority, and even of his life [q]. Zonaras follows Procopius and Theophanes [r], as does likewiſe Cedrenus [s]. It is ſurpriſing, that ſuch an event, one H's character.

The happy adminiſtration of Anthemius in the eaſt.

[a] Zoſ. p. 815—818. [b] Idem, ibid. [c] Zoſ ibid. Soz. p. 808, Hier. ep. xi. xvi. p. 93, 121. [d] Idem. p. 114, 115. [e] Idem ibid.

Whether Iſdegerdes, king of Perſia, was appointed guardian to the young prince.

[h] Socr. l. vii. c. 1. p. 334. [i] Ammian. l. ix. p. 151. [k] Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 349. [l] Theod. c. 8. p. 813. [m] Sid. car. ii. p. 291, 292. [n] Chryſ. p. 780. Socr. Syn. ep. lxxv. p. 220. [o] Syn. car p. 299 & ep. lxxii. p. 220, 221. [p] Procop bell Perſ. l. i c. 2. p. 7. [q] Theoph p. 69. [r] Zonar. p. 43. [s] Cedren. p. 334.

one of the moſt remarkable in hiſtory, ſhould by no hiſtorian be taken notice of before Procopius, who wrote an hundred and fifty years after, and is often guilty of no ſmall miſtakes, being miſled by popular and ill-grounded traditions, among which we may reckon this ſuppoſed laſt will of Arcadius; for Agathias tells us, that it was the common talk, having been handed down by tradition from father to ſon; but that he found it vouched by no writer, except Procopius, not even by thoſe who had given a particular account of the death of Arcadius [t]. And truly Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Zoſimus, Philoſtorgius, both Proſpers, and Marcellinus, take not the leaſt notice of this memorable tranſaction. Iſidore of Peluſium and Syneſius[u] mention an eunuch, by name Antiochus, who paſſing from the ſervice of a Perſian lord, named Narſes, to that of Theodoſius II. became preceptor to the young prince; which perhaps gave riſe to the above-mentioned tradition. This year the Hunns and Squiri, or Scyri, a northern nation, broke ſuddenly into Thrace, under the conduct of Uldin, of whom we have made mention above; but ſome of their officers abandoning them to join the Romans, they retired with great precipitation: however, the emperor's troops, coming up with the Squiri before they could reach the Danube, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and took the reſt priſoners. By this overthrow, that nation was almoſt utterly extirpated [w].

The Hunns and the Squiri break into Thrace; but the latter are almoſt entirely cut off.

THE next conſuls were Honorius, the eighth time, and Theodoſius, the third. In Gaul, Conſtantine, who reigned there, cauſed himſelf to be acknowledged conſul in the room of Theodoſius [x]. As Honorius, under various pretences, declined delivering up to Alaric the promiſed hoſtages, and executing ſome other articles of the treaty not mentioned by hiſtorians, the ſenate ſent Attalus, Cæcilianus, and Maximianus or Maximilianus, to repreſent to him in their name the evils that might thence accrue to the empire, eſpecially to the capital. But their remonſtrances were utterly diſregarded by the emperor, miſled, ſays Zoſimus, by Olympius and Alaric's enemies at court [y]. However, he raiſed Attalus to the poſt of comes largitionum, and Cæcilianus to that of præfectus prætorio [z]. In the mean time, Alaric, provoked at the emperor's backwardneſs in complying with the articles of the late treaty, left Hetruria, and approaching Rome, blocked blocked it up a ſecond time, his army being reinforced with forty thouſand ſlaves, who had made their eſcape out of the city [a]. Honorius ſent ſix thouſand choſen troops to the defence of the city; but they were intercepted by Alaric's parties, and all either cut off, or taken priſoners, except Valens, their commander, Attalus, and about an hundred more, who with much ado got into Rome [b]. Maximilianus, one of the priſoners, was ranſomed by his father with thirty thouſand pieces of gold. Zoſimus writes, that the ſix thouſand men ſent by Honorius to defend the city, made up five legions [c]; ſo that a legion at this time conſiſted but of twelve hundred men. In the mean time, Ataulphus, whom Alaric had ſent for, as we have obſerved above, was advancing to join him; and had already paſſed the Julian Alps, and entered the province of Venetia, when Honorius diſpatched againſt him all the forces quartered in the neighbouring towns, who cut in pieces eleven hundred of his men, with the loſs only of fifteen; but notwithſtanding this check, Ataulphus purſued his march, and joined Alaric [d]. About this time, Olympius, the prime miniſter, was diſgraced, deveſted of all his honours, and diſcharged, the eunuchs of the court blaming him to the emperor as the author of the preſent calamities. He was ſucceeded by Jovius, then prefect of Italy, a perſon highly commended by Zoſimus [e], which gives us room to believe him to have been a pagan; for he is ſcarce ever ſo laviſh of his praiſes on thoſe who profeſſed the chriſtian religion. With Olympius ſeveral other officers were changed. Attalus was made prefect of Rome, and Demetrius comes largitionum, or treaſurer, in his place. The ſoldiers, mutinying at Ravenna, demanded the heads of the two generals Turpilio and Vigilantius, and likewiſe of Terentius and Arſacius, the emperor's two firſt chamberlains. Hereupon the timorous prince, at the inſtigation of Jovius, perhaps the author of the tumult, ordered the two generals to be conveyed on board a veſſel, in order to be ſent into exile; but the ſoldiers, who were charged to conduct them, put them both to death. Terentius was baniſhed into the eaſt, and Arſacius confined to the city of Milan [f]. Euſebius was made great chamberlain in the room of Terentius; Valens ſucceeded Turpilio in the poſt of general of the horſe; and the office of comes domeſticorum, held by Vigilantius, Ataulphus enters Italy.

Alaric returns before Rome.

[t] Agath. l. iv. p. 137. [u] Iſidor. Pel. l. i. ep. 39. p. 11. Syn. p. 84. [w] Soz. l. ix. c. 6. p. 807, 809. [x] Gruter. p. 295. [y] Zoſ. l. v. p. 817—819. [z] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 153.

Olympius diſgraced.

The generals Turpilio and Vigilantius put to death.

was

[a] Zoſ. p. 819. [b] Idem. ibid. [c] Idem. ibid. [d] Idem, p. 820. [e] Idem, p. 824. [f] Idem, p. 820, 821.

was given to Ellebichus or Allobichus. Theſe were all creatures of Jovius, whoſe authority was thus thoroughly eſtabliſhed [g]. At the ſame time, Generides, by birth a barbarian, was appointed general of the troops quartered in Rhœtia, Noricum, Dalmatia, and Pannonia; which countries he protected with great fidelity againſt the barbarians, who attempted to invade them. Zoſimus writes, that he was a pagan, and that for his ſake Honorius revoked the law excluding the pagans from all employments [h]. The ſame law was revoked with reſpect to heretics, eſpecially the Donatiſts, to whom ſome churches were reſtored, which had been formerly taken from them, the emperor following therein the advice of Jovius, of Heraclianus, count of Africa, and of Macrobius, the author of the Saturnalia, as is commonly believed, at that time proconſul of Africa [i].

ALARIC being returned before Rome, as we have obſerved above, the ſenate ſent a ſecond deputation to the emperor, preſſing him to execute the articles of a treaty, which he himſelf had ratified. Alaric approved of this ſtep, and appointed a body of Goths to eſcort the deputies, among whom was Innocent, biſhop of the city. At the ſame time, Alaric, by the advice of Jovius, with whom he had been intimately acquainted in Epirus, advanced with part of his army to Ariminum or Rimini, that he might be nearer at hand to treat with the emperor, then at Ravenna. Jovius himſelf met him at Rimini; and, after ſome conferences with him, wrote to court, adviſing the emperor to comply with the articles formerly agreed to; or if he thought them unreaſonable, to ſatisfy Alaric by preferring him to the poſt of commander in chief of all the Roman forces. To this letter the emperor anſwered, that he was reſolved never to prefer Alaric, nor any of his people. The emperor's letter being delivered to Jovius, while he was in Alaric's tent, and he with the utmoſt imprudence reading it aloud, Alaric was ſo provoked at the prince's declaration, that he immediately decamped, bending his march towards Rome: but ſoon after, changing his mind, he ſent ſome biſhops to Honorius, with very moderate propoſals; for he offered to enter into a perpetual alliance with Honorius, and to defend the empire againſt all invaders, provided he would only ſend him a ſmall ſum to pay his men their arrears, that they might not mutiny when diſbanded, and Honorius refuſes to comply with the propoſals of Alaric.

[g] Idem, ibid. Phot. p. 181. [h] Zoſ. ibid. [i] Hier. ep. viii. p. 65. Cod Theod. tit. 4. p. 199.

and allow them to ſettle in Rhœtia and Noricum, which provinces paid but an inconſiderable tribute, and nevertheleſs obliged the emperor, as they were expoſed to the incurſions of the neighbouring barbarians, to maintain numerous armies to defend them, which he took upon himſelf to do, without putting the empire to the leaſt charge. Theſe propoſals, however reaſonable, were rejected. Jovius having, by a ſecond fault, cut off all means of an accommodation; for, apprehending the emperor might, from his late imprudent conduct, ſuſpect him of privately favouring Alaric, he over-acted the contrary part, inducing the emperor to ſwear, that he would never make peace, but wage perpetual war with Alaric: this he ſwore himſelf by the emperor's head, and obliged all the officers both civil and military to take the ſame oath [k]. Alaric, tho' informed of theſe unaccountable proceedings, ſent back the biſhops to Ravenna, earneſtly entreating the emperor, who had not ſufficient forces to withſtand him, not to ſuffer that ſtately metropolis, which for ſo many ages had been revered by all nations as miſtreſs of the world, to become a prey to her enemies. But the emperor continuing obſtinate in his former reſolution, Alaric purſued his march to Rome; and, approaching the city, acquainted the inhabitants with the emperor's invincible obſtinacy, inviting them at the ſame time to conſult their own ſafety by joining him againſt Honorius. This propoſal they rejected at firſt with indignation; but Alaric having, after a few days ſiege, taken the caſtle at the mouth of the Tiber, in which all the public proviſions were lodged, they immediately opened their gates, and received him into the city, which he entered attended by a ſmall guard, and obliged the citizens to renounce their allegiance to Honorius, and acknowledge, not himſelf, as he might have eaſily done, but Attalus, then prefect of the city, for emperor [l]. Attalus was a native of Ionia, and greatly beloved by Alaric and his Goths, becauſe he had been baptized by Segiſarius their biſhop [m], and conſequently profeſſed the doctrine of Arius, tho' he was in his heart a pagan, according to Philoſtorgius [n]. Attalus, thus created emperor by Alaric, made him in return commander in chief of all his forces, and Ataulphus his comes domeſticorum, diſtributing the other great employments amongſt

And ſwears never to make peace with him.

Alaric's moderation.

He beſieges Rome, which ſubmits, and acknowledges Attalus for emperor.

[k] Soz. l ix c. 7. p. 808, 809. Zoſ. p, 822-- 824. [l] Soz. Zoſ. ibid. [m] Soz c. 9. p. 111. [n] Philoſt. l. xii. c. c. p. 533.

mongſt pagans and Arians. At it was a matter of the utmoſt importance to ſecure Africa, whence Rome was ſupplied with proviſions, Alaric adviſed the new emperor to ſend thither without delay a conſiderable body of troops under the conduct of Drumas, who was by nation a Goth, but an officer of great experience and addreſs: but Attalus, contrary to the advice of Alaric, ſent one Conſtantine or Conſtans, a perſon quite unacquainted with military affairs, and with him but a ſmall number of troops, being aſſured by the aruſpices, ſays Sozomen, that Africa would immediately ſubmit[o]. But Conſtantine was upon his firſt landing cut off with all his men by Heraclianus, who took care to place guards in all the ports of Africa, that no corn might be thence conveyed to Rome, which by that means was ſoon reduced to great ſtreights [p]. In the mean time, Attalus, without waiting for news from Africa, ſet out from Rome with the ſuccours he received from Alaric, with a deſign to beſiege the emperor in Ravenna, who, alarmed at his motions, diſpatched Jovius, the prime miniſter, Valens, general of the foot, Potamus, the quæſtor, and Julian, his firſt ſecretary, to wait his arrival at Rimina, and acquaint him, that the emperor was willing to acknowledge him as his partner in the empire. But Attalus would only grant Honorius his life, and the liberty of retiring to what iſland he pleaſed [q]. Jovius, in a private conference with Attalus, not only adviſed him to inſiſt upon theſe terms, but ſuggeſted to him, that he ought to maim the emperor ſo as to prevent his having iſſue; which wicked ſuggeſtion was rejected with horror, if Olympiodorus is to be credited, by Attalus himſelf [r]. That treacherous miniſter returned to court; but being ſent back to the uſurper with new propoſals, he continued with him. Honorius, finding himſelf thus betrayed by his friends, and no-ways in a condition to oppoſe ſo many enemies at once, reſolved to abandon Ravenna and retire by ſea into the eaſt; but was diverted from that reſolution by the ſeaſonable arrival of four thouſand men, ſent him by his nephew Theodoſius, which encouraged him to continue at Ravenna, and there wait the iſſue of the war in Africa. And truly his arms were attended there with uncommon ſucceſs; for Attalus having, after the death of Conſtans, ſent thither a body of troops far more numerous than the firſt, Heraclianus cut them likewiſe in pieces; and not

The uſurpers troops defeated by Heraclianus in Africa.

Honorius offers to acknowledge Attalus; Who inſiſts upon his reſigning.

Honorius receives a ſeaſonable ſupply from Theodoſius.

[o] Soz. p 810. [p] Zoſ p. 829. Soz. ibid. [q] Zoſ. p. 828. Phot. p. 181. [r] Phot. ibid.

not only continued to keep the ports blocked up, so that no provisions could be conveyed to Rome, but sent a seasonable supply of money to Honorius, which he immediately distributed among the soldiery, and by that means re-established his affairs [s]. In the mean time, Alaric reduced all the cities of Liguria and Æmilia, except Bononia, which he was obliged to abandon, after having lain a considerable time before it. He caused Attalus to be every-where proclaimed emperor, and obliged the people to swear allegiance to him [t].

WHILE these things passed in Italy, Geroncius, to whom Constans the son of Constantine, had committed the government of Spain, as we have related above, revolting, upon some disgust, from Constantine, set up one Maximus for emperor, whom Olympiodorus supposes to have been his son [u], while other writers style him his client or creature [w]. Orosius speaks of him as a person of a mean extraction, and altogether unknown [x]. It was no sooner known in Gaul, that Geroncius had revolted, than the Vandals, Suevians, Alans, and other barbarians, whom Constantine had suffered to remain in that province, as we have related above, flew to arms, probably at the instigation of the new usurper, and made themselves masters of several cities. The people, finding themselves thus harassed by the barbarians, and expecting no relief either from Honorius or Constantine, resolved to defend themselves. The Britons were the first, who, falling off from the empire, established a new form of government among themselves, after having driven out the barbarians, the Germans, according to Zosimus, but more likely the Scots, or Irish, who had invaded their country [y]. Thus they continued a free people till the year 421, 422, when, overpowered by their warlike neighbours the Scots, they were forced to implore the protection of the emperor, and submit anew to the laws of the empire, as we shall relate hereafter. All the Armorici, says Zosimus, that is, in the language of the Gauls, the maritime people, followed the example of the Britons, and, shaking off the Roman yoke, gave rise to a new state and government [z], which, notwithstanding all their efforts, proved but short-lived. The barbarians, meeting with greater opposition than they expected from the inhabitants of Gaul, who had taken arms in their Maximus set up in Spain by Geroncius.

The Britons fall off from the empire.

And the Armorici

[s] Zos. p. 829. Oros. l. vii. c. 42. p. 224. [t] Idem ibid. [u] Phot. c. 80. p. 184. [w] Soz. p. 814. Greg. Tur. p. 63. Oros. p. 224 Prosp. ann. 412. [x] Oros. ibid. [y] Zos. l. vi. p. 827. [z] Idem ibid.

own defence, and acquainted with the distracted state of Spain, which was represented to them as a wealthy and fruitful country, resolved to try whether they could settle there. With this design, the Vandals, the Alans and Suevians bent their march towards the Pyrenees, which they passed without opposition, the guards, who had been placed there by Geroncius to defend the narrow passes, either retiring at the approach of such multitudes, or joining them [a]. Thus the barbarians first entered Spain in 409, on a Tuesday, says Idatius, the twenty-eighth of September, or the thirteenth of October [b]; but in the year 409, the 13th of October fell on a Wednesday. The passes of the Pyrenees being once opened, the barbarians, who had over-run Gaul, powered in swarms into Spain, and there made themselves masters of several cities and strong-holds, defeated the troops which Constantine had sent, under the conduct of his son Constans, to suppress the rebellion of Geroncius, and obliged Constans himself to abandon the country, and retire to his father at Arles [c]. As for Geroncius, they entered into a kind of alliance with him against their common enemy Constantine [d]. The barbarians, having no enemy to oppose them, after the retreat of Constans, over-ran the whole country, committing every-where unheard-of cruelties; which the reader will find described at length by Idatius, who, in this very century, was bishop of a city in Spain [e]. Olympiodorus writes, that the Romans, who had taken refuge in some strong-holds, were reduced to the dreadful necessity of feeding upon one another; and adds, that a mother, who had four children, killed and devoured them all; for which unnatural cruelty she was stoned to death by the populace [f]. The barbarians continued their ravages, putting all to fire and sword, till the year 411, when, being absolute masters of the country, they applied themselves to the tilling of the ground, and other works of agriculture, after having divided among themselves by lot the Spanish provinces. In that division Galicia fell to the Vandals and Suevians, the former having Gonderic for their king, and the latter Ermeric; Lusitania, and the province of Carthagena, to the Alans; Bœtica to the Silingi, who were likewise Vandals, and are supposed to have given to their lot the name of Wandalusia, which

The Vandals Alans and Suevians enter Spain.

And over-run the whole country.

And divide the Spanish provinces among themselves.

[a] Greg. Tur. l. ii. c. 2. p. 42. Oros l. vii. c. 40. p. 223. [b] Soz. l. ix. c. 12. p 814. [c] Idat. chron. [d] Zos. Oros. Greg. Tur. ibid. [d] Phot. c. 80. p. 184. [e] Idat. chron p. 10, 11. [f] Phot. c. 80. p. 189.

which was afterwards changed into that of Andaluſia [g]. Such of the natives as had the good luck to eſcape the general ſlaughter, ſubmitted to the barbarians, who, touching the holy book of the goſpels, ſwore, that they would treat them for the future as their friends and allies; which oath they obſerved ſo religiouſly, that the Romans choſe to live in poverty, ſays Oroſius, under the barbarians, rather than to return into the dominions of the empire [h]. The inhabitants of Galicia, however, maintained their liberty, and formed a new ſtate in a corner of that province, where they were often attacked, but without ſucceſs, by Emeric or Ermeric, king of the Suevians [i]. Nothing happened this year in the eaſt worthy of notice, except a tumult at Conſtantinople, where the people, riſing on account of the ſcarcity of bread, burnt the houſe of Monaxes, prefect of the city; but the ſenators and other wealthy citizens, having, by voluntary contributions, raiſed a large ſum for the relief of the poor, and the bakers being publicly whipt through the city, as was frequently practiſed when bread grew dear, the tumult was quelled [k].

A tumult at Conſtantinople.

THE following year 410, when Varanes alone was conſul, is remarkable for the taking of Rome by Alaric. Varanes began his conſulſhip at Conſtantinople; but the weſtern empire, eſpecially the city of Rome, was involved in ſuch troubles, that Honorius was not at leiſure to think of a conſul. Attalus, however, raiſed Tertullus, a pagan, to that dignity: but he was acknowledged only by the partizans of the uſurper: whence Varanes alone is named conſul in the faſti and in the laws, ſome of which are dated thus; the year after the eighth conſulſhip of Honorius, and the third of Theodoſius [l]. As Heraclian continued to keep the ports of Africa blocked up, and the lands in Italy had not been tilled for ſeveral years, by reaſon of the wars, the Roman people were reduced to feed upon cheſnuts; nay, human fleſh was publicly ſold, and ſeveral mothers were ſaid to have devoured their children [m]. This obliged both Alaric and Attalus to haſten to Rome, in order to adviſe with the ſenate about the proper means of ſupplying the city. Moſt part of the ſenators were for ſending into Africa a body of Goths, Alaric engaging, that Drumas, one of his officers, would reduce it with five hundred only; but Attalus openly declared, that he would not by any means employ Goths in that war; which so piqued Alaric, who had already began to look upon Attalus as one no-ways qualified for the high station to which he had raised him, that he resolved to depose him, lest, by his obstinacy and imprudence, he should quite ruin his affairs. He was confirmed in this resolution by Jovius, who persuaded him, that Attalus, scorning to depend upon him, and to hold the empire upon precarious terms, was determined to destroy him. This conduct of Jovius has induced some writers to believe, that he maintained a private correspondence with Honorius; nay, that he abandoned him with no other view but to betray Attalus [n]. Be that as it will, Alaric, finding the new emperor unequal to so great a charge, and provoked at his late declaration and misconduct with respect to the affairs of Africa, sent deputies once more to Honorius, with very reasonable terms; which the emperor seeming inclined to comply with, Alaric publicly stripped the mock prince of all the badges of sovereignty, and sent them to Honorius. He would not, however, deliver up either Attalus, or his son Ampelius; but insisted upon their being pardoned, since their crime was owing more to him than to them [o]. Attalus being thus deposed, Alaric approached Ravenna, and stopped at a place called the Alps, about nine miles from that city, in order to put the last hand to the treaty of accommodation between him and the emperor [p]. But this peaceable face of affairs was soon changed by an unlucky and unforeseen accident: Sarus the Goth, of whom we have made frequent mention, commanded a body of three hundred men in Picenum, without declaring either for Honorius or Alaric. However, Ataulphus, who bore him an irreconcilable hatred, resolved to destroy him, and with this view marched at the head of a strong party against him; which obliged him to declare for Honorius, and retire to Ravenna. Olympiodorus writes, that Alaric was so provoked at the kind reception Sarus met with from the emperor, that he would hearken to no terms [q]. On the other hand, Sozomen tells us, that Sarus, apprehending a peace would be prejudicial to him, fell unexpectedly upon the Goths, and put some of them to the sword [r]. However Alaric deposes Attalus.

A great famine rages in Rome.

[g] Oroſ. c. 41. p. 223. Idat. Iſid. chron. [h] Oroſ. l. iii. c. 23. p. 173. & l. vii. c. 41. p. 223. [i] Idem ibid. [k] Cod. Theod. tit. 5 p. 84. Lib. orat. i. p. 64. Chron Alex. p. 716. [l] Cod. Theod. chron. 156. [m] Socr. l. ix. p. 810. Zoſ. l. vi. p 830.

And attempts an accommodation with Honorius.

Which unhappily broke off.

[n] Philost. p. 181 [o] Phot. c. 80. p. 181. Zos. p. 830. Soz. p. 810. Philost. l. xii. c. 3. p. 533. [r] Soz. p. 809. Zos. p. 831. [q] Phot. p. 180. [r] Soz. p. 811.

ever that be, it is certain, that Alaric departed in a great rage from the neighbourhood of Ravenna, and returned to his army, encamped near Rome, as ſoon as Sarus had joined the emperor [s], reſtoring the purple, and other badges of majeſty, to Attalus; but in a few days degrading him anew, as if he deſigned to traduce and expoſe to ridicule the imperial dignity [t]. Socrates writes, that having ſhewed him to the ſoldiery, with all the enſigns of ſovereignty, he expoſed him the very next day to public view in the dreſs of a ſlave [u]. To this was the majeſty of the Roman empire now reduced. Alaric no ſooner arrived before Rome, than he blocked it up on all ſides, and by that means, as proviſions were already very ſcarce, reduced it in a few days to the utmoſt extremity. Some authors, and among the reſt, St. Jerom [w] write, that it held out a long time; while others ſay, Alaric reduced it with ſuch expedition, that Honorius, when told by one of his courtiers, that Rome was loſt, underſtood him of a favourite cock bearing that name, not being yet informed, that the city of Rome was beſieged [x]. There is likewiſe a diſagreement among authors as to the manner in which it was taken. Procopius writes, that Proba, an illuſtrious Roman matron, pitying the unhappy condition of the people, reduced by the famine that had long raged in the city to the fatal neceſſity of devouring one another, opened the gates in the nighttime to the enemy [y]. Sozomen ſays it was taken by treachery, without explaining himſelf farther [z]; but Oroſius uſes the word irrumpit [a], which ſeems to import, that the enemy broke in by force, or took the city by aſſault. Be that as it will, that proud and haughty city, ſtyled the metropolis of the univerſe, after having triumphed over ſo many nations, and extended her dominions from one end of the known world to the other, was, on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt of the preſent year 410, taken by a barbarian, who had not a foot of ground which he could properly call his own. As ſhe had, for the ſpace of one thouſand one hundred and ſixty-three years, pillaged the reſt of the world, and enriched herſelf with the ſpoils of the plundered nations, ſhe underwent in the end the ſame fate, and ſuffered in her turn the ſame calamities, which ſhe had brought upon others. Alaric, when upon the point of breaking into the city, addreſſing his soldiers, told them, That all the wealth lodged in it was theirs, and therefore he gave them full liberty to seize it; but at the same time he strictly enjoined them to shed the blood of none but such as they should find in arms, and above all to spare those who should take sanctuary in the holy places, especially in the churches of the apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, which he named, because they were more spacious, and consequently capable of affording an asylum to great numbers of people. Having given these orders, he abandoned the city to the Goths, who treated it no better, according to St. Jerom, than the Greeks are said to have treated antient Troy [b]; for, after having plundered it for the space of three, or, as others will have it, of six, days, they set fire to it in several places; so that the stately palace of Sallust, and many other magnificent buildings, were reduced to ashes; nay Procopius writes, that there was not in the whole city one house left entire [c]; and both St. Jerom [d] and Philostorgius [e],

And Rome anew beſieged, taken, and plundered.

[s] Idem. ibid. Philoſt. p. 534. [t] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 42. p. 224. [u] Socr. l. vii. c. 10. p. 346, 347. [w] Hier ep. 16. p 121. [x] Proſp. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 2. p 180. [y] Idem ibid. [z] Soz. l. ix. c. 9. p. 811. [a] Oroſ. p 222.

Alaric orders his men to spare the lives of the citizens, especially of such as should fly to the churches.

The miserable condition to which the city was reduced.

that the great metropolis of the empire was reduced to an heap of ashes and ruins. Tho' many of the Goths, pursuant to the orders of their general, refrained from shedding the blood of such as made no resistance, yet others, more cruel and blood-thirsty, massacred all they met; so that the streets in some quarters of the city were seen covered with heaps of dead bodies, and swimming in blood [f]. However, not the least injury was offered to those who had fled to the churches; nay, the Goths themselves conveyed thither, as to places of safety, such as they were desirous should be spared [g]. Many of the statues of the gods that had been left entire by the emperors, as excellent pieces of art, were on this occasion destroyed, either by the Goths, who, tho' mostly Arians, were zealous christians, or by a dreadful storm of thunder and lightning, which fell at the same time upon the city, as if it had been sent on purpose to complete, with them, the destruction of idolatry, and abolish the small remains of pagan superstition [h]. The learned bishop of Meaux wrote a famous treatise, shewing, that the taking of Rome by Alaric may be looked upon as one of the chief mysteries foretold by John in his revelations [i]. The pagans ascribed the calamities which Rome suffered on this occasion, to its having banished the gods, by whom it had been often protected against far more more powerful enemies. Theſe calumnies St. Auſtin fully confuted in his 81ſt, 105th and 106th ſermons, in another intitled of the deſtruction of the city of Rome [k], and in his great work de civitate Dei, wherein he ſhews, that Rome had ſuffered far greater calamities before it embraced the true faith, and that it was preſerved by the chriſtian religion from utter deſtruction [l].

[b] Hier. ep. 16. p. 121. [c] Procop. p. 179. [d] Hier. ep. 12. p. 100. [e] Philost. p. 534. [f] Idem ibid. [g] Hier. & Soz. ibid. [h] Oros. l. vii c. 39. p. 222. & l. ii. c 19. p. 164. [i] Explication de l' apocalypse.

[k] Auger. Sym. p. 546. & Rom. excid. p. 330. [l] Idem de civ. Dei.

CHAP. XXX.

The hiſtory of Rome, from the taking of the city by the Goths, to the death of Theodoſius II.

ALARIC, having ſtaid, according to ſome, ſix, according to others, only three, days in Rome, retired from thence into Campania, carrying with him immenſe wealth, and a great number of captives, among whom was Placidia, the ſiſter of Honorius, whom he treated with all the reſpect due to her rank and ſex. After he ravaged and laid waſte Campania, Lucania, Samnium, Apulia, Calabria, and the country of the Brutii, he approached the ſtreights of Sicily, with a deſign to paſs over into that iſland, and thence into Africa, which he intended to reduce; but the fleet he had prepared for that purpoſe being ſhipwrecked in the ſtreights, he continued in the neighbourhood of Rhegium, deliberating what further meaſures he was to take; but before he came to any reſolution, he was ſuddenly ſeized with a fit of ſickneſs, which carried him off in a few days [l]. The Goths were deeply concerned for the death of their king, (for they had given him that title, as we have obſerved above) and fearing the Romans ſhould offer ſome indignity to his bones, they turned the courſe of the Buſento near Coſenza in the Farther Calabria; and having buried him, with many rich ſpoils brought from Rome, in the bed of the river, Alaric retires, with the wealth of Rome, into Campania.

He dies in the neighbourhood of Rhegium.

[l] Oroſ. ii. c. 19. p. 164. Socr l. vii c. 10. p. 347 Philoſt. l. xii. c. 3. 534. Aug civ. Dei, l. i. c. 10. p. 8. Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 30. p. 653.

river, they reſtored the waters to their natural current, and killed all the ſlaves they had employed in the work [m]. After this they choſe Ataulphus king in his room. He was brother-in-law to the deceaſed prince, who had married his ſiſter. Jornandes writes, that he returned to Rome, and pillaged that city a ſecond time [n]. But of this ſecond deſtruction of Rome, as he ſtyles it, no mention is made by any of the writers who flouriſhed at that time. While the barbarians were thus ravaging Italy on one ſide, Conſtantine, leaving Gaul, where he reigned, entered it on the other, giving out, that he was marching to the aſſiſtance of Honorius, tho' his real deſign was to ſtrip him of the few provinces that were left him. With this view he was already advanced as far as Verona; but while he was preparing to paſs the Po, in order to march to Ravenna, and there conſer as he pretended, with the emperor about the moſt proper meaſures in the preſent juncture, he received news of the unhappy, but deſerved, end of Alabicus or Allobicus, one of Honorius's generals, whom that prince had cauſed to be put to death, upon a well grounded ſuſpicion of his privately correſponding with the uſurper [o]. This Conſtantine no ſooner underſtood, than he repaſſed in great haſte the Alps, and retired to Arles, where he found his ſon Conſtans driven out of Spain by the above-mentioned barbarians. Geroncius, who had joined them againſt him purſued him into Gaul; which obliged Conſtantine to ſend Edobicus, one of his generals, to procure ſupplies among the Franks and Germans, and to commit the guard of Vienne, and the other cities on the Rhone, to his ſon Conſtans. But Geroncius, arriving in the mean time before Vienne, took the place; and having put Conſtans, whom he found in it, to death, advanced without oppoſition to Arles, and there cloſely beſieged Conſtantine himſelf [p]. While the weſtern empire was thus involved in endleſs calamities, the provinces all over the eaſt enjoyed a profound peace under the wiſe adminiſtration of Anthemius; ſo that nothing remarkable happened there, except the diſgrace of one Andronicus, governor of the Pentapolis, who, by his tyrannical extortions, deſerved to be firſt excommunicated by Syneſius biſhop of Ptolemais, the metropolis of that province, and afterwards removed by Anthemius from his government [q].

Ataulphus choſen king in his room.

Conſtantine invades Italy.

But repaſſes the Alps in great haſte, and retires to Arles.

Conſtans taken, and put to death by Geroncius who beſieges Conſtantine in Arles.

THE

[m] Jorn. ibid. [n] Idem, p. 654. [o] Soz. l. ix. c. 12 p. 814. Phot. c. 80 p. 181. Zoſ. l. v. p. 821. [p] Soz. ibid. Phot. p. 184. Oroſ p. 224. [q] Syneſ. c. 74. p. 220.

THE following year 411, Theodosius alone was the fourth time consul, Honorius being diverted, by the troubles in the west, from naming any one to that dignity [r]. This year Honorius sent Constantius, an officer of great experience and address, and inviolably attached to the interest of his prince, into Gaul, with what troops he could spare, to make war upon Constantine, whom, after his entering Italy, the emperor no longer looked upon as his partner in the empire, but as a public enemy. Constantius was not by birth a barbarian, but a Roman; that is, he was born a subject of the empire, according to Olympiodorus, in the city of Panaisa in Illyricum [s]. Valesius, supposes, upon what authority we know not, that he was a native of Naissus in Dacia, the birth-place of Constantine the Great [t]. He was a man of extraordinary parts, well-shaped in his person, agreeable in conversation, frank, generous, an enemy to all dissimulation and restraint, disinterested, brave, and equally capable of commanding an army, and governing the state [u]. He was no sooner named for this expedition, than he set out at the head of a considerable army from Gaul, where he was joined upon his first arrival by most of the troops of Geroncius, then busied in reducing the city of Arles, in which was Constantine himself, as we have related above. Geroncius, finding himself abandoned by his men, raised the siege in great haste, and fled into Spain, where the few soldiers who attended him, provoked at his unseasonable severity, attacked him in the house where he was lodged; which he defended, tho' assisted only by one friend, and a few slaves, with great resolution and intrepidity, killing three hundred of the aggressors. In the end the slaves, consulting their own safety, made their escape, which Geroncius too might have easily done, had he been able to prevail upon himself to forsake his wife, whom he tenderly loved. When he found himself overpowered, he resolved to lay violent hands on himself. His wife, by name Nonnichia, apprised of this resolution, earnestly entreated him to put her to death rather than suffer her to fall into the hands of the incensed soldiery. Moved with her tears, he first dispatched her, then his friend, and lastly himself [w]. It is surprising, that Sozomen should commend this in Nonnichia, as an action worthy of the christian religion,

Constantius sent against Constantine.

His character.

Geroncius raises the siege of Arles, and flies into Spain.

Where he lays violent hands on himself.

[r] Idat. Prosp. Cassiod. &c. [s] Phot. c 80. p. 193. [t] Val. rer. Franc. l. iii. p. 107. [u] Phot. p. 185. Oros c. 43. p 224. Soz. l ix. c. 16. p. 815. [w] Oros. p 224. Soz. p. 815. Phot. ibid.

religion, which she professed [x]. As for Maximus, whom Geroncius had set up for emperor, as we have related above, he was secured by his own men, and brought to Constantius, who stripped him of his ensigns of majesty, but spared his life, looking upon him as a person of himself inoffensive, and incapable of giving the least umbrage [y]. He retired into Spain amongst the barbarians, and was still alive when Orosius wrote his history, that is, in 417 [z]. To return to Constantius: he pursued the siege of Arles, which Geroncius had begun. Constantine, who was in the place with his second son, by name Julian, held out for the space of four months, in expectation of the succours which Edobicus was sent to procure amongst the Franks, and other German nations. Edobichus arrived at length, at the head of an army far more numerous than that of Constantius; which so terrified the emperor's generals, that they were for abandoning the siege, and retiring into Italy. But their retreat being cut off by the enemy, they were forced to put the whole to the issue of a battle. Ulphilas therefore, who commanded under Constantius, passing the Rhone with a strong detachment of foot, concealed himself among the woods, till the enemy passed, and were ready to engage Constantius; when falling unexpectedly upon their rear, while Constantius charged them in front, they were immediately put to the rout. Edobichus fled to the house of a Gaulish lord, by name Ecdices, who, notwithstanding the many favours he had received at his hands, struck off his head, and carried it to Constantius, who ordered the traitor to depart the camp that instant, lest his presence should draw down from heaven some misfortune upon the whole army [a]. Constantius returned without loss of time before Arles, which still held out with great obstinacy, till news being brought to the Roman camp that Jovinus, having usurped the imperial title in Farther Gaul, was advancing full march to Arles, at the head of a formidable army, consisting of Alemans, Franks, Burgundians, and Alans, with a design to fall on the emperor's army. Upon this intelligence, Constantius thought it adviseable to comply with the terms which had been proposed before by the besieged, but rejected by him, viz. to grant a general indemnity, and to promise upon oath, that the lives of Constantine and Julian should be spared. Hereupon the gates were opened,

Maximus taken; but his life spared.

The Germans coming to the assistance of Constantine defeated.

Arles surrendered to Constantius.

[x] Soz. ibid. [y] Oros. ibid. [z] Idem ibid. [a] Idem, p. 223 Phot. c. 80. p. 184. Greg. Tur. l. i. Franc. l. ii. c. 9. p. 65. Soz. l. ix. c. 14. p. 815.

opened, and the victorious army received into the town. Conſtantine had ſome time before deveſted himſelf of the purple, and taking ſanctuary in a church, cauſed himſelf to be ordained prieſt, thinking that character would ſcreen him from the emperor's juſt reſentment. Conſtantius nevertheleſs cauſed both him and his ſon to be ſecured, and ſent into Italy, where they were, by the emperor's orders, beheaded about thirty miles from Ravenna [b]. Honorius would not grant them their lives, becauſe they had put to death his two couſins Didymius and Verinianus; but as they had been promiſed indemnity by his lieutenant, the chriſtian as well as the pagan writers look upon this action as a breach of faith unworthy of a prince. About the ſame time that Conſtantine deveſted himſelf of the purple, Jovinus, or, as he is ſtyled by Sozomen and Philoſtorgius, Jovianus, aſſumed it at Mundiacum, ſays Olympiodorus [c]; which ſome take to be Mentz. He was deſcended from one of the moſt illuſtrious families in Gaul, and is ſaid to have cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor at the inſtigation of Goar king of the Alans, and Guntarius, or Gondicarius prince of the Burgundians [d]. It appears from his medals, that he made himſelf maſter of Treves [e]; but his reign was ſhort-lived, as we ſhall ſee anon. In the eaſt, the tranquillity which the people had long enjoyed there, was diſturbed this year by the Auſurians, a Mooriſh nation, who, breaking into the Pentapolis, laid waſte that province; but were ſoon driven out by Anyſius, who had ſucceeded Andronicus in that government. The Saracens likewiſe committed great diſorders on the frontiers of Egypt, Paleſtine, Phœnicia, and Syria; but retired of their own accord.

Conſtantine and his ſon beheaded.

Jovinus cauſes himſelf to be proclaimed emperor.

THE following year 412, when Honorius was conſul the ninth time, and Theodoſius the fifth, the Goths at length left Italy, either in virtue of a treaty between Honorius and Ataulphus their new king, as Jornandes ſeems to ſuppoſe [f], or becauſe they had already quite drained that country of its wealth, which from the ſequel of the hiſtory, appears more probable. However that be, quitting Italy, they broke into Gaul, ravaging the countries through which they paſſed. Upon their arrival in that province, Attalus, whom Ataulphus had brought thither with him, adviſed the Goth to join Jovinus againſt Honorius, and divide Gaul between them.

The Goths leave Italy, and break into Gaul.

Ataulphus

[b] Phot Soz. Greg. Tur. ibid. [c] Phot. c. 80. [d] Soz. p. 816, 817 Oroſ. p. 224. Phot. p. 184. [e] Syneſ. catait p. 299. & ep. 78. p. 223 224. [f] Jorn rer. Goth. c 31. p. 655.

Ataulphus and Jovinus met upon that propoſal; but all we know of their interview is, that Jovinus was not at all pleaſed to ſee Ataulphus and his Goths in Gaul [g]. Sarus, whom we have often mentioned, having about this time revolted from Honorius, becauſe he refuſed to puniſh the authors of the murder of one of his officers, by name Bellerid, was going into Gaul, to offer his ſervice to Jovinus; which coming to the ears of Ataulphus, his implacable enemy, he went to meet him at the head of a thouſand men. Sarus, tho' attended only by twenty perſons, defended himſelf with ſuch reſolution, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty he was taken alive, after having killed with his own hand great numbers of the enemy. Ataulphus cauſed him ſoon after to be put to death, which as he was a brave and experienced officer, created a miſunderſtanding between Jovinus and Ataulphus. Jovinus ſoon after took his brother Sebaſtian for his partner in the empire, contrary to the opinion of Ataulphus, who was ſo provoked at his promotion, that he diſpatched privately deputies to Honorius, offering to reſtore to him his ſiſter Placidia, and to ſend him the heads of the two uſurpers, provided he would ſupply his men with a certain quantity of corn. The emperor having readily complied with his demand, Ataulphus ſoon found an opportunity of diſpatching Sebaſtian; but Jovinus, upon the news of his death, fled to Valence, where he was cloſely beſieged, and in the end forced to ſubmit to Ataulphus, who delivered him up to Dardanus, prefect of Gaul, by whoſe orders he was put to death at Narbonne [h]. Idatius aſcribes the defeat of the two uſurpers to the generals of Honorius, who had perhaps joined Ataulphus. Dardanus, at this time prefect of Gaul, is highly commended by St. Jerom and St. Auſtin, who wrote ſeveral letters to him; but Apollinaris Sidonius, who is likewiſe honoured with the title of ſaint, paints him as a perſon of a moſt infamous character, in whom centered all the vices of the three uſurpers Conſtantine, Jovinus and Geroncius [i] (O). This year Theodoſius, or rather Anthemius, cauſed the walls of the frontier towns of Illyricum to be repaired [k], Sarus taken priſoner by Ataulphus, and put to death.

Jovinus is taken, and put to death.

The

[g] Oroſ. p. 224. Phot. ibid. [h] Oroſ. ibid. Phot. p. 184. Soz. l. ix. c. 15. p. 817. [i] Sid. l. v. ep. 9. p. 139. [k] Cod. Theod. l. xv. tit. 1. leg. 29. p. 342.

(O) From an antient inſcription diſcovered near Siſteron in Provence, it appears, that Dardanus, or Claudius Poſtumius Dardanus, as he is ſtyled there, had been governor of Vienne, and

THE next conſuls were Lucius and Heraclianus: but the name of the latter was eraſed out of the faſti; for he revolted this very year from Honorius, and cauſing himſelf to be proclaimed emperor in Africa, which he had with ſo much bravery defended againſt Attalus, he equipped a fleet there of ſeven hundred ſail, according to ſome, of three thouſand ſeven hundred, according to others, if there is no miſtake in the numbers [l]. Oroſius writes, that his fleet was more numerous than thoſe of Xerxes, of Alexander, or any other monarch mentioned in hiſtory [m]. With this formidable armada he ſailed from Africa, and landing ſafe in Italy, marched ſtrait to Rome, which his approach threw into the utmoſt conſternation; but count Marinus marching out to meet him at the head of all the troops he could aſſemble, the uſurper, ſeized with a ſudden panic, betook himſelf to flight, and haſtening on board one of his veſſels, returned alone to Carthage. Upon his flight, his men immediately ſubmitted, and were received into favour by Honorius, who ſoon after publiſhed a law, dated the fifth of July, and addreſſed to the people of Africa, wherein he declared Heraclianus a public enemy, and impowered every one to apprehend him, and put him to death, where-ever they found him [n]. He was, ſoon after his return to Carthage, diſcovered by ſome ſoldiers in an antient temple, and by them immediately cut in pieces [o]. His eſtate was confiſcated, and beſtowed upon Conſtantius [p]. The ſame year the Franks made an irruption into Gaul, ſet fire to the city of Treves, and laid waſte the neighbouring country [q]. The Burgundians, who had entered Gaul in 407, with the Vandals and Alans, made themſelves this year maſters Heraclianus revolts in Africa.

Lands in Italy; but, ſeized with a ſudden panic, returns to Africa.

Where he is diſcovered and cut in pieces by the ſoldiery.

[l] Marc. chron. [m] Oroſ p. 224. [n] Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 40. leg. 21. p. 320. [o] Oroſ. ibid. Idat. chron. [p] Phot. c. 80. p. 185. [q] Greg. Tur. l. ii. c. 9. p. 63.

and its territory, preſect of Gaul, quæſtor, and in the end raiſed to the rank of patrician; that his wife's name was Nevia Galla; and that his brother, Claudius Lepidus, who is diſtinguiſhed in the inſcription with the title of count, had been governor of Germania Prima, and treaſurer. This inſcription was made in honour of Dardanus, and his wife Galla, for having built a caſtle on a ſteep rock which ſtood on their eſtate, that the country-people, in the ſudden irruptions of the barbarians, might have a ſafe place to retire to with their families and effects. This caſtle was then called Theopolis; but is known at preſent by the name of Rochetaillée.

masters of the country now known by the name of Alsace, or Alsatia. Constantius, who had reduced the rest of Gaul after the death of the two usurpers Constantine and Jovinus, marched against them; but they demanding leave to settle in Gaul, as friends and allies of the Roman people, the Roman general, not caring to reduce them to despair, persuaded the emperor to grant them part of the country which they had conquered [r]. Such was the rise of the kingdom of the Burgundians in Gaul, under the conduct of Gondicarius or Guntiarius. Socrates commends them as a peaceable people, for the most part artificers, and willing to earn a livelihood with labour [s]. Orosius writes, that in 417, they had all embraced already the christian religion, and the catholic faith, and treated the Gauls, who lived under them, not as their vassals, but their friends [t]. About the year 440, the heresy of Arius began to prevail among them [u], which was probably owing to their intercourse with the Goths. Ataulphus had promised, as we have observed above, to restore to Honorius his sister Placidia, taken prisoner in Rome, but treated by him, as she had been by Alaric, with the utmost respect. Constantius, hoping the emperor would give her to him in marriage, was continually pressing Ataulphus to comply with this article; but as Honorius had not yet sent to the Goths the corn he had promised them, Ataulphus, who desired to marry Placidia himself, refused to part with her, till the emperor had executed his promise which he was not at that time in a condition to do: however, the Romans promised to send the corn as soon as Placidia was restored; and Ataulphus to restore Placidia as soon as the corn was spent [x]. After matters had continued for some time in this situation, Ataulphus, at last thinking himself deluded by the Romans, began hostilities anew; and, having reduced the cities of Narbonne and Toulouse, advanced as far as Marseilles; but met there with such vigorous resistance from count Bonifacius, that he was forced to abandon the enterprize and retire, after having lost great numbers of his men, and been himself wounded. From Marseilles he bent his march to Bourdeaux, where he was received as a friend [y]. In the east, one Lucius, a pagan who commanded the troops attending the court, provoked at the zeal of young Theodosius in extirpating idolatry, resolved to save it from utter ruin ruin by aſſaſſinating his prince. With this deſign he went to the palace, and was thrice upon the point of drawing his ſword; but was deterred from executing his wicked purpoſe by a woman of an extraordinary ſtature, and a threatening aſpect, who, as often as he put his hand to his ſword, appeared to him holding the emperor in her arms. Thus Damaſcus, a pagan writer, who flouriſhed about the latter end of the preſent century. Photius, who copied it from him, calls it a moſt remarkable event, and not to be queſtioned, ſince related by a pagan writer [w], but it is not, however remarkable, taken notice of by any other hiſtorian. This year the city of Conſtantinople was ſurrounded with the walls, which Socrates ſtyles the great walls [x]. Thoſe which had been built by Conſtantine the Great were pulled down, and this new work, twenty miles in circuit, completed in two months [y]. But this we can hardly believe upon the authority of Nicephorus, an hiſtorian not much to be relied on. It was called the new wall, and the wall of Theodoſius [z]. The emperor publiſhed this year ſeveral laws againſt the Re-baptizers, the Eunomians, the Sabbatians, and the Protopaſchites, that is, againſt thoſe, who, in the celebration of Eaſter, differed from the church as to the day, and therefore ſtyled themſelves Protopaſchites, as if they followed the primitive practice and inſtitution.

The Burgundians allowed to settle in Gaul.

Ataulphus makes himself master of Narbonne and Toulouse.

[r] Oros c. 43. p. 224. Val. p. 136. Euch. de Belg. p. 440 Coint. annal. eccles. Fran. ann. 407. [s] Socr. l. vii. c. 30 p. 371. [t] Oros. p. 219. [u] Socr. p. 372. [x] Phot c 80 p. 185. [y] Rutil. l. i. p. 137. Phot. p. 185. Val. ibid. p. 115. Hier. ep. xi. p. 39.

Lucius attempts upon the life of Theodoſius.

Conſtantinople ſurrounded with new walls.

THE next conſuls were Conſtantius and Conſtans, both generals, the former in the weſt, and the latter in the eaſt. This year the negotiations between Honorius and Ataulphus, interrupted by the taking of Narbonne and Toulouſe, were reſumed. But the more the Goth was preſſed by Conſtantius to ſend back Placidia, the higher he raiſed his demands, that, the emperor refuſing to comply with them, he might have a more plauſible excuſe for detaining her. In the end, by means of one Candidianus, he prevailed upon her to marry him, and the nuptials were celebrated at Narbonne, in the month of January of this year 414, with the utmoſt pomp and ſolemnity. Placidia appeared on that occaſion ſitting on a bed of ſtate, and Ataulphus in the Roman dreſs. He yielded to the royal bride the moſt honourable place, and preſented her with fifty baſons filled with pieces of gold, and fifty with jewels and precious ſtones of an ineſtimable value, part of the ſpoils brought from Rome. Attalus aſſiſted at the ceremony, and ſung the epithalamium or nuptial ſong [a]; a degrading

Ataulphus marries Placidia.

 function

[w] Phot. c. 242. p. 1072. [x] Socr. l. vii. c. 1. p. 334. [y] Niceph. l. xiv. c. 1. p. 438. [z] Cange de Conſt. p. 38—40. [a] Olymp. apud. Phot p. 181. Idat. chron.

function for one who had been veſted with the imperial dignity. This marriage was generally looked upon as an accompliſhment of Daniel's prophecy, that the king of the north ſhould marry the daughter of the king of the ſouth [b] (P). Honorius did not, it ſeems, conſent to this marriage; for ſoon after Ataulphus obliged Attalus to reſume the purple, and cauſed him to be acknowledged emperor by his Goths. However, he wiſhed for nothing ſo much as to conclude a laſting peace with Honorius, and ſeems to have ſet up Attalus anew, with no other deſign but to intimidate the emperor, and oblige him to grant to him and his Goths more favourable terms [c]. Oroſius writes, that at firſt he had nothing elſe in view than the utter ruin of the Roman empire, and the eſtabliſhing the empire of the Goths in its room; of giving the name of Gothia to that country, which was then called Romania; and founding ſuch a monarchy among his countrymen as Auguſtus Cæſar had introduced among the Romans: but being by long experience convinced, that the Goths were incapable of being governed by laws, he began to think, that the only means of acquiring a great name was to reſtore, inſtead of deſtroying, the Roman empire; and with this view he courted the friendſhip of Honorius, eſpecially after he had by Placidia a ſon to whom he gave the name of Theodoſius [d]. But Conſtantius, and his party at court, defeated all the meaſures taken by Ataulphus and Placidia to bring about an accommodation: they would not ſuffer the emperor to hearken to any overtures, however reaſonable; ſo that the war being renewed, Ataulphus was in the end obliged to quit Gaul, and retire to Spain [e]. Valeſius is of opinion, that he withdrew in virtue of a treaty between him and Conſtantius [f]; but

He obliges Attalus to reſume the purple.

Ataulphus obliged to quit Gaul, and retire into Spain.

[b] Idat. ibid. [c] Olymp. ibid. [d] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 43. p. 324. [e] Olymp. ibid. p. 184. [f] Val. rer. Franc. l. iii. p. 110.

(P) At St. Gille in Languedoc was found an inſcription made by the neighbouring people in honour of Ataulphus and Placidia, their princes and ſovereigns, as they are ſtyled, for having choſen Heraclea, that is, according to ſome, the preſent St. Gille, for the place of their reſidence (1). In this inſcription, which both Spon and du Cange look upon as genuine, Ataulphus is ſtyled the moſt powerful king of kings, and the moſt juſt conqueror of conquerors: he is likewiſe commended for having driven out the Vandals, probably ſome of that nation, who had remained in Gaul. Placidia is ſtyled Cæſarea, as if ſhe had enjoyed the rank and honours peculiar to the Cæſars.

(1) Spon. p. 137.

but the expreſſion of Oroſius, that he was forced to quit Gaul, ſeems to import, that he was driven out by force [g]. Honorius publiſhed a law this year, dated the twenty-third of March, forbidding any one to moleſt ſuch as ſhould take ſanctuary in churches, on pain of being proſecuted and puniſhed as guilty of high treaſon [h]. The law dated the twentieth of May allows every one full liberty to kill ſuch lions as they ſhould find on their grounds, but not to hunt them, in order to take them alive, and ſell them. Theſe lions were kept for the public ſhews; but the intereſt of our people, ſays the emperor in that law, muſt be preferred to our diverſion [i].

Pulcheria is declared Auguſta, and takes upon her the adminiſtration in the eaſt.

WHILE theſe things paſſed in the weſt, Pulcheria, ſiſter to the emperor Theodoſius, being declared Auguſta in the eaſt, on account of her extraordinary wiſdom and piety, took upon her the adminiſtration, Athemius thinking her better qualified for it than himſelf, though ſhe had juſt then entered only the ſixteenth year of her age, and was but two years older than the emperor. And truly, as ſhe was endowed with moſt extraordinary parts and eminent for piety, her adminiſtration proved equally advantageous to the ſtate and the church. Theodoſius II. excelled perhaps in piety and religion even his grandfather Theodoſius the Great, which all authors agree to have been in great part owing to the uncommon care Pulcheria took in inſpiring him with thoſe religious maxims, by which ſhe ruled her own actions [k]. In the very beginning of her adminiſtration, ſhe perſuaded the young prince to diſmiſs the eunuch Antiochus, of whom hereafter, and to remit whatever was due to the exchequer from the year 368, to 407 [l].

THE following year, when Honorius was conſul the tenth time, and Theodoſius the third, Theodoſius the ſon of Ataulphus and Placidia, died in Spain, whither his father had retired with his Goths; and was buried in a ſilver coffin near Barcelona, in a place of prayer, ſays Olympiodorus [m], that is, in a church. Ataulphus himſelf did not long ſurvive him; for he was killed this very year at Barcelona, in the month of Auguſt or September, ſince the news of his death was brought to Conſtantinople on a Friday the twenty-fourth of the latter month [n]. He was ſtabbed in his ſtable by one of his own countrymen and domeſtics, named Dobbius, whoſe former maſter, a leading man among the Goths, Ataulphus had cauſed to be murdered ſeveral years before [o]. Jornandes ſuppoſes him to have waged a long war with the Vandals in Spain, and to have been killed three years after he had reduced that country by one Vernulphus, whoſe former maſter Ataulphus had murdered [p]. But in what relates to Ataulphus, we have all along followed Olympiodorus, a contemporary hiſtorian, who, generally ſpeaking, agrees with the other writers of thoſe times. Photius has tranſmitted to us an abſtract of his work. We are ſurprized, that Giannone, in his hiſtory of the kingdom of Naples, ſhould to his authority prefer that of Jornandes, a writer of a much later date, who ſeldom agrees with other hiſtorians, and often diſagrees with himſelf. Ataulphus, in dying, charged his brother, not named by our hiſtorian, to ſend back Placidia to the Romans, and to live in friendſhip with them [q]. But the Goths, inſtead of his brother, choſe for their king Sigeric, the brother of Sarus, who immediately ordered the ſix children that Ataulphus had had by a former wife, to be inhumanly murdered, revenging by that piece of cruelty, the death of his brother [r]. He even obliged Placidia to walk with other captives twelve miles before his chariot. But he was aſſaſſinated by his own people the ſeventh day after his election [s], and Vallia choſen in his room, after he had cauſed all thoſe to be murdered who ſtood in competition with him for the crown [t]. This year a great tumult happened at Alexandria; the chriſtians and Jews, who were very numerous in that city, quarrelling on account of certain ſports exhibited on a Saturday, St. Cyril, biſhop of the place, threatened to drive the Jews out of the city; which exaſperated them to ſuch a degree, that they reſolved to vent their rage upon his whole flock, the more becauſe they were favoured by Oreſtes, prefect of the city, then at variance with the biſhop. Accordingly having provided themſelves with arms, ſome of them in the dead of the night began to cry fire, giving out at the ſame time, that the great church was in flames. Hereupon, the chriſtians, haſtening out of their houſes to ſave the church, were maſſacred in great numbers by the Jews, who lay in ambuſh for them, and knew one another by a certain mark or badge, which they

Ataulphus murdered in Spain.

[g] Oroſ. ibid. [h] Cod, Juſt. l. i tit. 12. leg 2. p. 107. [i] Cod. Theod. l. xv. tit. 12. leg. 1. p. 392. [k] Soz. p. 800. [l] Theoph. p. 70. Iſid. Peluſ l. i ep. 36. p. 11. Cod. Theod. l. xi tit. 28. p. 203. [m] Olym. apud Phot. p. 88. [n] Idem ibid. Philoſtorg. l. xii c. 4. p. 534.

He is ſucceeded by Sigeric, who cauſes all his children to be murdered, and is murdered himſelf.

A great tumult at Alexandria, between the chriſtians and Jews.

[o] Idem ibid. [p] Jorn. rer. Goth. c 31. p. 655. [q] Olymp. apud Phot. p. 188. [r] Idem ibid. Oroſ. p. 224. Soz. l ix. c. 9. p. 811. [s] Olymp. ibid. Oroſ. p. 224. [t] Oroſ. ibid. Proſp chron.

they wore for that purpoſe. The biſhop, highly provoked at this barbarity, drove all the Jews out of the city; which the governor reſenting as an encroachment upon his authority, the breach between him and the biſhop was widened, and they both wrote to court complaining of each other's conduct. In the mean time, the hermits or monks, who led a retired life on the neighbouring mountains, being told, that Oreſtes had eſpouſed the cauſe of the Jews againſt Cyril and the chriſtians, flew to the city, and meeting the prefect in his chariot, reviled him with the names of pagan and idolater. Oreſtes, to appeaſe them, told them, that he was a chriſtian, and had been baptized by Atticus, biſhop of Conſtantinople. But while he was yet ſpeaking, one of the monks, by name Ammonius, wounded him on the head with a ſtone. His attendants, believing him killed, for he was in an inſtant covered all over with blood, betook themſelves to flight, but ſome of the citizens coming to his reſcue, ſeized the monk, and delivered him up to the prefect, who cauſed him to be tortured till he died on the rack. The populace reſolved to revenge his death, which they did in the following manner, to the great ſcandal of the chriſtian name and profeſſion. At that time lived in Alexandria, Hypatia, the daughter of the celebrated philoſopher Theon, who had been brought up and inſtructed by her father with extraordinary care, and was thought to excel in learning and quickneſs of apprehenſion all the philoſophers of that age. She was thoroughly acquainted with the different doctrines of the various ſects of philoſophers, and publicly explained them to an incredible number of diſciples, who flocked from all parts to hear her. She was no leſs remarkable for her chaſtity and modeſt carriage, tho' her friendſhip was courted by all the great men of her age, than for her knowledge and erudition. As ſhe was in great favour and eſteem with the prefect Oreſtes, the populace, partly to revenge the death of Ammonius, and partly becauſe they imagined, as ſhe was a pagan, that ſhe incenſed the prefect againſt the biſhop and his friends, roſe ſuddenly in a tumultuous manner: and being headed by one Peter, a reader in a church, they ſtopped her as ſhe was returning to her houſe, and pulling her out of her chariot, dragged her to a neighbouring church, where they flayed her alive, and tearing her in pieces, carried her mangled members to a place called Cinaron, and there burnt them to aſhes. This unheard-of barbarity reflected great ſcandal on the chriſtian name, eſpecially on the church of

The celebrated Hypatia inhumanly murdered, by the chriſtians.

Alexandria. Thus Socrates [u], whoſe authority is queſtioned by moſt eccleſiaſtic writers, who ſuppoſe him to have been a zealous Novatian, and conſequently an enemy to St. Cyril, who, upon his firſt coming to the ſee of Alexandria, had cauſed the penal laws againſt thoſe and all other ſectaries to be ſtrictly executed. This year, Theodoſius, by a law dated the ſeventh of December, excluded the pagans from all employments both civil and military [w]. By another law, dated the nineteenth of October, he depoſed Gamaliel, patriarch of the Jews, for having abuſed his authority [x]. Gamaliel is ſuppoſed to have been the laſt patriarch of that nation, which was thenceforth governed by primates choſen by the councils of the provinces, whereas the patriarchal dignity was hereditary.

The pagans excluded from all employments both civil and military.

THE next conſuls were Theodoſius, the ſeventh time, and Junius Quartus Palladius, who was prefect of Italy this and the five following years [y]. Vallia, lately created king of the Goths in Spain, reſolved to purſue the war againſt the Romans, and attempt the reduction of Africa; but the fleet he was ſending thither being ſhipwrecked near the ſtreights of Gibraltar, and moſt of the Goths on board of it drowned, he entered into a treaty with Conſtantius, and in the end concluded a peace with Honorius, delivered up hoſtages, and, upon his receiving ſix hundred thouſand meaſures of corn, ſent back Placidia to her brother [z]. Vallia not only concluded a peace, but entered into an alliance, with the Romans againſt the barbarians, who had ſettled in Spain, adviſing the emperor to let them fight it out amongſt themſelves, ſince whatever ſide prevailed, he was ſure to be a gainer [b]. This advice Honorius followed, to the great advantage and relief of the empire, as we ſhall ſee anon. Attalus, whom the Goths had carried with them into Spain, ſeeing a peace concluded between them and the Romans, endeavoured to make his eſcape by ſea; but the ſhip was taken, and carried to Conſtantius, then in Gaul, who ſent him to the emperor, by whoſe orders his right hand, or, as others will have it, only the fingers of his right hand were cut off, to prevent his writing, and he confined to the iſland of Lipari, where the good-natured emperor cauſed him to be treated with great great humanity [c]. This year, Theodoſius, leaving Conſtantinople for the firſt time after the twenty-ſecond of July, retired to Eudoxiopolis, called formerly Selymbria, on the ſea-coaſt between Conſtantinople and Heraclea, and continued partly there, partly at Heraclea, till the twenty-ninth of September [d]. The following year 417, when Honorius was conſul the eleventh time, and Conſtantius the ſecond, the emperor, to reward the ſervices of that brave general, gave him in marriage his ſiſter Placidia, an honour at which he had been long aſpiring. Placidia could not by any means be prevailed upon to give her conſent; but the emperor, taking hold of her hand, gave it in ſpite of her to Conſtantius [e]. They were thus married on the firſt of January of the preſent year, when Conſtantius entered upon his ſecond conſulſhip. A few months after, Honorius, leaving Ravenna, repaired to Rome, which he entered in triumph, cauſing Attalus, brought for that purpoſe from Lipari, to walk before his chariot. When the triumph was over, Attalus was remanded to the place of his exile, and Honorius returned ſoon after to Ravenna [f]. The Armorici, who had revolted in 409, and introduced a new form of government among themſelves, were this year brought again under ſubjection by Conſtantius [g]. About this time the Franks, after having dwelt for the ſpace of near two hundred years on the German ſide of the Rhine, were allowed to paſs that river, and ſettle in Thongria, that is, in the territory of Tongres, where they were governed by as many kings as they had cities or cantons [h]. But whether Faramond, who reigned at this time, had any authority over the other princes, or was only more powerful than the reſt, is what we are no where told. He was the ſon of Marcomir, of whom we have ſpoken elſewhere [i], and the grandſon of Priamus, whom Tiro Proſper calls the firſt king of the Franks mentioned in hiſtory [k]. In the eaſt nothing remarkable happened this year beſides an earthquake, which overturned ſeveral houſes at Conſtantinople, and the city of Cybyra in Phrygia [l].

Vallia, king of the Goths in Spain, concludes a peace with Honorius.

Attalus taken and confined to the iſland of Lipari.

[u] Socr. l. vii. c. 13. [w] Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit 10. leg. 21. p 293. [x] Idem, tit. 8. leg. 22. p. 239. [y] Idat. Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 376. [z] Oroſ p. 224. Philoſt. l. xii. c. 4. p. 534. Olymp. ibid. p. 189. [b] Oroſ. ibid.

Placidia married to Conſtantius.

The Franks allowed to ſettle in Thongria.

THE following year, Honorius being conſul the twelfth time, and Theodoſius the eighth, Vallia, making war upon the Vallia gains great advantages over the Vandals in Spain.

[c] Olymp. Philoſt. Oroſ. ibid. [d] Socr. l. vii. c. 36. p. 381. Cod. Theod. chron. p. 163. [e] Olymp. p. 192. [f] Cod. Theod, chron. p. 164. [g] Rut. l. i. p. 132. [h] Greg. Tur. hiſt. Fran. l. ii. c. 3. p. 64. Buch. de Belg. p. 453. Coint. tom. i. p. 44. [i] P. 122. & ſeq. [k] Proſp. chron. [l] Chron. Al p 718.

the barbarians in Spain, cut off all the Vandals called Silingi, who had ſettled in Bœtica or Andaluſia. He likewiſe made ſuch a dreadful havock of the Alans, who had hitherto ruled over the Vandals and Suevians, that their king Ata being killed among the reſt, they fled for protection to Gonderic, king of the Vandals, who had ſettled in Galicia, and ſubmitted to him. Hence the ſucceſſors of Gonderic uſed to ſtyle themſelves kings of the Vandals and Alans [m]. Conſtantius, to reward theſe eminent ſervices of Vallia and his Goths, gave them Aquitania Secunda, comprizing the preſent archbiſhoprick of Bourdeaux, and ſome neighbouring cities, that is, the whole tract from Toulouſe to the ſea, to which he added ſoon after Novempopulania or Aquitania Tertia, that is, the province of Auch, and Gaſcony. Vallia fixed his reſidence at Toulouſe, which by that means became the capital of the kingdom of the Goths [n]. Vallia on the other hand yielded to the Romans the countries he had taken from the Vandals and Alans in Spain [o]. He died ſoon after, leaving behind him one daughter, married to a Suevian, by whom ſhe had Ricimer, who completed the ruin of the weſtern empire. The deceaſed prince was ſucceeded by Theodoric, called by ſome Theodorus, and by others Theodorides [p]. In the eaſt one Plintha, by nation a Goth, revolted, but was defeated in Paleſtine [q]; which is all we know of this war. Plintha, notwithſtanding his defeat, muſt have concluded an advantageous peace with Theodoſius; for he was raiſed the following year to the conſular dignity, and preferred to the poſt of general of the Roman horſe and foot in which he acquitted himſelf with great reputation and fidelity [r]. In the conſulſhip he had Monaxius for his collegue, another of Theodoſius's officers; ſo that both conſuls were in 419, ſubjects of the eaſtern empire, as they had been in 417, of the weſtern. Of the two conſuls, one was, generally ſpeaking, choſen in the eaſt, the other in the weſt; and he named the firſt, who was firſt in rank: if they were equal, each named in the firſt place his own conſul. This year Honorius, by a law dated from Ravenna the twenty-ſecond of November, extended the right and privileges of an aſylum to all places within fifty paces of the church, declaring thoſe guilty of ſacrilege, who Vallia and his Goths allowed to ſettle in Aquitain.

He dies, and is ſucceeded by Theodoric.

[m] Idat. chron. Sid. carm ii p. 300. [n] Idat. Proſp. chron. [o] Jorn c. 33. p. 655. Idat. p. 32, 33. [p] John. p. 659. Olymp. p. 193. [q] Philoſt. l. xii. c. 8. p. 166 [r] Socr l. vii. c. 23. p. 392.

who ſhould arreſt any one within that ſpace [s], On the ſecond or third of July of this year, Placidia was delivered at Ravenna of a ſon, who was named Valentinian, and ſucceeded Honorius in the empire [t]. The barbarians in Spain being no longer harraſſed by the Goths, who had retired to Gaul, as we have related above, and ſettled there, began to quarrel among themſelves. Gonderic, king of the Vandals, having gained great advantages over Eremeric, king of the Suevians, obliged him in the end to fly for refuge to the mountains of Biſcay, where he kept him and his people blocked up. But in the mean time, Aſterius, count of Spain, and the vicar Maurocelus, falling unexpectedly upon Gonderic, cut great numbers of his men in pieces, and obliged the reſt to abandon Biſcay and Galicia, and retire into Bœtica [u]. Nothing happened this year in the eaſt, which hiſtorians have thought worthy of notice, except an attempt upon the life of Aetius, prefect of Conſtantinople, who was attacked by an aſſaſſin, named Ceryachus, as he was returning from the great church [w]. We are not told what gave occaſion to this attempt, nor what became of the aſſaſſin. By a law dated the twenty-fourth of September, Theodoſius declared thoſe guilty of death, who ſhould teach the barbarians the art of building ſhips, to which they were yet ſtrangers [x]. The following year, when Theodoſius was conſul the eighth time, and Conſtantius the third, the army mutinied in the eaſt, and put to death their general, by name Maximinus, as we read in the cronicle of Marcellinus: but of this mutiny no mention is made by any other writer. In the weſt nothing remarkable happened this year; but under the following conſuls Agricola and Euſtatius, the emperor Honorius, on the eight of February, raiſed Conſtantius to the imperial dignity, declared him his collegue, and gave the title of Auguſta to his wife Placidia [y]. The images of Conſtantius and Placidia were ſent to Conſtantinople, with the news of their promotion; but Theodoſius refuſed, for what reaſon we know not, to acknowledge them; which would have kindled a war between the two empires, had not Conſtantius died ſoon after, that is, on the ſecond of September, after having reigned ſeven months wanting ſix days. He was buried at Ravenna, where he died of a pleuriſy, in a mauſoleum, Valentinian III. born.

Gonderic, king of the Vandals, driven by the Romans out of Biſcay and Galicia, retires into Andaluſia.

Conſtantius is raiſed to the empire, but dies ſoon after.

[s] Cod. Theod. p. 36. [t] Idat. Marc. Proſp. Olymp. p. 192. Cange Byz. fam p. 66, 67. [u] Idat. chron. [w] Chron. Al. p. 720. [x] Cod. Theod l. ii. tit. 40. leg. 24. p. 322. [y] Theoph. P 72. Olymp. p. 192. Mar. chron.

ſoleum, built by his widow Placidia, near the church of St. Vitalis [z]. The ſame year the emperor Theodoſius married Eudocia on the ſeventh of June, on which occaſion there were great rejoicings at Conſtantinople [a]. Euodocia was the daughter of an Athenian philoſopher, by name Heraclitus, upon whoſe death her two brothers Geſius and Aurelianus defrauding her of the ſhare that was due to her of her father's eſtate, ſhe went to Conſtantinople to implore the protection of Pulcheria. As ſhe had been inſtructed by her father with extraordinary care in ſeveral languages, and in every branch of literature, and was beſides remarkable for her beauty and engaging behaviour, Pulcheria, after ſeveral conferences with her, began to think her a proper match for her brother Theodoſius, whom accordingly ſhe perſuaded to marry her. Thus the modern Greeks; but the antient writers tell us, that ſhe was the daughter, not of the philoſopher Heraclitus, but of Leontius, an Athenian ſophiſt, or profeſſor of eloquence at Athens [b]. Before the nuptials were celebrated Theodoſius cauſed her to be baptized by Atticus, biſhop of Conſtantinople, who changed the name of Athenais, which ſhe bore before, into that of Eudocia [c]. As Eudocia had been brought up to letters, ſhe uſed to divert herſelf with making verſes, and this very year ſhe compoſed a poem on the victory gained by the Romans over the Perſians [d], of which anon (Q). The two brothers of Eudocia, informed Theodoſius marries Eudocia.

Her birth, education, &c.

[z] Philoſt. l xii. c. 12. p. 537. Olymp. p. 193. Idat. chron. Mabil it. Ital. p 39, 40. [a] Chron. Al. p. 724. [b] Socr. l. vii. p. 360. [c] Evag. l. 1. c. 20. p. 297. [d] Socr. l. vii. c. 21. p. 360.

(Q) She likewiſe put into hexameter verſe the five books of Moſes, with thoſe of Joſhua, of the Judges, and of Ruth. This performance, which conſiſted of eight books, is highly commended by Photius, as is likewiſe the paraphraſe, which the ſame princeſs wrote in verſe upon the prophecies of Zachariah and Daniel, and Photius found with a poem on St. Cyprin and St. Juſtin, done without all doubt, ſays that writer, by the ſame hand (3). The reader will find in Photius a long abſtract of that poem (4) Zonaras mentions another work of the ſame empreſs, which he calls Homer's rhapſody. It contained the hiſtory of our Saviour, and entirely conſiſted of verſes borrowed from Homer. It was informed of her good fortune, and conſcious to themſelves of their behaviour towards her, abſconded; but ſhe, inſtead of reſenting the injury they had done her, invited both to court, and raiſed them to great preferments [e]. What Codinus, a modern Greek author, writes of the ſeven philoſophers, who, he ſays, attended Eudocia to Conſtantinople, has the air of a fable [f]. This year the peace, which had long ſubſiſted between the Romans and Perſians, was broken, and a war kindled between the two empires on the following occaſion. Vararanes V. who in 420, had ſucceeded his father Iſdegerdes in the kingdom of Perſia, having, at the inſtigation of the Magi, raiſed a bloody perſecution againſt the chriſtians in his dominions, great numbers of them took refuge in the Roman territories, and repaired to Conſtantinople, where they were received with great kindneſs by Atticus, biſhop of that city, and by him recommended to the emperor, who was ſo far from delivering them up when redemanded by the Perſian embaſſadors, that, on the contrary, he declared his reſolution of defending them, and the religion they profeſſed, with the whole ſtrength of the empire. Some miſunderſtanding had ariſen before between the two princes, the Perſian king refuſing to ſend back ſome workmen, whom he had hired out of the Roman territories, to dig in mines of gold, which he had lately diſcovered. Beſides the Perſians had plundered and inſulted ſome Roman merchants trading to cheir country [g]. Upon theſe provocations, as Vararanes continued to perſecute the chriſtians in his dominions, Theodoſius proclaimed war with the Perſians, and, without loſs of time, diſpatched Ardaburius, an Alan by nation, at the head of a conſiderable army, into Azazene, a Perſian province beyond the Tigris, which he laid waſte, after having gained a complete victory over Narſes, whom the king of War between the Perſians and Romans.

(3) Phot. c. 183. p. 413—416. (4) Idem, p 420

Narſes, the Perſian general, defeated by Ardaburius.

[e] Zonar. p. 44. Chron. Al. p. 724. Conſtantin. eccleſ. p. 30, 31.

[f] Vide Codin. de off.

[g] Socr. l. vii. c. 18, p 353.

was begun by a patrician, ſays Zonaras, but ended by Eudocia (5). Some take this patrician to have been one Pelagius, who was killed in the reign of Zeno, about the year 480, and is ſaid to have been the author of a rhapſody (6). But he was a pagan as appears from Cedrenus (7), and conſequently can hardly be thought to have been the author of that work or any part of it.

(5) Zon. tom. iii p. 37. Cange Byz. fam. p 71. (6) Voſſ. poet. Græc. p 78. (7) Cedr. p. 354.

of Perſia had ſent with a numerous army to oppoſe him. The battle was fought on the third of September, and the news of the victory brought on the ſixth of the ſame month to Conſtantinople, tho' ſeven hundred miles diſtant from the borders of Perſia, by a famous courier of thoſe times, named Palladius. He travelled with the ſame ſurprizing expedition to what part ſoever he was ſent; whence of him it was pleaſantly ſaid, that he had found means to reduce the Roman empire to a petty ſtate [h]. Narſes, after his defeat, abandoning the province of Azazene to the mercy of the enemy, marched with incredible expedition into Meſopotamia, with a deſign to invade the empire on that ſide, which was then deſtitute of troops, and unprepared for a defence. But Ardaburius, aware of his deſign, followed him cloſe, and obliged him to ſhelter himſelf within the walls of Niſibis, which place he immediately beſieged. In the mean time the king of Perſia having received intelligence of the defeat of his general, and the danger both he and the city of Niſibis were in, aſſembled all his forces; and entering Meſopotamia, laid ſiege to Theodoſiopolis, with a deſign to divert Ardaburius from that of Niſibis. But the beſieged, having at their head Eunomius, biſhop of the place, defended it with ſuch vigour and reſolution, that the Perſians, after having battered it with an incredible number of machines for a whole month without intermiſſion, were obliged to drop the enterprize and retire [i]. The enemy were ſoon after reinforced with a numberleſs multitude of Saracens, under the conduct of Alamundarus, a renowned warriour, who to raiſe the drooping ſpirits of the Perſian monarch, bragged, that in a ſhort time he would deliver into his hands, not only the Romans who beſieged Niſibis, but Antioch itſelf, the metropolis of Syria. But not long after, his men, being ſeized with a panic, and not knowing whither to fly, threw themſelves headlong into the Euphrates, where an hundred thouſand of them are ſaid to have periſhed. The Romans, ſeized at the ſame time with the like fear, upon a falſe report, that the king of Perſia was advancing to the relief of Niſibis with a great number of elephants, burnt all their machines, raiſed the ſiege, and retired in the utmoſt confuſion into the Roman dominions [k].

Ardaburius beſieges Niſibis.

And the king of Perſia Theodoſiopolis.

But are both ſeized with a panic, and retire.

THE following year, when Honorius was conſul the thirteenth time, and Theodoſius the tenth, the war was purſued [h] Socr. c. 19. p. 557, 558. [i] Idem ibid. Theodoret. l. v. c. 36. p. 243. [k] Socr. ibid. p. 559—560.

ſued with uncommon ſucceſs againſt the Perſians. From Socrates, who only hints at the military preparations, as foreign to his main purpoſe, it appears, that Ariobindus, one of the Roman generals, killed in a ſingle combat a Perſian famed for his valour; that Ardaburius put to the ſword ſeven Perſian commanders, ſurprized in an ambuſcade; and that Avitianus cut in pieces the few Saracens who had eſcaped being drowned in the Euphrates [i]. Notwithſtanding theſe advantages, Theodoſius, imagining the Perſians, thus weakened and diſheartened, would hearken to an accommodation, and give over perſecuting the chriſtians, in whoſe defence he had taken arms, ſent embaſſadors to Vararanes, with very reaſonable propoſals, which the Perſian would have accepted with joy, had he not been diverted from it by the immortals, that is, a corps of ten thouſand choſen men, ſo called becauſe they had never been conquered. Theſe perſuaded the king to keep the Romans in ſuſpenſe, with a deſign to ſurprize them in the mean time; for they imagined they would not at that juncture be upon their guard. With this view they divided themſelves into two bodies, one of which lay concealed among the woods, while the other advanced in order to attack the enemy, and draw them into the ambuſcade; but Procopius, who commanded a ſeparate body of Romans, obſerving their motions from an eminence where he was poſted, and appriſed of their deſign, attacked them in the rear, while Ardaburius charged them in front; by which means they were ſurrounded, and all to a man put to the ſword. Vararanes was no ſooner informed of this new calamity, than calling to the Roman embaſſadors, he agreed to the terms they had propoſed, and concluded a peace with the empire for an hundred years, which laſted, according to Evagrius, till the twelfth year of the reign of Anaſtatius; that is to the year 502 [k]. The chief article of this treaty was, that the Perſian king ſhould recal the baniſhed chriſtians, reſtore them to their eſtates, and put a ſtop to the cruel perſecution he had raiſed againſt them. While theſe things paſſed in the eaſt, Honorius attempted in the weſt to recover Spain out of the hands of the barbarians, greatly weakened by their inteſtine wars. With this view he ordered Caſtinus, general of the foot, and comes domeſticorum, or captain of the guards, to march againſt them, at the head of a very numerous numerous and powerful army. Caſtinus ſoon reduced them to ſuch ſtreights, that they were preparing to ſubmit, and abandon the country which they had ſeized; but the Roman general having unſeaſonably ventured an engagement, twenty thouſand of his men were cut in pieces, and he obliged with the reſt to take refuge in Tarraco [l]. Idatius aſcribes this defeat to the treachery of the Goths, who ſerved in the Roman army; but all other writers to the raſh and imprudent conduct of Caſtinus.

The Romans gain great advantages over the Perſians.

A peace concluded between the Romans and Perſians for 100 years.

[i] Idem c. 18. p. 357. [k] Evagr. l. i. c. 19 p. 276. Theodor. l. v. c 39. p. 245. Socr. c. 21. p. 359.

The Romans receive a great overthrow in Spain.

THE following year, when Marinianus and Aſclepiodotus were conſuls, a miſunderſtanding aroſe between Honorius and his ſiſter Placidia, whom the emperor had entertained at court, ever ſince the death of her husband Conſtantius, with ſuch tenderneſs and affection, as gave occaſion to ſome very ſcandalous reflections. Some authors write, that the great ſway ſhe bore in the adminiſtration giving no ſmall jealouſy to the other courtiers, they perſuaded the emperor, that ſhe correſponded privately with the Goths who ſtill looked upon her as their queen, and betrayed to them all his counſels [m]. However that be, it is certain, that the extraordinary affection he had hitherto ſhewn her being this year changed into an averſion no leſs extraordinary, Placidia thought it adviſeable to quit the court, and retire, with her ſon Valentinian, and her daughter Honoria, to Conſtantinople, where ſhe was kindly received by her nephew Theodoſius, tho' he had formerly refuſed to acknowledge her husband Conſtantius for emperor, and to give her the title of Auguſta [n]. Soon after, Honorius died at Ravenna of a dropſy, having reigned twenty eight years ſince the death of his father Theodoſius, and thirty-one ſince the time he was firſt created Auguſtus. He died, according to Theopharnes, on the fifteenth, according to Olympiodorus, on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt of the preſent year 423 [o]. His body is ſaid to have been found in 1542, with thoſe of his two wives, Maria and Thermantia, the daughters of Stilicho, in the church of St. Peter at Rome [p]. If ſo, it muſt have been conveyed thither from Ravenna, where his mauſoleum, ſuppoſed to have been built by his ſiſter Placidia, is ſtill to be ſeen. Of the writers who flouriſhed Placidia obliged to quit the court and retire into the eaſt with her ſon Valentinian.

Honorius dies.

[l] Greg. Tur. l. ii. c. 9. p. 63. 64. Salvian. l. vii. p. 165—168.
[m] Olymp p. 196. [n] Idem ibid. Caſſiod. chron. [o] Theoph. p. 72. Olymp. ibid. [p] Mabill. it. Ital. p. 145.

flouriſhed in his reign, we ſhall ſpeak in note (R). Honorius no ſooner expired, than an expreſs was diſpatch'd to Theodoſius with

(R) Under Honorius flouriſhed Olympiodorus, who wrote in Greek the hiſtory of that prince, from the year 407, the thirteenth of his reign, to his death. His work conſiſted of twenty-two books, and was inſcribed to Theodoſius II. or the younger (8). The reader will find an abſtract of it in Photius (9), who cenſures the ſtyle as low, and altogether unworthy of an hiſtorian. However, both Zoſimus and Sozomen ſeem to have copied it in ſeveral places, with ſome alteration in the phraſe and expreſſion. The author was a native of Thebes in Egypt, and a pagan by religion. He was ſent, with others, in 412, on an embaſſy to a king of the Hunns, named Donatus. Of this voyage (for he went by ſea) he gives us an account, and likewiſe of his journey to Athens, and of another to Syene in Egypt, and to the country of the Blemmyes (10). This is all we know of him. Renatus Profuturus Frigeridus wrote likewiſe the hiſtory of the reign of Honorius, from the year 406, to the death of that prince; but of his work only a few paſſages have reached our times, quoted by Gregory of Tours (11). Claudian may be ranked among the hiſtorians who have written of Honorius; for of him we have learnt ſeveral particulars of that prince's reign. He was a native of Alexandria in Egypt, as he himſelf tells us in different places (12), and not the ſon of a merchant at Florence, as ſome modern writers have endeavoured to prove. He firſt applied himſelf to Greek poetry; and a fragment of a poem written in that language on the battle of the giants has reached our times (13). His firſt Latin poem was on the conſulſhip of the two brothers Olybrius and Probinus, who were conſuls in 395. He continued to write on different ſubjects till the ſixth conſulſhip of Honorius in 404, he was ſent by the citizens of Rome in 396, to congratulate Honorius on his third conſulſhip (14). He was honoured by the Roman ſenate with a ſtatue, which, in conſideration of his excellency in poetry, was erected in the ſquare of Trajan (15). This honour was conferred upon him before he wrote his poem on the battle of Pollentia, fought in 403 (16). He was then tribune and notary, or ſecretary of ſtate, and enjoyed the title of clariſſimus, which was given to the Roman ſenators. Having, by means of Serena, Stilicho's wife, married a lady poſſeſſed of great wealth in Africa, he thenceforth became

(8) Phot. c. 80. p, 177. (9) Idem ibid. (10) Idem. p. 177—193. (11) Greg. Tur. hiſt. Franc. l. ii. c. 9. p. 62--64. (12) Claud. ep. 1. p. 238. ep. 4. p. 241. ep. 5. p. 11, 15, &c. (13) Claud. p. 236. (14) Idem, epig. 9. p. 140. (15) Idem, conſ. Hon. 3. p. 39. (16) Bell. Goth. p. 156.

with the news of his death, which that prince concealed for ſome days, and in the mean time gave private orders to a body of became a profeſſed admirer, or rather adorer, of that great general and ſtateſman, inveighing at the ſame time with much bitterneſs againſt his rivals Rufinus and Eutropius (17); neither does he ſpare his countryman Adrian, who was prefectus prætorio in 405, and 412, having probably been ill-uſed by him; for in an epiſtle addreſſed to him to appeaſe his wrath, he complains, that his family was undone; that of his friends ſome had been put to the rack, and others baniſhed; and that he himſelf was reduced to beggary (18). To avoid the ill treatment he met with from Adrian, he retired, perhaps to the eaſt; for Evagrius ranks him among the poets who flouriſhed under Theodoſius II (19). He was, as appears from his poems, an adorer of Jupiter, and all the other pagan gods. Oroſius calls him a moſt obſtinate pagan; but at the ſame time commends him as an excellent poet (20). St. Auſtin likewiſe ſpeaks of him as a perſon greatly attached to the pagan ſuperſtition (21). Hence ſuch pieces as contain chriſtian ſentiments are by the beſt critics thought not to have been written by him, tho' they paſs under his name, but perhaps by Claudian Mamertus, a chriſtian poet of Vienne in Gaul. Baillet prefers Claudian to all the poets who have written ever ſince the age of Auguſtus, tho' he is not, in the opinion of that writer, without ſome faults. His ſtyle is ſometimes flat, and ſometimes ſublime, and moſt of his poems filled with youthful ſallies (22). In all his poems there are ſeveral moſt beautiful paſſages. His invectives, eſpecially the two books againſt Eutropius, are moſt eſteemed by the learned (23). It is uncertain whether or no the poem on mount Ætna was written by him. Rutilius, or, as he is ſtyled at the head of his poem, Rutilius Claudius Numatianus, flouriſhed in the reign of Honorius. He was a native of Gaul, according to ſome, of Toulouſe. His father had been governor of Hetruria, quæſtor, comes largitionum, and prefect (24). The Hetruſcans, by whom he was greatly beloved, on account of his good nature, and impartiality in the adminiſtration of juſtice, erected ſeveral ſtatues to his honour at Piſa, and in other places. He was dead when his ſon wrote his poem. Rutilius bore two of the greateſt employments in the ſtate, viz. the office of magiſter officiorum, and that of prefect of Rome 25). In his poem he declares himſelf a pagan, and a ſworn enemy to the monks

(17) Idem, ep. 2. p. 239, 240. (18) Idem, epig. 29. p. 261. & ep. 1. p. 257. (19) Evag. l. i c. 19. p. 278. (20) Oroſ. l. vii c. 35 p. 221 (21) Aug. civ. Dei, l. v. c. 26. p. 142. (22) Baill. jugemens de ſçavans. tom. 6. p. 485 -492. (23) Idem p. 490, 491. (24) Reut. p. 128, 137, 139. (25) Idem, p. 131, 138.

of troops to advance into the neighbourhood of Salonæ in Dalmatia, that they may be ready at hand, to prevent the diſturbances, monks, eſpecially to thoſe who lived in the iſland of Capraria or Capraia, on the coaſt of Tuſcany, a young nobleman of his acquaintance having renounced a plentiful eſtate, and abandoned his friends, relations, and even his wife, to lead a retired life among them (26). Rutilius left Rome, where he had lived many years to return to Gaul, where he had not been ever ſince the barbarians entered that country in 407. He ſet out from Rome in 417, or 420 about the month of October, and embarquing on the Tiber, repaired to Porto, where he waited a whole fortnight for the new moon, and the ſetting of the Pleiades (27). Thoſe who are ſkilled in aſtronomy, may learn from thence the preciſe year and day of his departure. In 417, and 420, it was new moon in the latter end of October. At Porto, twelve miles diſtant from Rome, he heard, or imagined to hear, the ſhouts of the people in the circus. He embarqued there on board a ſmall veſſel, for the convenience of landing when he pleaſed to viſit his friends, and of lying every night aſhore (28). He landed at Circumcellæ, now Civita Vecchia, and went to view certain hot waters three miles from thence called the baths of Taurus. Putting to ſea again, he diſcovered the ruins of Graviſcæ, and Coſa or Coſſa, two cities famous in former ages, The inhabitants of the latter are ſaid to have been forced, by prodigious ſwarms of rats, to quit their habitations, and abandon the place of their nativity (29). He came aſhore likewiſe at Port-Ercole, beyond which he ſaw the iſland of Elba, more uſeful, ſays he, on account of its iron-mines, than the Tagus for its golden ſands. From Port-Ercole he purſued his voyage to Piombino, and from thence to Volterra, where he went to ſee the fine houſe of Albinus prefect of Rome, and the ſalt-pits at a ſmall diſtance from it At Volterra he found Victorinus his intimate friend, who, having abandoned Toulouſe, the place of his nativity, after the ſettling of the Goths there, had retired to Italy, and led a country-life in the neighbourhood of Volterra. He had been formerly vicar to the prefect of Britain, which office he diſcharged to the great ſatisfaction of the people. Honorius, upon his retiring from Touloſe, had invited him to court, giving him the title of count; but he preferred a retired life to all the honours the emperor could confer upon him (30). From Volterra he ſailed to the iſland of Gorgona, and from thence to the port of Piſa, where he landed, and went to the city of Piſa, to ſee one of his old friends, by name Protadius, (26) Idem, p. 137. (27) Idem, p. 131, 132. (28) Idem ibid. (29) Idem, p. 133. (30) Idem, p. 137.

diſturbances, which, he apprehended, would be raiſed in the weſt by the death of Honorius, who had left no children to ſucceed us, who, having loſt a great eſtate in Gaul, ſeized, no doubt, by the barbarians, enjoyed greater happineſs on a ſmall farm he had in Umbria, than he had ever done when poſſeſſed of immenſe wealth, and large territories in his own country. He had been prefect of Rome, and had been diſtinguiſhed with ſeveral other great employments (31). Several letters written to him by Symmachus have reached our times (32). From the port of Piſa, where Rutilius was obliged to continue ſome time, by reaſon of the bad weather, he purſued his voyage to Portus Lunæ, now Lerice, as is commonly believed (33). Thus far his itinerary, that is, the poem in which he deſcribes his voyage. It was divided into two books, of which the latter is almoſt entirely loſt. It has all the elegance and beauty that can be expected in a performance of that unpoliſhed age, and informs us of ſeveral things relating to the hiſtory of thoſe times (34). Some groſs miſtakes that are to be found in it are, without all doubt, owing partly to the tranſcribers, partly to ignorant critics, who have ſtrangely mangled and confounded ſeveral paſſages. The author betrays throughout the whole work an inveterate hatred both to the Jews and chriſtians; whence we may conclude Lachalius, Lucilius, and his other heroes, to have been pagans. Lucilius wrote ſome ſatires, in no reſpect inferior, if we may depend upon the judgment of Rutilius, to thoſe of Turnus and Juvenal (35); but none of them have reached our times. One Flavius, ſaid by St. Jerom to have wrote in verſe a treatiſe on phyſic, is ſuppoſed by Voſſius to have flouriſhed in the reign of Honorius, and likewiſe the author of a comedy, ſtyled Querulus Plauti, which is inſcribed to one Rutilius (36). About this time flouriſhed Macrobius, or, as he is ſtyled at the head of his works, Aurelius Theodoſius Ambroſius Macrobius; for all the perſons he introduces in his ſaturnalia, lived under Theodoſius I. and his ſon Honorius. He was born in a country where the Latin tongue was not common, that is, in Greece, or in the eaſt (37). To his name is added, in an antient manuſcript, the word Sicetinus, denoting perhaps his country (38); but to us quite unknown. He is diſtinguiſhed with the title of illuſtrious, peculiar to the firſt officers of the empire (39). Hence moſt writers conclude him to be the Macrobius who was great chamberlain to Theodoſius II. in 422, for whoſe ſake that prince equalled the office of great chamberlain to ſucceed him. Having taken this ſtep, he made public the death of his uncle, and at the ſame time cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed

(31) Idem, p. 138. (32) Sym. l. iv. ep. 17, 34, 57. p. 150, 174. ep 30, 32, &c. (33) Rut. p. 141. (34) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. iii. c. 2. p. 746. (35) Rut. p 137. (36) Voſſ. ibid. (37) Macrob. ſat. l. i. c. 8. p. 161. (38) Wilth append. ad dypt. Leod. p. 4. (39) Macrob. p. 159.

to thoſe of the præfectus prætorio and the magiſter militiæ (40). But againſt this opinion may be objected, that Macrobius, the author of the ſaturnalia had a ſon, by name Euſtathius; whereas the great chamberlains were, generally ſpeaking, eunuchs. Beſides, we cannot perſuade ourſelves, that Theodoſius II. would have ſuffered a pagan (for ſuch was the writer we are ſpeaking of) to enjoy that office, which obliged him to be always about the emperor's perſon. The opinion of thoſe is better founded, who ſuppoſe the Macrobius, who was proconſul of Africa in 410, to be the author of the ſaturnalia. One Macrobius was vicar of Spain in 399, and 400, but ſtripped of his employment, and puniſhed for ſome neglect with reſpect to the poſts (41). The work by which Macrobius is chiefly known is his ſaturnalia, that is, a collection of antiquities made by him for the inſtruction of his ſon, and ſuppoſed to have been uttered in a familiar converſation among friends, during the ſaturnalia, or the feaſts of Saturn. The perſons he introduces were the moſt famous then at Rome for their learning and erudition. He addreſſes his work to his ſon, for whoſe ſake he undertook it. He relates moſt things in the terms of the authors from whom he borrowed them, by reaſon he could not expreſs himſelf with eaſe in the Latin tongue; and truly, when he ſpeaks himſelf, he plainly betrays his ſmall knowledge of that language (42). Beſides the ſaturnalia, he wrote two books on the dream of Scipio, which he likewiſe inſcribed to his ſon, for whoſe inſtruction he undertook that, as he had done the other, work. Theſe two books were tranſlated into Greek by Maximus, ſurnamed Planudes (43). Another book paſſes under the name of Macrobius, on the conformity and diſagreement of the Greek and Latin tongues (44). Macrobius wrote indeed a book on that ſubject; but the work which has reached our times was done by John Erigenes, who flouriſhed in the ninth century, and followed the plan of Macrobius, whom he copied, changing ſome things, and adding many of his own (45). One of the chief perſons introduced by Macrobius in his ſaturnalia is Servius, who had lately begun to teach polite literature at Rome, and is painted as a perſon of great learning, and at the ſame time univerſally beloved on account of his modeſty (46). He is introduced ſpeaking moſtly of Virgil, whoſe inimitable

Æneid

(40) Cod. Theod. tit. 2. p. 82. (41) Idem, l. viii. tit. 5. leg. 61. p. 565. (42) Vide Baillet. tom. 2. p. 27, 28. (43) Macrob. p. 17. (44) Idem, p. 556. (45) Idem, p. 601, 604, 736. (46) Idem, ſat. l. i. c. 2. p. 166. & l. vi. c. 7. p. 478.

Theodoſius cauſes himſelf to be proclaimed emperor of the weſt. John, the deceaſed emperor's chief ſecretary, aſſumes the purple.

proclaimed emperor of the weſt in his room [q]. This did not deter John, the deceaſed emperor's chief ſecretary, from aſſuming

[q] Olymp. ibid. Socr. l. vii. c. 23. p. 363. Idat. chron.

Æneid he explained daily to the Roman youth. Maurus Servius Honoratus, the author of the learned comment on that poet, is, without all doubt, the Servius of Macrobius; but moſt authors are of opinion, that what has reached us is but an abridgment of that learned work; nay, ſome take it to have been compiled from Servius, and ſeveral other antient critics. It is generally held in great eſteem, tho' not quite free from faults (47). In the fifth or ſixth century flouriſhed a grammarian, named Martianus Mineus Felix Capella, who publiſhed ſeveral philological pieces, partly in proſe, and partly in verſe, which are ſtill extant, and divided into ſeven books. He is ſaid in the manuſcript copies to have been honoured with the proconſular dignity. He was a native of Carthage; and truly his barbarous and uncouth ſtyle plainly ſhews, that he was no Roman. In his allegorical marriage of Mercury with the ſciences, there is a great deal of erudition; but the invention is low and mean (48). Securus Melior Felix, who profeſſed the chriſtian religion, and taught rhetoric at Clermont in Auvergne, was at the trouble of correcting, in 534, one of the copies of Capella's works. Felix is ſtyled in that manuſcript V. SP. Com. Conſiſt. that is, Vir ſpectabilis, comes conſiſtorianus, a man of rank, and one of the conſiſtorial or the emperor's counſellors (49). Capella was greatly eſteemed in France about the end of the ſixth century, as appears from Gregory of Tours (50). Soſipater Chariſius, who publiſhed five books of obſervations on the grammar, ſtill extant, flouriſhed, according to Baillet, in the time of Honorius, and before him a grammarian named Diomedes, whoſe works have likewiſe reached our times; but ſtrangely mangled by Johannes Cæſarius, who publiſhed them, with many obſervations of his own. Chariſius is quoted by Priſcian, who wrote about the end of the fifth century (51). About the ſame time, Fabius Fulgentius Planciades publiſhed an explication of ſome words, addreſſed to one Calcidius, another grammarian. He is ſtyled, and indeed deſervedly, both by Voſſius (52) and Baillet (53), one of the moſt ignorant, impertinent, and trifling authors that ever wrote. He aſcribes to Tacitus, and other writers, works never before heard of.

(47) Vide Baill. tom. 2 p. 29—32. (48) Idem, p. 34, 35. Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. iii. p. 712, 713. (49) Wilt. p. 4. (50) Vide Voſſ. p. 713, 714. (51) Vide Baill. tom. 3. p. 36—40. (52) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. i. c 30. p. 159. (53) Baill. p. 38, 39.

aſſuming the purple in Rome, being, no doubt, encouraged in his uſurpation by Caſtinus, then commander in chief of all the troops in the weſt; for he was afterwards diſgraced and baniſhed, as one of the uſurper's chief friends and abetters. The new tyrant was immediately acknowledged, not only in Rome and Italy, but likewiſe in Gaul and Dalmatia; which encouraged him to diſpatch embaſſadors to Theodoſius, to acquaint him with his promotion; but that prince refuſing to acknowledge him, and having even ordered his embaſſadors to be arreſted, and thrown into priſon, he began to prepare for war, and ſent the famous Aetius, with great ſums, to draw the Hunns over to his aſſiſtance. That celebrated commander, who governed the weſtern empire with an abſolute ſway during the reign of Valentinian III. was a native of Doroſterum in Mœſia, and the ſon of Gaudentius, who, tho' by birth a Scythian, was raiſed to the higheſt employments in the empire, and married an Italian lady of great diſtinction, called by ſome Italica [r]. By her he had Aetius, who ſerved at firſt among the emperor's domeſtics, or the troops of his houſhold, and was given as an hoſtage to Alaric, after the battle of Pollentia in 403, and afterwards to the [r] Val. rer. Franc. l. iii. p. 220.

of. Cave calls him an arrant trifler (54); and all other critics ſpeak of him with the utmoſt contempt. In the reign of Theodoſius I. or his children, was publiſhed, as is commonly believed, what we call the map or tables of Peutinger, which are a kind of itinerary made by ſome quarter-maſter, if we may ſo call him, for the uſe of thoſe who conducted the Roman troops from one place to another. The author ſeems to have been altogether ignorant both of geography and mathematics. Theſe tables belonged to one Conrad Peutinger in Augſbourg, and are thence called the tables of Peutinger; but they were publiſhed by Velſer, who had them engraved by John Moret of Antwerp. The reader will find them in the theatrum geographicum of Bretius, publiſhed at Amſterdam in 1619, and among Velſer's works, publiſhed at Nuremberg in 1682. A civilian, by name Euſebius, deſcribed the war of Gainas in a poem, which he ſtyled Gainades; and the ſame ſubject was handled by another poet, named Ammonius, who read it to Theodoſius II. in 438. Both theſe poems were greatly eſteemed (55); but neither of them has reached our times. Voſſius ſuppoſes them to have been written in the Greek tongue, and ranks the authors among the Greek poets (56).

(54) Cave ſcript. eccleſ. p. 274. (55) Socr. p. 309.
(56) Voſſ poet. Græc. c 9 p. 77, 78.

Hunns, with whoſe chiefs he, by that means, became acquainted. Upon his return from the country of the Hunns, he married the daughter of Carpilio, captain of the guards, and had by her two ſons, Gaudentius, who, after the death of Valentinian, was taken by Genſeric, and Carpilio, whom Valentinian ſent with the character of embaſſador to Attila[s]. Aetius was a perſon of a majeſtic mien, of a tall ſtature, and a robuſt conſtitution, which enabled him to bear with patience the greateſt fatigues and toils attending a military life. He is no leſs commended by the antients on account of his prudence, addreſs, and penetration in ſtate affairs, than for his courage, intrepidity, and experience in war. He was quite free from avarice, had but little ambition, and was ſuch a lover of juſtice, that no recommendations, however preſſing, were capable of making him ſwerve from what to him appeared equitable. Such is the character given him by Frigeridus, a writer who flouriſhed in his time, as quoted by Gregory of Tours[t]. Procopius writes, that Aetius and Boniface, who defended, as we have obſerved above, Marſeilles, when attacked by Ataulphus, were the two greateſt commanders in the whole empire, and that they deſerved to be called the laſt Romans[u]. John, upon his uſurping the empire, committed to Aetius the care of his palace, and then ſent him to engage the Hunns in his cauſe, with orders to fall upon the rear of the troops of Theodoſius, if they entered Italy, while he himſelf charged them in front[w]. On the ſecond of January of the preſent year, Eudocia was declared Auguſta[x].

Aetius his character.

He ſides with the uſurper.

THE next conſuls were Caſtinus and Victor. The former was general of the troops in the weſt. Of the latter we find no farther mention in hiſtory. In an antient inſcription, John the uſurper is ſtyled conſul, he being probably acknowledged in the weſt, and not Victor, whom we may ſuppoſe to have belonged to the eaſtern empire[y]. This year, Theodoſius, having drawn together all the forces of the eaſtern empire, ordered them to march to the frontiers of Dalmatia, under the conduct of Ardaburius, his ſon Aſpar, and Candidianus. With them he ſent Placidia and her ſon Valentinian, allowing the former to reſume the title and enſigns of Auguſta, which had been given her by her brother Honorius, but ſhe had quitted upon her entering the dominions nions of Theodoſius; and the latter to wear the habit peculiar to the nobiliſſimi; which title had ſome time ſince been given to the ſons of emperors before they were created Cæſars. This was renouncing all pretenſions to the empire of the weſt, and tacitly yielding it to Placidia, and Valentinian. Before they left Conſtantinople, Theodoſius bethrothed his daughter Licinia Eudoxia, born in 422, to young Valentinian, born on the ſecond or third of July in 419. When this ceremony was over, Placidia ſet out from Conſtantinople, with her ſon, who upon his arrival at Theſſalonica, received the enſigns peculiar to the Cæſar, at the hands of Helio, magiſter officiorum to Theodoſius, by whom he had been ſent thither for that purpoſe [z]. The following year, Theodoſius being conſul, the eleventh time, with Valentinian, the army of Theodoſius, having croſſed Pannonia and Illyricum, appeared unexpectedly before Salonæ, which was taken by ſtorm. There it was agreed among the generals, that Aſpar ſhould lead the cavalry, with Placidia and Valentinian, by land to Aquileia, while the foot, under the command of his father Ardaburius, was conveyed thither by ſea. This ſcheme was ſo well executed on the ſide of Aſpar, that arriving at Aquileia, before the enemy had the leaſt notice of his march, he entered the place without oppoſition; but the fleet being diſperſed by a violent ſtorm, Ardaburius was driven aſhore, and taken by the uſurper's ſoldiers, who immediately carried him to their emperor, then at Ravenna, by whom he was received with great joy, and treated with the utmoſt civility, the uſurper hoping by his means to prevail upon Theodoſius, with whom Ardaburius bore a great ſway, to acknowledge him for his collegue. As he was allowed to converſe with whom he pleaſed, he gained over the chief officers, who had already begun to be tired of their new prince, and privately acquainting his ſon Aſpar with the ſecurity in which the tyrant lived, adviſed him to advance ſpeedily with his beſt troops to Ravenna. Aſpar immediately ſet out from Aquileia with the cavalry; and being conducted through the marſhes which ſurrounded Ravenna on the land-ſide by a ſhepherd, whom Socrates ſuppoſes to have been an angel, he entered the city, finding the gates open and unguarded, and with the aſſiſtance of the officers gained over by his father, ſecured the tyrant before he had time to make his eſcape, and ſent him in chains to Placidia and Valentinian, then at Aquileia, Theodoſius grants to Placidia the title of Auguſta, and to Valentinian that of Cæſar.

[s] Caſſiod. l. i. ep. 4. p. 4. Priſ. leg. p. 53. Sidon. p. 169. Oroſ. p. 305. [t] Greg. Tur. p. 50. [u] Procop. bell. Vand l. i. c. 3. p 183. [w] Olymp. p. 96. Proſp. chron. [x] Chron. Alex. p. 726. [y] Sidon. p. 137.

Aſpar takes Aquileia from the uſurper.

[z] Olymp. p. 169. Proſp, chron. Philoſt. p. 573. Greg. Tur. p. 57.

He ſurpriſes Ravenna, and takes the uſurper, who is put to death.

Aquileia, who ordered firſt his right-hand, and then his head, to be cut off [a]. Procopius writes, that after his hand was cut off in the circus, he was by way of deriſion, carried about the ſtreets on an aſs, expoſed to the outrages and inſults of the incenſed multitude [b]. Thus ended the uſurpation of John, after he had borne the title of emperor about a year and ſix months, according to Philoſtorgius [c]. Three days after his death, Aetius entered Italy, with an army of ſixty thouſand Hunns, who being met by Aſpar, a bloody battle was fought, without any conſiderable advantage on either ſide; but, in the mean time, Aetius informed of the death of the uſurper, thought it adviſable to make the beſt terms he could for himſelf. Accordingly, Placidia promiſing not only to receive him into favour, but to diſtinguiſh him with the title of count, he ſubmitted, and prevailed upon the Hunns to return into their own country [d]. Caſtinus, who was ſuppoſed to have favoured the uſurpation of John, was ſent into exile [e]. When news of the captivity and death of the uſurper was brought to Conſtantinople, Theodoſius declared his couſin, young Valentinian, emperor, and Placidia regent of the empire during her ſon's minority. He intended to have taken a progreſs into Italy, in order to inveſt him there with the ſovereignty, and with that deſign advanced as far as Theſſalonica; but was ſeized in that city with a malady, which obliged him to return to Conſtantinople, whence he diſpatched Helio to Rome, where Valentinian then was, with the purple and imperial diadem, which the young prince received on the twenty-third of October of the preſent year 425 [f]. The ſame year, the Vandals, who had ſettled in Spain, ravaged the Balearic iſlands; and the Goths, to whom ſettlements had been allotted in Gaul, ſeized on ſome of the neighbouring cities, and even laid ſiege to Arles, which however they were forced to raiſe at the approach of Aetius, who was ſent againſt them with a conſiderable army [g]. In the eaſt, Thrace was laid waſte by the Hunns, probably the ſame who came to the aſſiſtance of the uſurper John, and even threatened Conſtantinople with a ſiege, but their leader, by name Rougas, or Roilas, being killed with lightning, and a great number of them being daily ſwept away by a plague, which Aetius ſubmits and is received into favour.

Valentinian III. declared emperor of the weſt, and his mother Placidia regent.

Thrace ravaged by the Hunns.

[a] Socr. p. 363. Philoſtorg. p. 538. Olymp. ibid. p. 197. [b] Procop bell. Vand. l. i. c. 3. p. 181. [c] Philoſt. ibid. [d] Idem ibid Caſſiod. chron. [e] Proſ. chron. [f] Socr. l. vii. c. 24. p. 364. Olymp. ibid. Idat. chron. [g] Sidon. p. 22. Idat. chron.

which broke out in the army, the reſt withdrew of their own accord, dreading, not the valour of the Romans, ſay Socrates, but the power of Heaven, which had evidently eſpouſed the cauſe of Theodoſius [h]. The following year 426, when Theodoſius was conſul the twelfth time, and Valentinian the ſecond, nothing remarkable happened in either empire. But under the next conſuls Hierius and Ardaburius the Goths, who had held Pannonia ever ſince the year 377, when they firſt entered that province, were by Theodoſius transferred from thence into Thrace, where they continued for the ſpace of fifty-eight years, that is, till they made themſelves maſters of Italy, under the conduct of Theodoric [i]. This gives us room to believe, that Theodoſius, in yielding the weſtern empire to Valentinian, retained Pannonia, which compriſed that part of the preſent Auſtria and Hungary, that lies on the Roman ſide of the Danube, and had hitherto belonged to the empire of the weſt. Great diſturbances happened this year in Africa, which were attended with the loſs of that province. The celebrated count Bonifacius, who is ſtyled by St. Auſtin the joy of the church, the bulwark of Africa, and the glory of the empire, had been rewarded by Honorius, for his gallant behaviour at Marſeilles, with the command of the troops in Africa; which province he defended with great bravery againſt the repeated attempts of John, tho' acknowledged by all the other commanders and governors of provinces. Placidia, highly pleaſed with his conduct and loyalty, called him to court, upon the death of that tyrant; and, after beſtowing upon him the higheſt encomiums, preferred him to the poſt of comes domeſticorum, and ſent him back into Africa with an unlimited power. This gave no ſmall jealouſy to his rivals at court, eſpecially to Felix, commander in chief of the Roman forces, and to Aetius, who, after his departure, perſuaded Placidia, that he had preſerved Africa for himſelf, and only waited an opportunity of eſtabliſhing there an independent ſovereignty. Aetius added, that the empreſs might, when ſhe pleaſed, oblige him to pull off the maſk, by recalling him from his government; for he was very ſure Bonifacius would diſobey her orders. Hereupon the credulous princeſs immediately ordered Bonifacius to repair to Rome; but Aetius having written to him before, that the empreſs ſought his ruin, and in order to compaſs it, would ſoon recall him, adviſing him at the ſame time, with great proteſtations of friendſhip, to conſult

The Goths removed from Pannonia into Thrace.

Bonifacius in great favour with Placidia.

He is forced by the treachery of Aetius and Felix, to revolt.

[h] Socr. p. 387. [i] Theop. p. 81. Marc chron.

ſult his own ſafety, he, upon the receipt of Placidia's letter, concluded Aetius to be his true friend, and following his advice, he refuſed to comply with the orders he had received. Hereupon Placidia, no longer queſtioning the truth of Aetius's information, declared Bonifacius a public enemy, and diſpatched a ſtrong body of troops againſt him, under the command of Mavortius, Galbio, and Sinex, who beſieged Bonifacius, in what place we are nowhere told, and kept him ſhut up, till quarrelling among themſelves, Mavortius and Galbio were killed by the treachery of Sinex, and he in a ſally by Bonifacius, who gained a complete victory, without the loſs of one man. Placidia, being reſolved, notwithſtanding the ill ſucceſs of her three generals, to purſue the war with vigour, committed the whole management of it to to Sigiſvult, by nation, a Goth, who, without loſs of time, paſſing over into Africa, with a great number of his countrymen, made himſelf maſter of Carthage and Hippo. Bonifacius, finding the empreſs obſtinately bent upon his ruin, and himſelf not in a condition to contend with the whole ſtrength of the empire, had recourſe to the Vandals, who, ever ſince the defeat of Caſtinus in 422, had peaceably enjoyed the province of Bœtica or Andaluſia, and were at this time governed by Genſeric, brother to the late king Gonderic. Genſeric was according to Jornandes [k] and Procopius [l], of a low ſtature, and lame by a fall from his horſe: he thought much, and ſpoke little; was an enemy to pleaſure and debauchery; had a wonderful addreſs in gaining the affection of the people, and ſowing diſſenſions among his enemies. He was remarkably brave and courageous; but no leſs ambitious and paſſionate; well ſkilled in the art of war, and long enured to the hardſhips and toils attending it. He renounced the catholic faith, which he firſt profeſſed, to embrace the doctrine of Arius, which prevailed among his countrymen the Vandals [m]. His brother Gonderic left ſeveral ſons behind him; but he cauſed them all to be put to death, together with their mother [n]. With this barbarian Boniſacius, whoſe piety had been formerly ſo much extolled by St. Auſtin [o], was forced, in his own defence, to enter into a treaty whereof the chief, and perhaps the only, article was, that, upon their aſſiſting him, Africa ſhould be divided between, Gonderic, ſays Procopius falſly, ſuppoſing

Defeats the troops ſent againſt him.

Another army ſent to reduce him.

He returns to Genſeric king of the Vandals.

[k] Jorn. c. 33. p. 657. [l] Procop. p. 184. [m] Idat. p 17. [n] Malel. hiſt. chron. [o] Aug. ep. 70. p. 126.

ſuppoſing him ſtill alive, Genſeric and himſelf [p]. The treaty being agreed to, Genſeric, having aſſembled a great number of veſſels, ordered all his Vandals, women and children as well as men, to embarque; and abandoning Spain in the month of May of the year 528, while Felix and Taurus were conſuls, croſſed the ſtreights of Gibraltar, and landed in Africa [q]. The Romans took poſſeſſion anew of the provinces which the Vandals had abandoned, and held them, till they were driven out by the Suevians, as the Suevians were in their turn by the Goths, who by that means, came to ſettle in that part of Spain [r]. The ſame year, Aetius was ſent into Gaul, to make war upon the Francs, whom he defeated with great ſlaughter, and obliged them to abandon the country on the Roman ſide of the Rhine, in which they had been allowed by Honorius to ſettle, and to retire, with their families beyond the river [s]. What gave occaſion to this war, we are no-where told. The Francs were governed at this time by Clodius, as Proſper Tyro ſtyles him [t], or Clodion, as he is called by Gregory of Tours and the modern writers [u]. He is ſuppoſed, to have been the ſon, as well as the ſucceſſor, of Faramond. Nothing happened this year in the eaſt worthy of notice, except the publiſhing of a law, by which all brothels were ſuppreſſed in Conſtantinople [w]. Florentius and Dionyſius, conſuls for the year 429, were ſucceeded by Theodoſius and Valentinian, the former the thirteenth time, and the latter the third time conſul. During the conſulſhip of the two princes, Aetius was raiſed to the chief command of all the troops of the weſtern empire, in the room of Felix, who was at the ſame time created a patrician; but ſoon after killed in Ravenna by the mutinous ſoldiery, ſtirred up againſt him by Aetius, jealous of his great credit at court. The ſame year Aetius gained conſiderable advantages over the Juthongi, whoſe country bordered on Rhœtia; over the inhabitants of Noricum, who had revolted; and over the Goths in Gaul, attempting to raiſe new diſturbances in that province [x]. The following year, when Baſſus and Antiochus were conſuls, Aetius entirely reduced the Norici, and likewiſe the Vindelici, who had joined

Who paſſes over into Africa.

The Franks driven out of Gaul by Aetius.

Who is appointed commander in chief of all the forces of the weſtern empire.

[p] Procop. p. 45. [q] Proſp. chron. Idat. p. 18. Vict. Vit. de perfec. Vandal. p. 3. [r] Procop. p. 19. Idat. ibid. [s] Caſſiod. chron. Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 34. p. 660. [t] Tyr. Proſp. [u] Greg. Tur. hiſt. Franc. l. ii c. 9. p. 64. [w] Cod Theod. l. xv. tit. 8. leg. 13. p. 38. [x] Idat. Sidon. car. vii. p. 338. Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 34. p. 660.

joined the former in the revolt. From Noricum, he paſſed into Gaul, to awe the Francs, who were ſaid to be in arms [y]. This year Placidia diſcovered at length the true cauſe of the revolt of Bonifacius. Some of that general's friends, greatly ſurpriſed at his entering all on a ſudden into an alliance with the enemies of the empires, after having defended it againſt the barbarians with ſo much zeal and integrity, obtained leave of the empreſs to paſs over into Africa, in order to confer with him in perſon, and hear what he could alledge in his own defence. Bonifacius was overjoyed to ſee them, and produced, upon their charging him with treaſon and rebellion, the letter which Aetius had written to him, proteſting, that nothing but his own ſafety and preſervation could have induced him to turn his arms againſt his prince and country. With this letter they returned to Placidia, who was thereby fully convinced of the treachery of Aetius; but not thinking it adviſeable to provoke him, as he was then at the head of a victorious army in Gaul, ſhe concealed her indignation for the preſent, and contented herſelf with expreſſing, in a letter to Bonifacius, her ſincere deteſtation of the injury that had been done him; withal aſſuring him of her favour and protection for the future; and exhorting him to return to his duty, and conſulting, with his uſual zeal, the ſafety of the empire, drive out the barbarians, whom, for his own ſafety, he had called in. This Bonifacius readily undertook, offering them immenſe ſums provided they quitted Africa, and returned to Spain; but as they had already reduced the whole country, except three cities, viz. Carthage, Hippo, and Cirtha, Genſeric firſt returned him a ſcoffing anſwer; and then falling upon him, cut moſt of his men in pieces, and obliged Bonifacius himſelf to fly to Hippo: which place the barbarians immediately inveſted but were obliged the following year, for want of proviſions, to raiſe the ſiege, after it had continued for the ſpace of fourteen months, Genſeric atacking the town almoſt daily with incredible fury, and Bonifacius defending it with equal vigour and intrepidity [z]. In the caſt was held this year an œcumenic council at Epheſus, in which the doctrine of Neſtorius, biſhop of Conſtantinople, aſſerting not only two natures in Chriſt, but two perſons, was condemned, and he depoſed on the twenty-ſecond of June, the ſentence of his depoſition being ſigned by above two hundred biſhops. The next year, Aetius was raiſed to the conſulſhip Placidia acquainted with the true cauſe of the revolt of Bonifacius.

He endeavours to perſuade the Vandals to retire from Africa.

Moſt of Bonifacius's men cut in pieces by Genſeric.

[y] Idat. p. 19. [z] Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 3. p 185.

ſulſhip, Placidia ſtill pretending to be unacquainted with his treacherous conduct towards Bonifacius. He had for his collegue Valerius, the preceding year prefect of Conſtantinople. This year Bonifacius, reinforced with powerful ſuccours ſent both by Placidia and Theodoſius, offered battle to the Vandals; who readily accepted it, cut moſt of his men in pieces, took an incredible number of priſoners, and obliged the reſt to ſhelter themſelves among the rocks and mountains. Among the priſoners was Marcianus, who afterwards attained to the empire. Aſpar, who commanded on this occaſion the eaſtern tooops, with much-ado eſcaped into Africa, and returned to Conſtantinople, as did Bonifacius to Italy, being invited thither by Placidia. Upon their departure, the barbarians over-ran all Africa, committing everywhere dreadful ravages and unheard-of cruelties; which ſtruck the inhabitants of Hippo with ſuch terror, that they abandoned their city, which was firſt pillaged, and then ſet on fire, by the victorious enemy [a]. St. Auſtin, biſhop of the place, died the year before, in the fourth month of the ſiege. Carthage and Cirtha were now the only places in all Africa held by the Romans. Boniſacius, upon his arrival at Ravenna, was received with extraordinary demonſtrations of kindneſs and eſteem by Placidia, and raiſed to the chief command of the army, in the room of Aetius; who, finding his treachery diſcovered, and dreading the power of Boniſacius, aſſembled the forces under his command, in order to deſtroy his rival. Bonifacius, at his approach, marched out at the head of a body of choſen troops to meet him. Hereupon a battle enſuing, Bonifacius received a wound, of which he died three months after [b]. Thus Marcellinus, who did not, it ſeems, think it neceſſary to acquaint us in what place the battle was fought, nor which ſide carried the day. The ſame writer adds, that Bonifacius on his death-bed exhorted his wife Pelagia to marry no man but Aetius, if his wife ſhould die before him. Aetius, dreading the reſentment of Placidia, withdrew to the court of Rugula, or Rouas, king of the Hunns, whence he returned ſoon after, at the head of a numerous army of barbarians; but the empreſs promiſing not only to pardon him, but reſtore him to his former poſt, he diſmiſſed the barbarians, and returned to court, where he was this very year raiſed to the rank of a patrician [c]. The following year, Theodoſius being conſul the fourteenth time, Bonifacius and Aſpar defeated by Genſeric.

Who overruns all Africa.

A civil war between Bonifacius and Aetius, in which the former was killed.

[a] Idem ibid. Proſp. chron. [b] Marc. chron. [c] Proſp. Idat. chron.

time, with Petronius Maximus, a dreadful fire broke out at Conſtantinople, which laſted three days, and conſumed all the public granaries, with many other ſtately edifices, and great part of the city [d]. In the following conſulſhip of Aſpar and Areobindus, Honoria, ſiſter to the emperor Valentinian, having ſuffered herſelf to be debauched by one of her domeſtics, named Eugenius, was baniſhed the court, being then ſixteen years old, and ſent to Conſtantinople, her mother Placidia having diſcovered, that, by means of her eunuchs, ſhe maintained a private correſpondence with Attila, who had ſucceeded Rouas king of the Hunns; that ſhe had even ſent him a ring, and was daily preſſing him to enter Italy at the head of a powerful army, and marry her. The following year 435, Theodoſius being conſul the fifteenth time, and Valentinian the fourth, a peace was at length concluded with the Vandals in Africa, to whom the Romans yielded great part of Numidia, all the province Proconſularis, and likewiſe Bizacene. This treaty was ſigned at Hippo, on the eleventh of February, by Genſeric, and by Trigetius, who had ſucceeded Bonifacius in Africa. The king of the Vandals delivered up to the Romans his ſon Huneric by way of hoſtage [e]. The ſame year, Aetius gained a great victory over the Burgundians, who, having been allowed in 413, to ſettle in that part of Gaul which borders on the Rhine, had revolted from the Romans, and plundered Belgic Gaul. Gondicarius, their king, was obliged to ſubmit to ſuch conditions, as the conqueror thought fit to impoſe upon him and his people [f]. But Gondicarius did not long enjoy the peace which Aetius had granted him, being ſoon after, that is, in the beginning of the following year, when Anthemius Iſidorus and Senator were conſuls, attacked by the Hunns, and cut off, with twenty thouſand of his men [g]. Socrates writes, that of the unhappy Burgundians three thouſand only were left alive, who, having embraced the chriſtian religion, and received the ſacrament of baptiſm, went, full of courage and confidence, to attack the enemy, of whom they killed a thouſand, and obliged the reſt to ſave themſelves by a precipitous flight [h]. Thus Socrates. But Oroſius aſſures us, that the Burgundians had embraced the Honoria, ſiſter to Valentinian, privately correſponds with Attila.

The Romans yield great part of Africa to the Vandals.

20,000 Burgundians cut off by the Hunns.

[d] Socr. l. vii. c. 39 p. 385. [e] Proſp. chron Proſp. p. 386.
[f] Idat. p. 21. Sid. car. vii. p. 338. [g] Idat. p. 25. Valeſ. rer. Franc. l. iii. p. 136—138. [h] Socr. l. vii. c. 30. p. 371, 372.

the chriſtian religion, before the year 417 [i]. The Goths, who had been allowed to ſettle in Aquitain, as we have obſerved above, and had Theodoric for their king, not ſatisfied with the countries that had been allotted them, made themſelves maſters of ſeveral neighbouring cities belonging to the Romans, and even laid ſiege to Narbonne; which, however, they were forced to raiſe, either this year 436 or the following, as Idatius will have it, count Litorius coming ſeaſonably to the relief of the place with a numerous body of Hunns, who, falling upon the Goths, put them to flight, and entered the city, each horſeman carrying with him two buſhels of corn; which proved a very welcome ſupply, the inhabitants being by the long ſiege reduced to the utmoſt extremity [k]. While theſe things paſſed in the weſt, Theodoſius completed the ruin of idolatry in the eaſt, by a law enacted in 435, ordering all the temples, oratories, and places conſecrated to the worſhip of the idols, to be pulled down, and forbidding his ſubjects, on pain of death, to practiſe any of the pagan ceremonies, either in public or private. By this law the very foundations of the temples were to be entirely demoliſhed, and the ſign of the chriſtian religion, no doubt the croſs, to be ſet up in the place where they ſtood [l]. Theodoſius paſſed part of the year 436, at Cyzicum. The following year 437, when Aetius was conſul the ſecond time, with Sigiſvultus, or Sigiſvult, the Romans, aſſiſted by the Hunns, purſued the war againſt the Goths in Gaul [m]; but with what ſucceſs we are no-where told. The Saxon pirates began this year to infeſt the coaſts of the Armorici [n]. Eudoxia, the daughter of Theodoſius by the empreſs Eudocia, had been betrothed to Valentinian in 424, as we have related above; and this year the nuptials were celebrated with great ſolemnity at Conſtantinople, on the twenty ninth of October, Valentinian being then eighteen years and five months old. The ceremony was to have been performed at Theſſalonica; but Valentinian, out of complaiſance to the royal bride, proceeded to Conſtantinople; which city he entered on the twenty-firſt of October [o]. Theodoſius, in giving, or, as others will have it, in betrothing his daughter, to Valentinian, obliged the young prince to yield to him Weſt Illyricum, comprehending

The Goths beſiege Narbonne; but are obliged to drop the enterprize and retire.

Theodoſius's edict againſt all manner of idolatrous worſhip.

Eudoxia, the daughter of Theodoſius, married to Valentinian III.

[i] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 32 p. 305. [k] Idat. p. 21. Sid. car. vii. p. 346. [l] Cod. Theod. tit. 10. leg 25. p 296. Theodor. l. v. c. 36. p. 749. [m] Proſp. Marc. chron. [n] Sid. car. vii. p. 342. [o] Socr. l. vii. c. 44. p. 388. Chron. Alex. p. 570.

Who yields to Theodoſius Weſt Illyricum.

comprehending the Upper and Lower Pannonia, Dalmatia, and the two Noricums, viz. Mediterraneum and Ripenſe [p]. The two Pannonias compriſed that part of Auſtria and Hungary, that lies on the Roman ſide of the Danube; and the two Noricums the archbiſhopric of Saltzburgh with Styria and Carinthia. As for Eaſt Illyricum, it had belonged to the emperors of Conſtantinople ever ſince the time of Gratian, who yielded it to Theodoſius the Great. Valentinian left Conſtantinople in the latter end of this year; and having ſpent the winter at Theſſalonica, returned early in the ſpring to Ravenna. He had by Eudoxia two daughters, viz. Eudocia and Placidia.

THE following year, Theodoſius being conſul the ſixteenth time, with Acilius Glabria Fauſtus, the Suevians, who had ſettled in Galicia in 409, under the conduct of their king Ermeric or Hermeric, came after a long and bloody war to an agreement with the antient inhabitants; [q] but the articles of that treaty have not been tranſmitted to us. The Romans ſtill purſued the war againſt the Goths in Gaul, of whom eight thouſand were this year cut in pieces by Aetius [r]. In the eaſt Juſtinian publiſhed, on the fifteenth of February of the preſent year 438, his famous code, that is, a collection of all the beſt and moſt uſeful laws that had been enacted by the lawful princes his predeceſſors. Eight able civilians were employed in this work, at the head of whom was Antiochus, who had been conſul in 431. Such laws as were not contained in this code, were declared to be of no force. It was immediately received in the weſt; nay, it met with better ſucceſs there than in the eaſt, where it obtained only for the ſpace of about ninety years, that is to the reign of Juſtinian, who abrogated this, and publiſhed a new code: but in the weſt it was received by Theodoric, and the Oſtrogoths, who made themſelves maſters of Italy about the end of the fifth century, and likewiſe by Alaric, king of the Viſigoths or Weſtrogoths, in Languedoc and Spain. The laws that were afterwards added to the code by Theodoſius, and ſome other princes, were called Novellæ. Theodoſius, in publiſhing the code, enacted, that the laws made by one prince ſhould be of no force in the dominions of the other, unleſs confirmed and ſigned by him [s]. In the following conſulſhip 8000 Goths cut in pieces by Aetius in Gaul.

The Juſtinian code publiſhed.

[p] Socr. ibid. Chron Alex. Jorn. de reg. ſuc. p. 92, 93. [q] Idat. p. 21, 22. [r] Proſ. chron. [s] Proſp. chron. Doviat. hiſt. jur civ. c. 1. Ritterſhuſ. in jur. Juſt. c. 3. Cod Theod nov. 1 p. 1.

ſulſhip of Theodoſius, the ſeventeenth time conſul, and of Feſtus, Litorius, after having gained great advantages over the Goths in Gaul, laid ſiege to Toulouſe, their capital. Theodoric, who was in the place, ſent ſeveral catholic biſhops to Litorius, with very reaſonable propoſals; nay, he offered in the end to ſubmit to what terms the Romans thought fit to impoſe upon him, begging only, that they would grant to him and his Goths their lives and liberty. But Litorius, confiding in the valour of his Huns, and deſirous of taking the Gothiſh king alive, and carrying him in triumph, would hearken to no propoſals. Hereupon Theodoric, having firſt performed his devotions, and viſited all the churches of his capital in the habit of a penitent, ſallied out at the head of his Goths, and falling upon the enemy, cut moſt of them in pieces; put the few who ſurvived the general ſlaughter to flight; and having ſurrounded Litorius, while he was attempting to make his eſcape, took him alive in ſpite of the vigorous and deſperate reſiſtance he made, and carried him with his hands tied behind his back into that city, which he had hoped to enter that very day in triumph. Theodoric cauſed him to be expoſed for ſome time to the inſults and outrages of the populace and children, and then to be thrown into the public priſon, where he died ſoon after [t]. Litorius ſeems to have been a pagan; for he repoſed great confidence in the anſwers of the aruſpices [u]. He was, next to Aetius, the moſt powerful man, and the beſt general, in the weſtern empire [w]. After this victory, the Goths might have eaſily extended their conqueſts to the Rhine; but Theodoric, thinking he ought to uſe with moderation a victory, for which he acknowledged himſelf in a particular manner indebted to heaven, hearkened to the propoſals of Avitus, prefect of Gaul, and this very year concluded a peace with the Romans upon very reaſonable terms [x]. Jornandes ſuppoſes this peace to have been made by Litorius, and no battle to have been fought, or victory gained by the Goths; ſo little was that writer acquainted even with the hiſtory of his own nation. The Hunns, who ſerved under Litorius, were commanded by a king of their own nation, named Gauſeric, who, during this war, laid ſiege to the city of Bazas, belonging Toulouſe beſieged by Litorius.

His men are cut in pieces by Theodoric and he himſelf taken priſoner.

Theodoric concludes a peace with the Romans.

[t] Greg. Tur. hiſt. Fran. l. ii. c. 27. p 81. Salv. p. 164. Sid. car. vii. p. 340. Idat. p. 22. [u] Salvian. de gub. l vii. p. 164. [w] Idem ibid. [x] Proſp. Idat. chron. Sid. car, vii. p. 341.

ing to the Goths; but is ſaid to have been obliged by a miraculous apparition to drop the enterprize and retire, as the reader will find related at length by Gregory of Tours [y].

Merida taken by the Suevians, and Carthage by the Vandals.

The ſame year Merida, then the metropolis of Luſitania, was taken by Richila, who the year before had ſucceeded his father Hermeric, king of the Suevians, in Galicia [z]. But the loſs of Carthage in Africa, ſurpriſed on the twenty-third of October of the preſent year by Genſeric, king of the Vandals, proved a more fatal blow to the weſtern empire. By the taking of that important place, which had belonged to the Romans for the ſpace of five hundred and eighty-five years, the Vandals remained maſters of the Proconſularis, of Byzacene, Getulia, and part of Numidia. However, Valentinian maintained ſo long as he lived, the two Mauritanias, viz. Cæſarienſis and Sitifenſis, with Tripolitana, Tingitana, and that part of Numidia in which Cyrtha ſtood. In the eaſt, nothing worthy of notice happened this year, except the journey which the empreſs Eudocia undertook to Jeruſalem, in compliance with a vow ſhe had made to viſit the holy places there [z]. She paſſed through Antioch, where, in the preſence of the ſenate and people, ſhe pronounced a ſpeech in commendation of that city from a throne of gold enriched with precious ſtones [a]. At her departure, ſhe preſented the magiſtrates with a very conſiderable ſum, for the relief of the indigent citizens. The inhabitants of that metropolis acknowledged the kindneſs ſhe had ſhewed them by erecting two ſtatues to her honour, placing the one, which was of braſs, in the muſeum; and the other, which was plated over with gold, in the ſenate [b]. At Jeruſalem ſhe preſented Juvenal, biſhop of the place, with great ſums, to be diſtributed among the poor, and with a croſs of gold, adorned with precious ſtones, to be ſet up on mount Calvary; for which the biſhop is ſaid to have preſented her in his turn with the right hand of St. Stephen, the protomartyr [c]. The following year, when Valentinian was conſul, the fifth time, with Anatolius, Genſeric made a deſcent upon Sicily in the month of June; and meeting with little or no reſiſtance, ravaged the open country, committing unheard-of cruelties, and even laid ſiege to Palermo: but not being able to reduce the place, he Sicily ravaged by Genſeric.

[y] Greg. Tur. de glor. martyr. l i. c. 13. p. 31-34. [z] Idat. p 22. [z] Socr. l. vii. c 47. p. 390. [a] Evagr l. i. c. 20. p. 277. [b] Idem ibid. Chron. Al. p. 731. [c] Cedren. p. 337. Theoph. p. 74. Marc. chron.

he returned to Africa with an immenſe booty [d]. The ſame year, count Cenſorius, who had been ſent by Valentinian to negotiate a peace between the Suevians in Galicia and the natives of that country, was beſieged by Rechila in Merſola on the Guadiana, where he reſided, and upon the reduction of the place, taken priſoner [e]. About the ſame time, Aetius, removing the Burgundians from the banks of the Rhine, allotted them ſettlements in the preſent duchy of Savoy, and rewarded a body of Alans, who had ſerved the Romans with great fidelity under the conduct of their king Eocaric or Eocric, with lands on the Loire [f]. Theſe Alans are ſuppoſed to have ſett led afterwards with the Britons in Armorica [g]. Bucherius takes Sangiban, king of the Alans, mentioned by Jornandes, to have been the ſucceſſor of Eocaric [h]. As Salvianus wrote at this time his treatiſe on judgments, we ſhall tranſcribe out of that piece a paſſage, wherein the author acquaints us with the chief virtues and vices of the ſeveral barbarous nations then infeſting the empire. The Goths, ſays that writer, are treacherous, but chaſte: the Alans are not ſo chaſte, but leſs treacherous, the Franks are liars, but kind to ſtrangers: the Saxons are exceeding cruel, but wonderfully chaſte. But tho' the Saxons are cruel, continues Salvianus, the Gepidæ are void of humanity, the Hunns lewd and deceitful, the Alemans drunkards, the Alans lover of plunder, and the Franks deceitful and perfidious to ſuch a degree as to look upon falſe oaths as ornaments of ſpeech; yet theſe vices are not ſo criminal in the barbarians as in the Romans, who are inſtructed in the morals of the chriſtian religion [i]. The ſame writer obſerves elſewhere [k], that tho' the Goths would not ſuffer their own people to frequent brothels, yet in the countries allotted to them they kept up thoſe infamous places for the ſake of the Romans, who lived among them, and claimed the ſcandalous privilege of frequenting them without reſtraint. In the eaſt, Paulinus, the empreſs Eudocia's chief favourite, who by her intereſt had been raiſed in 430, to the high poſt of magiſter officiorum, was this year put to death by the emperor's orders at Cæſarea in Cappadocia [l]. And this is all we find in the antient writers concerning this remarkable event. The more modern Greeks aſcribe his death to the jealouſy of Theodoſius; and tell us, that the

The Burgundians removed by Aetius to the preſent duchy of Savoy.

Paulinus put to death by the emperor's orders.

The cauſe of his diſgrace, as related by the more modern writers.

[d] Proſp. Idat. & Chron. Al. p. 730. [e] Idat. 21, 23. [f] Proſp. chron. Valeſ. rer Franc. p. 173. Jorn. rer. Goth. c 37. p. 665. [g] Val. ibid. [h] Buch. Belg. p. 492. [i] Sal. de jud. l. v. p. 107. [k] Idem, l. vii. p. 160. [l] Marc. chron.

emperor being preſented on the ſixth of January with an apple of an uncommon ſize, and extraordinary beauty, he immediately ſent it, as a rarity, to Eudocia, and ſhe to Paulinus, in whoſe converſation ſhe took great delight, as he was a man of learning, and the empreſs herſelf well verſed in all the branches of literature. Paulinus, not knowing by whom it had been ſent to the empreſs, thought it a proper preſent for the emperor, and accordingly carried it to him. This raiſed ſome jealouſy in Theodoſius, who thereupon diſmiſſed Paulinus; and ſending for Eudocia, asked her what was become of the apple. The empreſs, not caring to own ſhe had given it to Paulinus, anſwered, ſhe had eat it. Upon this, the emperor, producing it, commanded Paulinus to be immediately executed, and from that time ſhewed himſelf ſo indifferent towards the empreſs, that ſhe begged leave ſoon after to return to Jeruſalem, and to continue in that city, which was readily granted her. Thus Conſtantine Manaſſes, Zonaras, Nicephorus, Glycas and Codinus [m]. That Eudocia retired about this time to Jeruſalem is very certain; and likewiſe, that there was a miſunderſtanding between her and the emperor, who cauſed a prieſt, by name Severus, and a deacon, named John, whom Eudocia had carried with her from Conſtantinople to Jeruſalem, to be murdered, for no other reaſon, but becauſe the empreſs lived in great intimacy with them, and made them frequently rich preſents. This giving, either jealouſy to the prince, or occaſion to ſcandalous reflections, Theodoſius diſpatched Saturnius, his comes domeſticorum, to Jeruſalem, with private orders to diſpatch the two favourite eccleſiaſtics. Eudocia was ſo affected with their death, that not miſtreſs of her temper, ſhe cauſed, in her turn, Saturnius to be murdered; which provoked the emperor to ſuch a degree, that he ordered all the great officers of her court to quit her ſervice, and return to Conſtantinople; which was reducing her to the condition of a private perſon. Thus ſhe lived at Jeruſalem to her death, which happened in 460. She is ſaid to have ſolemnly declared on her death-bed, that ſhe was altogether innocent as to the crime, of which Theodoſius had ſuſpected her and Paulinus [n]. As ſhe was poſſeſſed of immenſe wealth, which the emperor left untouched, ſhe built at Jeruſalem a great number of churches, monaſteries, and hoſpitals, Miſunderſtanding between the emperor and his wife Eudocia who retires to Jeruſalem.

Where ſhe died.

[m] Manaſſ. p. 55. Zonar. tom. p. 37. Niceph. l xiv. c. 23. p. 485 Glyc. p. 261. Codin. orig. Conſtantinop p. 56. [n] Evag. l. i. c. 21. p. 277, 278. Cedr. p. 343. Theoph. p. 83.

hoſpitals, adorned the city with many ſtately edifices, and, at a vaſt expence, repaired the walls, which in moſt places were entirely ruined. She was buried in a magnificent tomb in the church of St. Stephen, which ſhe had built in the neighbourhood of Jeruſalem [o]. Her piety is greatly extolled by moſt writers, eſpecially by Caſſiodorus, who ſtyles her of all women the moſt pious, the moſt religious [p]. The following year, Cyrus alone was conſul: he excelled in polite learning, eſpecially in poetry; and having by that means gained the favour and protection of Eudocia, who took great delight in verſes, he had been raiſed by her intereſt to the firſt employments in the ſtate. As he entered the circus this year with the conſular ornaments, the people, by whom he was greatly beloved, received him with ſuch acclamations, that the emperor, who was preſent, cauſed him out of jealouſy, a few days after, to be ſtripped of all his employments, and his eſtate to be confiſcated, giving out, that he was inclined to paganiſm, and that he aſpired at the empire. Hereupon Cyrus fled for refuge to a church, and cauſed himſelf to be ordained prieſt. The emperor reſpecting his new character, granted him his life, and ſoon after ſuffered him to be ordained biſhop, and to be raiſed to the ſee of Cotyea in Phrygia [q]. As Genſeric, king of the Vandals, was now become very formidable, Theodoſius reſolved in the end to aſſiſt Valentinian, his couſin and ſon-in-law, againſt ſo powerful an enemy. Accordingly he fitted out a fleet, conſiſting of eleven hundred large ſhips, and putting on board of it the flower of his army, under the conduct of Arcovindas, Anſilus, and Germanus, he ordered them to land in Africa, and joining the weſtern forces there, to drive Genſeric out of the countries he had uſurped. They ſteered their courſe to Sicily, in order to paſs more eaſily from thence over into Africa. But in the mean time, Genſeric having ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to Theodoſius, and pretending to be deſirous of concluding a peace with the two empires, the Roman generals waited on the coaſt of Sicily the reſult of the negotiations, which Genſeric craftily ſpun out till the ſeaſon proper for action was over [r]. While his embaſſadors were ſtill at Conſtantinople, the Perſians, in open breach of the treaty made between the two empires in

The conſul Cyrus ſtripped of his conſular ornaments by the emperor.

Theodoſius ſends a powerful fleet and army againſt Genſeric.

But he is obliged to recall them; and Valentinian, to conclude a peace with Genſeric.

[o] Evagr. l. i. c. 22. p. 280. Ced. p. 337. Chron. Al. p. 732. Niceph. l xiv. c. 50. p. 558, 559. [p] Caſſiod. pſ. 1 p. 174. [q] Zon. p. 35 Theoph. p. 83. Chron. Al. p. 736. [r] Theoph. p. 87. Chron. Al. p. 730.

in 422, entered the Roman territories in an hoſtile manner; which obliged Theodoſius to recal his forces, and Valentinian to conclude a peace with Genſeric, which he could not obtain but by yielding to him all the countries in Africa, which he had ſeized, and we have mentioned above [s]. Anatolius and Aſpar were diſpatched againſt the Perſians, who finding the Romans, whom the expected to ſurpriſe, upon their guard, hearkened to an accommodation; ſo that a peace was concluded, whereof one of the chief conditions was, that neither the Perſians nor the Romans ſhould for the future raiſe any new fortifications on the frontiers [t]. The ſame year, Arſaces, king of Armenia, dying, divided his kingdom between his two ſons Tigranes and Arſaces; but by his laſt will bequeathed the far greater part to Tigranes. Hereupon Arſaces had recourſe to Theodoſius, who threatening to make war upon Tigranes, terrified the young prince to ſuch a degree, that flying to the protection of the Perſian king, he yielded to him his ſhare, preferring the eaſe and quiet of a retired life to all the charms of a crown. Arſaces, on the other hand, dreading the power of the Perſians, put Theodoſius in poſſeſſion of his ſhare, upon certain conditions, one of which was, that his family ſhould enjoy for ever an entire liberty, and an exemption from all tribute and taxes [u]. Thus ended the kingdom of Armenia, after it had continued for many ages, and given occaſion to much bloodſhed and endleſs wars, waged by the Romans firſt with the Parthians, and afterwards with the Perſians. It began and ended in Arſaces. The ſhare of Tigranes belonging to the Perſians, was called Perſarmenia and Armenia Perſica [w]. The part of Arſaces held by the Romans was thenceforth governed by a particular officer, with the title of comes Armeniæ, or count of Armenia [x]. The ſame year, the Hunns, taking advantage of the wars, in which the Romans were engaged with the Vandals and Perſians, paſſed the Danube, and with a formidable army fell unexpectedly upon Thrace. They had invaded that province in 425, under the conduct of Rougas, their king, as we have related above; but he being killed with lightning, and at the ſame time a plague breaking out, and raging with great violonce, in his army, the barbarians repaſſed the Danube of their own accord, not caring, ſays Socrates [y], to engage in a war with the Romans, whoſe cauſe heaven had evidently eſpouſed. Rougas was ſucceeded

The end of the antient kingdom of Armenia.

The Hunns invade Thrace.

[s] Idem. p. 88. [t] Agath. p. 237. Procop. bell. Perſ. p. 8.
[u] Procop. de ædif. l. iii. c. 1. p. 52, 53. [w] Procop. l. i. p. 29.
[x] Theodoret. p. 944. [y] Theod. p. 77. Procop. p. 29.

ſucceeded by Roas or Rouas in 434, who concluded a peace with the Romans, wher: of one of the conditions was, that they ſhould pay him yearly a penſion of three hund:ed and fifty pounds weight of gold. A few years after, the Hunns reſolving to drive out the Boſchi, and other barbarous nations dwelling on the banks of the Danube under the protection of the Romans, Rouas diſpatched one Eilas to the court of Conſtantinople, threatening to make war upon Theodoſius, if he lent them the leaſt aſſiſtance. Hereupon the two generals, Plintha and Dionyſius, were appointed by the emperor to treat with the king of the Hunns, and divert him, if poſſible, from the reſolution he had taken. But in the mean time, Rouas dying, and his nephew, the famous Attila, of whom we ſhall ſpeak at length in the hiſtory of the Hunns, ſucceeding him, the embaſſadors were ordered to treat with him and his brother Bleda, his partner in the ſovereignty. But in the room of Dionyſius, who could not agree with Plintha, was ſent the queſtor Epigenes, a man of great experience in negotiations. The embaſſadors had an interview with the two princes in the neighbourhood of Margum, a city on the Danube in Upper Mœſia, at a place where the Margus or Margis falls into that river. The Romans were obliged to confer with them on horſeback, the Hunns refuſing to diſmount. The peace was confirmed, but upon ſuch conditions as plainly betrayed the weakneſs and deplorable condition of the empire. Theſe were, 1. That the Romans ſhould deliver up to Attila and Bleda ſuch Hunns as had taken, or ſhould for the future take, refuge in the Roman dominions. 2. That the Roman priſoners, who ſhould make their eſcape from the Hunns, without paying their ranſom, ſhould in like manner be delivered up or eight pieces of gold paid for each of them. 3. That, inſtead of three hundred and fifty pounds weight of gold, the Romans ſhould for the future pay annually ſeven hundred. 4. That the Romans ſhould not aſſiſt any nation whatſoever, when attacked by, or at war with, the Hunns. In compliance with this ſhameful treaty, the Romans immediately delivered up to Attila ſome princes of the royal blood of the Hunns, who were by his orders crucified like the meaneſt of ſlaves, in the ſight of the Romans, for no other crime but becauſe they had abandoned their own country to ſerve in their armies. Attila, being, in virtue of this treaty, at full liberty to make what conqueſt he pleaſed, reduced all the northern countries, his authority being acknowledged even by the ſeveral barbarous nations lying north of the Euxine ſea [z]. Having thus extended his dominions, he reſolved to take advantage of the wars in which Theodoſius was engaged this year with the Perſians and Vandals; and accordingly, without any regard to the above-mentioned treaty, he paſſed the Danube at the head of a very numerous and formidable army, and entering Thrace, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral cities and ſtrong holds, and, among the reſt, of Viminacium, a place of great importance on the Danube, and of Margum, which was betrayed to him by the biſhop of the place. Elated with this ſucceſs, he diſpatched a meſſenger to Theodoſius, requiring, or rather commanding, him to deliver up forthwith all the Hunns who had taken refuge in the Roman dominions, to pay part of the tribute that had been owing for ſome time, and to ſettle what ſhould be paid him for the future. Theodoſius could not prevail upon himſelf to abandon thoſe, who, after the declaration of war, had forſaken Attila, and come over to him. Whereupon Attila began to ravage the country, putting all to fire and ſword, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition. He took by ſtorm Retiarium on the Danube in upper Mœſia, Singidunum, Naiſſus and Sirmium, formerly the capital of all Illyricum, with ſeveral other cities and ſtrong-holds, inſomuch, that Theodoſius, not thinking himſelf ſafe at Conſtantinople, retired the following year 442, when Eudoxius and Dioſcorus were conſuls, into Aſia [a]. As to the iſſue of this war, we are left quite in the dark. All we know is, that this very year a peace was concluded between Attila and Theodoſius, who thereupon returned to Conſtantinople, and entered that city on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt [b]. From this time Attila continued quiet till the year 447, contenting himſelf with only threatening to make war upon the Romans, in order to draw from them corn, money, proviſions, and whatſoever elſe he ſtood in need of; for the Romans, trembling at the very name of Attila, complied with all his demands, however unreaſonable, and obeyed him, ſays Priſcus, like ſo many ſlaves, that he might have no pretence to take arms againſt them. The embaſſadors he ſent to Conſtantinople returned always loaded with preſents; inſomuch that, when he thought fit to reward any of Attila, notwithſtanding the treaty, paſſes the Danube.

Rouas, king of the Hunns, dies, and is ſucceeded by Attila.

The Romans conclude a peace with the Hunns upon moſt ſhameful conditions.

[See p. 35].

And makes himſelf maſter of ſeveral cities.

The Romans dread the name of Attila.

[z] Priſ. hiſt Goth. de legat. p. 45——48. [a] Idem, p. 34—5~. Chron. Al. p 730. Proſp. Marcel. chron. [b] Marc. Proſp. chron. Cod. Theod. tit. 10. leg. 9. p. 898.

of his own people, he uſed to ſend them, under ſome pretence or other, with the character of embaſſadors to Theodoſius, who, to court the friendſhip of their maſter, never failed to load them with preſents to a great value. Thus were the ſubjects of the empire impoveriſhed to enrich the barbarians, their ſworn enemies [c]. Attila, finding himſelf thus become the terror of the Romans, is ſaid to have ſent, out of mere wantonneſs, two Goths, with the character of embaſſadors, the one to Theodoſius, and the other to Valentinian, whom, by his orders, they addreſſed thus; Attila, my maſter and yours, commands you to get ready a palace for his reception [d]. During theſe tranſactions in the eaſt, the Suevians made great progreſs in Spain, where they took the city of Seville, and reduced all Bœtica with the province of Carthagena [e]. His haughty behaviour and arrogance.

THE following year, Maximus being conſul, the ſecond time, with Paterius, Theodoſius, leaving Conſtantinople, viſited the province of Pontus, where he cauſed the public edifices and walls of Heraclea to be repaired [f]. As he was one day, during this progreſs, marching on foot, greatly tormented with heat, duſt, and thirſt, an officer of his guards preſented him with a beautiful cup full of freſh and excellent liquor; but the emperor, returning the officer thanks in a moſt obliging manner, declared, that he would not by any means refreſh himſelf, when it was not in his power to refreſh thoſe who attended him [g]. In 444, when Theodoſius was conſul, the eighteenth time, with Albinus, died Arcadia, the ſiſter of Theodoſius [h]. The ſame year the eunuch Antiochus, the emperor's great chamberlain, being convicted of extortion, and abuſing his authority to the oppreſſion of the people, was by Theodoſius degraded from the rank of a patrician, and confined to the monaſtery of St. Euphemia at Chalcedon, ſtripped of the great wealth he had amaſſed, and deprived of all the honours which he had enjoyed [i]. Theophanes writes, that Theodoſius made him pope, meaning perhaps, that he obliged him to take holy orders. Upon his diſgrace, the emperor enacted a law excluding all eunuchs from the dignity of patrician [k]. The following year, when Valentinian was conſul, the ſixth year, with Nomus, nothing remarkable happened in the Arcadia dies.

The eunuch Antiochus diſgraced.

[c] Priſc. p. 36, 37. [d] Chron. Al. [e] Idat. p. 23. [f] Parc. p. 315. Cod. Theod nov. tit 30. p. 13. [g] Paſc. p. 390. [h] Marc. chron. [i] Zonar. tom. iii. p. 34. Theoph. p. 83. [k] Cod. p. 48.

The Romans defeated by the Suevians in Spain.

the eaſt; but in the weſt, Vitus being ſent with a conſiderable army into Spain, to ſupport the Romans, that is, the natives, againſt the Suevians, moſt of his men were cut off by Rechila, and he obliged to ſave himſelf by flight, and abandon the inhabitants to the mercy of thoſe barbarians [l]. The next year, Aetius being conſul the third time with Q. Aurelius Symmachus, the Britons, no longer able to withſtand the Scots and Picts, had recourſe to Aetius, who governed the weſtern empire almoſt with an abſolute ſway. To move him to compaſſion, they wrote him a letter with the following direction, The groans of the Britons to the conſul Aetius; but could not, with all their groans and tears, prevail upon him to lend them the leaſt aſſiſtance [m]. The learned Uſher thinks, that Valentinian was then under apprehenſion of a war with Attila [n]. The venerable Bede ſuppoſes the Hunns to have already broken into the weſtern empire [o]; but he was therein certainly miſtaken. In the eaſt a dreadful plague raged this and the following year, when Ardaburius and Alypius were conſuls, and violent earthquakes were felt in moſt provinces, which overturned ſeveral cities, and great part of the new walls of Conſtantinople, with fifty-ſeven towers, and many ſtately edifices, not only in that city, but likewiſe at Antioch and Alexandria [p]. The ſame year, 447, Attila, upon what provocation we know not, (for both emperors readily complied with all his demands, however unjuſt and arrogant) broke into Thrace with a formidable army, conſiſting of Hunns, Goths, Gepidæ, Alans, and many other barbarous nations, commanded by their reſpective kings. Attila, whom they all obeyed, at the head of this numerous hoſt, over-ran without oppoſition Illyricum, Thrace, both Dacia's, Mœſia, and Scythia. He took and plundered above ſeventy cities, and, among the reſt, Philippopolis in Thrace, properly ſo called, Arcadiopolis in the province of Europe, and Marcianopolis, the metropolis of Lower Mœſia. They extended their ravages on one ſide to the Euxine ſea, and on the other to the ſtreights of Thermopylæ, which part Theſſaly from Achaia or Greece. In the mean time, Arnegiſelus, governor of Mœſia and Thrace, having drawn together all the troops quartered in thoſe two provinces, marched againſt Attila; And engaging him

The Britons recur in vain to Aetius.

Attila breaks anew into the empire at the head of a formidable army.

He over-runs ſeveral provinces.

[l] Sid. car. v. p. 315. Idat. p 24. [m] Gild. excid. Britan. c 6. p. 118. [n] Uſſer. eccleſ. Brit. antiq. p. 1204. [o] Bed. hiſt. c. 13. p. 156. [p] Chron. Al. p. 734. Evagr l. i. c. 17. p. 275. Niceph. l. xiv. c. 48 p. 543.

him in Lower Mœſia, on the banks of the river Utis, which falls into the Danube near a city of the ſame name, cut off great numbers of his men; but falling unluckily from his horſe, he was himſelf killed, after having ſold his life dear, and his army put to the rout [q]. Another battle was fought in the Cherſoneſus near Gallipoli, probably by the generals Aſpar and Arcobindus, who were both ſent againſt Attila [r]. But no better ſucceſs attended the Romans in this than in the other engagement; ſo that Theodoſius was obliged the following year 448, when Zeno and Poſthumianus were conſuls, to ſend Anatolius, with one Vigilius, who underſtood the language of the Hunns, to Attila to ſue for peace, which he was ſtrictly enjoined to conclude upon any terms. A peace was accordingly agreed to, and ratified by the emperor, on the following terms, highly opprobrious to the Roman name, viz. 1. That the Romans ſhould pay immediately to Attila ſix thouſand pounds weight of gold, and every year two hundred. 2. That they ſhould ſend back to him all his deſerters, and receive none for the future. 3. That they ſhould deliver up the Roman captives, who had eſcaped without paying their ranſom, or pay for each of them twelve pounds weight of gold. 4. That the Romans ſhould ſend no embaſſadors to Attila, till they had delivered up to him all his deſerters and fugitives [s]. Purſuant to this ignominious treaty, ſix thouſand pounds weight of gold were ſent immediately to Attila, with all the Hunns who had taken refuge in the Roman dominions, among whom were ſeveral princes, who choſe rather to be killed by the Romans, than fall into the hands of Attila [t]. While theſe things paſſed in the eaſt, Rechila king of the Suevians ſettled in Spain, died at Merida in 447, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Requiarius, who the year following married the daughter of Theodoric, king of the Goths in Languedoc, and ſoon after went to pay a viſit to his father-in-law at Toulouſe; but on his return to Spain, ſurpriſed the city of Lerida; and carrying with him from thence a great number of captives, pillaged the territory of Saragoſa, which, according to Iſidorus, belonged to the Romans [u]. This year a miſunderſtanding aroſe between Attila and Valentinian on account of ſome ſacred veſſels, which Attila falſly pretended to have been ſtolen from him by one Silvanus, a banker in Rome. Silvanus,

And defeats the Roman generals ſent againſt him.

The Romans conclude a peace with him upon diſhonourable terms.

Rechila, king of the Suevians in Spain, dies, and is ſucceeded by his ſon Requiarius.

[q] Jorn rer. Goth. c 44 p. 553. Theoph. p. 88. Chron. Al. p 734. Priſc. p. 35, 36 [r] Priſ. p 34. [s] Idem ibid. & p. 51—53 Theoph. p. 88. [t] Idat. p. 26. [u] Priſc p. 57--68.

Attila ſeeks a pretence to quarrel with Valentinian.

vanus, who was the lawful owner of theſe veſſels, had ſold them to the church. But as they were pieces of exquiſite workmanſhip, Attila, coveting them, or rather ſeeking a pretence to quarrel with Valentinian, claimed them as ſtolen from him by Silvanus, and with great arrogance preſſed the emperor either to reſtore the veſſels, or deliver up to him Silvanus. Hereupon count Romulus was ſent with Promotus, governor of Noricum, and Romulus, an officer of diſtinction, to the court of Attila, to convince him, if poſſible, that the veſſels in diſpute had never belonged to him; or if he continued to claim them, to pay him their value in gold. Attila received the embaſſadors in a very obliging manner, entertaining them at his own table with the embaſſadors of Theodoſius, who arrived at his court much about the ſame time. But the only anſwer that he returned to their reaſoning and arguments was, that the veſſels belonged to him, and that he was determined to do himſelf juſtice, and declare war, if Valentinian did not either reſtore them, or deliver up to him Silvanus, who had ſtolen them. But notwithſtanding theſe menaces, he did not make war upon Valentinian till three years after, tho' that prince could not by any means be prevailed upon to comply with either of his demands. The following year, when Protogenes and Aſturius or Aſterius were conſuls, one Edecon being ſent by Attila with the character of embaſſador to Theodoſius, the eunuch Chryſaphus, the emperor's great chamberlain, diſcovering him to be greatly taken with the ſplendor of the court, and deſirous to continue among the Romans, promiſed him great wealth and preferments, provided he diſpatched Attila; which he promiſing to do, Theodoſius conſented to the wicked attempt, and charged Vigilius, interpreter to the Roman embaſſadors at the court of Attila, to be aſſiſting to him in that undertaking. But Edecon, either apprehenſive of the dangers attending ſuch a deſperate attempt, or deceiving the whole time the emperor and his miniſter, upon his return diſcovered the plot to Attila, who thereupon cauſed Vigilius to be ſeiz d, and diſpatched his ſecretary Oreſtes to reproach Theodoſius with his treachery, and demand Chryſaphus, the chief author and contriver of the conſpiracy, to be delivered up to him. But Nomus, who was ſent embaſſador to the king of the Hunns on this occaſion, with ſeveral other perſons of great diſtinction, gained his eſteem and affection to ſuch a degree, that he promiſed to live in peace and amity with Theodoſius, pardoned Chryſaphus, ſet Vigilius at liberty berty, and diſmiſſed the embaſſadors, loaded with rich preſents. Thus Priſcus, who was an eye-witneſs of what he wrote, having attended the embaſſadors to the court of Attila [w].

Theodoſius attempts to get Attila murdered.

Who ſpares the conſpirators, and makes peace with the emperor.

THE following year, 450, when Valentinian was conſul the ſeventh time, with Avienus, Theodoſius was ſo bruiſed with a fall from his horſe in hunting, that being with much ado carried in a ſedan to Conſtantinople, he died there the next day, the twentieth of June, according to Theophanes [x], or the twenty-eighth of July, as we read in Theodorus [y], who is followed by moſt chronologers. According to this opinion, he died in the fiftieth year of his age, after having reigned forty-two years, and near three months after the death of his father, and forty-eight ſince he had received the title of Auguſtus. He was buried on the thirtieth of July, in the ſame tomb with his father Arcadius [z]. He is generally commended as a prince of exemplary piety; but all own him to have had but ſlender parts, and to have been entirely guided by thoſe about him, eſpecially by the eunuchs of the court, who, abuſing his authority, oppreſſed the people to ſuch a degree, that many in his reign choſe rather to abandon their native country, and live among the Hunns, and other barbarians, than bear the tyrannical government, of thoſe who, by the eunuchs, were ſet over them. Authors give us the following inſtance of his diſattention to public affairs: As he had been uſed, when yet a child, to ſign all the acts that were brought to him by his miniſters, without reading them, he continued the ſame cuſtom even after he was married, till his ſiſter Pulcheria, to appprize him of the evil conſequences that might attend it, cauſed an act to be drawn up, whereby he yielded to her for ever the empreſs Eudocia as her ſlave. This act the emperor ſigned without peruſing it, or enquiring what it contained; which he had no ſooner done, than Pulcheria deſired him to read it, when, aſhamed of his paſt indolence and neglect, he reſolved to be upon his guard for the future, and to ſign no papers till he was well informed what they contained [a]. He was a great friend to the church, but yet, miſled by ill-meaning men, countenanced the declared enemies of the orthodox faith, as the reader will find in the account which the eccleſiaſtic writers give us of the two councils held

Theodoſius dies.

His character.

An inſtance of his diſattention to public affairs.

[w] Idem, p 72. [x] Theoph. p. 568 [y] Theod. p. 88.
[z] Theod. ibid. [a] Theoph. p. 87. Conſtant. Manaſſ. p. 55. Zoſ. p. 36. Suid. p. 577.

held by his orders at Epheſus, and of the progreſs which the herſy of Eutyches made in his reign. Of the writers who flouriſhed under Theodoſius, we ſhall ſpeak in note (S).

(S) We are chiefly indebted to the eccleſiaſtic writers Socrates, Sozomen, and Philoſtorgius, for the hiſtory of the reign of Theodoſius the younger. Socrates was born in Conſtantinople about the year 380, and ſpent moſt part of his life in that city (1). He ſpeaks of what happened after the year 395, as of things that had happened in his time (2). He tells us, that when he was yet very young, he knew a Novatian prieſt, by name Auxano, who remembered the council of Nice, and lived to the reign of Theodoſius the younger, that is, to the year 408 3) Socrates ſtudied grammar under Helladius and Ammonius, two pagan prieſts of Alexandria, who had retired to Conſtantinople, when the temples of the idols were pulled down in their own country, which happened in the year 389. He probably ſtudied eloquence under Troilus, who in his time taught it with great applauſe at Conſtantinople: for he beſtows mighty encomiums upon that ſophiſt (4). He begins where Euſebius ended his hiſtory, but repeats the tranſactions of the firſt year of Conſtantine's reign, that is, of the year 306, and carries his work down to the ſeventeenth conſulſhip of Theodoſius II. that is, to the year 439, ſo that it compriſes the ſpace of an hundred and thirty-four years. He addreſſes it to one Theodorus, by whoſe orders he undertook it Theodorus was probably a biſhop or prieſt; for he calls him a perſon conſecrated to the worſhip of God (5). He writes in a familiar, but plain and eaſy, ſtyle. At firſt he followed Rufinus, eſpecially in his firſt two books, copying even his miſtakes; but theſe he corrected, after having peruſed the works of Athanaſius. He informed himſelf with great care of the truth of what he relates, copying what had happened before his time from the authors that were moſt eſteemed, and relating only ſuch events of his own time as he himſelf had either ſeen, or learnt from perſons of unqueſtionable veracity (6). As he ſpeaks of the Novatians with great reſpect, and even pretends ſome of their biſhops to have wrought miracles, ſeveral writers conclude from thence, that he himſelf held the tenets of Novatus. But on the other hand, he blames the Novatians for ſeparating from the church (7), and in expreſs terms diſapproves the ſuppreſſing of the office of penitentiary in the church of Conſtantinople, againſt which office the Novatians had always exclaimed (8). Socrates wrote in Greek, but ſeems to have been acquainted with the Latin tongue His hiſtory is quoted by Liberatus, and the ſeventh œcumenical council. Sozomen, zomen, or Salaminus Hermias Sozomenes, as he is ſtyled by Photius, was not, as ſome have conjectured from the firſt of theſe names, a native of Salamis in the iſland of Cyprus, but of a village in the territory of Gaza, named Bethelia, as appears from the account he gives of the converſion of his grandfather to the chriſtian religion (9). The title of ſcholaſticus, beſtowed upon him by Photius (10) and others, gives us room to believe, that he was well verſed in polite literature. He pleaded at the bar in Conſtantinople (11), and was at the ſame time aſſeſſor or counſellor to Iſidorus, prefect of the eaſt in 435, and 436 (12). He was well acquainted with the civil law, as is plain from his works. He wrote firſt in two books the eccleſiaſtic hiſtory, from the aſcenſion of our Saviour to the depoſition of Licinius in 323 (13), which work has been long ſince entirely loſt. He afterwards undertook his great hiſtory, which was to compriſe whatever had happened worthy of notice from the third conſulſhip of Criſpus and Conſtantine Cæſars, that is, from the year 324, to the ſeventeenth conſulſhip of Theodoſius the younger, in 439 (14). Whence it is manifeſt, that the work, which has reached our times, is imperfect, ſince it ends in the year 415. Some think he was prevented by death from purſuing his deſign. St. Gregory writes, that the hiſtory of Sozomen was not received by the church of Rome on account of the many falſhoods it contained, and of the great commendations the author beſtowed on Theodorus of Mopſueſtia. He is not indeed without faults; but notwithſtanding ſome miſtakes that are to be found in his work, he is commonly preferred to the other hiſtorians of thoſe times. Whoever compares his hiſtory with that of Socrates, will find, that the one has evidently copied from the other, moſt likely Sozomen from Socrates; for the latter ſeems to have written before the former. When Socrates wrote, the houſe in which Arius died was ſtill ſtanding; whereas Sozomen obſerves, that an Arian, having bought it, had pulled it down, and built another in its room (15). Beſides, the candor and ſimplicity with which Socrates writes, would not, in our opinion, have allowed him to copy his hiſtory from another without owning it. Though Sozomen beſtows great commendations on ſome Novatian biſhops, as Socrates had done; yet he condemns in ſeveral places their tenets (16). About the beginning of the ſixth century, Caſſiodorus, cauſed the hiſtories of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret to be tranſlated into the Latin tongue by one Epiphanes, that Greece alone, ſays Caſſiodorus, might not poſſeſs ſo valuable and neceſſary a work. He divided them, thus tranſlated, into twelve books, commonly known by the (9) Soz. l. v. c. 15. p. 617. (10) Phot. c. 30. p. 17.

(1) Socr l. v. c, 24 p. 293. (2) Idem, l. vi. c. 1. p. 299. (3) Idem, l. i c. 13 p. 41. (4) Idem, l. ii. c. 1. p. 79. & prol. p. 6. (5) Idem, prol p 7. (6 Idem, l. ii c. 1 p 79. (7) Idem, l. ii. c. 38. p. 144. (8) Idem. l. v. p. 278.

(11) Soz. p. 105. (12) Iſidor. Peluſ. l. i. ep. 300. p. 880.
(13) Soz. l. i. c. 1. p. 401 (14) Idem ibid. & p. 991, 397, 403. (15) Socr. l. i. c 38 p 74. Soz. l. ii. c. 30. p. 49.
(16) Soz. l. vii. c 16. p. 726. & l. viii. p. 754. &c.

the name of Hiſtoria Tripartita. Before him Theodorus, the reader, had begun to compile a hiſtory in Greek from the three above-mentioned hiſtorians. But of that work, only the two firſt books, compriſing the reigns of Conſtantine and Conſtantius, have reached our times. It does not appear, that the author wrote any more; and thoſe, which he wrote, have never yet been printed. Philoſtorgius, born about the year 368, in the province of Cappadocia Secunda, wrote an eccleſiaſtic hiſtory, or rather, under that name, an apology for the Arians, eſpecially the Eunomians whoſe tenets he himſelf held. He began his work, which was divided into twelve books, with the death of Conſtantius Chlorus, the father of Conſtantine the Great, and carried it down to the acceſſion of Valentinian III. to the empire, that is, to the year 425. This work has been long ſince loſt; but an abſtract of it, which may be called a large hiſtory, has been conveyed to us by Photius (17), who commends the ſtyle, but thinks the author often too diffuſe and tedious The whole is a continued ſatire on the catholics, and a panegyric on the Arians. Philoſtorgius ſeldom agrees with other writers, and relates ſeveral remarkable events, quite unknown to thoſe who lived at the ſame time with him, ſuch as the miracles wrought by Euſebius of Nicomedia, by Theophilus the Indian, by Leontius of Tripoli, &c. whence Photius ſtyles him a fabulous and lying writer (18). However, he is often quoted by John of Antioch, who wrote about the beginning of the ſeventh century, by Nicetas Coniates, who flouriſhed in the thirteenth century, by Nicephorus and others. Suidas likewiſe has copied ſeveral paſſages from him. Philoſtorgius, beſides his hiſtory, wrote a long panegyric on Eunomius, and an apology for the chriſtian religion againſt Porphyrius; but neither of theſe works has reached our times. About the ſame time flouriſhed Philip of Sida in Pamphylia, who wrote a very diffuſe hiſtory from the creation to his time, conſiſting of eight hundred and ſixty-four books, which he intitled the Chriſtian hiſtory. Of this voluminous work, which has been long ſince loſt, Photius ſpeaks with great contempt (19). The ſame author wrote another extenſive work, wherein he confuted, or attempted to confute, the writings of the emperor Julian (20); but that performance has undergone the ſame fate as the other. The author was a deacon of the church of Conſtantinople, and thought himſelf highly injured, becauſe he was not preferred to that ſee (21). Priſcus, who attended Maximus, when ſent embaſſador to Attila in 449, wrote the hiſtory of the war between that prince and Theodoſius; the hiſtory of Marcian's reign; an account of the journey of Anthemius to Rome; of the war carried on in the reign of Leo againſt Genſeric; and of the unhappy end of Aſpar and his children, put to death by the emperor Leo in 471 (22). Suidas

(17) Phot. c. 40. p. 25. (18) Idem, p. 16, 25. (19) Idem, p. 21. (20) Socr. l. vii. c. 27. p. 368. (21) Idem ibid. (22) Evagr. l. i. c. 17. p. 273. & l. ii. c. 1. p. 283.

Suidas aſcribes to him eight books of the Byzantine hiſtory, and of the war with Attilus, meaning, no doubt Attila (23). Priſcus was a native of Panes or Panium, reckoned among the cities of the province of Europe in Thrace (24). He was a ſophiſt, or profeſſor of eloquence (25). He viſited Rome, where he ſaw the king of the Franks (26), no doubt Merouée, and travelled likewiſe to Thebais and Alexandria in Egypt. In the latter city he was an eye-witneſs of the diſorders which attended the election of the holy biſhop Proterus to that ſee, and greatly contributed to the appeaſing of them by the good advice he gave to Florus, prefect of Egypt. Euphemius, magiſter officiorum to the emperor Marcian, adviſed with him in all matters of importance (27). His hiſtory is ſaid to be ſtill extant and lodged in ſome libraries (28). Hitherto only ſome fragments of it, relating to embaſſies, have been publiſhed, which are to be found among the works of the other Byzantine hiſtorians. Some paſſages of his hiſtory are quoted by Jornandes (29). He wrote with great exactneſs and elegance (30). Suidas mentions his declamations and letters (31). The hiſtory of Theodoſius the younger was likewiſe written by one John, who is often quoted by Evagrius, and by him ſtyled orator, or profeſſor of eloquence (32). He is thought to have been a native of Antioch, becauſe he is frequently quoted by Evagrius in what relates to the hiſtory of that city (33). His hiſtory ended with the ſeventh year of Juſtin I. of the chriſtian æra 525, whence we muſt diſtinguiſh him from another hiſtorian of the ſame name, whoſe hiſtory began with the death of Juſtinian, and was carried down to the reign of Mauritius (34). Another hiſtorian, named likewiſe John, a follower of Eutyches, wrote in five books the eccleſiaſtic hiſtory, from the time of Neſtorius to the defeat of Baſiliſcus; that is, from the year 428, to 477. To his eccleſiaſtic hiſtory he added five books (35), the contents of which are to us quite unknown.

(23) Suid. p. 590. (24) Theoph. p. 100. Evagr. p. 74. (25) Evag. l. i. c. 17. p. 275. (26) Idem ibid. (27) Idem, l. ii. p. 295. Priſc. p. 41. (28) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. iv. c. 18. p. 488. (29) Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 24, 34, 35, 42, 49. (30) Evag. l. i. c. 17. p. 275. & l. ii. c. 16. p. 308. (31) Suid p. 590. (32) Evag. p. 61. (33) Idem, l. i. c. 16. l. ii. c. 12. l. iii. c. 14, 28. (34) Idem, p. 274. & 383. (35) Phot. c. 41. p. 38.

CHAP. XXXI.

The Roman hiſtory, from the death of Theodoſius II. to the total failure of the weſtern empire in Auguſtulus.

IF the laws at this time in force concerning private eſtates and inheritances, had obtained with reſpect to kingdoms and empires, the right of Eudoxia to the imperial crown had been indiſputable, that princeſs being the only child of the deceaſed emperor; but not the leaſt regard was had, either to her, or to the emperor Valentinian her huſband: and truly neither of them ſeems to have laid any claim to the eaſtern empire, tho' Theodoſius left no iſſue male behind him. As Pulcheria had ſhared the ſovereignty with her brother, and bore the title of Auguſta, ſhe remained by his death ſole miſtreſs of the empire; and no perſon was more capable of governing it well. However, as no woman had yet reigned alone in either empire, ſhe reſolved to marry, notwithſtanding the reſolution ſhe had taken, or the vow ſhe had made, to continue a virgin to her death. Purſuant to this reſolution, as ſoon as the death of Theodoſius was publicly known, ſhe ſent for Marcianus, a perſon famous for his exemplary piety, and extraordinary qualifications; and told him, that ſhe deſigned to raiſe him to the ſovereignty, by marrying him, on condition that he would ſuffer her, agreeable to the reſolution ſhe had taken, to live and die a virgin. Marcianus readily complying with this condition, ſhe ſent for the patriarch Anatolius, and the ſenate, and in their preſence declared Marcianus emperor. Her choice being approved by them, and applauded by all the officers at court, both civil and military, the new emperor was crowned at the palace of Hebdomon, on the twenty-fourth or twenty-fifth of Auguſt of the preſent year 450 [b]. His election was immediately notified to Valentinian; and he approving it, his images were, according to cuſtom, ſent into the weſt, and received at Rome on the thirtieth of March of the following year [c]. After this, the marriage was celebrated with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence, Pulcheria reſolves to marry Marcian.

Who is declared emperor.

Pulcheria,

[b] Theod. p. 551. Evagr l. ii. c. 1. p. 275. Theoph. p. 89. Chron. Alex. p. 733. [c] Evagr. p. 285.

Pulcheria, being then in the fifty-firſt, and Marcian in the fiftieth year of his age [d]. He was a native of Thrace or Illyricum, and deſcended from a family of no great diſtinction, but remarkable for their attachment to the orthodox faith [e]. As his father ſerved in the army, he reſolved to follow the ſame profeſſion; and, purſuant to this reſolution, ſet out for Philippopolis in Thrace, in order to enliſt himſelf there. On his journey, he found the body of a man lately killed lying on the public road, and, prompted by his good nature, could not proceed, till he had decently interred it. This ſome perſons, accidently coming by, obſerved, and immediately acquainted the magiſtrates of Philippolis with what they had ſeen; who thereupon cauſed Marcian to be ſeized and examined, and would have condemned him, had not the true author of the murder been ſeaſonably diſcovered and convicted [f]. Marcian, thus ſet at liberty, liſted himſelf among the troops quartered at Philippopolis, and ſerved ſtill as a private man in 421, when, upon the breaking out of the war between the Romans and Perſians, the corps in which he ſerved was ordered into Syria; but Marcian falling ſick as they marched through Aſia, continued a long time indiſpoſed at a place called Sydema, and thence repaired to Conſtantinople, where he liſted himſelf among the troops that were commanded by Ardaburius, and his ſon Aſpar, who diſcovering him to be a man of uncommon parts, raiſed him to the poſt of their ſecretary. With that character he attended Aſpar in 431, into Africa, where he was taken priſoner by Genſeric, with many perſons of diſtinction, Aſpar himſelf having narrowly eſcaped falling into the enemy's hands. All the captives of note were, by Genſeric's orders, brought into the palace, where while they were waiting in an open court till the king was at leiſure to view them, Marcian lying down on the ground, fell aſleep, and an eagle at the ſame time appearing over him, ſays Evagrius, and intercepting with his extended wings the ſcorching rays of the ſun, afforded him a friendly ſhade. This Genſeric obſerved from his apartment, and concluding from thence, that he was deſtined by Heaven to the empire, he granted him his liberty, after having obliged him to ſwear, that he would never make war upon the Vandals [g]. From Africa he returned to Conſtantinople, where he was, according to Theophanes [h], honoured with the ſenatorial dignity. Theodorus ſtyles him only tribune; but adds, that he diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſelf in war [i]. He had by his firſt wife, who died before his acceſſion to the empire, but one daughter, named Euphemia, whom, when he was raiſed to the ſovereignty, he married to Anthemius, afterwards emperor of the weſt. All writers agree, that Marcianus was a prince of moſt exemplary piety, a zealous patron of the orthodox faith, a father to his people, a ſincere friend to virtue, an enemy to all vice and irreligion; in ſhort, a perſon endowed with every great and good quality becoming a prince. Some writers prefer him even to Conſtantine and Theodoſius the Great. He preferred none but perſons of known abilities, and unblemiſhed characters; whence the reader will find, in the writers of thoſe times, great encomiums beſtowed, not only upon him, but on all thoſe who were employed by him in the adminiſtration. In the weſt died in the ſame year 450, Pulcheria, mother to the emperor Valentinian, and was interred at Ravenna, where her tomb is ſtill to be ſeen [k]. She is blamed by ſome writers for yielding, or inducing her ſon to yield, Weſt Illyricum to Theodoſius. She had governed the weſtern empire with an abſolute ſway for the ſpace of twenty-ſix years, Valentinian ſuffering her to rule, to the hour of her death, with the ſame authority which ſhe had enjoyed in his minority.

His birth, education and character.

[d] Idem ibid. [e] Idem, p. 283. Niceph. l. xv. c. 1. p. 595.
[f] Evagr. p. 283. [g] Idem, p. 284. [h] Theoph. p. 81.

Pulcheria mother to the emperor Valentinian, dies.

THE following year 451, Attila aſſembled one of the moſt numerous and formidable armies we find mentioned in hiſtory. It conſiſted of Hunns, Gepidæ, Oſtrogoths, Rugians, Gelonians, Burgundians, Belonatians, Squiri, Neurians, Baſtarnæ, Turingians, Bructerians, Franks dwelling on the Neckar, Marcomans, Suevians, Quadians, Heruli, Turcilingians, and in ſhort, of all the northern barbarians, to the number of five, or, as others will have it, of ſeven, hundred thouſand men [l]. Attila, in raiſing ſo formidable an army, had nothing leſs in view, than to make himſelf maſter of both empires. But Marcian returning no other anſwer to his embaſſadors, ſent to demand the annual penſion or tribute paid him by Theodoſius, than that he had gold for his friends, and ſteel for his enemies, he thought it adviſeable to turn his arms firſt againſt Valentinian, whom he held in the utmoſt contempt, being well appriſed, that it would be no difficult undertaking to reduce, in ſpite of all oppoſition, the eaſtern, after he had made himſelf maſter of the weſtern empire. Being therefore determined to make war upon Valentinian, Attila aſſembles a formidable army.

He reſolves to make war upon Valentinian.

[i] Theod. l. i. p. 551. [k] Proſp. chron. Idat. Marcell. it Ital. p. 39, 40. [l] Priſc. p. 40. Jorn. c. 78. p. 666. Sidon. vii. p. 54.

lentinian, he ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to that prince, demanding his ſiſter Honoria, whom he pretended to be his wife, and with her half of the weſtern empire, as belonging of right to her. We have obſerved above, that Honoria had maintained, by means of her eunuchs, a private correſpondence with Attila, and even ſent him a ring, which the embaſſador produced to prove their mariage. Valentinian anſwered, That, among the Romans, women had no right to the imperial crown, nor to any part of the empire; and at the ſame time diſpatched Carpilio, the ſon of Aetius, and ſeveral other perſons of great diſtinction, to the court of Attila, to convince him of the injuſtice of his claim. Attila, to the great ſurprize, both of Valentinian and the embaſſadors themſelves, ſeemed to be fully ſatisfied with their reaſoning, and the arguments they alledged; but it was only the better to deceive the unwary prince, and put in execution a new ſcheme. Hemeric, the ſon of Genſeric, king of the Vandals, having married the daughter of Theodoric king of the Goths in Languedoc, cauſed her noſe to be cut off ſoon after, and ſent her back, thus diſfigured, to her father, upon a bare ſuſpicion, that ſhe deſigned to poiſon him. As he was well appriſed, that Theodoric would not fail to reſent ſuch an affront, he reſolved to be before-hand with him; and therefore ſent embaſſadors with rich preſents to Attila, to engage him to fall upon Theodoric. Attila, who wanted only ſome pretence to enter Gaul, readily cloſed with the propoſal, pretending at the ſame time, that he might meet with no oppoſition from the Romans, to be fully ſatisfied with the reaſons alledged by their embaſſadors, and to relinquiſh all claim to any part of the empire; nay, he ſent to Valentinian embaſſadors, with a very friendly, in appearance, and obliging letter, aſſuring him, that his warlike preparations were deſigned againſt Theodoric alone; that, as to the Romans, he ſhould ever look upon them as his friends, provided they did not eſpouſe the cauſe of his enemy, At the ſame time he wrote to Theodoric, aſſuring him of his friendſhip, and exhorting that prince to join him againſt the Romans, as their common enemy. The better to ſurpriſe Valentinian, he did not wait the return of the embaſſadors he had ſent to him; but ſetting out immediately from Scythia, tho' in the midſt of winter, and directing his march through Germany, he never halted till he reached, early in the ſpring, the banks of the Rhine. There ſuch of the Franks as ſtill dwelt on the German ſide of that river, endeavoured to ſtop him; but they were eaſily defeated, Childeric, the ſon of Meroüée, and grandſon

Whom he endeavours to deceive.

He defeats the Franks, and enters Gaul.

of Clodion, being taken priſoner, with his mother and other perſons of diſtinction [m]. The Franks being thus overcome and diſperſed, Attila cauſed an incredible number of boats to be built, cutting down for that purpoſe whole foreſts, and paſſing the Rhine without oppoſition, entered Gaul [n]. As he gave out, that he deſigned to live in friendſhip with the Romans, and only begged leave to march through their country, in order to make war upon the Viſigoths in Languedoc, ſeveral cities opened their gates to him; but the rapines and violences which he ſuffered his men to commit in the cities that had received him, betraying his real deſign, the other cities ſhut their gates againſt him. Hereupon pulling off the maſk, he beſieged, took by ſtorm, and pillaged Tongres, Treves, Straſbourg, Spires, Worms, Mentz, and all the cities in that neighbourhood. Advancing thence into the country, and dividing his numerous army into ſeveral bodies, he put all to fire and ſword, and not only reduced and pillaged, but laid in aſhes the cities of Arras, Laon, Beſancon, Toul, and Langres [o]. Attila, thus laying waſte the country far and near, and committing every-where unheard-of cruelties, arrived at length before Orleans, and laid ſiege to that city. In the mean time, Aetius, arriving from Italy at Arles, aſſembled what forces he could, having brought with him but a ſmall number of troops, which, however, were reinforced by a great number of Viſigoths, under the command of their king Theodoric, whom Aetius had perſuaded to join the imperial troops, and, with their united forces, oppoſe the furious torrent, which threatened both alike. The example of Theodoric was followed by ſeveral other nations, namely, by the Franks, under the conduct of Merouée, who by means of one of his own nation, named Wiomaud, had made his eſcape; by the Sarmatians, Burgundians, Saxons, the Armorici, the Liſians, the Riverins, the Ibrions, and ſeveral other nations of Celtic Gaul and Germany, who, apprehending themſelves to be in no leſs danger than the Romans, readily joined Aetius againſt the common enemy [p]. The Liſians dwelt, according to Valeſius [q], on the banks of the Lis in Flanders; the Riverins on the Rhine towards Cologne; and the Ibrions in Vindelicia now Suabia and Bavaria. While Aetius was buſied in aſſembling the Roman

Takes and deſtroys ſeveral cities.

Aetius arrives in Gaul, and is joined by Theodoric and other princes.

[m] Val. rer. Franc. l. iv. p. 158. Du Cheſne tom. 1. p. 726. Sid. car. vii. p. 541. [n] Idem ibid. [o] Greg. Tur. hiſt. Franc. l. ii. c. 57. p. 275. Idat. p. 28. Coint. annal. eccleſ Franc. p. 451. [p] Jorn p. 664. Greg. Tur. hiſt. Franc l. ii. c. 7. p. 277. [q] Val. p. 161.

Roman forces and thoſe of their allies, Attila purſued the ſiege of Orleans with great fury, battering the place night and day with an incredible number of warlike engines. At length he carried it by aſſault, according to Apollinaris Sidonius; but while his men were buſie in plundering without the leaſt apprehenſion of danger, Aetius and Theodoric, arriving with all their forces, entered the city, cut great numbers of the Hunns in pieces, before they could put themſelves in a poſture of defence, and obliged Attila to repaſs the Loire, in which many of his men were drowned, and to retire towards the Rhine. Having paſſed Troyes, he halted in the Catalaunic or Mauriac fields, that is, in the plains of Chalons, which city was then known by the name of Catalauni. The ſame plains were called, according to Jornandes[r], Mauriaci or Mauritii, no doubt, from ſome neighbouring city or village. Valeſius indeed diſtinguiſhes the Catalaunic from the Mauriac plains, and ſuppoſes two battles to have been fought, the one, which was not deciſive, in the Mauriac, and the other, which put an end to the war, in the Catalaunic plains[s]. But all the antients mention only one battle fought in the plains, called by ſome Mauriac and Mauritian, and by others Catalaunic. Attila choſe that place, as the moſt advantageous for his Hunns, who were all horſe, to engage in. Aetius, who followed him cloſe, reſolved, notwithſtanding the enemy's advantageous ſituation, to put the whole to the iſſue of a battle. As he arrived late at night in the plains where Attila was encamped, the Gepidæ, who followed Attila, and the Franks, who ſerved under Aetius, meeting in the dark, engaged with ſuch fury, that, on both ſides, above fifteen thouſand were left dead upon the ſpot[t]. The next day Attila drew up his men in battle-array, placing the flower of his army in the centre, which he commanded in perſon, the Oſtrogoths in the left wing, and the Gepidæ, with other barbarous nations, in the right. On the other hand, Aetius placed the Romans, whom he commanded himſelf, in the left wing; the Viſigoths, under the command of Theodoric and his eldeſt ſon Thoriſmond, in the right; and the Alans, with their king Sangiban, the Franks, and the other auxiliaries, with their reſpective leaders, in the centre. That the Romans might not have time to purſue their victory, in caſe they gained it, Attila did not quit his camp till four in the afternoon, when the battle began, which, by

Attila beſieges, and takes Orleans;

But is driven out with great ſlaughter by Aetius.

A bloody encounter between the Franks and Gepidæ.

[r] Jorn rer. Goth. c. 46. p. 664 [s] Val notit. Gall p 324.
[t] Jorn. c. 41. p. 671.

The battle of Chalons.

all writers, is reckoned one of the moſt obſtinate and bloody engagements mentioned in hiſtory. Aetius, Theodoric, and his ſon Thoriſmond, diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a moſt eminent manner. Theodoric, notwithſtanding his great age, fought at the head of his Goths with a courage and reſolution hardly to be expreſſed. But while he was thus animating his men, more by his example than his words, he unluckily fell from his horſe, as ſome authors write, and was trod to death by his own people, who did not know him. Others write, that he was killed by a Goth, named Andagus, who ſerved under Attila, and was deſcended from the royal family of the Amali [u]. The Goths, not in the leaſt diſheartened by the death of their king, charged the Hunns ſo vigorouſly, that they began, after a moſt obſtinate reſiſtance, to give ground; which Attila no ſooner perceived, than he cauſed the retreat to be ſounded, and retired to his camp. As it was already dark, Aetius, thinking it adviſeable not to purſue the enemy, withdrew likewiſe; but kept his men all night under arms, for fear of a ſurprize. The next morning, the extenſive plains, in which the battle had been fought, appeared covered with heaps of dead bodies, and a neighbouring brook tinged with the blood of the ſlain. As Attila kept cloſe in his camp, the Romans concluded from thence, that his army had ſuffered greatly, and that he owned himſelf conquered; but as his camp was well fortified, and ſurrounded with an incredible number of waggons, the Romans and Goths contented themſelves with blocking it up, being well appriſed, that the enemy would be ſoon obliged, for want of proviſions, either to ſubmit, or to quit their intrenchments, and venture a ſecond battle in the open fields. In the mean time, the body of Theodoric, found among the ſlain, was interred with extraordinary pomp; and his ſon Thoriſmond, who had been dangerouſly wounded, proclaimed king of the Viſigoths in his room [w]. Such is the account the antients give us of this famous action. Idatius writes, that on both ſides near three hundred thouſand men were killed [x]; and Jornandes, according to the Amſterdam edition in 1655, makes the number of the ſlain amount to two hundred and fifty-two thouſand [y]. Both armies were greatly weakened, and the loſs on each ſide perhaps equal; but as Attila ſhut himſelf up in his camp, and declined a ſecond engagement, the Romans, who Theodoric, king of the Goths killed.

Attila retires to his camp.

The number of the ſlain.

[u] Vide Buch. hiſt. Belg. c. 37—40.
[w] Jorn. rer. Goth c. 40, 41. p. 669—672.
[x] Idat. p. 28.
[y] Jorn. c. 41. p. 672.

who remained maſters of the field of battle, challenged the victory. Caſſiodorus, and Theodoric king of Italy, aſcribe this victory to the courage and bravery of the Goths [z]; but Gregory of Tours will have it to have been chiefly owing to the prayers of St. Agnan biſhop of Orleans [a]. Thoriſmond who had not been informed of his father's death till the day after the battle, was for revenging it on the Hunns, and attacking Attila in his camp. With this view he had already drawn up his Goths in battle-array; but Aetius fearing, if the Hunns were entirely cut off, that the young prince, who was of an aſpiring genius, would turn his arms againſt the empire, adviſed him to return home with his forces, and take poſſeſſion of his paternal dominions, leſt his brothers, during his abſence, ſhould raiſe diſturbances, and, ſeizing on the royal treaſures, give riſe to a civil war. Thoriſmond followed his advice, which Attila no ſooner knew, than he quitted his camp, and began to retire towards the Rhine. As he did not attack Aetius even after the departure of Thoriſmond, Valeſius concludes, that either the number of his troops was greatly encreaſed by the writers of thoſe times, or the loſs he ſuſtained in the battle leſſened [b]; but the firſt is moſt likely. Aetius purſued Attila as far as the Rhine; but never offered to attack him, being willing, ſome authors ſay, that he ſhould make his eſcape, and, by awing the Franks and Goths, divert them from raiſing diſturbances in the empire. Attila, being thus driven out of Gaul, retired to Pannonia; and having there reinforced his army with ſupplies ſent him out of Scythia, he reſolved to make an irruption into Italy, where he hoped to meet with more booty and leſs oppoſition, there being no Goths, Alans, Franks, or Burgundians, there to oppoſe him. Purſuant to this reſolution he left Pannonia, and finding the paſſes of the Alps unguarded, as no hoſtilities were expected on that ſide, he entered Italy in the latter end of the preſent year 451, as Idatius and Jornandes ſeem to inſinuate [c], or in the beginning of the following year 452, when Herculanus and Sporacius were conſuls. It is impoſible to expreſs the terror and conſternation, which ſo ſudden and unexpected an irruption occaſioned, even in the moſt diſtant provinces. Aetius was at Thoriſmond returns home with the Viſigoths.

Attila quits Gaul.

And invades Italy.

[z] Caſſiod. chron & l. iii. ep. 1. p. 40. [a] Vide Du Cheſne p. 277. & Val. rer. Franc. l. iv. p 164. [b] Val. p. 165. [c] Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 42. p. 672. Theoph. p. 92. Greg. Tur. l. ii. p. 277.

at firſt for ſaving himſelf by flight, and retiring with the emperor into Gaul; but ſhame getting the better of his fear, he continued in Italy, and began to aſſemble the forces that were diſperſed up and down the provinces. In the mean time, Attila, advancing as far as Aquileia, the metropolis of the province called Venetia, inveſted that important place, battering it night and day with an incredible number of warlike engines; but as it was well fortified, and defended by the flower of the Roman troops, it held out, in ſpite of his utmoſt efforts, for the ſpace of three whole months, at the end of which it was taken by aſſault, pillaged for ſeveral days together, and laid in aſhes, not one houſe being left ſtanding, nor one perſon alive that fell into the enemy's hands, Attila deſigning, by this barbarous and inhuman treatment, to ſtrike terror into the other cities, and frighten them into ſubmiſſion. The cities of Arevigio, Verona, Mantua, Cremona, Breſcia, and Bergamor, underwent the ſame fate, the barbarians raging every where with ſuch fury, as can hardly be expreſſed or conceived, and putting all to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition. It is commonly believed, that on this occaſion the inhabitants of the province of Venetia, to avoid falling into the hands of the Hunns, retired to the iſlands on their coaſt, and there laid the foundations of a city, which, borrowing its name from the province, was called Venetiæ, and is now known by the name of Venice [d]. Caſſiodorus, ſpeaking of the Venetians, as he ſtyles them, about fifty years after, ſays, that they inhabited the iſlands of the Adriatic; that they had no other fence againſt the waves but hurdles; no other food but fiſh; no wealth beſides their boats; and no merchandize but ſalt, which they exchanged for other proviſions [e]. To return to Attila: From the province of Venetia he advanced to Milan, then the metropolis of Liguria, which he took and pillaged; the city of Pavia, and ſeveral other places in that neighbourhood, he laid in aſhes, after having plundered them, and put ſuch of the inhabitants to the ſword, as had not ſaved themſelves by a timely flight. Seeing at Milan ſome pictures, repreſenting the Roman emperors ſitting on thrones of gold, and the Scythians, that is, the Goths or Hunns, proſtrate at their feet, he cauſed himſelf to be painted ſitting on a throne, and the Roman emperors carrying on their ſhoulders ſacks Aquileia, taken, and deſtroyed, with ſeveral other cities.

The founding of Venice.

Milan taken and pillaged.

[d] Por de imp. c. 28. p. 69, 72. Valeſ. rer Franc. l. iv. p. 169

[e] Caſſiod. l. xii. ep. 24. p. 199.

ſacks filled with gold, which they emptied at his feet [f]. From Liguria, Attila was for advancing to Rome, which city was not in a condition to withſtand him; but his men, remembering the untimely end of Alaric, who died ſoon after he had plundered the metropolis, did all that lay in their power to divert him, notwithſtanding their thirſt after plunder, from that reſolution. Attila deſpiſed that omen; but his troops being greatly diminiſhed for want of proviſions, and by the maladies that raged among them, and Aetius having at the ſame time, with a reinforcement ſent him by Marcian out of the eaſt, defeated a party of Hunns, he thought it adviſeable to put off his march to Rome, and purſue his ravages in the neighbouring provinces. In the mean time, Valentinian, having no other reſource, ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to Attila, with propoſals for an accommodation. At the head of this embaſſy was Leo biſhop of Rome, a perſon famed for his eminent piety, eloquence, and learning. His collegues were Albienus or Avienus, who had been conſul in 450, and Trigecius, formerly prefect. They found Attila on the banks of the Menzo, not far from Mantua, and were by him received with uncommon demonſtrations of kindneſs and eſteem. He concluded with Leo, who ſurprized and ſoftened him with his eloquence, a kind of treaty, which, it ſeems, was but a truce; for he threatened to return to Italy, and purſue his ravages with more cruelty than ever, unleſs the princeſs Honoria was ſent him, with the ſhare of the imperial treaſures that was due to her. One of the articles of this treaty was, that the emperor ſhould pay an annual penſion to Attila. It was no ſooner ſigned, than he ordered his Hunns to forbear hoſtilities, and leaving Italy, retired beyond the Danube [g]. Damaſcus, who flouriſhed about this time, writes, that a bloody battle was fought under the walls of Rome between the Romans and the Scythians under the conduct of Attila; and that the ſlaughter was great on both ſides, none but the chiefs, and a ſmall number of their guards, being left alive; but as he adds, that the ſouls of the ſlain purſued the engagement with great noiſe for three days and three nights [h], his whole account may be looked upon as fabulous. The following year, 453, when Opilio and Vincomalus were conſuls, Attila, incapable of living himſelf, or ſuffering others to live in peace, croſſing Rhætia, and following the courſe of the Rhone, entered unexpectedly the Valentinian concludes a treaty with Attila.

Who retires out of Italy.

[f] Jorn. ibid. p. 673. [g] Idem, p. 674—685. [h] Phot. c. 242. p. 1040, 1041.

And returns to Gaul.

the country now known by the name of Dauphiny, and fell upon the Alans, whom Aetius had allowed to ſettle in the Valentinois, under the conduct of Sangiban. But Thoriſmond, king of the Viſigoths, whoſe dominions were divided from thoſe of the Alans only by the Rhone, being well appriſed, that Attila, after having reduced the Alans, would not fail to invade his territories, joined his neighbours with the whole ſtrength of his kingdom, and having gained a complete victory over Attila, obliged him to return with ſhame and diſgrace into his own country [i]. Jornandes, and Sigebert are the only writers who mention this ſecond irruption of the Hunns into Gaul; and their authority is ſuſpected by Valeſius, eſpecially that of Jornandes, who ſeems not to have been well acquainted with the hiſtory of the Viſigoths. Attila died ſoon after, that is, either in the preſent, or the following year, 454, and with him ended the kingdom, or rather the empire, of the Hunns, in the north, a civil war being kindled, upon his death, among his numerous iſſue; which gave the ſeveral nations he had ſubdued an opportunity of ſhaking off the yoke, and recovering their antient liberty, as we ſhall relate more at length in the hiſtory of the Hunns, and other northern nations. The ſame year, Thoriſmond, king of the Viſigoths, was murdered in Toulouſe, the capital of his kingdom, by two of his brothers, viz. Theodoric and Frederic, and ſucceeded by the former, on whom Apollinaris Sidonius, who was intimately acquainted with him, beſtows great encomiums, extolling him even above his father, and ſtyling him the protector and bulwark of the empire [k].

Where he is defeated by Thoriſmond.

Thoriſmond murdered.

The council of Chalcedon.

WHILE theſe things paſſed in the weſt, the council of Chalcedon was held in the eaſt by Marcian's orders, who nevertheleſs ſeems to have aſſiſted in perſon only at the ſeſſion of the twenty-fifth of October. The council began on the eighth of october, of the year 451, and ended on the firſt of November [l]. The ſame year the emperor enacted a law, forbidding, on pain of death, any one to ſacrifice to the gods, or even to adorn their temples with flowers, and condemning the governors and officers, who ſhould wink at ſuch wicked practices, to pay fifty pounds weight of gold [m]. The following year, the Saracens, the Nubians, and the Blemmyes, broke into the empire; but were defeated by the troops troops of Marcian, and forced to sue for peace, which the emperor granted them upon terms highly advantageous to the empire, as Priscus assures us, who attended the Roman embassadors to Damascus, where the treaty was concluded [n]. The following year, 453, Attila dying, several nations, formerly subdued by that conqueror, revolting from his children, begged and obtained leave of Marcian to settle in Thrace and Illyricum, almost entirely dispeopled by the frequent incursions of the Hunns and other barbarians. Among these mention is made of the Squiri, Satagairæ, and Alans, who, under the conduct of Candax, their king or leader, settled in Lesser Scythia, and Lower Mœsia: to the Rugians, Sarmatians, and Cemandrians, lands were granted in Illyricum near a place called the castle of Mars: to the Goths, commonly called Ostrogoths or Eastern Goths, to distinguish them from the Visigoths or Western Goths, who afterwards became masters of Spain, Marcian granted all Pannonia, from Sirmium, now Sirmish, in Sclavonia, to Vindobona, at present Vienna, in Austria, a large tract, comprising many cities. These Goths were then governed by three brothers, viz. Valemir, Theodomir, the father of Theodoric the Great, afterwards king of Italy, and Vidimir, who divided that extensive country among them, Valemir settling in the eastern part of it, Theodomir in the western, and Vidimir between the other two [o]. The Goths, as well as the other barbarians, acknowledged the authority of the Constantinopolitan emperors, and were subjects of the empire; but at the same time their princes claimed an uncontrolled authority over their own people, and frequently waged war with each other. Even one of the sons of Attila, named Ernac, and several other Hunns, submitted to the Romans, who granted them lands on the most distant borders of Lesser Scythia, in Dacia, and amongst the Sarmatians in Illyricum [p]. The same year died, in the month of July, the empress Pulcheria, daughter to Arcadius, sister to Theodosius II. and wife to Marcian. She left by her will, which was confirmed and executed with great fidelity by Marcian, the immense wealth of which she was possessed, and her rich moveables, to the poor [q]. She was a woman of most extraordinary parts, and is, on account of her exemplary piety, Several barbarous nations settle in Thrace and Illyricum.

[i] Jorn. p 674—675. [k] Sid. car. vii. p. 347. et ep. ii—vi p. 4. car. xiii p. 400. [l] Concil. tom. iv. p. 574, 576.
[m] Cod. Juſt. l. i. tit. 11. leg. 7 p. 105, 106.

The empress Pulcheria dies.

[n] Evagr. l. ii. c. 5 p. 295. Prif. p 40. Niceph. l. xv. c. 9. p. 61. [o] Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 50—52. p. 688, 689. [p] Idem ibid.

piety, honoured both by the Greeks and Latins with the title of ſaint.

The diſgrace and death of Aetius.

THE following year, 454, when Aetius was conſul the fourth time with Studius, is remarkable for the downfal and death of that great commander, owing chiefly to the malice and inſinuations of an eunuch, by name Heraclius, who having gained an abſolute aſcendant over the emperor, eaſily perſuaded the weak prince, that Aetius aſpired at the empire, and maintained a private correſpondence with the barbarians, in order to raiſe himſelf by their means to the imperial dignity. Aetius, on his ſide, gave ſome occaſion to the accuſations of the eunuch, by preſſing the emperor with too much eagerneſs to perform the promiſe he had made of marrying his eldeſt daughter Eudocia to Gaudentius, the general's ſon. His importunity gave weight to the calumnies of Heraclius, and confirmed the weak and jealous emperor in his ſuſpicions, which, according to Gregory of Tours[r] and all the writers of thoſe times, were altogether groundleſs. But after all, his treachery towards count Bonifacius and ſeveral others, plainly prove, that he did not on all occaſions ſcruple ſacrificing his conſcience and honour to his preferment and grandeur. Some pretend, but without any poſitive proof, and probably without foundation, that he was at the bottom of all the diſturbances that happened during his adminiſtration [s]. Petronius Maximus is ſaid to have greatly contributed to the death of Aetius, by prompting the eunuchs of the court to perſuade the emperor, that he aimed at nothing leſs than the ſovereignty. The view of Maximus therein was to remove out of the way the only perſon, who ſcreened the prince from the vengeance he was reſolved to take upon him for a late affront [t], of which anon. However that be, the death of Aetius being reſolved on, Valentinian ordered him one day to attend him in the palace, pretending to have ſome affair of the utmoſt importance to impart to him. Aetius obeyed the ſummons, repairing without delay to the emperor's apartment, attended by Boëtius, the præfectus prætorio, his intimate friend, and ſeveral others. But Aetius alone was admitted into the prince's chamber, which he had no ſooner entered, than Valentinian ran him through with his ſword; and with the aſſiſtance of the officers about him, particularly, of Heraclius, diſpatched him in a moſt barbarous and

Who is treacherouſly murdered by Valentinian.

[q] Marc. chron. Valeſ. p. 175.
[r] Greg. Tur hiſt. Fran l ii. c. 8. p. 277.
[s] Val p. 176. Buch. Belg p. 313.
[t] Jorn. reg. Sue. p. 654.

and inhuman manner [u]. Thus fell the beſt general of his age, the terror of Attila, the bulwark of the weſtern provinces, ſays Sidonius, by the hand of the greateſt coward in the whole empire [w]. We are told, that Valentinian having one day asked a Roman whether he had done well in diſpatching Aetius? the Roman anſwered, that he could not tell whether he had done well or no, but thought he had cut off his right hand with his left [x]. The prefect Boëtius, and all thoſe who had attended Aetius to the palace, were likewiſe diſpatched, being called one after the other into the emperor's chamber [y]. This bloody tragedy was acted, according to Theophanes, at Rome [z]. Valentinian immediately diſpatched embaſſadors to the Suevians, and other foreign nations, to acquaint them with the death of Aetius, and confirm the treaties that general had concluded with them [a]. But the news of that great man's death encouraged, it ſeems, ſome of them to make irruptions into the empire. For in the beginning of the following year, the Armorici, that is, the inhabitants of the preſent Bretagne and Normandy, were under daily apprehenſions of ſeeing the Saxons on their coaſts; the Alemans paſſed the Rhine near Baſle, and the Franks laid waſte the territories of Mentz and Rheims [b].

THE following year, 445, when Valentinian was conſul the eighth time with Anthemius, ſon-in-law to the emperor Marcian, the weſtern empire was involved in endleſs calamities. The emperor Valentinian was murdered on the ſeventeenth of March, and the empire ſeized by Petronius Maximus, grandſon to Magnus Clemens Maximus, who having uſurped the ſovereignty in 383, was taken and put to death by Theodoſius the Great in 388. Authors give us the following account of the unhappy end of Valentinian, and uſurpation of Maximus. The latter having married a lady, equally famous for her beauty and chaſtity, Valentinian, taken with her charms, fell paſſionately in love with her; but her virtue being proof againſt all his preſents, menaces, and promiſes, he had recourſe to the following artifice: He ſent one day for Maximus to play with him at dice; and having won of him a conſiderable ſum, obliged him to leave his ring as a pledge for the payment of it. This ring he ſent privately to the wife of Maximus, deſiring her in her huſband's Valentinian falls in love with the wife of Maximus.

[u] Idat. p. 30. Proſp. Marc. chron. Theoph. p. 92. Sid. car. v. p. 318. [w] Sid. car. vii. p. 342. [x] Perſec. Vand. hiſt. l. i. c. 4. p. 187. [y] Proſp. Idat. Marc. Caſſiod &c. [z] Theoph. p. 92. [a] Idat. Caſſiod. &c. [b] Sid. car. vii p. 542.

band's name to repair to the palace, and wait upon the empreſs. The lady, knowing the ring, haſtened to the palace, in compliance with the ſuppoſed orders of her huſband; but was conducted by ſome perſons employed for that purpoſe to a remote apartment, where Valentinian, without any regard to her tears and entreaties, robbed her by force of that which was infinitely more dear to her than her life. Upon her return home, ſhe burſt into a flood of tears, reproaching, in moſt bitter terms, her huſband, whom ſhe believed privy to her diſhonour, and his own infamy. Maximus, on the other hand, then firſt appriſed of the emperor's wicked artifice, acquainted his wife with it, and reſolved at all events to be revenged on Valentinian [c]. Purſuant to this reſolution, he applied to the friends of Aetius, whom the emperor had cauſed to be lately murdered, eſpecially to Trauſtila and Optila or Occylla, two barbarians, who had ſerved under that general, and had been diſtinguiſhed by him with particular marks of kindneſs and eſteem. Theſe readily undertook to revenge the death of their old commander, and at the ſame time the diſhonour offered to Maximus; and accordingly falling upon Valentinian, while he was diverting himſelf in the campus Martius at Rome, they firſt killed his favourite eunuch Heraclius, who courageouſly interpoſed, and endeavoured to ſave his maſter, and then diſpatched, with many wounds, the emperor himſelf in the ſight of the whole court [d]. Procopius and John of Antioch, who evidently copies from him, are the only authors who mention the indignity offered to Maximus. Sidonius and Idatius, without taking the leaſt notice of that outrage, aſcribe the death of Valentinian to the unbounded ambition of Maximus, not to be ſatisfied with any thing leſs than the empire itſelf [e]. Valentinian was murdered on the ſeventeenth of March of the preſent year 455, after having lived thirty-four years, and reigned twenty-nine and about five months, reckoning from the twenty-third of October 425, when he was firſt declared Auguſtus [f]. His tomb is thought to be ſtill extant at Ravenna [g]. As he had but very ſlender parts, he was entirely governed by the eunuchs of the court, who diſpoſed, at their pleaſure, of all the great offices, ſacrificing the good of the public, and the honour of the prince, to their private intereſt tereſt and ambition. He had not courage enough to head his armies in perſon: and beſides was, by his effeminate education, become altogether incapable of bearing the toils of a military life. The only journies he undertook were from Ravenna to Rome, and from Rome back again to Ravenna, keeping himſelf in both places locked up in his palace with a herd of eunuchs, and indulging, without reſtraint, his moſt brutal inclinations, tho' married to one of the moſt beautiful women of that age[h]. The day after his death, Maximus, the author of it, aſſumed the purple; and being ſaluted by the Roman people with the title of Auguſtus, he immediately raiſed his ſon, by name Palladius, to the dignity of Cæſar. Maximus was ſprung from an illuſtrious family in Rome, and had diſcharged with great applauſe and reputation the firſt offices in the ſtate. He was poſſeſſed of immenſe wealth, which he ſhared and enjoyed with his friends, leading an eaſy and quiet life, and indulging himſelf in all the diverſions and recreations, which his plentiful eſtate could afford him. Hence he no ſooner began to feel the anxieties inſeparable from a crown, eſpecially when acquired by unlawful means, than he repented the ſtep he had taken, panting after his former condition. Sidonius writes, that the very firſt night he lodged in the palace, he was heard crying out, "Happy Damocles, whoſe reign began and ended "with a dinner;" nay, he had ſome thoughts of abandoning Rome, of quitting the enſigns of majeſty, and reſuming in ſome corner of Italy his former method of life[i]. But being diverted from that reſolution by his friends, he appointed Avitus, then in Gaul, commander in chief of the Roman armies, who immediately diſpatched Meſſianus to acquaint Theodoric, king of the Viſigoths, with the acceſſion of Maximus to the empire. That general went ſoon after to confer in perſon with the Gothiſh king, and entered Toulouſe, attended by Theodoric himſelf on his right hand, and one of the prince's brothers on his left. He was upon the point of concluding a treaty with Theodoric, when he unexpectedly received the diſagreeable tidings of the death of Maximus, which put him upon other meaſures[k]. The wife of Maximus dying ſoon after the outrage ſuppoſed to have been offered her, the uſurper, that he might have ſome title to the crown,

Maximus, to revenge the violence offered her, cauſes Valentinian to be murdered.

[c] Procop. bell. Vand. l. ii. c. 4. p. 186, 187. [d] Marc. Idat Caſſiod chron. Evagr c. 7. p. 298. Jorn. reg Suev. p 654. Greg. Tur. p. 277. [e] Sid. l. ii. ep. 13. p. 57. Idat. p. 31. [f] Idat. p. 30. [g] Mab. It. Ital. p. 40.

The character of Valentinian.

Maximus aſſumes the purple.

And appoints Avitus, commander in chief of all the Roman forces.

[h] Theoph p. 93. Zon. p. 40. Conſt. Manaſſ. p. 51. Procop. bell. Vand l. i. c 3. p. 182.
[i] Sid. l. ep. 13. p. 57, 58.
[k] Idem, car vii. p. 343, 344.

Eudoxia, being forced to marry him, invites Genſericinto Italy.

crown, obliged Eudoxia, the deceaſed emperor's widow, to marry him, contrary to her inclination, a few days after the murder of her husband; and at the ſame time married her daughter Eudocia to his ſon Palladius. Eudoxia, who had loved Valentinian with great tenderneſs, highly provoked in ſeeing herſelf married againſt her will to the very perſon who had deprived him both of his life and empire, reſolved, whatever it coſt her, to revenge the death of her former husband, and the affront offered in her perſon to his bed. Blinded therefore with paſſion and thirſt of revenge, ſhe took ſuch meaſures as proved fatal to herſelf, to Rome, and all Italy. For expecting no aſſiſtance from Marcian, unwilling perhaps to engage in a civil war, ſhe diſpatched a truſty meſſenger to Genſeric in Africa, conjuring him to come and revenge the death of his friend and ally Valentinian, and to reſcue her out of the arms of a tyrant, the murderer of her huſband [l]. Some authors affirm, that ſhe wrote to the king of the Vandals with her own hand, aſſuring him, that he would meet with no great reſiſtance in Italy, and promiſing to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of her power. This meſſage was very acceptable to Genſeric, who had long wiſhed for ſuch an opportunity, which he embraced with great joy; and putting to ſea without loſs of time, ſteered his courſe ſtrait to Rome. When his numerous fleet firſt appeared, the chief citizens, and all perſons of diſtinction, ſtruck with terror and diſmay, inſtead of putting themſelves in a poſture of defence, thought only of conſulting their ſafety by flight [m]. Among theſe was Maximus himſelf; but as he was flying with thoſe of his court, the populace, highly incenſed againſt him for thus ſhamefully abandoning thoſe whom it was his duty to protect, riſing all on a ſudden, purſued him with ſhowers of ſtones; which ſome of Valentinian's officers obſerving, they threw themſelves upon him; and a Roman ſoldier, by name Urſus, gave him the fatal blow [n]. His body was ignominiouſly dragged through the chief ſtreets of the city; and, after it had lain ſome time expoſed to the inſults of the incenſed multitude, thrown into the Tiber. Such was the end of the uſurper Maximus, after he had lived about ſixty years, and borne the title of emperor three months wanting five days. His ſon Palladius is ſuppoſed to have undergone the ſame fate. Three days after the death of Maximus, that is, on the fifteenth of June, Genſeric entered Rome without oppoſition, and Maximus murdered.

Rome taken and plundered by Genſeric.

[l] Evagr. l. ii. c. 7. p. 298. [m] Sid. p. 174. [n] Procop. p. 186. Jornand. rer. Goth. c. 45, 67.

and abandoned it to the mercy of his Vandals, ſtrictly enjoining them, however, not to ſet fire to the city, nor ſhed the blood of the inhabitants, purſuant to the promiſe he had made to Leo the Great, then biſhop of Rome, who had gone out to meet him [o]. They continued in the city fourteen days, pillaging not only the private houſes, but ſtripping the public buildings of all their rich ornaments, and even the churches of their ſacred veſſels. They took an incredible number of captives, every one ſeized ſuch women as they liked beſt; and amongſt the men, thoſe who they thought would be of moſt uſe to them. Genſeric himſelf forced the imperial palace; and having ſeized on the treaſure, and all the rich moveables he found there, he cauſed them to be put on board a veſſel, with the empreſs Eudoxia, her two daughters Placidia and Eudocia, and Gaudentius, the ſon of Aetius, and carried them all into captivity. Amongſt the ſpoils, mention is made of a great many ſtatues with which a veſſel was loaded; of half the covering of the capitol, which was of braſs plated over with gold; of ſacred veſſels of gold, enriched with precious ſtones; and of thoſe which had been formerly taken by Titus out of the temple of Jeruſalem, and brought to Rome. Genſeric, having thus ſtripped the city of all its wealth and valuable ornaments, returned with his fleet to Africa, but loſt in his paſſage the ſhip that carried the ſtatues [p]. Marcian, ſenſibly affected with the misfortune of Eudoxia and the two princeſſes her daughters, diſpatched embaſſadors to Genſeric, earneſtly entreating him to ſet them at liberty; but he, deſpiſing both his entreaties and menaces, kept them till the year 462, when he ſent back Eudoxia, with her ſecond daughter Placidia, to Leo, the ſucceſſor of Marcian. As for Eudocia, he married her to Hunneric, his eldeſt ſon, who had by her Ailderic, afterwards king of the Vandals in Africa [p]. In the eaſt Marcian enacted this year a famous law, dated, according to ſome, the firſt of May, according to others, the twenty-ſecond of April, wherein he allowed every one to bequeath to the eccleſiaſtics and monks what they pleaſed, and revoked the laws of the other emperors his predeceſſors, forbidding widows and deaconeſſes to leave any thing by will to the church [r]. This law is addreſſed to Palladius, the præfectus prætorio, to whom is likewiſe addreſſed another againſt the Eutychians, dated from Eudoxia and her daughters carried into captivity.

[o] Theoph. p. 93. Vict. Proſp. chron. [p] Theoph. p. 93. Evagr. p. 98. Procop. p. 189. [q] Theod. l. i. p, 552 Priſc. p. 1. [r] Cod. Theod. nov. l. iii. tit. 5.

Conſtantinople the firſt of Auguſt [s]. Of the few writers who flouriſhed under Valentinian III. we ſhall ſpeak in note (T).

AVITUS,

[s] Concil. tom. iv. p. 886, 888.

(T) The chronicle of Idatius has been of great uſe to us in writing the hiſtory of Valentinian's reign. He was a native of Lamego, in the province of Beira, belonging then to Galicia, but at preſent to the kingdom of Portugal. His parents dying when he was very young, he left Spain, and retired to the eaſt, where he ſaw St. Jerom, Eulogius of Cæſarea, John of Jeruſalem, and Theophilus of Alexandria. He owns himſelf to have been but indifferently verſed in polite literature, and ſtill leſs in the ſtudy of the holy ſcripture (1). But as to the latter, Leo the Great, biſhop of Rome, ſeems to have been of a different opinion, ſince he employed him againſt the Priſcilianiſts (2). He was ordained biſhop in the third or fourth year of the reign of Valentinian III. that is, about the year 427, for he reckons from the time that prince was created Cæſar (3). Sigibert, and ſome other writers, ſuppoſe him to have been biſhop of Lamego. And truly the words of his preface leave it doubtful, whether he was biſhop, or only a native, of that city; but in his chronicle he tells us, that the biſhop Idatius was taken in the church of Aquæ Flaviæ, and returned after three months captivity to Flaviæ (4). As he evidently ſpeaks in that place of himſelf, father Labbé concludes him to have been a native of Lamego, and biſhop of Aquæ Flaviæ (5); which laſt city Sanſon places in the territory of Braga, on the confines of Portugal, calling it Aquæ Leæ Turodorum. Leo, biſhop of Rome, only writes, that Idatius was biſhop in Galicia (6). Dupin will have him to have been archbiſhop of Lugo (7), not reflecting, that Idatius was ordained biſhop in 427, and that ſix years after the ſee of Lugo was held by Aſterius (8). In the year 431, Idatius was ſent by the natives of Galicia to implore the aſſiſtance of Aetius, then in Gaul, againſt the Suevians, who, contrary to the articles of a late treaty, pillaged the country. He returned from Gaul the following year with count Cenſorius, ſent by Aetius to treat with the Suevians. He was taken by the Suevians in the church of Aquæ Flaviæ on the twenty ſixth of July 462, but after three months captivity was ſet at liberty. Notwithſtanding the wars and diſturbances that reigned in his time all over the empire, eſpecially in Spain, he wrote a chronicle, which is, properly ſpeaking,

(1) Idat chron. p 2—10. (2) Leo ep. xxxii. c. 17 p. 162. (3) Idem, p. 4. (4) Idem, p. 39. (5) Labb. ſcript tom. ii p. 496. (6) Leo. tom. ii p 827, 828. (7) Dupin. tom. iv p. 557. (8) Idat. p. 20.

Avitus, or Flavius Mœcilius Avitus, as he is ſtyled on an antient medal [t], had been appointed by Maximus commander

[t] Goltz. p. 135.

ing, a continuation of that of St. Jerom. What he wrote from the death of Valens, where his chronicle begins, to the third year of Valentinian's reign, and his own epiſcopacy, he either copied, as he aſſures us, from the beſt writers, or learnt of perſons of unqueſtionable veracity: of all the reſt, he was himſelf an eye-witneſs. He writes, that he had the misfortune to ſee the Roman empire reduced within narrow bounds, and in great danger of loſing the little it retained; that the diſcipline of the church was utterly neglected in Galicia, and the liberties of the people entirely loſt, the barbarians, who prevailed there, acknowledging no other law but their arbitrary will and caprice. He carries his chronicle down to the third of Anthemius's reign, that is, to the year 469, the forty-firſt of his epiſcopacy. The chronicle of Idatius gives great light to the hiſtory of thoſe times, eſpecially to that of Spain; whence Iſidore and ſome others have copied almoſt word for word. However, it is not quite free from faults, eſpecially in point of chronology, either the author himſelf, or his tranſcribers reckoning ſometimes the end of one emperor's reign, and the beginning of another's, as two diſtinct years, which is a very groſs miſtake. The years of the emperors are marked all along with the olympiads, and, in imitation of St. Jerom, the years of the ſupputation of Euſebius from the birth of Abraham. The æra of Spain, which is thirty years anterior to ours, is marked in the beginning on the margin Father Sirmond, to whom we are indebted for this chronicle, has annexed to it a book of conſular tables, which he believes to have been done by the ſame author. Father Sirmond publiſhed only part of theſe tables. But father Labbé inſerted the whole in his Bibliotheca nova, and Du Cange in his Chronicon Paſchale (9), which extends from the conſulſhip of Brutus, the firſt conſul, to the ſecond conſulſhip of Anthemius in 468, ſo that the conſular tables end about a year after the chronicle. In the tables no other æra is marked but that of Spain, which gives us room to believe that they were done by a native of that country (10). They are reckoned very exact; but yet ſome faults have crept into them, which, in all likelihood, is owing to the ignorance of the tranſcribers. In the time of Charlemagne, a French chronologer publiſhed an epitome of the chronicle of Idatius, which is to be found in Caniſius (11). The work

(9) Labb. p. 3. Cange chron. Paſc. p. 439. (10) Vide Wilt. ad. not p. 8 & Noris de Dioclef. num p. 11. (11) Caniſ. tom. ii p. 640, 641.

mander in chief of all the Roman forces, and was at the court of Theodoric, king of the Viſigoths, when news was brought him of the death of the uſurper. He immediately acquainted Theodoric, with what had happened, who thereupon preſſed him to aſſume the purple, and even cauſed him to be proclaimed emperor by the Goths in Toulouſe, on the tenth of July of the preſent year, promiſing to ſupport him in his new dignity with the whole ſtrength of his kingdom [u]. However, he did not, it ſeems, take upon him the title of emperor till he was proclaimed ſome time after, that is, on the eighth of Auguſt, by the Roman army at Arles, and by all the chief men in Gaul. Theodoric went immediately, attended by his brothers, to Arles, to congratulate the new prince on his acceſſion to the empire, and was received by him as one to whom he was chiefly indebted for the dignity he enjoyed [w]. From Arles the new emperor ſet out ſoon after for Rome, where he was received by the populace with great demonſtrations of joy. Marcian, who had nothing ſo much at heart as the public welfare and tranquillity, readily approved of his promotion, and acknowledged him for his collegue [x]. The following year, when Varanes and Johannes were conſuls, a bloody war broke Avitus proclaimed emperor at Toulouſe, and after at Arles.

Is received as ſuch at Rome, and acknowledged by Marcian.

[u] Greg. Tur. l. ii. c. 11. p. 280. [w] Idat. p. 31. Iſidor. chron. [x] Idat. p. 32.

work intitled Notitia imperii is ſuppoſed to have been written in the reign of Valentinian III. and Theodoſius II. but by ſome in the very beginning, by others in the latter end, of the reign of Theodoſius. This notitia contains a ſuccinct account of the ſtate of the empire in thoſe times, viz of the provinces and their governors; of the other magiſtrates, both civil and military, their titles and offices; of their land and ſea forces; of their foot and horſe; of their troops, both Roman and foreign, and the places where they were quartered, &c. This notitia was publiſhed by Guidus Pancirollus in 1593, with copious comments, of which father Labbé ſpeaks with great contempt, ridiculing the cuts with which they are adorned, repreſenting, as Pancirollus imagines, the habits and ornaments peculiar to each office and dignity. To the notitia is added the decription of Rome by an anonymons author, who is ſuppoſed to have wrote under Valentinian III. To this deſcription of Rome, father Labbé adds one of Conſtantinople, done likewiſe by an anonymous writer, either in the reign of Arcadius, or of Theodoſius the younger. The treatiſe de rebus bellicis, which Labbé adds to it, is ſuppoſed to have been written about the ſame time; but the author, who ſeems to have been a private perſon, and to have profeſſed the ſtudy of philoſophy, is not known.

broke out between the Suevians in Spain and the Viſigoths in Aquitain. Requiarius, king of the former, taking advantage of the diſtracted ſtate of the empire, over-ran the province of Cartagena, which ſtill belonged to the Romans, committing every-where dreadful ravages. Hereupon Avitus, diſpatching count Fronto to him with the character of embaſſador, put him in mind of the treaties concluded between him and the Romans. Theodoric likewiſe, whoſe ſiſter Requiarius had married, interpoſed his good offices, conjuring his brother-in-law not to diſturb the public tranquillity, and acquainted him with the engagements which he had entered into with Avitus. But Requiarius, without any regard either to treaties or remonſtrances, purſued his ravages, laying waſte, not only the province of Cartagena, but that of Tarraco too, which likewiſe belonged to the empire. Upon this, Theodoric ſent him a ſecond embaſſy, to which he anſwered with great haughtineſs, that if Theodoric found fault with his conduct, he would ſoon give him an account of it at Toulouſe. This anſwer piqued Theodoric to ſuch a degree, that he immediately entered Spain at the head of a powerful army; and being met by Requiarius about twelve miles from Aſtorga, a battle enſued, in which the Suevians were entirely defeated, and their king, who was dangerouſly wounded, obliged to fly for ſhelter to a diſtant corner of Galicia. Theodoric purſued him cloſe; and entering Braga on a Sunday, the twenty-eighth of October, gave that city up to be plundered by his ſoldiers. From Braga he advanced with all poſſible expedition to a place called Portucal, whither the fugitive king had retired [y]. Some writers take Portucal for the preſent city of Porto, on the Douro, in the kingdom of Portugal, to which it is thought to have given name [z]. Jornandes writes, that Requiarius put to ſea, in order to ſave himſelf by flight, but was driven back by a ſtorm [a]. Be that as it will, all authors agree, that he was taken, and delivered up to Theodoric, who, after having kept him ſome time in priſon, put him to death in the month of December [b]. The Suevians, diſheartened by the death of their king, and deſtitute of a leader, ſubmitted to Theodoric, who retained for himſelf the country he had conquered, appointing one Aquiulphus to govern it. Aquiulphus, revolting ſoon after from Theodoric, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king of the Suevians in Galicia, but died the following year in the month of June at Porto [c]. Jornandes writes, that a War between the Viſigoths and Suevians.

The Suevians defeated.

[y] Idat. p. 33. Iſidor. chron. Jorn p. 676. [z] Baud. [a] Jorn. ibid. [b] Idat p. 24. Iſidor. chron. [c] Idat p. 27.

powerful army being ſent againſt him by Theodoric, he was overcome in battle, taken, and beheaded[d]. Some Suevians, refuſing to ſubmit to the Goths, retired to a diſtant corner of Galicia, and there choſe for their king one of their own nation, named Maldra[e]. The ſame year, Genſeric, putting to ſea with a numerous fleet, and a conſiderable army on board, with a deſign to ravage the coaſts of Italy or Gaul, was overtaken near Corſica by the Roman fleet, under the command of Ricimer, and utterly defeated[f]. Ricimer, ſtyled by ſome Richimer or Richemer, was ſprung from the royal family of the Suevians; but as his mother was the daughter of Valla, king of the Goths in 418, he is commonly looked upon rather as a Goth than a Suevian. He had ſerved from his youth in the Roman armies, and acquired ſo much reputation by his warlike exploits, that Sidonius gives him the title of invincible, and Jornandes ſtyles him the beſt commander of his age[g]; nay, Sidonius prefers him for courage to Sylla, for prudence to Fabius, for good-nature to Metellus, for eloquence to Appius, for vigour and reſolution to Fulvius, and for addreſs to Camillus[h]. But theſe good qualities were not without the allay of as many bad ones; for he was a man without faith, honour, or honeſty; ambitious to ſuch a degree, that not ſatisfied with being commander in chief of all the forces in the weſt, patrician, and ſon-in-law to the emperor, he took upon him to raiſe and depoſe emperors at his pleaſure, and, ſince he was excluded by his birth from wearing the imperial crown himſelf, to command and controul thoſe who wore it. This unbounded ambition, this unbridled luſt of ruling, prompted him to murder four emperors, three of whom had been raiſed by himſelf, and to ſtir up and aſſiſt under-hand the avowed enemies of that empire, which he was by the ſtrongeſt ties bound to protect and defend. Elated with his ſucceſs over Genſeric, inſtead of purſuing it, he returned to Rome, and, revolting with Majorianus, obliged the ſenate to declare Avitus unworthy of the empire; which no ſooner came to the prince's ears, who was then in Gaul, than he haſtened back to Italy; but upon his arrival at Placentia, he was ſtopped by Ricimer, and ſtripped of all the badges of majeſty[i]. Theophanes writes, that Avitus was overcome in battle by Ricimer, Genſeric defeated at ſea by Ricimer.

Avitus depoſed.

[d] Jorn. p. 677. [e] Idat. p. 34. [f] Idem, ibid. [g] Jorn. c. 45. p. 678. Sid car. ii. p. 301. [h] Sid. car. v. p. 317. [i] Greg. Tur. l, ii c. 11. p. 280.

Ricimer, on the ſixteenth of October [k]; ſo that he had ſcarce reigned fourteen months. Being thus deveſted of the purple, he cauſed himſelf to be ordained biſhop of Placentia, but the ſenate inſiſting upon his being put to death, he withdrew from Placentia, with a deſign to take ſanctuary in the church of St. Julian at Brioude in Auvergne, the place of his nativity. Gregory of Tours adds, that he died on the road, and his body was brought to Brioude, and buried near that of the holy martyr of St. Julian [l]. During his ſhort reign, the Burgundians, who had been removed from the banks of the Rhine in 438, or, as others will have it, in 443, and had ever ſince that time dwelt amongſt the mountains of Savoy, ſeized on part of Gaul, and made themſelves maſters of the city of Lions [m]. In 463, the city of Die in Dauphiny was ſubject to them, as appears from a letter of Gondiac their king to Hilarius biſhop of Rome [n]. The next conſuls were Conſtantine and Rufinus, belonging both to the eaſtern empire, no emperor being yet choſen in the weſt. In the beginning of this year 457, died the emperor Marcian, after having reigned ſix years, five months, and two days. His death, which Theodorus, ſurnamed the Reader, aſcribes to his having aſſiſted at a proceſſion on the twenty-ſixth of January [o], muſt have happened about the end of that month; for Leo, who ſucceeded him, was proclaimed at Conſtantinople on the ſeventh of February. Marcian is commended by all the writers of thoſe times, for the innocence and ſimplicity of his manners, for his extraordinary piety, and zeal for the purity of religion [p]. Leo biſhop of Rome, calls him a prince of a bleſſed and venerable memory; and the Greeks honour him with the title of ſaint, celebrating his feſtival, with that of the empreſs Pulcheria, on the ſeventeenth of February. He was buried in the church of St. Zea at Conſtantinople, which he had built [r]. Priſcus, of whom we have ſpoken above, wrote the hiſtory of his reign; but of that work only ſome fragments have reached our times [s]. A few days after the death of Marcian, Leo was proclaimed emperor, with the unanimous

The Burgundians ſeize on part of Gaul.

Marciandies.

Leo proclaimed emperor.

[k] Theoph. p. 94. [l] Greg. Tur. p. 280. [m] Marc. chron: p. 210. [n] Concil. tom. 4. p. 1043. [o] Theod. l. i. p. 650. [p] Idem. p. 70. Evagr. l. ii. p. 269. Idat. Marc. & chron Alex. p. 747. [q] Leo. ep. 12. [r] Codin. orig. Conſtant. p. 48. [s] Evagr. l. ii. c. 1. p. 283. [t] Theoph. p. 95. Theod. p. 563. Marc. chron.

mous conſent of the ſenate, people, and ſoldiery, and crowned by Anatolius, patriarch of Conſtantinople [u]. This is the firſt inſtance we find in hiſtory of a prince's receiving the crown at the hand of a biſhop. Leo, diſtinguiſhed by the Greeks with the ſurname of the Great, was, according to the moſt probable opinion, a native of Thrace, and thence commonly called Leo the Thracian. He had ſerved from his youth in the Roman armies, and commanded a body of troops encamped at Selymbria in Thrace, when he was raiſed to the empire. His prudence, moderation, impartiality in the adminiſtration of juſtice, exemplary piety, and zeal for the catholic religion, are greatly extolled by the writers who flouriſhed in thoſe times. Leo is ſaid to have owed his promotion to the patrician Aſpar, of whom we have made frequent mention, and his ſon Ardaburius, who not daring, tho' very powerful, to aſſume the purple themſelves, as they were Arians by religion, and not Romans by birth, but Goths, or rather Alans, conferred it upon Leo, in whoſe name they hoped to reign; nay, we are told, that Leo promiſed to raiſe one of Aſpar's ſons to the dignity of Cæſar [v].

His birth, education, employments, &c.

In the very beginning of his reign, great diſturbances were raiſed by the Eutychians in Alexandria, who hearing of the death of Marcian, roſe in a tumultuous manner, murdered the catholic biſhop Proterus, and choſe in his room one of their own ſect, named Timotheus Elurus. The tumult was ſoon quelled; but the authors of it putting themſelves under the protection of Aſpar, a zealous patron of Arianiſm, were by him ſcreened from the puniſhment due to their wickedneſs [w]. In the weſt, after an inter-reign of about three months, during which time Ricimer governed with an abſolute ſway, Majorianus was proclaimed emperor by the ſenate, the people, and ſoldiery, Ricimer propoſing him as a perſon in every reſpect well qualified for that high ſtation. All we know of his family is, that his father had ſerved with great reputation under Aetius, and was afterwards raiſed to the office of treaſurer of the empire. His mother was daughter of Majorianus, appointed by Theodoſius I. or rather by Gratian, in 379, general of the Roman horſe and foot in Pannonia. From him the emperor took the name of Majorianus. He was raiſed to the Majorianus raiſed to the empire in the weſt.

[u] Zonar p. 40 Theod. p. 563. Theoph. p. 575. [w] Cedren. p. 346. Leo, ep. 118. p. 671.

the empire in the flower of his age, having already given ſeveral inſtances, not only of his courage and military abilities, but of his good-nature, generoſity, moderation, and other amiable qualities. Procopius, ſpeaking of him, ſays, that he ſurpaſſed in every virtue all the princes who had reigned before him [x]. He lived from his childhood in great intimacy with Ricimer, and therefore was eaſily prevailed upon by him to revolt from Avitus. Soon after the depoſing of that prince, he was raiſed to the poſt of general in the room of Ricimer, who was created patrician, probably by Marcian, or Leo his ſucceſſor; for the emperor of the eaſt is ſuppoſed to have governed the weſtern empire during the inter-regnum [y]. He had not been long general, when he was proclaimed emperor at a place about ſix miles from Ravenna, called The little pillars [z]. In the beginning of his reign, Theodoric, king of the Viſigoths, having almoſt entirely reduced the Suevians in Galicia, entered Luſitania, and made himſelf maſter of ſeveral cities there, and among the reſt of Meridia, the metropolis of that country; but receiving diſagreeable tidings from Gaul, not mentioned in hiſtory, he ſet out from Luſitania the day after Eaſter, which fell this year 457, on the thirty-firſt, and not on the twenty-eighth, of March, as we read in Idatius, and returned in great haſte to Toulouſe [a]. He left a body of troops in Spain, with orders to reduce the Suevians in Galicia, who had not yet ſubmitted to him. Theſe forces being, on their march to Galicia, admitted as friends into the city of Aſtorga, which was held by the Romans, fell unexpectedly upon the inhabitants, put moſt of them to the ſword, plundered their houſes, and ſetting fire to the place, carried all thoſe, whoſe lives they had ſpared, into captivity, and among the reſt the whole clergy, and two biſhops, who happened to be there at that time. The city of Palentia met with the ſame treatment; but the caſtle of Coviac, about thirty miles from Aſtorga, making a vigorous reſiſtance, the Goths, after having loſt great numbers of their men, thought it adviſeable to raiſe the ſiege, and return to Gaul [b]. The Suevians had, upon the death of Requiarius their king, choſen Maldra in his room, as we have obſerved above; but ſome of them, revolting from him, ſet up one Frantan. A civil civil war being thus kindled among them, they concluded a peace with the Romans, that is, with the natives, who ſtill held ſeveral ſtrong-holds in Galicia, and acknowledged the authority of the emperor; but notwithſtanding this peace, the partizans of Maldra, entering Luſitania, made themſelves maſters of Liſbon, after having been admitted into the place as friends [c].

Galicia almoſt entirely reduced by the Viſigoths.

[x] Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. p. 194. [y] Vide Valeſ. p. 136. [z] Jorn. rer. ſucc. p. 654 Marc. chron. [a] Idat. p. 35. [b] Idem, p. 36.

Liſbon taken by the Suevians.

THE following year, when the two emperors, Leo and Majorianus, were conſuls, the Vandals made a deſcent on the coaſt of Campania; but Majorianus, marching againſt them, defeated them in the neighbourhood of Sinueſſa, between the Garigliano and the Volturno; put great numbers of them to the ſword, among whom was the brother-in-law of Genſeric their commander; and obliged the reſt to ſave themſelves on board their fleet, which ſailed immediately for Africa [d]. Majorianus, reſolved to purſue them thither, and to attempt the recovery of that wealthy country, applied himſelf to the fitting out of a powerful fleet, and had, before the end of this year, aſſembled a great number of troops, and above three hundred ſhips [e]. But of this enterprize hereafter. Majorianus, leaving Ravenna in the depth of winter, paſſed the Alps, and entering Gaul, obliged the Burgundians, who had made themſelves maſters of the city of Lions, to deliver it up, and retire. From that city, where Sidonius pronounced his panegyric, Majorianus purſued his march to Arles, where he paſſed the remainder of the winter and part of the ſpring; for he was ſtill in that city on the ſeventeenth of April of the following year 459 [f]. In Spain, Frantan, one of the kings of the Suevians, dying, thoſe who had followed him ſubmitted to Maldra; ſo that the whole nation was again united under one head. An army of Viſigoths, ſent into Spain by Theodoric, ravaged the province of Bœtica, while the Suevians, notwithſtanding the peace concluded the preceding year with the natives, over-ran that part of Galicia, which borders on the Douro, putting all to fire and ſword [g]. In the following conſulſhip of Ricimer and Patricius, Theodoric, taking unexpectedly the field, ſurpriſed ſome cities in Gaul belonging to the Romans; but Majorianus, marching from Arles againſt him, defeated him in a pitched battle, and obliged him to ſue for peace; which was granted him, upon his promiſing

The Vandals defeated by Majorianus.

Spain ravaged by the Suevians and Viſigoths.

[c] Idem, p. 37. Iſidor. chron. [d] Sid. car. v. p. 325. [e] Idem, p. 324. Iſid. p. 42. Procop. bell. Vand. c. 7. p. 194. [f] Sid. car. v. p. 376. Cod. Theod. Nov. 9. p. 372. [g] Idat, p. 37.

miſing to aſſiſt the Romans againſt the Suevians in Spain, and the Vandals in Africa [l]. In the eaſt, the city of Antioch was almoſt utterly ruined by an earthquake, which happened on the fourteenth of September. Scarce a ſingle houſe was left ſtanding in the new city, the moſt beautiful quarter of that metropolis [m]. The following year 460, when Magnus and Apollonius were conſuls, Majorianus, leaving Arles, bent his march towards Spain, which he entered in the month of May, with a deſign to paſs over from thence into Africa [n]. Procopius writes, that the better to inform himſelf of the ſtrength of the enemy, the ſtate of the country, and the diſpoſition of the inhabitants, he went in diſguiſe to the court of Genſeric, pretending to be an embaſſador ſent by the Roman emperor, with propoſals for an accommodation [o]. This Procopius relates with ſuch circumſtances, as render the whole account altogether incredible. Genſeric, alarmed at the vaſt preparations that were carrying on in all the ports of the empire, ſent deputies to ſue for peace; but his propoſals being rejected, he diſpatched a ſquadron of his beſt ſhips, with orders to attack the Roman fleet riding in the bay of Alicant; which they did with ſuch ſucceſs, that they took moſt of the Roman ſhips, and returned with them in triumph to Africa. This misfortune, which was chiefly owing to the treachery of ſome on board the Roman fleet, put a ſtop to the enterprize, and obliged Majorianus to return to Arles, whence he iſſued out orders for the equipping of a new fleet. But, in the mean time, Genſeric, dreading the arms and valour of Majorianus, diſpatched embaſſadors to him, with new propoſals; which in the end he accepted, as they were very advantageous to the empire [p]. Thus a peace was concluded between Majorianus and Genſeric; but the articles of the treaty have not been tranſmitted to poſterity. In Spain, Maldra, king of the Suevians, being killed, Remiſmond his ſon, and Frumarius, probably another of his children, dividing his troops between them, the latter ſurpriſed Aquæ Flaviæ, and took Idatius, biſhop of the place, priſoner, on the twenty-ſixth of July, while Remiſmond laid waſte the territories of Orenſo on the Minho, and of Lugo. Sunieric and Nepotianus, two of Theodoric's generals, marched Majorianus reſolves to paſs over into Africa.

His fleet ſurpriſed by the Vandals.

[l] Idem, p 38. Valeſ p. 191. [m] Evag. l. ii. c 12 Theoph. p. 95 Niceph. chron. [n] Idat. Marc. chron. Priſc. p. 42. [o] Procop. bell. Vand. l. i c. 7. p. 194. [p] Procop. p. 194. Priſc. p. 42.

ched againſt them; and, after having ravaged part of Galicia, entered Luſitania, and made themſelves maſters of Scalabis, now Santarein on the Tagus [q]. In the eaſt, nothing happened this year that deſerves notice, except an earthquake, which overturned great part of the city of Cyzicus [r]. The following year 461, Severinus and Dagalaiphus being conſuls, Ricimir, who had raiſed Majorianus to the empire, thinking himſelf neglected by him, and jealous of the great reputation the prince had gained by his wife and vigorous adminiſtration, reſolved to depoſe him; and accordingly, having got him by treachery into his power, as he was returning from Gaul to Rome, he ſtripped him of the imperial ornaments at Tortona in the Milaneſe on the ſecond of Auguſt, and cauſed him, on the ſeventh of the ſame month, to be put to death at Iria, now Voghera, after he had reigned three years and ſome months [s]. The account which Procopius gives us of his death ſhews, that we muſt not lay ſtreat ſtreſs upon the authority of that writer [t]. Majorianus, in whoſe reign the empire ſeemed in a manner to revive, being thus removed, Ricimir cauſed Severus to be proclaimed at Ravenna, on the nineteenth of November, hoping to reign in his name, the new prince being no ways qualified for that high ſtation. All we know of him is, that he was a native of Lucania [u]. In the eaſt, Leo refuſing to pay the uſual penſion to Valamir, Theodomir, and Widemir, kings of the Oſtrogoths, whom Marcian had allowed to ſettle in Pannonia, as we have related above, they flew to arms, laid waſte great part of Illyricum, and made themſelves maſters of ſeveral cities; but Anthemius ſon-in-law to the late emperor Marcian, having obliged them to retire into Pannonia, they hearkened to the embaſſadors that were ſent by Leo to renew the antient alliance between them and the empire. A peace was accordingly concluded, and the famous Theodoric, afterwards king of Italy, then in the eighth year of his age, delivered up to Leo as an hoſtage [w]. But of him we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the hiſtory of the Oſtrogoths in Italy.

Majorianus depoſed by Ricimer, and put to death.

Severus made emperor.

THE following year, when the emperor Leo was conſul for the ſecond time, with Severus emperor of the weſt, who nevertheleſs ſeems to have been acknowledged by [q] Idat. p 39. [r] Marc chron. [s] Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 45. p. 678. Idat. p. 40. Evag. l. ii. c. 7. p. 299. [t] Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 7. p 194. [u] Jorn. reg ſucc. c. 46. p. 654. Theoph p. 97 Idat. p 40. Onuph. p. 306. Sid. p. 111. Evagr. p. 70. [w] Jorn. p. 690. Priſc. p. 74. Phot. c. 78, p 172.

by the Greeks, Genſeric, pretending not to be bound by the late treaty with Majorianus, after that prince's death, ſent a powerful fleet to pillage the coaſts of Sicily and Italy, and made himſelf maſter of Sardinia [x]. In Gaul Ægidius, a native of that country, and commander in chief of the Roman forces there, provoked at the death of Majorianus, who had raiſed him to that poſt, reſolved to march into Italy, and revenge it upon Ricimer and Severus. But in the mean time, the Viſigoths, in all likelihood ſtirred up by Ricimer, having made themſelves maſters of Norbonne, which was betrayed to them by one Agrippina, and beſieged Arles, Ægidius turned his arms againſt them, and obliged them to raiſe the ſiege and retire, tho' they were powerfully aſſiſted by the Burgundians, under the conduct of Gondiac their king, whom Severus had raiſed to the command of the Roman forces in Gaul, with the title of general [y]. The ſame year, Marcellinus, or, as Procopius calls him, Marcellianus, who had ſerved with great reputation in the Roman armies, no longer able to bear the haughty behaviour of Ricimer, revolted from Severus, and retiring into Dalmatia, eſtabliſhed there a new ſovereignty, independent of the empire [z]. Hereupon the inhabitants of Italy, ſeeing themſelves at the ſame time threatened by Marcellinus, by Ægidius, and by Genſeric, had recourſe to Leo, emperor of the eaſt, who immediately diſpatched embaſſadors to Genſeric and Marcellinus. The latter, ſatisfied to ſee himſelf acknowledged by Leo prince of the country which he had ſeized, promiſed not to moleſt the Romans. But Genſeric openly declared, that he would hearken to no terms, till the effects of Valentinian were delivered up to him; which he claimed, becauſe his ſon Huneric had married Eudocia, that prince's eldeſt daughter. He likewiſe demanded the effects of Aetius, perhaps becauſe Gaudentius, that general's eldeſt ſon, whom he had taken at Rome in 455, was then at his court. However, he ſent back to Leo, Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian, and Placidia her ſecond daughter; who being ſoon after married to Olybrius, of whom anon, Genſeric declared he would wage an eternal war with the weſtern empire, unleſs Olybrius, brother-in-law to his ſon, was raiſed to the imperial dignity [a]. To this low ebb was the Roman grandeur reduced by Marcellinus eſtabliſhes a new ſovereignty in Dalmatia.

[x] Priſc. p. 74. Procop. bell. Vand. l. iv. c. 6. p. 192. [y] Priſc. p. 42. Idat p. 41. Cuſp. p 452. [z] Phot. c. 242. Procop. p 191. Idat. p. 43. [a] Idat. p. 32. Priſc. p. 42. Sid. car. ii. p. 349.

The Viſigoths defeated in Gaul by Ægidius.

by the death of Majorianus and the adminiſtration of Ricimer. The following year 463, Flavius Cæcina Baſilius and Vivianus being conſuls, Ægidius gained a ſignal victory over the Viſigoths in Gaul. The battle was fought between the Loire and the Loiret. The latter river, after a ſhort courſe of about ſix miles, falls into the former a little below Orleans. Great numbers of the enemy were cut in pieces, and among the reſt Frederic, the king's brother, who in this action commanded in chief [b]. After this battle, Ægidius, laid ſiege to the city of Chinon in Tauraine; but the vigorous reſiſtance he met with obliged him to drop the enterprize [c]. The Viſigoths were attended with better ſucceſs in Spain, than in Gaul; for Idatius ſpeaks of them now as maſters of the whole country, except part of Galicia, which was ſtill held by the Suevians, and the provinces of Tarraco and Cartagena, which belonged to the Romans. Such of the natives of Galicia, as had not yet ſubmitted to the Suevians, ſent this very year one Palegorius, to implore the protection, not of Severus, but of Theodoric [d]; which plainly ſhews, that they acknowledged him, and not the Roman emperor, for their ſovereign. The next year Ruſticus, or Ruſticius, and Olybrius being conſuls, Remiſmond, king of the Suevians, ſurpriſed and plundered the city of Coimbra; but ſoon after concluded a peace with Theodoric [e]. In the beginning of the year, Beorgor, king of the Alans, having entered Italy with a conſiderable army, was met by Ricimer in the neighbourhood of Bergamo, and, on the 6th of February, cut off with all his men [f]. Whence theſe Alans came, is uncertain. This Jornandes ſuppoſes to have happened in the reign of Anthemius; but we have followed Idatius, who lived at that time. The ſame year, died Ægidius in Gaul, being, according to ſome, ſays Idatius, poiſoned, according to others, murdered. That writer adds, that, upon his death, the Viſigoths made themſelves maſters of the far greater part of Gaul. However, Berri, Sens, and Auvergne ſtill belonged to the Romans in 472, and were governed by one Paulus, diſtinguiſhed with the title of count [g] Sygarius, the ſon of Ægidius, held Soiſſons and its territory, for ſeveral years, having erected there a petty ſovereignty, according to the French hiſtorians, who give him the title of king [h]. At the ſame time, Childeric, king of

The Alans defeated by Ricimer.

Different nations ſettle in Gaul.

[b] Idat. p 41. Du Cheſne, p. 211. [c] Idat ibid [d] Idem, p. 42. Concil. tom. 4. p. 1062. [e] Idat. ibid. [f] Idem: ibid. [g] Greg. Tur. p. 282. [h] Idem, p. 285.

of the Burgundians, laid ſiege to Paris, and reduced it; the Franks made themſelves maſters of the provinces bordering on the Rhine; the Saxons ſettled at Nantes and Bayeux; the Alemans in the country of the Helvetii; and the Britons, driven out by the Angles and Scots, in the territories of Vennes and Treguier, which, with the adjacent country, took from them, according to the moſt probable opinion, the name of Bretagne [i]. In 465, when Baſiliſcus and Hermenericus were conſuls, died at Rome Severus, after having borne the name of emperor almoſt four years. He is ſuppoſed to have been poiſoned by Ricimer [k]. His death was followed by an inter-regnum of almoſt two years, Ricimer ruling, during that time, with an abſolute ſway; but not daring, as he was by birth a barbarian, to take upon him the title of emperor. The ſame year, a violent fire breaking out in Conſtantinople, on the ſecond of September, reduced to aſhes eight of the fourteen quarters into which that city was divided. However, it was at laſt overcome, after it had raged with incredible fury for the ſpace of ſix whole days, and as many nights [l]. The following year, when the emperor Leo alone was conſul the third time, Ricimer aſſembled a powerful fleet, with a deſign to attempt the recovery of Africa; but was, by contrary and violent winds, which continued blowing the whole ſummer, obliged to drop that enterprize [m]. The ſame year, Theodoric, king of the Viſigoths, after having reigned near thirteen years, was murdered by his brother Euric, who immediately took poſſeſſion of his dominions, and was proclaimed at Toulouſe [n]. Jornandes, always favourable to the Goths, only writes, that Euric was ſuſpected of having contributed to the death of his brother [o]. The new king ſent embaſſadors to the emperor Leo, to Remiſmond king of the Suevians, and to Genſeric king of the Vandals, acquainting them with his acceſſion to the crown [p]. In the eaſt, the Hunns broke into Dacia; but were defeated, firſt by Anthemius, and afterwards by Anagaſtus, ſtyled general of Thrace. They were commanded by Dengizic, one of Attila's ſons, who was ſlain in the engagement. His head was ſent to Conſtantinople, and there expoſed Severus dies.

A great fire at Conſtantinople.

Theodoric, king of the Viſigoths, murdered by his brother Euric.

[i] Val. rer. Franc. p. 236, 237. Sid. l i ep. 7. p. 16. [k] Jorn. p. 654. Sid. car ii. p. 317. Idat p 43. [l] Evagr. l. ii. c. 13. p. 307. Theodor. p. 555 Cedren p. 348. [m] Priſc. p. 75. [n] Idat. Iſidor. Marc. chron. [o] Jorn c. 44. p 677. [p] Idat. p. 44, 45.

expoſed for ſome days to public view [q]. In the following conſulſhip of Puſæus and Johannes, the inter-regnum ended in the weſt. Anthemius was, with the conſent and approbation of Ricimer, declared emperor, notwithſtanding the great intereſt made by Genſeric in favour of Olybrius, brother-in-law to his ſon. Anthemius was a native of Conſtantinople, deſcended of an antient, illuſtrious, and wealthy family, and was, at the time of his promotion, count of the eaſt. He had ſome claim to the empire, having married Marciana, the only daughter of the late emperor Marcian, by whom he had three ſons and one daughter. He had been conſul in 455, and was ſoon after, tho' yet very young, raiſed to the dignity of patrician, and the poſt of general. Sidonius, his panegyriſt, writes, that, upon the death of Marcian, no one thought of confrreing the empire on Leo, till Anthemius had refuſed it [r]. Theophanes ſtyles him a moſt chriſtian prince [s]. Soon after his nomination, he left Conſtantinople, where he then was, and ſet out for Italy, attended by a great number of choſen troops, and ſeveral counts, with other perſons of diſtinction, among whom was Marcellinus, prince of Dalmatia, whom Leo had perſuaded to join the new emperor, and, jointly with him, make war upon the Vandals [t]. Anthemius was received at Rome by the ſenate and people with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable, and proclaimed, according to ſome, on the twelfth of April, according to others, in the month of Auguſt, at a place about three miles from Rome, called Bontrota [u]. A few days after, he gave his daughter in marriage to Ricimer, purſuant to a private agreement between that general and the two princes [w]. In the mean time, Genſeric, highly provoked againſt Leo, for having preferred Anthemius, and not Olybrius, to the empire, ſent a powerful fleet with orders to ravage Peloponneſus and the Greek iſlands; which they did with great cruelty, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. Leo reſolved at all events to revenge the affront offered to the eaſtern empire; and acccordingly the following year 468, when Anthemius alone was conſul, he fitted out the greateſt fleet, ſays Procopius [x], the Romans had ever had. Cedrenus writes, it conſiſted of one thouſand one Anthemius raiſed to the empire.

And proclaimed at Rome.

Genſeric ravages the Greek iſlands.

[q] Chron. Alex. p. 744. Jorn. c. 56. p. 688. Priſc. p. 44
[r] Sid. p 295. [s] Theoph. p. 98. [t] Procop. bell. Vand. l
i. c 6 p. 191. Jorn. c 46. p. 654 [u] Idat. p. 44 Mar Caſſiod. Cuſpin chron. [w] Sid l. i. ep. 21, 22. [x] Procop
l. i. c. 6 .p 192.

one hundred and thirteen ſhips, each ſhip having one hundred men on board [y]. Theophanes [z] and Nicephorus [a] will have no fewer than one hundred thouſand ſhips to have been employed in this expedition, a number altogether incredible. To the forces of Leo were joined all the beſt troops of the weſt, under the command of Marcellinus, who reinforced them with a choſen body of men raiſed in his own dominions [b]. Leo gave the chief command of this formidable fleet to Baſiliſcus, brother to his wife Verina, who had frequently overcome the barbarians in Thrace. Under him commanded one John, a perſon of extraordinary courage, and great experience in war [c]. The iſland of Sicily was appointed the place of the general rendezvous. From thence Marcellinus was to ſail for Sardinia, which the Vandals had lately ſeized; Heraclius of Edeſſa, a brave and experienced officer, for Libya; and Baſiliſcus, with the greateſt part of the fleet, and the flower of the troops, to ſteer his courſe ſtrait to Carthage. Marcellinus, purſuant to this plan, landed in Sardinia, and made himſelf maſter of that iſland, while Heraclius, landing unexpectedly in Libya, defeated the Vandals, who attempted to oppoſe him, and reduced with incredible expedition Tripolis and all the other cities of that province [d]. Genſeric, receiving at the ſame time news of the loſs of Sardinia and Libya, and of the arrival of the Roman fleet at cape Mercury, about thirty miles from Carthage, began to look upon himſelf as irretrievably loſt, and is even ſaid to have had ſome thoughts of yielding up Africa to the Romans, and retiring elſewhere; and indeed if Baſiliſcus had, during the panic which had ſeized the barbarians, marched directly to Carthage, he might have eaſily made himſelf maſter of that city, and put an end to the war at once; but his dilatory proceedings giving Genſeric time to recover from his conſternation, he began to deſpiſe the Roman admiral, and had even the confidence to ſend deputies to him, begging a truce of five days, to ſettle with him the conditions on which he was to ſubmit to Leo. Some authors write, that, with the embaſſadors, Genſeric ſent privately an immenſe ſum to Baſiliſcus, with whoſe avaricious temper he was well acquainted [e]. Others tell us, that Aſpar, who had lately quarrelled with Leo, fearing that prince would become too powerful, if he Sardinia and Tripolis recovered from the Vandals.

[y] Cedren. p. 350. [z] Theoph. p. 99. [a] Niceph. l. xv. c. 27. p. 631. [b] Procop. l. i. c. 6. p. 191. [c] Idem, p. 153. [d] Idem, p. 192. Theoph. p. 101. Sid. car. p. 1199. [e] Theoph. p. 100. Theodor. p. 555.

overcame the Vandals, had promiſed to raiſe Baſiliſcus, who was no leſs ambitious than covetous, to the empire, provided he ſpared Genſeric [f]. Be that as it will, Baſiliſcus readily conſented to the truce, during which Genſeric taking one night advantage of a favourable wind, ſailed unexpectedly out of the harbour with a great number of fire-ſhips, which being by the wind driven full ſail upon the Roman navy, ſet fire to many of their ſhips, and threw the whole fleet into the utmoſt confuſion. The next morning Genſeric's fleet appeared drawn up in line of battle, and falling upon the Romans before they could recover themſelves from their terror and conſternation, took ſeveral of their ſhips, ſunk others, and obliged the reſt to ſave themſelves in the beſt manner they could. John, who commanded under Baſiliſcus, and was no-ways privy to his treachery, after having killed with his own hand an incredible number of barbarians, threw himſelf, when overpowered, on a plank into the ſea. Genſon, the ſon of Genſeric, greatly taken with his courage and gallant behaviour, offered him his life and liberty; but the brave commander anſwering, It ſhall never be ſaid, that John owed his life to dogs, quitted his plank, and was drowned [g]. As for Baſiliſcus, Zonaras writes, that, in the heat of the engagement, he all on a ſudden tacked about, and, crowding all ſails, betook himſelf to flight; which raiſed the courage of the enemy, and quite diſheartened his own people [h]. Marcellinus, after the reduction of Sardinia, returned to Sicily, with a deſign to paſs from thence over into Africa; but, before he ſet ſail, he was aſſaſſinated by an officer, who commanded under him, not without the privity, as was ſuppoſed, of Anthemius, to whom his power gave no ſmall umbrage [i]. Heraclius, who was on full march from Libya to Carthage, upon the news of the bad ſucceſs of Baſiliſcus, thought it adviſeable to turn back, and haſten into the territories of the empire [k]. Baſiliſcus returned to Sicily, with the few ſhips that had eſcaped, having loſt above fifty thouſand men [l]. From Sicily, he returned to Conſtantinople, and there, as his treachery was publicly known, took ſanctuary in the church of St. Sophia. Tho' both the emperor and people were incenſed againſt him, yet, by the mediation of the empreſs Verina, his ſiſter, his life was ſpared, and leave granted him to

The Roman fleet in Africa put to flight.

[f] Suid. Phot. c. 242. p. 1064. [g] Procop. l. i. c. 6. p. 192.
[h] Zonar. p. 42. [i] Procop. p. 193. Phot. c. 242. p. 1048. Marc. chron. [k] Idem ibid. [l] Priſc. p. 193.

to retire to Heraclea in Thrace [m]. Such was the iſſue of this unhappy expedition, which is ſaid to have coſt both empires above an hundred and thirty thouſand pounds weight of gold [t], not only the two princes, but all governors, and other perſons in employments, cheerfully contributing large ſums to defray the charges of an enterprize ſo advantageous to the empire [u]. Priſcus the hiſtorian, who flouriſhed at that time, wrote a very minute and exact account of it [w]; but his work has not reached our time. The ſame year, Leo married his daughter Ariadne to Zeno, deſcended from an illuſtrious family in Iſauria. His father's name was Ruſumbladaſtes, and his, before his marriage, Traſcaliſſæus, or Taraſicodiſus [x]. He took the name of Zeno from another Iſaurian, who had been raiſed to great employments in the reign of Theodoſius the younger [y]. Evagrius refers us to one Euſtathius, a Syrian writer, who, he ſays, will inform us as to the motives that prompted Leo to prefer Zeno to many other perſons of great merit in the choice of a ſon-in-law [z]; but the works of Euſtathius have been long ſince loſt. Theophanes and Candidus Iſaurus write, that Leo, jealous of the too great power of Aſpar, and appriſed of his wicked practices, gave his daughter to Zeno, hoping by his means to gain over the Iſaurians his countrymen, who were deemed the beſt ſoldiers of the empire [a]. However that be, Leo immediately raiſed his ſon-in-law to the rank of patrician, appointing him at the ſame time captain of his guards, and commander in chief of all the armies in the eaſt. In the weſt, Remiſmond made himſelf maſter of Liſbon, betrayed to him by one Luſides, a native of Luſitania, who commanded in that place. About the ſame time, the Goths ſurpriſed Merida, and committed dreadful ravages in the neighbouring country, ſparing neither Romans nor Suevians [b]. Here Idatius ends his chronicle, with telling us, that many prodigies appeared this year in Galicia, and among the reſt, that ſeveral fiſhes were taken in the Minho, marked with Hebrew, Greek, and Latin characters [c]. The next conſuls were Marcianus and Zeno, the two ſons-in-law of the emperor Leo, the latter having married Ariadne, and the former, who was the ſon of the emperor Anthemius, Leoncia. Nothing worthy of notice happened this year in either empire; but in the following conſulſhip of Severus and Jordanes, Euric, king of the Viſigoths, an ambitious and warlike prince, made himſelf maſter of Auvergne, Berri, and Gevaudan, after having defeated a body of twelve thouſand Britons dwelling on the Loire, who, under the conduct of Riothim or Riotham, came to the aſſiſtance of the Romans [d]. At the ſame time one Odoacer, who had commanded a body of Saxons under Ægidius in 464, made himſelf maſter of Angers; but was overcome by Childeric king of the Franks, who reduced not only the city of Angers, but all the neighbouring country [e]. The Burgundians too, taking advantage of the weak and diſtracted ſtate of the empire, reduced the city of Lions, and the whole province called Lugdunenſis Prima [f].

Leo marries his daughter to Zeno.

Liſbon taken by the Suevians, and Merida by the Goths.

[m] Idem ibid. Cedren. p 330. Theoph. p. 100. [t] Procop. p. 191. Evagr. p. 74. [u] Evag ibid. [w] Idem, l. ii. c. 16. p. 308 Theoph p. 100. [x] Zon. p. 42. Agath. l. iv. p. 149. [y] Theoph. p. 111. [z] Evagr. l. ii. c. 15. p. 308. [a] Theoph. p. 101. Cand. Iſaur. p. 18. [b] Idat. p. 41. [c] Idem, p 47, 48.

The Viſigoths extend their dominions in Gaul.

And likewiſe the Franks and Burgundians.

THE following year, when Leo was conſul the fourth time with Probianus, ſome miſunderſtanding aroſe between that prince and Aſpar, who had raiſed him to the empire; but as Aſpar was greatly beloved by the army, and commanded a ſeparate and independent body, having one Quelcal, by nation a Hunn, for his lieutenant, the emperor thought it adviſeable to diſſemble for the preſent; and pretending to be reconciled with Aſpar, gave one of his daughters in marriage to Patricius Secundus, that general's eldeſt ſon, and ſoon after created Aſpar Cæſar. The inhabitants of Conſtantinople, knowing Aſpar and his whole family to be greatly attached to the doctrine of Arius, were highly diſpleaſed at this promotion; but the emperor ſoon delivered them from the apprehenſion they were under of ſeeing an Arian raiſed to the empire; for being informed by ſome perſons, privy to all the counſels of Aſpar, that a plot was carrying on againſt him by that general and his children, he reſolved to be before-hand with them; and accordingly cauſed Aſpar, and his ſon Ardaburius, to be murdered this very year. The antients only tell us, that they fell by the hands of the eunuchs of the palace, Leo having ordered them to be put to death, becauſe they aſpired at the empire [g]. But the modern writers add ſeveral circumſtances, which ſeem inconſiſtent with what we read in the authors who flouriſhed in thoſe times. Patricius was dangerouſly wounded, but found Aſpar created Cæſar.

Aſpar and his ſon Ardaburius murdered.

means

[d] Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 45. 678. Sid. l. iii. ep, 9. p. 73, 74. Greg. Tur. l. ii. c. 18. p. 232. [e] Greg. Tur, ibid. [f] Sid. l. vi. ep. 12. p. 168. & car. xv. p. 386. [g] Marc. chron. Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 6. p. 139. Vict. Tun. Jorn. reg. ſucc. p. 664.

means to make his eſcape, as did likewiſe Aſpar's third ſon, named Hermeneric [h]. The friends of Aſpar, eſpecially the Goths in the emperor's ſervice, attempted to revenge his death, and committed great diſorders in Conſtantinople, being headed by one of their countrymen, named Oſtroui. But Zeno, who was then at Chalcis, haſtened with a choice body of troops to the metropolis, the Goths were driven out of the city with a great ſlaughter. However, they ravaged Thrace, and, being joined by the Goths, ſettled in Pannonia, made themſelves maſters of Philippi and Arcadiopolis; which places they reſtored ſoon after, laying down their arms, upon the emperor's promiſing to pay them a certain ſum, and to appoint Theodoric, ſon to Triarius, the brother of Aſpar's wife, commander of the Goths in the Roman ſervice [i]. Upon the death of Aſpar, who had been a zealous patron of the Arians, Leo publiſhed ſeveral rigorous laws againſt thoſe heretics, depriving them of all their churches, and forbiding them to hold any public or private aſſemblies [k]. The following year, when Feſtus and Marcianus were conſuls, Ricimir, who was no leſs powerful in the weſt, than Aſpar had been in the eaſt, dreading the ſame fate, reſolved to be before-hand with the emperor Anthemius, who, he ſaw, began to miſtruſt him. Accordingly he openly revolted, and, at the head of the barbarians in the Roman ſervice, but under his command, laid ſiege to Rome, where the emperor then was. The citizens, who were, generally ſpeaking, well affected to Anthemius, made a vigorous reſiſtance, notwithſtanding the famine and plague that raged in the city, depending upon the ſuccours they daily expected out of Gaul, under the conduct of Bilimer, who commanded the Roman troops there, and was greatly attached to the intereſt of Anthemius. Bilimer arrived at length with a conſiderable army, conſiſting partly of Romans, partly of barbarians; but having ventured an engagement, he was utterly defeated by Ricimer, who, encouraged with this ſucceſs, purſued the ſiege with freſh vigour, and breaking in the end into the city, raged with no leſs fury than Alaric or Genſeric had done, allowing his men not only to plunder the houſes of the unhappy citizens, but to commit all manner of cruelties [l]. As for the emperor Anthemius, Ricimir cauſed him to be put to death, and Olybrius to be proclaimed in his room [m]. Zeno, who Rome beſieged by Ricimer.

Which is taken and plundered.

Anthemius put to death, and Olybrius proclaimed emperor.

[h] Niceph. l. xv. c. 27. p 373 Zonar p. 39. [i] Marc. chron. Theoph. p. 181. [k] Theodor. l. iv. c. 4. p. 273. [l] Marc. chron. Onuph. p. 57. Concil. tom. 4. p. 1238. [m] Evagr. l. ii. c. 16. p. 308.

succeeded Leo, reproached the Roman senate with the death of Anthemius [n]. He is supposed to have died on the eleventh of July [o]; but authors are quite silent as to the circumstances of his death, contenting themselves only with telling us, that, by the treachery of Ricimir, he lost both his life and the empire. Ricimer did not long outlive Anthemius; for being seized with violent pains in his bowels, he died on the eighteenth, or rather nineteenth, of September [p]; and was followed soon after by Olybrius, who died a natural death at Rome, on the twenty-third of October [q]. This year, mount Vesuvius in Campania threw out such an immense quantity of ashes, as turned night into day, even at Constantinople, where the people were assembled in the circus, when the cloud first appeared. All the streets and houses were covered with ashes three inches deep [r]. This happened according to Marcellinus, on the sixth, according to the chronicle of Alexandria, on the eleventh, of November. The following year 473, when Leo alone was consul the fifth time, Glycerius took upon him the title of emperor at Ravenna, on the fifth of March, being supported by Gondibal, nephew to Ricimer, whom Olybrius had raised, during his short reign, to the rank of patrician. All we know of this new prince is, that he had been comes domesticorum, and was, according to Theophanes, a man of some merit. [s]. In the very beginning of his reign, the Goths, who had been allowed to settle in Pannonia, resolved, without the least povocation, says Jornandes, to make war upon both empires. Pursuant to this resolution, Videmir broke into Italy, while his brother Theodomir invaded the eastern empire; but the former dying, his son, bearing the same name, was, by the rich presents of Glycerius, prevailed upon to quit Italy, whence he retired into Gaul, and there joined the Visigoths, who, being thus reinforced, conquered soon after both that country and Spain [t]. Theodomir likewise died as soon as he entered the territories of the eastern empire, and was succeeded by his son Theodoric, surnamed the Great [u]. The same year 473, Leo, apprehending, either from his age or infirmities, that his end approached, was for naming Zeno to succeed him, but both the senate and people of Constantinople, who hated Ricimer dies, and the new emperor Olybrius.

Glycerius usurps the empire.

[n] Marc. p. 94. [o] Cuspin. p. 457. [p] Onuph. p. 57.
[q] Idem ibid. Jorn. p 67. Theoph. p. 102. [r] Zonar. p. 424.
Theodor. p. 555 Procop l. ii. c. 4. 398. [s] Theoph. p. 102.
[t] Jorn. rer Goth. c. 56. p. 194, 195. [u] Idem de reg. succ. c. 47, p 655.

hated Zeno, ſtrongly remonſtrating againſt his promotion, the emperor raiſed Leo the younger, the ſon of Zeno by his daughter Ariadne, to the dignity of Cæſar, and even declared him his partner in the empire, tho' he was then only five, or at moſt ſix, years old [w]. The following year, when Leo the younger was conſul alone, the emperor, his grandfather, was ſeized with a bloody flux, which, being attended with a violent fever, carried him off in a ſhort time. He died at Conſtantinople, in the month of January, after having reigned ſeventeen years, wanting ſome days [x]. Soon after his death, the empreſs Verina prevailed upon the ſenate and people of Conſtantinople to ſuffer her ſon-in-law Zeno to be declared collegue to young Leo in the empire. The ceremony was performed in the month of February, not in the palace of Hebdomon, as uſual, but in the circus at Conſtantinople [y]. The young prince did not ſurvive his grandfather above ten months; for he died in the month of November of the ſame year [z]. Victor Tununenſis and Ado ſuppoſe, that he was diſpatched by his own father; but neither the antient nor modern Greek writers, tho' highly prejudiced againſt Zeno, charge him with that unnatural murder. Leo the elder, or, as he is commonly ſurnamed, the Great, not approving of the promotion of Glycerius, had, before his death, named to the empire of the weſt Julius Nepos, or, as ſome call him, Nepotianus, a native of Dalmatia, and nephew, by the mother, to Marcellinus, prince of that country, who was murdered in Sicily, as we have related above. Nepos, who, it ſeems, was then at Conſtantinople, ſailed from thence without loſs of time, for Italy, and landing at Porto, ſurpriſed Glycerius there, took him priſoner, and, ſtripping him of the imperial ornaments, cauſed him to be ordained biſhop of Salonæ in Dalmatia, after he had borne the title of emperor a year, and ſome months [a]. In the mean time, the Viſigoths, under the conduct of Euric their king, broke into the territories which the Romans had ſtill left in Gaul; but he was prevailed upon by Epiphanius, biſhop of Pavia, whom Nepos ſent to him with the character of embaſſador to conclude a peace with the empire, whereof

Leo the younger created Cæſar.

Leo the elder dies.

Zeno declared collegue to his ſon Leo.

Leo dies.

Glycerius depoſed, and Julius Nepos raiſed to the empire.

[w] Zonar. p. 429. Theodor. p. 555. Evagr. p. 408. Goltz. p. 265. [x] Marc. Theoph. p 103. [y] Evagr. l. vii. c. 17. p. 309. Theoph. p. 111. [z] Chron. Alex. p. 751. Theoph. p. 103. [a] Phot. c. 78. p. 372. Jorn. rer. Goth. p. 654. Evagr. l. ii. c. 16. p. 338.

Clermont yielded to the Goths.

whereof one of the articles was, that the city of Clermont, which Euric had not been able to reduce by force, ſhould be delivered up to him [b]. Thus the whole country lying between the ocean, the Rhone, and the Loire, fell under the power of the Goths [r], who, it ſeems, had made themſelves maſters of all the open places, before Clermont was yielded to them. The following year, when Zeno alone was conſul the ſecond time, Nepos, having raiſed Oreſtes to the poſt of general, Creſtes revolts.

appointed him commander of the Roman forces in Gaul; but he, inſtead of haſtening into that country, purſuant to his orders, bent his march towards Ravenna, with a deſign to depoſe Nepos, who, he knew, was not in a condition to oppoſe him. The emperor, ſuſpecting his deſign, and diſtruſting the few troops he had with him, abandoned the city at his approach, and fled by ſea to Salonæ in Dalmatia, Nepos flies into Dalmatia.

where he was entertained by the biſhop Glycerius, whom he had lately deprived of the empire [d]. The flight of Nepos happened on the twenty-eighth of Auguſt of the preſent year 475 [c]. Oreſtes was by birth a Roman, that is, he was born a ſubject of the empire [f]. As he lived in Pannonia, perhaps his native country, when that province was yielded to the Hunns in 430, he liſted himſelf among the troops of Attila, who, finding him to be a man of parts, made him his ſecretary, and ſent him at leaſt twice to Conſtantinople with the character of embaſſador, viz. in 448, and 449 [g]. His father, by name Tatula, bore likewiſe ſome conſiderable employment at the court of Attila [h]. Oreſtes married the daughter of count Romulus ſent by Valentinian on an embaſſy to Attila in 449, and had by her a ſon, called by Males, or Melus, Romulus Auguſtus [i], but, by all other hiſtorians, Romulus Auguſtulus, either by way of deriſion, or becauſe he was very young when raiſed to the empire. Oreſtes, leaving the Hunns, ſerved with great reputation in the Roman armies, and was raiſed to the rank of patrician, and appointed by Nepos general of the troops in Gaul; when turning his arms againſt the prince who had entruſted him with them, he drove him from the throne, as we have related above, and cauſed not himſelf, but his ſon Auguſtus, or Auguſtulus, to be proclaimed emperor in his room, on the twenty-ninth of October of the preſent year [k]. The new prince ſtyled ſtyled himſelf Auguſtus Romulus Auguſtus, Auguſtus being both his proper name, and the title of his dignity [l]. As Auguſtus was very young, his father took upon him the adminiſtration, contenting himſelf with the title of patrician, and governing only as tutor and guardian to his ſon, during his minority [*]. While theſe things paſſed in the weſt, the Saracens committed dreadful ravages in Meſopotamia; and the Hunns and Thrace put all to fire and ſword, and afterwards retired unmoleſted, the emperor Zeno, a moſt leud and debauched prince, being wholly intent upon his ſcandalous pleaſures and diverſions [m]. However, he concluded a peace with Genſeric, which was religiouſly obſerved by the Vandals, till the reign of Juſtinian [n]. The ſame year the empreſs Verina, who had by her intereſt raiſed her ſon-in-law Zeno to the empire, highly provoked by his enormous vices and ſcandalous indolence, formed a conſpiracy againſt him, at the head of which was her brother Baſiliſcus, of whom we have ſpoken elſewhere. Zeno was privately informed of the whole; but, inſtead of putting himſelf in a poſture of defence, and defeating their meaſures, as he might have eaſily done, he betook himſelf to flight, retiring firſt to Chalcedon, and from thence into Iſauria, his native country. Upon his retreat, Baſiliſcus was proclaimed emperor by the ſenate and people of Conſtantinople, to the great diſappointment of Verina, who deſigned to confer the empire on Patricius, magiſter officiorum to Zeno, with whom ſhe is ſaid to have maintained a criminal correſpondence [o]. Baſiliſcus immediately declared his wife Zenonides Auguſta, and raiſed his ſon Marcus to the dignity of Cæſar. [p] The following year 476, when Baſiliſcus and Armatus were conſuls, the barbarians who ſerved in the Roman armies, and were diſtinguiſhed with the title of allies, demanded, as a reward for their ſervices, the third part of the lands in Italy, pretending that the whole country, which they had ſo often defended, belonged of right to them. As Oreſtes refuſed to comply with this inſolent demand, they reſolved to do themſelves juſtice, as they called it; and, openly revolting, choſe one Odoacer for their leader. Thus Procopius [q]. He is called by Theophanes a Goth [r]; by Marcellinus, king Zeno concludes a peace with Genſeric.

Oreſtes cauſes his ſon Auguſtulus to be declared emperor.

[b] Jorn. c 45. p. 679 Sid. l. iii. ep. 7. p. 72. [c] Sid. l iii. ep. 1. p. 62, 63. [d] Jorn. c. 45. p. 679 Onuph. p. 67. [e] Onuph. Marc chron. [f] Jorn. ibid. [g] Frid p. 37. [h] Idem, p. 57, 60. [i] Mal. leg. p 93. [k] Jorn. c. 45, 46. p. 679, 690.

Zeno driven out by Baſiliſcus.

The barbarians in the Roman ſervice revolt in the weſt, and chuſe Odoacer, for their leader.

[l] Jorn. ibid Evagr. l. ii. c. 16. p. 308. [*] Procop. p. 308. [m] Evagr. l. vii c 1. p. 333. [n] Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 7. p. 195. [o] Mal. p. 94. Agath. l. iv. p. 139. Chron. Alex. p. 750. Jorn. reg. ſucc. c. 47. p. 654. [p] Jorn. ibid. [q] Procop. bell. Goth. l. i. p. 308.

king of the Goths [s]; and by Iſidore, prince of the Oſtrogoths [t]. We cannot conceive what could induce Baronius, and ſeveral others, to call him king of the Heruli. Jornandes ſtyles him in one place king of the Rugians [u], and in another king of the Turcilingians [w]. The Rugians inhabited both the banks of the Danube, near the city of Faviana, a little above Vienna. As for the Turcilingians, we find no account in the antients of them, or their country. Odoacer, whether by birth a Goth, Rugian or Turcilingian, was, according to Ennodius, meanly born [x], and only a private man in the guards of the emperor Auguſtulus, when the barbarians revolting choſe him for their leader [y]. However, he is ſaid to have been a man of uncommon parts, equally capable of commanding an army, and governing a ſtate [z].

His character.

Having left his own country, when he was yet very young, to ſerve in Italy, as he was of a ſtature remarkably tall, he was admitted among the emperor's guards, and continued in that ſtation till the preſent year; when putting himſelf at the head of the barbarians in the Roman pay, who, tho' of different nations, had, with one conſent, choſen him for their leader, he marched againſt Oreſtes and his ſon Auguſtulus, who ſtill refuſed to give them any ſhare of the lands in Italy. As the Roman troops were inferior, both in number and valour, to the barbarians, Oreſtes took refuge in Pavia, at that time one of the beſt fortified cities in Italy; but Odoacer, inveſting the place without loſs of time, took it ſoon after by aſſault, gave it up to be plundered by his ſoldiers, and then ſet fire to it, which reduced moſt of the houſes, and two churches, to aſhes [a].

He beſieges Oreſtes in Pavia.

Who is taken priſoner, and put to death.

Oreſtes was taken priſoner, and brought to Odoacer, who carried him to Placentia, and there cauſed him to be put to death on the twenty-eighth of Auguſt, the day on which he had driven Nepos out of Ravenna, and obliged him to abandon the empire. From Placentia Odoacer marched ſtrait to Ravenna, where he found Paul, the brother of Oreſtes, and the young emperor Auguſtulus. The former he immediately put to death; but ſparing Auguſtulus, in conſideration of his youth, he he ſtripped him of the enſigns of the imperial dignity, and confined him to Lucullanum, a caſtle in Campania, where he was, by Odoacer's orders, treated with great humanity, and allowed an handſome maintenance to ſupport himſelf and his relations [b]. Rome readily ſubmitted to the conqueror, who thereupon cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king of Italy, but would not aſſume the purple, or any other mark of the imperial dignity [c]. Thus failed the very name of an empire in the weſt. Britain had been long ſince abandoned by the Romans; Spain was held by the Goths and Suevians; Africa by the Vandals; the Burgundians, Goths, Franks, and Alans, had erected ſeveral tetrarchies in Gaul; at length Italy itſelf, with its proud metropolis, which for ſo many ages had given law to the reſt of the world, was enſlaved by a contemptible barbarian, whoſe family, country, and nation are not well known to this day. The downfal and ruin of the greateſt ſtate the world ever beheld were, no doubt, owing to the depravity of the people in general, and to the ſloth, luxury, and ambition of their princes; but more immediately to their allowing ſuch ſwarms of barbarians to ſettle within the empire, and to ſerve in the Roman armies, under their own officers, in ſeparate and independent bodies. Thus they became more numerous and powerful than the natives, controlled the emperors, diſpoſed of the imperial crown as they pleaſed, and at length became abſolute maſters of thoſe whom they were employed to defend and aſſiſt. This great revolution happened in the weſt in the year 476, of the chriſtian æra, five hundred and ſeven years after the battle of Actium, when the Roman monarchy was firſt eſtabliſhed, and one thouſand two hundred and twenty-nine ſince the foundation of Rome. Moſt writers obſerve, that the empire began with Auguſtus, and ended in a prince of the ſame name. Of the ſtate of Italy under Odoacer, till he was overcome and ſlain by Theodoric the Oſtrogoth, and under the Oſtrogoths, from Theodoric to their expulſion by Narſes, we ſhall ſpeak hereafter; and in the mean time purſue the Roman hiſtory, that is, the hiſtory of the Conſtantinopolitan Roman empire, in which were preſerved the ſame marks of ſovereignty, the ſame ceremonies, titles, Auguſtulus ſtripped of the imperial ornaments, and confined to Lucullanum.

[s] Theoph. p. 102. [t] Vide Valeſ. rer. Franc. p. 228. [u] Iſidor. chron. [w] Jorn. reg. ſucc. c. 45. p. 659 [x] Idem rer. Goth c. 45. p. 679. [y] Ennod. Theodor. panegyr. p. 308. [z] Procop. p. 308. Mal. p. 93. [a] Ennod. vit. Epiphan p. 336. Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 46. p. 679. & reg. ſucc. c. 47. p. 654.

Italy and Rome ſubmit to Odoacer.

The end of the weſtern empire.

[b] Jorn. ibid. Procop. bell. Goth. l. i. c. 1. p. 308. [c] Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 46. Candid. Iſaur. c. 19. Evagr. l. ii. c. 16. p. 308.

titles, and employments, that had been firſt eſtabliſhed at Rome.

CHAP. XXXII.

The Roman hiſtory, from the diſſolution of the weſtern empire, to the death of Juſtinian the Great.

AT the ſame time that the Roman empire failed in the weſt, it was uſurped in the eaſt by Baſiliſcus, who, upon the flight of Zeno, the lawful prince, had cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor, and his ſon Marcus to be acknowledged Cæſar. Zeno fled into Iſauria, whither he was purſued by Illus and Trocondes, two of the uſurper's generals, who having eaſily defeated the few troops he had with him, forced the unhappy prince to ſhut himſelf up in the caſtle, which they immediately inveſted. But in the mean time, Baſiliſcus having by his cruelty, avarice, enormous extortions, and, above all, by his unſeaſonable zeal for the doctrine of Eutyches, highly diſobliged the ſenate and people of Conſtantinople, as well as the ſoldiery, the two generals, informed of what paſſed in the metropolis, and privately encouraged, as ſome write, by the ſenate, inſtead of purſuing the ſiege, openly declared for Zeno; and joining him with all their forces, bent their march to Conſtantinople. Baſiliſcus no ſooner heard of their revolt, than he diſpatched Harmatius or Armatus, his kinſman, with a very numerous army againſt them, after having obliged him to ſwear, by his baptiſm, that he would not betray him. But, notwithſtanding this oath, he had no ſooner paſſed the Boſphorus, than he joined Zeno, encamped with Illus and Trocondes, in the neighbourhood of Nice, upon that prince's promiſing to appoint him general of the troops of his houſhold, and to continue him in that office during his life; to raiſe his ſon, by name Baſiliſcus, who was yet very young to the dignity of Cæſar, and to leave him the empire after his death [d].

Zeno beſieged in a caſtle of Iſauria.

Baſiliſcus diſobliges the people and ſoldiery.

Zeno,

[d] Candid. p. 19. Theoph. p. 106. Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 7. p. 295. Evagr. l. iii. c. 24. p. 354.

Zeno, thus reinforced, marched directly to Conſtantinople, which he entered without oppoſition, the uſurper flying for refuge, with his wife Zenonides and his children, to the great church, where he is ſaid to have laid down his crown upon the altar. Zeno ordered them to be immediately ſtripped of all the marks of the imperial dignity; and having ſoon after got them into his power, being either betrayed a ſecond time by Harmatius, as Candidus Iſaurus writes [e], or delivered up, as we read in Procopius [f], by Acacius, patriarch of Conſtantinople, he confined them to a caſtle in Cappadocia, named Limnos, where they periſhed in a ſhort time with hunger and cold [g]. Thus ended the uſurpation of Baſiliſcus, after it had laſted, according to moſt writers, twenty months, that is, from October 475, to June of the preſent year 477. Zeno, purſuant to his promiſe, raiſed Harmatius to the poſt of general of the troops of his houſhold, and his ſon Baſilicus to the dignity of Cæſar; but ſoon after, diſtruſting the father, on account of his treachery and ingratitude to Baſiliſcus, who had preferred him to the firſt employments in the ſtate, he cauſed him to be murdered in the palace, employing for that purpoſe one Onoulus or Onoulphus, by birth a barbarian, but brought up in the family of Harmatius, and by his intereſt raiſed from a mean condition to the dignity of count, and the poſt of general of Illyricum [h]. As for Baſiliſcus, the ſon of Harmatius, he was depoſed from the dignity of Cæſar, and made reader in a church near Conſtantinople. He was afterwards ordained biſhop of Cyzicus, the metropolis of Helleſpont, which church he governed with great prudence and piety, and aſſiſted in 518, at the council of Conſtantinople [i]. During the uſurpation of Baſiliſcus, a dreadful fire happened at Conſtantinople, which conſumed great part of the city, with the library, containing an hundred and twenty thouſand volumes, and the works of Homer, written, as it is ſaid, in gold characters on the great gut of a dragon, an hundred and twenty foot long [k]. In the following year, 478, when Illus alone was conſul, Theodoric, the ſon of Triarius, who had eſpouſed the cauſe of Baſiliſcus, broke into Thrace with a numerous army of Goths, and advanced within four miles of Conſtantinople; which ſo terrified the emperor, that he concluded a peace with Zeno reſtored.

Baſiliſchus taken, and confined to a caſtle in Cappadocia, where he periſhes.

Harmatius murdered by Zeno's orders.

A great fire at Conſtantinople.

[e] Candid p. 19. [f] Procop bell. Vand. l. i. c. 7 p. 194.
[g] Evagr. l. iii c. 8. p. 341. Procop ibid. [h] Candid p. 19.
Evagr. l. iii c. 24. p. 354. Procop. p. 195. [i] Evagr. l. iii.
c. 24 p. 354. [k] Cedr. p. 35. Zonar. p. 43, 44.

with him upon his own terms; whereof one of the articles was, that Theodoric ſhould be appointed commander in chief of the Roman horſe [l]. The next year, Zeno being conſul the third time, Marcian, the ſon of Anthemius, who had reigned in the weſt, claiming the empire in right of his wife Leontia, the eldeſt daughter of the late emperor Leo, attacked unexpectedly the imperial palace in Conſtantinople, at the head of ſome malecontents prepared for any deſperate attempt. The emperor's guards, endeavouring to make head againſt them, were either diſperſed or cut in pieces, and Zeno himſelf ſhut up with a ſmall number of officers in the palace. Had Marcian purſued his deſign, and without loſs of time forced the gates of the palace, which in that conſternation he might have eaſily done, the emperor muſt have fallen into his hands. But the attack being with the utmoſt imprudence put off till the next morning, Zeno in the mean time gained over, what with preſents, what with promiſes, moſt of Marcian's men, who, thereupon diſtruſting the reſt, withdrew all on a ſudden, and took ſanctuary in the church of the apoſtles, whence he was dragged by the emperor's orders, ordained prieſt, and confined to a monaſtery in the neighbourhood of Cæſarea in Cappadocia [m]. As Zeno had not for ſome years paid the Oſtrogoths in Pannonia their annual penſion, Theodoric, their king, no ſooner heard of the revolt of Marcian, than he broke into Macedon; and from thence advancing into Epirus, made himſelf maſter of Duras on the Adriatic ſea, that important place being betrayed to him by a Goth named Sidimont. But Sabinianus, an officer of great experience and addreſs, having ſurprized and cut in pieces a ſtrong reinforcement that was marching to the aſſiſtance of Theodoric, under the conduct of his brother Theudimont, and taken all their baggage and two thouſand waggons loaded with proviſions, the Goths, abandoning Duras, retired in great haſte into Pannonia [n]. The following year 480, when Baſilus, ſurnamed the younger, was conſul, Zeno, not only concluded a peace, but entered into an alliance with Huneric, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Genſeric, dead three years before [o]. In 481, when Placidius or Placitus was conſul, Theodoric, king of the Oſtrogoths, renewed his ravages, laying waſte the provinces of Macedon and Theſſaly, which obliged Zeno in the end to comply with

Marcian revolts;

But is abandoned by his own men, and forced to take refuge in a church.

[l] Jorn. c. 57 p. 696. [m] Candid. p. 20. Evagr. p. 335. Theoph. p. 109. [n] Mal. p. 73—81. [o] Marc. ad. ann. 481. Malel. p. 95.

with his demands, that is, to yield to him part of Lower Dacia and Mœsia; to give him the command of the troops of the houſhold, and to name him conſul for the enſuing year 483. Upon theſe terms he withdrew in 482, when Severinus and Trocundus were conſuls, out of Macedon and Theſſaly, reſtored Lariſſa, the metropolis of the latter province, which he had taken, and promiſed to employ, when required, all his forces in defence of the empire [p]. The following year; when Theodoric was conſul at Conſtantinople, and Venantius at Rome, (for Odoacer made no change in the government or magiſtrates of the city) Leontius, a native of Chalcis in Syria; and commander of the troops in that province; revolting, ſome ſay at the inſtigation of the empreſs Verina; cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor. Againſt him Zeno immediately diſpatched Illus; captain of his guards: But he; inſtead of oppoſing Leontius, joined him; and having ravaged the provinces of Syria and Iſauria, advanced to Antioch; with a deſign to ſeize on that metropolis. Longinus; the emperor's brother; met them in that neighbourhood; at the head of a conſiderable army; but his troops were all to a man cut in pieces by the rebels, and he himſelf taken priſoner. After this victory, Leontius and Illus entered Antioch in triumph. Zeno; upon the defeat and captivity of his brother; diſpatched John; an officer of great valour; and experience in war; into Syria; with what troops he could aſſemble, and prevailed upon Theodoric, the Oſtrogoth, to join him with a numerous army of Goths. Theſe two commanders were attended with better ſucceſs; for meeting Leontius and Illus in the neighbourhood of Seleucia, they gained a complete victory; and the following year; when Symmachus was conſul, obliged the two ringleaders of the revolt to fly for refuge to the ſtrong caſtle of Papyra in Cilicia; which John immediately inveſted, while Theodoric returned; as the war ſeemed now ended; with his troops to Conſtantinople [q]. Trocundus; the brother of Illus; taken priſoner by John; as he was attempting to make his eſcape out of Syria, in order to ſtir up the barbarians; was; by his orders, beheaded [r]. The ſame year; Theodoric; upon ſome diſguſt; withdrew from Conſtantinople; and returned to Pannonia. Evagrius writes; that Zeno; jealous of the glory

Lower Dacia and Mœsia yielded to Theodoric, king of the Oſtrogoths.

Leontius revolts.

Is joined by Illus.

They are both defeated and beſieged in Papyra.

[p] Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 57. p. 696. Marcell. ad ann. 483. Theoph. p. 142. [q] Theoph. p. 112. Liberat. c. 18. p. 125. [r] Theoph. ibid.

glory he had acquired by his late victory, and of the great esteem persons of all ranks shewed him, attempted privately to dispatch him [s]. However that be, it is certain, that Theodoric, after having spent the following year, when Longinus and Decius were consuls, in raising troops and making other military preparations, as if he designed to make war upon the barbarians, broke suddenly into Thrace at the head of a numerous army; und putting all to fire and sword, advanced within fifteen miles of Constantinople; but, instead of laying siege to that metropolis, as was apprehended, he marched back to Pannonia, in virtue of a private treaty between him and Zeno, by which the emperor yielded to him, as some authors write, all the provinces of Italy, held then by Odoacer, encouraging him to rescue them out of the hands of that barbarian, and promising to acknowledge him king of Italy [t]. The Romans afterwards pretended, that Zeno had sent Theodoric to conquer Italy, not for himself, but for the emperor of the east, to whom of right it belonged. On the other hand, the Goths maintained, that Zeno had yielded it to be held for ever by the Goths. Some authors write, that, in virtue of this treaty, Theodoric was to hold Italy during his life-time, but that upon his death it was to be reunited to the empire. However that be, Theodoric, in the beginning of the autumn of this year 487, when Boetius was consul, returned to Novæ in Mœsia, which city he had chosen for a place of residence; and having spent the winter in military preparations, he set out the following year, when Sifidius and Dinamius were consuls, at the head of a powerful army for Italy, and entering that country, overcame Odoacer in several battles, and established a new monarchy there, as we shall relate at length hereafter. About the end of this year, Leontius and Illus, after having defended with incredible bravery the castle of Papyra for the space of four years, were in the end taken by treachery, and put to death. Their heads were sent to Constantinople, and there exposed for several days together to public view [u]. In the following consulship of Anicius Probinus and Chronion Eusebius, Zeno caused several persons of great distinction to be put to death, and banished others, confiscating their estates, under pretence that they had favoured Theodoric the Ostrogoth breaks into Thrace.

Turns his arms against Odoacer, king of Italy.

Leontius and Illus taken, and put to death.

[s] Evagr. l. iii. c. 27. p. 356. [t] Jorn. rer. Goth. l. ii. c, 57: p. 696. [u] Theoph, p. 114. Phot. c. 242. p. 1072. Theodor. p. 558.

voured Leontius and Illus [u]. The following year, when Longinus was conſul the ſecond time with Fauſtus, Zeno, raging with more cruelty than ever, cauſed Pelagius, a patrician of great diſtinction, to be ſtrangled, for no other reaſon but becauſe he had been told by an aſtrologer, that he was to ſucceed Zeno [w]. The emperor did not long ſurvive him; for in the month of April of the following year 491, when Olybrius was conſul, he was ſeized with violent pains in his bowels, which carried him off in a few days after he had lived ſixty-five years and nine days, and reigned ſeventeen years and three months [x]. The more modern Greek writers, and amongſt the reſt Cedrenus, tell us, that being ſeized with an epileptic fit, he was buried alive, his wife Ariadne, who hated him, and was in love with Anaſtaſius, whom ſhe immediately married, not ſuffering him to be relieved, tho' he made a dreadful noiſe in his tomb; which being afterwards opened, he was found to have devoured the fleſh of his own arms, and even his buſkins [y]. But of this tragical end no mention is made by the more antient writers. He is painted by the antients as one of the moſt wicked and debauched princes recorded in hiſtory, as a perſon deſtitute of every good quality requiſite in a prince, and equally incapable of governing a ſtate and commanding an army [z]. Of the writers, who flouriſhed about this time, we ſhall ſpeak in note (U).

Zeno's cruelty.

His death.

[u] Theoph. p. 116. Cedr. p. 354. [w] Zonar. p. 44. [x] Chron. Al. p. 758. Evagr. l. iii. c. 29. p. 357. [y] Cedren. p. 355. [z] Procop. bell. Goth. l. i. c. 1. p. 308. Marc. p. 1232.

(U) Theodulus, a native of Syria, publiſhed in the reign of Zeno, ſeveral pieces againſt the Manichees and other heretics, a comment on the epiſtle of St. Paul to the Romans, and a poem on the miracles related in the old teſtament, and on the fables of the poets (1) His comment has reached our times (2). John the grammarian publiſhed a book againſt the Eutychians, which has been long ſince loſt (3). He was ſtill alive, according to Gennadius, in 424 (4). Malus or Males, by profeſſion a ſophiſt, wrote the hiſtory of Zeno and Baſiliſcus: but of that work only ſome fragments have reached us (5). Candidus by birth an Iſaurian, compriſed in three books a very particular and diſtinct account of what

(1) Marc. chron. Gennad. c. 91. Sixtus Senenſ. l. iv. p. 381. Poſſevin. p. 469. Sigebert. c. 134. (2) Biblioth. patr. tom. i. p. 495. (3) Trith. p. 40. Marc. chron. ad ann. 486. (4) Gennad. p. 93. (5) Phot. c. 78. p. 172. Zonar. p. 44. Evagr. p. 78.

Upon the death of Zeno, his brother Longinus laid claim to the empire; but, he being univerſally abhorred on account of his lewdneſs and cruelty, Ariadne, widow to the deceaſed emperor, eaſily prevailed upon the ſenate to acknowledge Anaſtaſius for emperor, who was accordingly crowned on the eleventh of April in the circus, according to ſome by Ariadne [a], according to others [b], by Euphemius, patriarch of Conſtantinople, who abſolutely refuſed to place the imperial crown upon his head, till he had bound himſelf by a ſolemn oath to protect the catholic church, and to hold the doctrine of the two councils of Nice and Chalcedon. He was no ſooner proclaimed emperor, than he married Ariadne, being then in the ſixtieth-year of his age [c]. He was a native of Duras, the metropolis of New Epirus in Illyricum [d]. All we know of his family is, that his father was born in the ſame city; that his mother was a Manichee, and Clearchus, her brother, an Arian [e]. As for Anaſtaſius himſelf, he is by ſome ſtiled a Manichee, by others an Eutychian [f]. Magna, whom ſome will have to have been the emperor's ſiſter, others to have been wife to his brother, named Paul, was a zealous catholic [g]. Anaſtaſius had not yet attained to the rank of ſenator, when he was raiſed to the empire, being at that time one of the great chamberlain's officers, named Silentiarii, whoſe Anaſtaſius declared emperor.

He marries Ariadne.

His birth, education, employments, &c.

[a] Evagr. l. iii. c. 3. p. 334. [a] Theoph. p. 117. Cedren. p. 357. [b] Evagr. p. 361. Theoph. Zonar. p. 45. [c] Evagr. p. 357. Theoph. p. 117. [d] Evagr. l. iii. c. 29. p. 357. Theoph. p. 117. [e] Theodor. p. 558. Theoph. ibid. [f] Evagr. l. iii. c. 37. p. 361. Theoph. p. 115. [g] Niceph. chron. p. 305. Theoph. p. 131.

what happened from the election of Leo to that of Anaſtaſius. A ſhort abſtract of his work has been conveyed to us by Photius (6). Evagrius, in ſpeaking of Zeno, often quotes and highly commends one Euſtathius, a native of Philadelphia, who wrote an abridgment of the Roman hiſtory, from Æneas to the twelfth year of Zeno's reign (7). The ſame hiſtorian is mentioned by Nicephorus (8). Photius ſpeaks of one Victorinus, who wrote ſome orations in commendation of the conſuls, and of the emperor Zeno (9). He was a native of Antioch, and the ſon of Lampadius. Photius commends the elegance, clearneſs, and propriety of his ſtyle (10).

(6) Phot. c. 78 p. 172. (7) Evagr. l. iii. c. 15. p. 308. c. 37. p. 367. & l. v. c. 24. p. 442. Suid p. 1096. (8) Niceph. l. xiv c. 57. p 579. (9) Phot. c. 101. p. 276. (10) Idem ibid.

whoſe province it was to cauſe due ſilence to be obſerved in the palace [h]. He is ſaid to have led, while a private man, a very abſtemious life, and to have given ſignal inſtances of his integrity, whence, upon his receiving the purple and diadem in the circus, the people, applauding his promotion, cried out with one voice, Reign, Anaſtaſius, as you have lived [i]. And truly the beginning of his reign was not undeſervedly applauded by perſons of all ranks; for he immediately remitted what ever to that time was due to the exchequer, and utterly aboliſhed the infamous tax called chryſargyrum, which was levied every fifth year upon thoſe, even common beggars not excepted, who ſold any thing, of how little ſoever, whence it was called the gold of tribulation. To pay it, parents were often obliged to ſell their children, after they had been ſtripped of every thing elſe. It was not only raiſed on all traders, in what kind ſo ever of merchandize they dealt, but on the public proſtitutes, who, by paying to the prince a conſiderable ſhare of what they earned by their infamous profeſſion, ſeemed to have purchaſed a right to purſue with impunity their ſcandalous practices [k]. Alexander Severus being aſhamed, tho' a pagan, to ſuffer the money thus raiſed to be lodged in the exchequer, ordered it to be kept apart, and to be employed in repairing the public edifices [l]. Theodoſius the younger utterly ſuppreſſed this infamous tribute in 439, but it was ſoon after revived through the avarice of his ſucceſſors. Zoſimus will have the tax to have been firſt eſtabliſhed by Conſtantine the Great [m]; which is denied by Evagrius as a calumny, without any other foundation but the implacable hatred which that pagan writer bore to the deliverer of the chriſtian religion [n]. And indeed it is evident from the antient writers, that long before Conſtantine's time a tax was laid on all traders, as well as infamous women; but that Conſtantine, to ſave charges, cauſed it to be levied, not annually, as it had been till his reign, but every fourth or rather fifth year. However that be, Anaſtaſius, looking upon it as no leſs burdenſome to the people than ſhameful in the prince, not only utterly aboliſhed it, with the conſent and approbation of the ſenate, but, to prevent its ever being revived, cauſed all the papers relating to it to be publicly burnt in the circus [o]. This abolition

He aboliſhes the chryſargyrum.

The nature of this tax.

[h] Evagr. l iii. c. 29. p 357. Procop. bell. Perſ. l. ii. c. 25. p. 138. [i] Niceph. chron. p 398 Cedren. p. 357. [k] Theoph. p. 566. Evagr l. iii c. 39. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 691. [l] Lamprid. in Al. p. 212. [m] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 691. [n] Evagr. l. iii. c. 40 p. 370. [o] Evagr. l. iv. c. 39. p. 368. Cod. Theod. 2, 5. p. 2, 4.

of the chryſargyrum is recorded by all the hiſtorians, who ſpeak of Anaſtaſius, as an action truly great, heroic, and almoſt divine, worthy of being tranſmitted to the lateſt poſterity, and capable of covering the many faults, which are but too deſervedly laid to that prince's charge [p]. Timotheus of Gaza wrote a tragedy on the chryſargyrum, which he aſcribed to Anaſtaſius. Cedrenus, who ſtyles that writer a man of univerſal knowledge, tells us, that the emperor was in great meaſure induced by the reading of that piece to propoſe to the ſenate the ſuppreſſing of ſuch an infamous tax [q]. The ſame writer adds, that Anaſtaſius aboliſhed two kinds of chryſargyrums, one of which was raiſed on the poor, on the beggars, ſlaves, freemen, harlots, and divorced women, who, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition, paid every fourth year a certain ſum for themſelves, and another for their horſes, mules, dogs, aſſes, oxen, &c [r]. At the ſame time, the new prince drove all informers out of Conſtantinople, and put a ſtop to the enormous abuſe introduced by Zeno of expoſing to ſale all public offices, and beſtowing, to the great oppreſſion of the unhappy people, the beſt governments on the higheſt bidders [s]. Anaſtaſius having, by theſe and ſeveral other acts of generoſity and good-nature, gained the affections of the people, they all to a man joined him againſt Longinus, the deceaſed emperor's brother, who in the beginning of the following year 492, when the emperor Anaſtaſius and Rufus were conſuls, raiſed ſome diſturbances in Conſtantinople, but was immediately ſeized, deprived of all his employments, and ſent back into Iſauria, his native country, with orders to continue there. With him were driven out of Conſtantinople all the Iſaurians, who had borne great ſway in the late reign. The Iſaurians, thus baniſhed the city, eſpouſed the cauſe of Longinus, and, openly revolting, kindled a civil war in the bowels of the empire. They were headed by Longinus, the late emperor's brother, by another Longinus, ſurnamed Selinontius, no doubt from the city of Selinus in Iſauria, the place of his nativity, by Indus, Theodorus, Ninilinghus, and ſeveral other Iſaurians of great diſtinction, who had been raiſed by Zeno to the firſt employments in the ſtate. Conon, biſhop of Apamea in Syria, abandoning his flock, joined his countrymen, for he was by birth an Iſaurian, and became one of the ringleaders of the Informers driven out of Conſtantinople.

Longinus and the Iſaurians revolt.

[p] Evagr. p. 370. Conſt. Manaſſ. p. 63. Suid. p. 913.
[q] Cedren. p 357. [r] Idem ibid. [s] Idem, p. 358.

the revolt [t]. Under these heads the rebels seized on an immense quantity of arms, and vast sums lodged by Zeno in a strong hold of Isauria, which enabled them to raise and arm above an hundred and fifty thousand men. The emperor, alarmed at the progress they made, dispatched the flower of his troops against them, under the conduct of two of the most renowned generals of that age, viz. John the Scythian, and John, surnamed Gibbus, or the hunch-backed, who coming up with the rebels in the neighbourhood of Cotycea in Phrygia, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to take refuge amongst the inaccessible mountains of Isauria, where they maintained themselves for the space of six years, in spite of the utmost efforts of the best generals of the empire [u]. Ninilinghus, one of the chief leaders, was killed in the above-mentioned battle. The following year, when Eusebius was consul the second time with Albinus, surnamed the younger, the emperor, who, notwithstanding the genorosity he affected on his accession to the empire, was naturally of a most avaricious temper, laid an heavy tax on the inhabitants of Constantinople, called by Evagrius chrysotelia, which, as it was no-ways expected, incensed them to such a degree, that, rising all on a sudden, they pulled down the emperor's statues, and dragged them through the chief streets of the city with those of the empress Ariadne, uttering most injurious invectives both against her and Anastasius [w]. How this tumult ended, we are no-where told. The same year Theodoric the Goth, having completed the conquest of Italy, by the reduction of Ravenna after a three years siege, as we shall relate more at length hereafter, caused himself to be proclaimed king of that country, without waiting the return of the embassadors, whom he had sent to Constantinople for the ensign of royalty. However, he dispatched Festus, or Faustus, and Ireneus, two persons of rank, to sollicit the emperor's approbation, and excuse the liberty he had taken. Anastasius received his excuses, promised not to molest him in the possession of the country he had conquered, and sent him the ensigns of the royal dignity [x]. Hence it appears, that he acknowledged in some degree, as Odoacer had done, the authority of the emperor. Besides, he suffered the Romans to receive the consulship from the emperor of the east. 'Tis

They are defeated, but continue in arms.

A tumult in Constantinople.

Theodoric acknowledged king of Italy.

[t] Evagr. l. iii. p. 366. Theoph. p. 118. [u] Evagr. Theoph. ibid. Marc. chron. Jorn. p. 655. [w] Marc. chron. p. 401. [x] Anmian. anonym. p. 408. Concil. tom. iv. p. 1181.

true he named in 511, one Felix to that dignity; but at the ſame time he wrote to Anaſtaſius, begging him to confirm what he had done [y]. In 494, when Aſterius and Præſidius were conſuls, Diogenes, one of the emperor's generals, having ſurprized the city of Claudiopolis in Iſauria held by the rebels, he was cloſely beſieged in it by the biſhop Conon, and reduced to ſuch ſtreights, that he muſt have ſoon either periſhed with hunger, or been cut in pieces with all his men, had not John, ſurnamed Gibbus, opening himſelf away over mount Taurus, and falling unexpectedly upon the rebels, obliged them to retire with great ſlaughter. The biſhop, fighting with great reſolution and intrepidity at the head of his men, received a wound of which he died ſoon after [z]. The two following years, in the firſt of which Viator, or, as ſome ſtyle him, Victor, was conſul, and in the other Paul, the emperor's brother, ſome inconſiderable advantages were gained over the Iſaurian rebels, who were utterly defeated the following year, when the emperor Anaſtaſius was conſul the ſecond time, by John the Scythian. Longinus, brother to the late emperor Zeno, and Theodorus, or Athenodorus, being taken priſoners, they were both put to death by that general's orders, and their heads ſent to Conſtantinople, where they were expoſed to public view in the ſuburbs called Sycæ. The head of Athenodorus was afterwards ſent to Tarſus, and ſet up on a pole before the gate of that city [a]. The other ringleaders of the rebellion, namely Longinus Selinontius and Indus, were taken the following year, when John the Scythian was conſul with Paulinus, and ſent loaded with chains to Conſtantinople. Longinus was afterwards racked to death at Nice. As ſeveral cities in Iſauria were utterly ruined during this war, which had laſted ſix years, the inhabitants of Iſauria were removed into Thrace, and the annual penſion of five thouſand pieces of gold, paid to them by Zeno, taken away for ever [b]. This year the emperor narrowly eſcaped being murdered in the circus by the populace, upon his refuſing to cauſe ſome priſoners to be ſet at liberty, who had been concerned in a late riot. It was with the utmoſt difficulty that the guards ſcreened him from the fury of the enraged multitude, and the ſhowers of ſtones diſcharged againſt him. When the multitude found themſelves

The Iſaurians defeated a ſecond time by John the Scythian.

Longinus, and the other heads of the rebels, taken and put to death.

A tumult in Conſtantinople.

[y] Procop. p. 402. Caſſiodor. l. ii. ep. 1. [z] Marc. chron. Theoph. p 119. [a] Evagr. l iii. 35. p. 366 Theoph. p. 120. Vict. Tun p. 127. [b] Caſſiod. l. i. ep. 23 l. ii. ep. 3. Evagr. l. iii. c. 35. p. 366. Marc. chron.

ſelves repulſed by the ſoldiery, they ſet fire to the hippodrome, which conſumed that and ſeveral other ſtately edifices, with a ſquare of Conſtantinople, in which not a ſingle building was left ſtanding [c]. The ſame year, the Arabs and Saracens, named Scenitæ, broke into Paleſtine and Syria Euphrateſiana; but in Syria they were defeated by Eugenius, who commanded the Roman troops there, and in Paleſtine by Romanus, governor of that province, who on that occaſion recovered to the empire the Iſland of Jotape in the Red Sea, which the Arabs Scenitæ had ſeized, and re-eſtabliſhed there the Roman merchants trading to India [d].

In 499, when Joannes Gibbus and Aſclepion were conſuls, the Bulgarians breaking into Thrace, Ariſius, commander of the troops in Illyricum, marched againſt them at the head of fifteen thouſand men, engaged them on the banks of the Zurta or Zorta; but was defeated with the loſs of four thouſand men, amongſt whom were the counts Nicoſtratus, Innocentius, and Aquilinus, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction. The barbarians, after having plundered all the open places in Thrace, returned of their own accord beyond the Danube [e]. The ſame year, Neocæſarea and ſeveral other cities in Pontus were almoſt utterly ruined by an earthquake [f]. The year 500, when Patritius and Hypatius were conſuls, is quite barren of events. In the following conſulſhip of Pompeius and Avienus, the blue and green factions quarrelling in the circus of Conſtantinople, above three thouſand of the former were killed [g]. The following year, Probus and Avienus being conſuls, the Bulgarians breaking anew into Thrace, and the Saracens into Paleſtine, committed dreadful ravages in thoſe two provinces [h]. The ſame year Cabades, king of Perſia, being highly provoked at the emperor's refuſing to lend him a certain ſum, which he owed to the king of the Nephthalite or Epthalite Hunns, entered unexpectedly Armenia at the head of a numerous army; and having eaſily reduced the cities of Theodoſiopolis and Martyropolis, laid cloſe ſiege to Amida, which the inhabitants (for there was no garriſon in the place) defended with ſuch vigour and reſolution, that the king, deſpairing of being ever able to reduce it, had already ordered his troops to retire; but the inhabitants, eſpecially ſome women, probably

The Romans defeated by the barbarians.

A tumult in the circus at Conſtantinople.

The Perſians break into the empire.

[c] Chron. Al. p. 760. [d] Theoph p. 21. Evagr. l. iii. c. 36. p. 366. [e] Marc. chron. Zonar. p. 47. [f] Theoph. p. 123. Marc chron. [g] Marc. chron. [h] Idem, ibid. Theoph p. 153.

bly common proſtitutes, reviling and rallying him from the walls in a manner not to be expreſſed by a modeſt writer, he reſolved at all events to purſue the ſiege, which he did accordingly, and in the end made himſelf maſter of the place, after having lain before it eighty days, or as others write, four months [i]. Moſt of the inhabitants were put to the ſword, and the town pillaged. In the mean time, Anaſtaſius diſpatched a powerful army againſt the enemy, commanded by Patricius, Hypatius, and Arcobindus, who had married Juliana, the daughter of the emperor Olybrius. Under them commanded Celer, Juſtin, afterwards emperor, his ſon Vitalianus, Patritiolus, Romanus, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction. But the Perſians having reduced Amida before they reached that place, they divided the army into two bodies, the one, under the command of Patricius and Hypatius, attempting to make an irruption into the enemy's country on the ſide of Amida, and the other marching, under the command of Areobindus, to Niſibis, with a deſign to ſurprize that important place. In the mean time, Cabades, having drawn his troops together, went to meet Areobindus, who, upon his approach, abandoning his camp and baggage, fled in the utmoſt confuſion to Conſtantina, after having preſſed in vain Hypatius and Patricius to join him, and with their mutual forces to oppoſe the enemy, who was far ſuperior in number to either of the parties they commanded. Areobindus being thus put to flight, Cabades, without loſs of time, marched againſt Hypatius and Patricius; and coming upon them unexpectedly, cut their whole army in pieces, the two generals having with much ado eſcaped by a timely flight the common ſlaughter. Cabades, having now no enemy to oppoſe him, over-ran Meſopotamia, extending his ravages to the very borders of Syria, till he was obliged, by the approach of winter, to return into Perſia [k]. The following year, when Cethegus was conſul, Celer, entering the province of Arzanene, belonging to the Perſians, at the head of a conſiderable army, laid it waſte far and near, while the other generals undertook the ſiege of Amida, the Perſians being diverted by a ſudden irruption of the Hunns. The place held out till both the Romans and Perſians being quite tired out with the fatigues of a ſiege in the depth of winter, it was agreed, that the Perſians ſhould deliver up the city to the Romans,

And take Amida.

The Roman generals defeated and put to flight.

Amida reſtored to the Romans.

[i] Procop. bell. Perſ. l i. c. 7. p. 20, 21. Theoph. p. 124, 125. Evagr. l. iii. c. 37. p. 367. [k] Procop. p. 22. Theoph. p. 125.

Romans, upon their paying to the king of Persia fifty talents, which was immediately done. Thus the Romans recovered the important city of Amida, in the consulship of Sabinianus and Theodorus, after it had been held two years by the Persians [l]. Upon their entering the place, they found that the enemy had not sufficient provisions to support them seven days longer, though they had lived very sparingly during the siege. Not long after, a truce for seven years, which lasted about twenty, was concluded between the two empires, Cabades being engaged in a war with the Caduceans, Hunns, and other barbarians [m]. The same year one Mondon or Mondo, by nation a Goth, having settled with some of his countrymen, in such places beyond the Danube as he found uninhabited, seized on a strong hold called Herta; and thence, by frequent incursions into the Roman territories, continued for some time harassing the subjects of the empire, giving himself the title of king. Anastasius dispatched against him Sabinianus, the son of the famous general of that name, at the head of ten thousand chosen men, which obliged Mondon to have recourse to Theodoric, the Goth king, of Italy, who the year before had reconquered Pannonia, and recovered Sirmium out of the hands of the Gepidæ. As Mondo had entered into an alliance with Theodoric, Pitzia, one of that prince's generals, marched to his assistance, defeated Sabinianus in a pitched battle near Margus in Lower Dacia, and obliged him to shut himself up in the castle of Nato [n]. This occasioned a misunderstanding between Theodoric, and Anastasius, as we shall relate in the history of the Ostrogoths in Italy. The next consuls were Arcobindus and Messala, who were succeeded in 507, by the emperor Anastasius, the third time consul, and Venantius. This year Anastasius, to defend not only the city of Constantinople, but the adjacent country, against the sudden irruptions of the barbarians, built the famous wall, called the Long-wall, and the wall of Anastasius, of which frequent mention is made by the Byzantine historians. It was distant from Constantinople two hundred and eighty furlongs, extended from sea to sea, being four hundred and twenty furlongs round, and inclosed not only the metropolis, but the city of Selymbria, and the neighbouring country, which was a continued garden, with

A truce with the Persians.

The Romans defeated by Mondo the Goth.

Anastasius builds the Long wall.

an

[l] Idem, p. 127. & 25, 26. [m] Procop. bell. Pers. l. i. c. 9. p. 27. Theoph. p. 127. [n] Jorn. rer. Goth. p. 599. Ennod. in panegyr. Theodoric. p. 309.

an incredible number of ſtately villas and houſes of pleaſure, richly furniſhed and adorned. The wall was twenty foot in breadth, and defended by towers at ſmall diſtances from each other; by which means the inhabitants, upon the ſhorteſt warning, had an opportunity of putting themſelves in a poſture of defence, and repulſing with great eaſe the barbarians [o].

Daras repaired and fortified.

In the following conſulſhip of Celer and Venantius, ſtyled the younger, Anaſtaſius cauſed the city of Daras, a frontier-town towards Perſia, to be repaired and fortified, in order to prevent the Perſians from breaking into the empire on that ſide. Daras ſtood on the Cardus, about fifteen miles from Niſibis, and three from Carrhæ [p]. The ſame year Clovis, king of the Franks in Gaul, having gained a complete victory over Alaric, king of the Viſigoths in Languedoc and Aquitain, Anaſtaſius, who was at variance with Theodoric, whoſe daughter Alaric had married, ſent embaſſadors to the king of the Franks, to congratulate him upon his victory, and to preſent him with the conſular ornaments, and a diadem, which he received in the church of St. Martin at Tours, taking upon him thenceforth the title of conſul, and likewiſe that of Auguſtus. He removed ſoon after from Tours to Paris, where he fixed his reſidence, declaring that city the metropolis of his kingdom [q]. Nothing remarkable happened the two following years 509, 510, in the firſt of which Importunus was conſul, and in the ſecond the famous Boetius, of whom we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the hiſtory of the kingdom of Italy. In 511, when Secundinus and Felix were conſuls, the Heruli, after having long roved about from one country to another, paſſed the Danube, and were received the following year, when Paulus and Muſchianus were conſuls, into Thrace, where lands were allotted to them, upon their promiſing to ſerve with fidelity in the Roman armies, when required [r]. In the next conſulſhip of Probus and Clementinus, the emperor, at the inſtigation of the Eutychians, whom he favoured, drove Macedonius, the orthodox patriarch of Conſtantinople from his ſee, and preferred one Timotheus, an avowed follower of Eutyches, in his room, who, by attempting to introduce novelties in the public worſhip, raiſed great diſturbances in Clovis fixes his reſidence at Paris.

The Heruli admitted into Thrace.

[o] Evagr. l. iii c. 38. p. 367. Procop. ædif, l. iv. c. 9. p. 86. Gyl. de Conſtantinop. l. i. c. 21. p. 83. Zonar. p. 48. [p] Procop. ædif l. ii. c. 2. p. 31. Evagr. l. iii. c. 37. p. 367. [q] Greg. Tur. hiſt. Franc. l. ii. c. 38. p. 291. [r] Procop. bel. Goth. l. ii. c. 14 p. 42.

in Conſtantinople. Many of the inhabitants, ſome ſay ten thouſand, were killed in a tumult between the catholics and Eutychians, and ſeveral houſes burnt, amongſt the reſt that of the prefect Martinus, with its rich furniture, he himſelf having narrowly eſcaped being conſumed in the flames [s]. The following year 514, when Caſſiodorus Senator was conſul, Vitalianus, one of the emperor's generals, eſpouſing the cauſe of Macedonius, and the other orthodox biſhops, perſecuted by Anaſtaſius, approached Conſtantinople, at the head of a numerous army, raiſed in three days time, threatening to depoſe the emperor, if he did not reſtore the baniſhed biſhops to their ſees, and drive out the Eutychians. Anaſtaſius, who was a zealous patron of the doctrine of Eutyches, refuſing to comply with his requeſt, he made himſelf maſter of Mœſia and Thrace, took Cyril, governor of the latter province, priſoner, defeated Hypatius, the emperor's nephew, who likewiſe fell into his hands, and returning before Conſtantinople with his victorious army, Anaſtaſius, who was no-ways in a condition to oppoſe him ſolemnly promiſed to comply with his demands, viz. to put an end to the perſecution, which he had raiſed againſt the catholics, to reſtore Macedonius, and the other orthodox biſhops, to their ſees, and to call an œcumenical council, and ſtand to the deciſions of the prelates of the church. Anaſtaſius had no ſooner ſigned theſe articles, than Vitalianus withdrew from the neighbourhood of Conſtantinople; and diſbanding his troops, ſent Hypatius, whom he had taken priſoner, back to his uncle, and retired to his government in Thrace [t]. Anaſtaſius thus delivered from his fears, purſued the perſecution againſt the catholics with more cruelty than ever, as the reader will find related at length by the eccleſiaſtic writers. In 515, when Anthemius and Florentius were conſuls, and 516, when Petrus alone bore that dignity, nothing happened which hiſtorians have thought worthy of notice. In 517, when Anaſtaſius was conſul the fourth time with Agapetus, the northern barbarians, called by Marcellinus Getæ, breaking into Illyricum, laid waſte Macedon and Epirus, defeated Pompeius, the emperor's nephew, in the neighbourhood of Adrianople; and penetrating as far as Theſſaly, returned from thence beyond the Danube unmoleſted, with an immence booty, and an incredible number of captives [u]. The follow-

Great diſturbances in Conſtantinople.

Vitalianus eſpouſes the cauſe of the catholics againſt the Eutychians.

The emperor promiſes to comply with his demands.

The Getæ break into Illyricum.

[s] Surius, p. 173. [t] Marc. chron. Vict. Tununenſis, p. 632. [u] Marc. chron Jorn reg. ſucc, c. 48. p. 655.

Anaſtaſius dies.

following year, when Magnus alone was conſul, the emperor Anaſtaſius was found dead in his chamber on the ninth of July. Authors wary as to the circumſtances of his death: ſome write, that a violent ſtorm ariſing, the dread and terror with which he was ſeized, as being conſcious to himſelf of many cruel and unjuſt murders, put an end to his life [w]; others ſuppoſe him to have been killed by a flaſh of lightning [x]. He died in the eighty-eighth year of his age, after having reigned twenty-ſeven years, and three months, wanting two or three days [y]. No prince perhaps was ever more beloved in the beginning, nor more hated in the end of his reign. He gave at firſt ſeveral inſtances of generoſity, goodnature, moderation, and application to public affairs, ſeeming to have nothing ſo much at heart as the welfare of his ſubjects. But he ſoon abandoned himſelf to all manner of wickedneſs, ſelling the publick offices, and ſharing with the governors of provinces the ſpoils of the unhappy people, whom he ſuffered them to oppreſs with moſt enormous exactions. The eccleſiaſtic writers paint him in the blackeſt colours imaginable; but as he perſecuted the catholics, and countenanced, to the utmoſt of his power, the Eutychians, they were perhaps ſo far prejudiced againſt him as to overlook the few good qualities, which other authors allow him, and take notice only of his vices.

Juſtin proclaimed emperor. His birth, education, &c.

ANASTASIUS being dead, Juſtin, then præfectus prætorio, was by the ſoldiers of the houſhold proclaimed emperor in his room. He was deſcended of an obſcure and mean family in Thrace, having been in his youth employed in keeping cattle. He afterwards liſted himſelf among the troops that guarded Thrace; and having on ſeveral occaſions given ſignal proofs of an extraordinary valour, and addreſs, he was raiſed from the low ſtation of a common ſoldier to the poſt of a tribune, and from that ſoon after to the office of præfectus prætorio, which he held when he was preferred to the empire. Evagrius writes, that Amantius, the deceaſed emperor's great chamberlain, having intruſted Juſtin with large ſums to purchaſe the votes of the ſoldiery in favour of Theocritus, his intimate friend, Juſtin diſtributed the money in his own name; and having by that means ſecured the army to his intereſt, he was by them ſaluted

[w] Theod. p 505. Marc. chron. Chron. Al. p. 764 [x] Zonar. p. 47. Cedren. p. 362. [y] Evagr. l. iv. c. 1. p. 381. Chron. Al. p. 764.

ſaluted with the title of Auguſtus, as ſoon as the death of Anaſtaſius was known [z]. Thus Evagrius, whoſe account does not at all agree with what we read in the letters ſaid to have been written by Juſtin himſelf to Hormiſda biſhop of Rome ſoon after his promotion; wherein he tells him, that he had been preferred, contrary to his expectation, and againſt his will, to the imperial dignity *. But by what means ſoever he attained the purple, he governed with great equity and moderation; and by his ſteady adherence to the orthodox faith, and prudent adminiſtration healed in great meaſure the diviſions which had long rent the church, as well as the ſtate, into factions and parties. He was ſcarce warm in his throne, when Amantius, Theocritus, and ſeveral of the deceaſed emperor's relations, perſons of great intereſt and authority in the empire, conſpired againſt him; but the conſpiracy being diſcovered by ſome who were privy to it, the chief authors of it, and among the reſt Amantius and Theocritus, were publicly executed, to the great ſatisfaction of the people, who hated them as the avowed patrons of the Eutychians, and the chief promoters of the late perſecution againſt the catholics [a]. The following year 519, Juſtin being conſul with Eutharic, the ſon-in-law of Theodoric, king of Italy, all the orthodox biſhops, who had been baniſhed by Anaſtaſius, were by the emperor's orders reſtored to their ſees, and ſeveral ſynods aſſembled, in which the doctrine of the church was eſtabliſhed, and that of Eutyches condemned [b]. The following year, Vitalianus, of whom we have made mention above, was raiſed to the conſulſhip with Ruſticus, but was ſoon after diſpatched in the palace by the emperor's orders, upon his attempting to gain over ſome of the chief officers, with a deſign to depoſe Juſtin, and cauſe himſelf to be proclaimed emperor in his room. He had eſpouſed the catholic cauſe in the reign of Anaſtaſius; but his caballing againſt Juſtin, a zealous patron of the true faith, and his courting the Eutychians, convinced the world, that it was not merely on account of religion he had taken arms againſt his ſovereign [c]. The following year, Juſtinian, the emperor's nephew, being conſul with Valerius, Cabades, king of Perſia, ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to Juſtin, offering to conclude a laſting peace with him, provided he would adopt Coſrhoes, the Perſian king's youngeſt

Some conſpire againſt him, but are diſcovered and puniſhed.

Vitalianus put to death.

[z] Evagr. l. iv. c. 1, 2. * Vide Baron. ad ann. 518. [a] Jorn. reg. ſucc. c. 48. p. 132. [b] Evagr. l. iv. c. 3. [c] Idem, ibid.

youngeſt ſon, whom, to the prejudice of his eldeſt ſon Caoſes, he had declared his ſucceſſor. This he looked upon as the only means of engaging the Roman emperor to eſpouſe his cauſe, and of firmly eſtabliſhing him in the kingdom. The propoſal was received at firſt with great joy both by Juſtin and his nephew Juſtinian; but Proclus, the quæſtor, a man of great integrity, and well ſkilled in the laws, demonſtrating, that, in virtue of that adoption, Coſrhoes might claim the Roman empire as his inheritance, it was rejected; which ſo piqued Cavades, that he immediately entered Iberia, with a deſign to invade from thence the Roman territories. Gurgenes, king of the Iberians, had recourſe to Juſtin, who diſpatched a body of troops to his aſſiſtance, under the conduct of Sittas and the famous Beliſarius, who was then but a youth, and ſerved in the guards of Juſtinian, lately declared commander in chief of all the forces of the empire. Sittas and Beliſarius broke into that part of Armenia which belonged to the Perſians, and laid it waſte; but being met by Narſes and Aratius, they were by them put to flight, and obliged to retire into the Roman dominions. Narſes and Aratius revolted ſoon after from the Perſians, and ſerved under Beliſarius in Italy. The emperor, well pleaſed with the conduct of Beliſarius gave him the command of the forces in Daras, on the frontiers of Perſia [d]. Theſe things happened in the third conſulſhip of Severinus Boëtius, and the firſt of Symmachus, who were ſucceeded in 523, by Maximus alone in the weſt, and he by Juſtin, the ſecond time conſul, and Opilio, during whoſe conſulſhip we find nothing tranſacted in the empire that deſerves notice. In 525, when Probinus or Probus, and Philoxenus, were conſuls, Juſtin, by an edict, deprived the Arians of all their churches in his dominions; which occaſioned a miſunderſtanding between him and Theodoric, king of Italy, who was a zealous patron of the doctrine of Arius. But what relates to that prince, we reſerve for the hiſtory of the Oſtrogoths in Italy. The ſame year the city of Antioch was almoſt utterly overturned by an earthquake, and great numbers of the inhabitants buried, with their biſhop Euphraſius, under the ruins [e]. The cities of Epidamnus, Corinth, and Anazarbus in Cilicia, underwent the ſame fate, but were at a vaſt expence reſtored, as well as Antioch,

The Perſian war.

Beliſarius commander of the troops in Daras.

The Arians deprived of their churches.

A great earthquake at Antioch.

[d] Procop. bell. Perſ. c. 11, 12. [e] Evagr. l. iv. c. 5 6.

Antioch, to their former condition by the good-natured emperor, who was ſo affected with their misfortune, that putting off the purple, and laying aſide the diadem, he appeared for ſeveral days in ſack-cloth [f]. In 526, Olybrius alone was conſul, and ſucceeded in that dignity by Mavortius, during whoſe conſulſhip, Juſtin, on the firſt of April, declared his nephew Juſtinian his partner in the empire. He was the ſon of Sabatius, by Bigleniza, the ſiſter of Juſtin, called by the Romans Vigilantia. He was a native of Taureſium, but brought up at Bederina, the birth-place of his uncle Juſtin, both cities on the confines of Thrace and Illyricum; whence he is by ſome ſtyled a Thracian, by others an Illyrian. He was ſent, when a youth, by Juſtin, then commander in chief of the Roman army, as an hoſtage to Theodoric, king of Italy, who, upon the news of his uncle's preferment, ſuffered him to return to Conſtantinople, where he was immediately honoured with the title of nobiliſſimus, and upon the death of Vitalianus, raiſed to the chief command of the army in his room [g]. Some authors write that Juſtin, at the requeſt of the ſenate, took him for his partner in the empire; whereas others pretend, that the ſenate were awed by threats and menaces. Be that as it will, it is certain that Juſtinian was this year declared emperor; and upon his entering the circus with the purple, and other enſigns of the imperial dignity, the populace received him with loud acclamations: he was then as Zonaras obſerves, in the forty-fifth year of his age. The emperor Juſtin died about four months after, that is, in the latter end of September, or the beginning of Auguſt, in the ſeventy-ſeventh year of his age, after having reigned nine years, one month, and ſome days. His death is generally aſcribed to a wound received in battle many years before. He could neither read nor write, having been employed by his parents in keeping cattle, till he liſted himſelf in the army; but was nevertheleſs a man of extraordinary penetration, and uncommon addreſs, in the management of the moſt difficult affairs, well ſkilled in the art of war, and in every reſpect equal to the high ſtation to which hr was raiſed.

Juſtin aſſumes Juſtinian for his partner in the empire.

Juſtin dies.

His character.

JUSTINIAN, now ſole maſter of the empire, made it his firſt and chief buſineſs to ſecure the frontiers towards Perſia. With this view he ordered Beliſarius, commander of the troops

What gave riſe to the Perſian war.

[f] Idem, ibid. c. 8.

[g] Vide not. Alam. in Procop. ſecret. hiſt.

troops in Daras, to build a fort in the neighbourhood of Mindon, which might be as a curb upon the Perſians, and prevent them from breaking into the empire on that ſide. Beliſarius had no ſooner begun the work, than Cabades, who ſtill reigned in Perſia, after having attempted in vain, by threats and menaces, to divert him from it, diſpatched a body of troops againſt him. On the other hand, Juſtinian ordered the two brothers Curtzes and Buzes, who commanded the troops quartered in the neighbourhood of mount Libanus, to join Beliſarius. But notwithſtanding this reinforcement the Romans, in the battle which enſued, were utterly defeated, and great numbers of them taken priſoners, and among the reſt Curtzes, to whoſe raſh and imprudent conduct the defeat was chiefly owing. After this victory, the Perſians, finding the fort abandoned by the Romans, levelled it with the ground [h]. War being thus declared, Juſtinian appointed Beliſarius, general of the eaſt, ordering him to make an inroad into Perſia. Perozes, the Perſian general, met him at the head of a very numerous and powerful army in the neighbourhood of Daras; whereupon a battle enſuing, the Perſians were defeated, with the loſs of five thouſand men. As the Perſians fled in great confuſion, the Romans would, in all likelihood, have cut moſt of them in pieces, had not Beliſarius, apprehending they might rally, and return to the charge, ſounded a retreat [i]. The like ſucceſs attended the Roman armies in Armenia, where Mermeroes, who commanded another army, conſiſting of Perſarmenians, Sunites and Hunns, was ſurpriſed and defeated by Dorotheus, the Roman governor of Armenia, and Sittas, general of the forces quartered in that province. Mermeroes, being put to flight, the Romans made themſelves maſters of ſeveral ſtrong holds in Perſarmenia, and among the reſt of Pharangium, which commanded the royal mines, and was betrayed to them by one Simeon. About this time, Narſes and Aratius, two brothers, who, in the latter end of Juſtin's reign, had commanded the Perſian army in Armenia and gained ſome advantages over Beliſarius and Sittas, as we have related above, revolting from the Perſians, came over to the Romans, who were now maſters of the greateſt part of Perſarmenia, their native country. Narſes, the emperor's quæſtor in thoſe parts, who was likewiſe a Parſarmenian, received them with extraordinary marks of kindneſs and eſteem, making them rich preſents

The Romans defeated.

And the Perſians in their turn by Beliſarius.

And by Dorotheus in Perſarmenia.

Narſes and Aratius revolt to the Romans.

[h] Procop. bell. Perſ. c. 13. [i] Idem, c. 15.

presents in the emperor's name, which encouraged their younger brother, by name Isaac, to follow their example, after having held a private correspondence with the Romans, till he found an opportunity of delivering up to them a strong-hold in the territory of Theodosiopolis, named Bolus [k]. Justinian, notwithstanding the advantages gained by his troops in Mesopotamia and Armenia, dispatched embassadors to Cabades, with proposals for an accommodation; but the treaty being soon broken off, the Persians, early in the spring of 530, invaded the Roman territories under the command of Azarethes, who was joined by an incredible number of Saracens, commanded by Alamundarus their king, who, as he was a person of great experience in war, and well acquainted with the country, advised the Persians to break into the Roman territories, not by the way of Mesopotamia and Osrhoene, as they usually did, but to march directly into Syria, which country they might lay waste, and plunder Antioch itself, before the army in Mesopotamia could receive the least intelligence of their motions. The Persian generals approving the scheme, the army began to march; but Belisarius, apprised of their design, flew with a strong detachment to the frontiers of Syria, where the Persians finding him, to their great surprize, ready to dispute their passage, they resolved to proceed no farther, but rather to retire, thinking it dangerous to hazard a battle. On the other hand, Belisarius, judging it imprudent to provoke a flying enemy, far superior to him in numbers, was for suffering them to retire unmolested. But his men upbraiding him with cowardice, he led them on against the enemy, by whom, after a most obstinate dispute, they were put to the rout, Belisarius, with a small body of horse, who were ashamed to forsake him, keeping the field, and by that means preventing the enemy from pursuing the fugitives. The next day the Persians, who had lost in the engagement the flower of their army, not thinking it advisable to venture a second battle, retired in good order, the Romans, who were greatly disheartened by their defeat, not daring to attack them [l]. The following year 531, Justinian being desirous of concluding a peace with the Persians, that he might be at leisure to make war upon the Vandals, and reunite to the empire the many rich provinces they had seized, dispatched Hermogenes to the king of Persia, with very reasonable proposals. But Cabades, instead of hearkening to them, sent early in the spring a fresh army into Mesopotamia under the command of Chanaranges, Aſpendes, and Mermeroes, who, after having ravaged the country, putting all to fire and ſword, ſat down before Martyropolis, a city about thirty miles north of Amida on the river Nimphius, which parted the Perſian and Roman dominions. The place was no-ways in a condition to maintain a ſiege, being deſtitute both of ſoldiers and proviſions. The emperor had recalled Beliſarius to adviſe with him about a war with the Vandals, on which he was chiefly bent; and Sittas, who had ſucceeded him in the command of the troops in the eaſt, had not ſufficient ſtrength to attempt the relief of the place. While affairs ſtood thus, the emperor was informed, that a numerous army of Maſſagetes was marching into Perſia, with a deſign to invade from thence the Roman dominions. This intelligence Juſtinian turned to his great advantage, by perſuading the Perſian deſerter, who brought it, to ſpread a report in the army before Martyropolis, that the Maſſagetes were in the Roman pay, and their true deſign was to fall upon the Perſians, and raiſe the ſiege. This report, with the news that was ſoon after brought of the death of Cabades, inclined the Perſian generals to hearken to the overtures that were made them by Sittas and Hermogenes, with whom they firſt concluded a truce, retiring from before Martyropolis, and ſoon after a peace upon the following terms: 1. That the Roman emperor ſhould pay to Coſrhoes, who had ſucceeded his father Cabades, a thouſand pounds weight of gold. 2. That both princes ſhould reſtore the places they had taken during the war. 3. That the commander of the Roman forces in Meſopotamia ſhould no longer reſide at Daras, but at Conſtantina, as he had formerly done. 4. That the Iberians, who had ſided with the Romans, ſhould be at liberty to return to their own country, or ſtay at Conſtantinople [m]. Upon theſe terms the Romans and Perſians concluded an eternal peace, as it was ſtyled, in 532, the ſixth year of Juſtinian's reign, which, as it was without conſuls, as the preceding year had been, is thus marked in the faſti; The ſecond year after the conſulſhip of Lampadius and Oreſtes. About this time happened at Conſtantinople the greateſt tumult we find mentioned in hiſtory. It began amongſt the different factions in the circus, but ended in an open rebellion, the multitude, highly diſſatisfied with the conduct of John

The Persians attempting to break into Syria, are prevented by Belisarius.

The Romans engaging against the opinion of Belisarius, are defeated.

[k] Idem, c. 15, 16. [l] Idem, c. 18.

The Perſians beſiege Martyropolis.

A perpetual peace concluded between the Romans and Perſians.

A great tumult at Conſtantinople.

[m] Evagr. l. iii. c, 38. Agath l iv. c 13. Niceph l. xvii. c. 10. Theoph. ad ann. Juſt 5, 6. Cedren. p. 366. Hiſt. miſcell. l. xvi. Procop. bell. Perſ, ibid.

John the præfectus prætorio, and of Trebonianus, then quæſtor, forcing Hypatius, nephew to the emperor Anaſtaſius, to accept the empire, and proclaiming him with great ſolemnity in the forum. As the two above-mentioned miniſters were greatly abhorred by the people, on account of their avarice, the emperor immediately diſcharged them, hoping by that means to appeaſe the tumult; but the populace growing more outrageous, and moſt of the ſenators joining the rebellious multitude, the emperor, alarmed and diſheartened, would have abandoned the city, and made his eſcape by ſea, had not the empreſs Theodora, with a manly courage, perſuaded him to part with his life, rather than with the empire, by ſeaſonably putting him in mind of the old ſaying, How glorious a ſepulchre is a kingdom! Juſtinian, thus encouraged, reſolved to continue in the palace, and, with the aſſiſtance of the few ſenators who had not yet abandoned him, defend it to the laſt. In the mean time the rebels, having attempted in vain to force the gates, carried Hypatius in triumph to the circus; where while he was beholding the ſports from the imperial throne, among the ſhouts and acclamations of the people, Beliſarius, who had been recalled from Perſia, entering the city with a conſiderable body of troops under his command, and appriſed of the uſurpation of Hypatius, marched ſtrait to the circus, fell ſword in hand upon the diſarmed multitude; and being ſeaſonably joined by Mundus, governor of Illyricum, at the head of a band of Heruli, cut above thirty thouſand of them in pieces, took Hypatius the uſurper, and Pompeius, another of the nephews of Anaſtaſius, priſoners, and carried them to the emperor, by whoſe orders they were both beheaded, and their bodies caſt into the ſea. Their eſtates were confiſcated, and likewiſe the eſtates of ſuch ſenators as had joined them; but the emperor cauſed great part of their lands and effects to be afterwards reſtored, together with their honours and dignities, to their children [m]. Marcellinus ſuppoſes that this tumult was raiſed by Hypatius, Pompeius, and Probus, all three nephews to the emperor Anaſtaſius, each of them ſetting up for himſelf; by which means the city was rent into factions, an incredible number of citizens was murdered, and many ſtately buildings laid in aſhes [n]. The tumult being thus appeaſed, and a peace concluded with the king of Perſia, the emperor applied his thoughts wholly to the war in Africa, which he had been long bent upon. But of the wars that were by the renowned Beliſarius

The manly courage of the empreſs Theodora.

The tumult quelled with the death of 30,000 perſons.

[m] Procop. bell Perſ. l i. p. 265. [n] Marc. chron.

liſarius carried on with amazing ſucceſs in the reign of Juſtinian, firſt with the Vandals in Africa, and afterwards with the Goths in Italy, we ſhall ſpeak at length hereafter. Theſe two wars laſted from 533, to 541, a year remarkable for the triumphant return of Beliſarius to Conſtantinople, and no leſs on account of its being the laſt that is marked by conſuls, time being thenceforth computed, not by conſulſhips, tho' conſuls were ſtill created for ſome time, but by the years of the emperor's reign. During the war with the Goths in Italy, the Hunns, probably ſtirred up by them, paſſed the Danube, and entreing Illyricum, laid waſte the whole country, took above thirty-two caſtles, deſtroyed Caſſandria, and returned home unmoleſted, carrying with them an immenſe booty, and an hundred and twenty thouſand captives. At the ſame time the Armenians, ſhaking off the Roman yoke, gained ſome advantages over the emperor's forces in that province; which, with a groundleſs report ſpread abroad, that the emperor, grown jealous of Beliſarius, would no longer truſt him with the command of his armies, encouraged Coſrhoes to invade the Roman dominions with a very powerful army, in defiance of the treaty ſolemnly concluded a few years before. Buzes, who commanded in the eaſt, inſtead of aſſembling his forces, and providing for the defence of the provinces, diſappeared all on a ſudden, and retired, no one knew whither, leaving the enemy at full liberty to plunder the country at their pleaſure. As Coſrhoes met with no oppoſition, he bent his march to Syria; and having taken and plundered Beræa, Hierapolis, and ſeveral other cities, he laid ſiege to Antioch itſelf, which he ſoon maſtered, and gave up to be plundered by his ſoldiers, who, without diſtinction of ſex or age, put all they met to the ſword. The king himſelf ſeized on all the gold and ſilver veſſels belonging to the great church; cauſed all the valuable ſtatues, pictures, and other pieces of art, to be taken down, and conveyed into Perſia: and having thus ſtripped the proud metropolis of the eaſt of all its wealth and ornaments, he ordered his men to ſet fire to it, and lay it in aſhes; which was done accordingly, none of the buildings, even without the walls, being ſpared by the outrageous and inſulting enemy. Thus periſhed the moſt wealthy, beautiful and populous city of the eaſt. Such of the inhabitants as eſcaped the common ſlaughter, and afterwards fell into the enemy's hands, were carried into captivity, and ſold in Perſia to the higheſt bidder [c]. Juſtinian, upon the firſt

The Hunns commit great ravages in Illyricum.

Coſrhoes invades the Roman dominions.

Antioch beſieged, taken, and laid in aſhes.

[c] Procop. bell. Perſ. l. ii. c. 12. Evagr. Agath. ibid.

firſt news of the Perſians entering the Roman territories, had diſpatched embaſſadors to Coſrhoes, to put him in mind of the articles of the treaty concluded a few years before. The king alledged ſeveral frivolous pretences for the hoſtilities he had committed, in order to lay the whole blame on Juſtinian; but after he had waſted Syria, and enriched himſelf and his army with the ſpoils of that province, and its wealthy metropolis, he began to hearken to an accomodation; and accordingly a peace was concluded on the following terms: 1. That the Romans ſhould, within two months, pay to the Perſian king five thouſand pounds weight of gold, and an annual penſion of five hundred. 2. That the Perſians ſhould relinquiſh all claim to Daras, and maintain a body of troops to guard the Caſpian gates, and prevent the barbarians from breaking into the empire. 3. That, upon the payment of the above-mentioned ſum Coſrhoes ſhould immediately withdraw his troops out of the Roman territories. The treaty being ſigned, and the ſtipulated ſum paid, Coſrhoes began to march back; but in his retreat plundered, as if the war was ſtill continued, the cities of Apamea and Chalcis; and croſſing the Euphrates, laid waſte Meſopotamia, carrying with him from thence an immenſe booty, and an incredible number of captives. Hereupon Juſtinian, now well appriſed, that with Coſrhoes no treaties were binding, reſolved to purſue the war with the utmoſt vigour, and with that deſign ſent for Beliſarius, then employed againſt the Goths in Italy, and, upon his arrival at Conſtantinople, appointed him general againſt the Perſians. While that brave commander was making the neceſſary preparations to take the field early in the ſpring of the enſuing year 542, the Lazians, no longer able to brook the arbitrary and tyrannical conduct of the commander of the Roman troops in that country, revolted to the Perſians, and delivered up to them all their caſtles and ſtrong-holds. Lazica, formerly part of Colchis, lay between the Euxine and Caſpian ſeas, and was governed by its own kings, who were under the protection of the Roman emperor, and received at his hands the enſigns of royalty. Their preſent king's name was Gobazes, who had ſerved the Romans with great fidelity, and continued attached to their intereſt, till Joannes Tzibus, commander of the Roman troops quartered in his dominions to awe the neighbouring Iberians, by erecting a fort, as a curb upon the Lazians, and exacting exorbitant contributions for the payment

A peace concluded with the king of Perſia.

Who nevertheleſs ravages Meſopotamia.

The Lazians revolt to the Perſians.

[p] Procop. l. ij. c. 2.

ment of his ſoldiers, forced, in a manner, both the prince and his ſubjects, tho' otherwiſe well affected to the empire, to have recourſe to the king of Perſia, who, upon the firſt invitation, entered their country, and being aſſiſted by the natives, drove out the Romans, and placed every-where Perſian garriſons in their room [q]. In the mean time Beliſarius, not appriſed of the revolt of the Lazians, entered Perſia at the head of a powerful army; and having made himſelf maſter of a ſtrong-hold called Siſibranum, laid waſte Aſſyria; but was obliged, by the violent heats, and the diſtempers that began to rage in his army, to return, before the end of the ſummer, into the Roman dominions. Coſrhoes was no ſooner informed of the invaſion of Beliſarius, than quitting Lazica, he haſtened into Aſſyria; but being informed on his march, that the Romans were retired, he put his army into winter quarters, and withdrew to Cteſiphon [r]. The ſpring following, he invaded anew the Roman territories, bending his march through Comagena, with a deſign to enter Paleſtine, and enrich himſelf with the ſpoils of that fertile and wealthy province. Beliſarius, who was returned to Conſtantinople, upon the firſt news of this invaſion, flew to Europus on the Euphrates, and there drew together what forces he could ſome time after Coſrhoes had paſſed that river; which ſo alarmed the Perſian king, dreading an enemy at his back, that he thought it adviſeable to drop his intended expedition into Paleſtine, and return to his own dominions, before Beliſarius was in a condition to cut off his retreat. The emperor being ſoon after obliged to recall Beliſarius, and ſend him into Italy, where the Goths had gained great advantages over the Romans as we ſhall relate hereafter, Coſrhoes reſolved once more to invade the Roman territories, notwithſtanding the dreadful plague that raged in Perſia, being encouraged thereunto by the magi, and by a ſhameful overthrow of thirty thouſand Romans, who, attempting to break into Perſarmenia, had been defeated by four thouſand Perſians. Upon this ſucceſs he invaded Meſopotamia, and ſat down before Edeſſa; but not being able to maſter the place, after ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts, he agreed to raiſe the ſiege, and ſoon after concluded a truce for five years, upon the emperor's paying him two thouſand pounds weight of gold, and ſending him a celebrated phyſician, by name Tribunus, who had formerly cured him of a dangerous diſtemper *. Not long after the concluſion of the truce, Coſrhoes, Beliſarius enters Perſia, and ravages Aſſyria.

Coſrhoes attempts to invade Paleſtine.

But, dreading Beliſarius, drops that enterprize.

[q] Idem. ibid. c. 15, 29. [r] Idem ibid. * Procop. l. ii. c. 12. Evagr. l. iv. c. 27.

hoes, obſerving the Lazians no-ways pleaſed with their late change, and apprehending they would ſoon revolt from him to the Romans, reſolved to prevent a ſecond revolution, by cauſing Gabazes their king to be murdered, and tranſplanting the natives into Perſia, and peopling the country, which opened him a paſſage into the Euxine ſea, with Perſians, and other nations well affected to his intereſt. But his deſign being diſcovered to Gubazes, by thoſe who were to put it in execution, that prince had recourſe, in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner imaginable, to Juſtinian, who, forgetting his paſt conduct, received him anew under his protection, and, without loſs of time, diſpatched eight thouſand men, under the command of Dagiſtæus, to his aſſiſtance, who being joined by a numerous body of Lazians, laid ſiege to Petra, one of the ſtrongeſt places of Lazica, defended by a Perſian garriſon, and ſtored with all manner of proviſions. Coſrhoes, alarmed at this ſudden revolution, ſent a powerful army, under the conduct of Mermeroes, to the relief of the place. At their approach, Dagiſtæus, who was a young unexperienced officer, abandoning his camp and baggage, fled in the utmoſt conſternation towards the Phaſis. Upon his retreat, Mermeroes advanced to Petra, the garriſon of which place, conſiſting at firſt of fifteen hundred men, was now reduced to three hundred and fifty, of whom an hundred and fifty were quite diſabled, and unfit for ſevice. Mermeroes repaired with great expedition the breaches in the walls, garriſoned the place with three thouſand men, and returned with the reſt of his army into Perſarmenia, not thinking it ſafe to continue in Lazica, whither, he was informed, freſh forces were marching, under the conduct of Recithangus, by birth a Thracian, who had ſerved in the army from his childhood, and was deemed one of the beſt commanders of his age. At his departure he left a body of five thouſand men encamped on the banks of the Phaſis, to watch the motions of the Romans and Lazians. Of theſe Gubazes and Dagiſtæus ſurpriſed one thouſand, as they were ſtraggling about in queſt of booty; and having cut them all off to a man, fell unexpectedly in the dead of the night upon the main body, put moſt of them to the ſword, and obliged the reſt to ſave themſelves by a precipitous flight. The Romans made themſelves maſters of their camp, in which, beſides their enſigns and baggage, they found a great quantity of arms, and a conſiderable number of mules and horſes. They purſued the fugitives to the confines of Iberia, intercepted ſeveral other parties that were conveying proviſions into Petra; and having

The Lazians revolt to the Romans.

The Romans obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Petra.

The Perſians put to flight.

having blocked up all the avenues leading to the place, returned with their booty and captives. Cosrhoes was no sooner informed of this overthrow, than he dispatched Corianes, with an army of Alans as well as Persians, into Lazica. But Corianes was attended with no better success than the other Persian generals; for being met on the banks of the Hippus in Colchis by Gubazes and Dagistæus, his army was, after a most obstinate dispute, utterly defeated, and he himself slain[s]. These advantages were chiefly owing to the courage and conduct of Gabazes, at whose request Dagistæus, who had shamefully abandoned the siege of Petra, as we have related above, was recalled, and Bessas, an officer of great experience appointed to command in his room. He immediately invested Petra, and in the end reduced that important place, tho' defended by the Persian garrison with such obstinacy, as savoured of madness and despair. Bessas ordered Petra to be dismantled; and leaving only twelve thousand men in Lazica, viz. three thousand in Archæopolis the metropolis, and nine thousand encamped on the banks of the Phasis, under the command of Odonachus, he retired with the rest into Armenia, his own government. Upon his retreat, Mermeroes entered Lazica; and having first obliged Odonachus to withdraw into the Roman territories, he laid siege to Archæopolis, which however he was forced to raise, having, in several assaults, being repulsed with great loss by the garrison. Notwithstanding these hostilities, the Persian embassadors, who had been sent to Constantinople the preceding year, continued still there, and soon after the reduction of Petra, concluded a five years truce with the emperor upon his paying to the Persian king an immense sum, which raised great complaints among the people, who were rather for pursuing the war, than submitting to pay a tribute, as they styled it, to the king of Persia[t]. But Justinian was glad to come to an agreement with the Persians upon any terms, that he might not be diverted from pursuing the advantages he had gained over the Goths in Italy, of which we shall speak in a more proper place. The truce was no sooner expired, than the Persians, invading anew Lazica, took by stratagem the strong castle of Telepsis; and then falling upon the Roman army, which lay encamped at a small distance, put them to flight at the first onset. Gubazes,

The Persians utterly defeated.

Petra taken by the Romans.

A truce between the Romans and Persians.

[s] Idem, l. iv. c. 25, 26. Procop. l. ii c. 10. [t] Idem, l. ii. c. 27, 28, 29.

zes, king of Lazica, provoked at the cowardice of the Roman generals, acquainted the emperor with their shameful behaviour, which incensed them to such a degree, that they agreed to dispatch him: and acordingly, having accused him at court of treachery, as if he privately corresponded with the Persians, by wresting the instructions sent them by the emperor, they murdered him, giving out, that he designed to betray them, and deliver all the Romans into the hands of the Persians. The Lazicans, highly incensed against the authors of his death, would have revolted from the Romans, and joined the Persians, had not Justinian appeased them, by causing all those, who were any-ways accessory to the murder, to be publicly executed, and the deceased king's brother to be immediately proclaimed in his room. In the mean time the Persians, to the number of sixty thousand men advanced, under the command of Nachoragan, into Lazica, and laid siege to Phasis, but Justin, who commanded the Roman troops, falling upon him unexpectedly, cut twelve thousand of his men in pieces, and obliged the rest, with their general, to save themselves within the Persian dominions. This defeat so disheartened Cosrhoes, that he immediately dispatched embassadors to Constantinople to sue for a peace; which was accordingly concluded upon terms equally honourable to both princes [u]. The public rejoicings for the peace with Persia, after such a long and destructive war were disturbed by a dreadful earthquake, which continued for several days, and overturned a great many stately edifices, and several churches, in which perished an incredible number of people, who had crowded to them during the public confusion. About the same time the plague, which had raged a few years before with great fury all over the empire, broke out anew at Constantinople, and swept off many thousands of people. The same year 558, the Hunns, passing the Danube in the depth of winter, marched in two bodies directly for Constantinople, and laying waste the countries through which they passed, came, without meeting with the least opposition, within an hundred and fifty furlongs of the city. But Belisarius, tho' now weakened by old age to such a degree, that he was scarce able to hold a shield, or brandish a sword, marching out against them with a handful of men, put them to flight, and delivered both the emperor and the city from the dangers that threatened them [w]. However,

The king of Lazica barbarously murdered by the Romans.

The Persians defeated.

A peace concluded.

The Hunns break into Thrace.

Are put to flight by Belisarius.

[u] Idem, ibid. & bell. Goth. l. iv. c. 8, 9. Agath. l. iii. p. 81—90. [w] Agath. l. v. p. 155.

ever the emperor, to prevent them from breaking anew into the Roman dominions, agreed to pay them an annual penſion, upon their promiſing to defend the empire againſt all other barbarians, and to ſerve, when required in the Roman armies [x]. This was the laſt exploit performed by Beliſarius, who upon his return to Conſtantinople, was diſgraced, ſtripped of all his employments, and confined to his houſe. Agathias aſcribes his diſgrace to the malice of his enemies at court, who, envying him the great reputation he had deſervedly acquired, and the favour he was in with the people, perſuaded the emperor, whoſe jealouſy encreaſed with his years, that Beliſarius aſpired at the ſovereignty; that the people, who preferred him to the moſt renowned heroes of antiquity, were all to a man ready to ſecond him in his ambitious views; that the ſoldiery were ſtill more attached to him than the people, &c. Upon theſe malicious and groundleſs inſinuations, the emperor, forgetting the paſt ſervices of the moſt deſerving of all his ſubjects, of one who had been the bulwark of the empire, and the reſtorer of the antient military diſcipline, recalled him, according to Agathias, without ſo much as ſuffering him to purſue his late victory over the Hunns; and upon his arrival at Conſtantinople, which he deſerved to enter in triumph, confined him to his houſe, after having, with the utmoſt ingratitude, deveſted him of all his authority, honours and employments [y]. The more modern writers pretend, that Juſtinian cauſed his eyes to be put out, and reduced him to ſuch poverty, that he was forced to beg from door to door in the ſtreets of Conſtantinople. But the antient authors aſſure us, that the year following, the emperor, fully convinced of his innocence, reſtored him to all his employments, which he enjoyed, without any farther diſgrace, to his death. About this time, three of the emperor's chief officers, viz. Ablavius, Marcellus, and Sergius, conſpired againſt him, upon what provocation we know not; but the plot being diſcovered by ſome perſons, whom Ablavius had attempted to draw into it, the conſpirators were ſeized, before they could put their deſign in execution. Marcellus, after having defended himſelf with great reſolution againſt the officers who were ſent to arreſt him, ſtabbed himſelf with his own ſword. Ablavius and Sergius were publicly executed, and the reſt of the conſpirators

Beliſarius diſgraced.

A conſpiracy againſt Juſtinian.

Juſtinian acts.

[x] Idem. p. 156, 157. [y] Agath. hiſt. Juſtin. c. 9.

conſpirators baniſhed [z]. The emperor eſcaped the conſpiracy; but did not long outlive it, being ſoon after carried off by a natural, but ſudden, death, in the thirty-ninth year of his reign, that is, according to the moſt probable opinion, after he had reigned thirty-eight years, and ſeven months. His public works, the wars which were, in his reign, carried on with ſurpriſing ſucceſs by his two renowned generals Beliſarius and Narſes, and the new form which he gave the Roman juriſprudence, have deſervedly procured him the ſurname of Great. Of his public buildings the reader will find a diſtinct account in Procopius, who aſſures us, that there was ſcarce a city in his dominions, in which he did not erect ſome ſtately edifice, nor a province, wherein he did not build or repair ſome city, fort, or caſtle [a]. In war he recovered, and reunited to the empire, Africa and Italy, after they had been long held, the former by the Vandals, and the latter by the Goths, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of theſe two nations. In peace he ſignalized his reign by many excellent laws, but chiefly by the famous code, called from him the Juſtinian code. In the very beginning of his reign he publiſhed an edict, directed to the ſenate of Conſtantinople, for the compiling of a new code. For this work he choſe the moſt famous and learned men of his age, at the head of whom was the celebrated civilian Tribonianus, who were to collect into one volume all the conſtitutions contained in the Gregorian, Hermogenian, and Theodoſian codes, and join to them ſuch as had been publiſhed by Theodoſius the younger, and the other lawful emperors his ſucceſſors, down to Juſtinian himſelf. Whatever in thoſe laws ſeemed ſuperfluous was to be retrenched, with the prefaces; their ſenſe and meaning was to be rendered more clear, and the names of the princes who publiſhed them, the place, the time and the perſons to whom they were directed, to be prefixed to each conſtitution. In this form and method was the new code compiled in a little more than a year; ſo that it was publiſhed in the beginning of the third year of Juſtinian's reign, with an edict, commanding that code alone to be quoted by pleaders at the bar, and declaring all laws that were not contained in it to be of no force or authority. It was divided into twelve books, and contained the conſtitutions of fifty-four emperors, from Adrian to Juſtinian; whereas the Theodoſian

His code.

[z] Procop hiſt. ſecr 3. 13. [a] Idem, de ædif.

Theodosian code began with Constantine the Great. Justinian, not satisfied with the code alone, undertook soon after a more noble, and far more difficult work, which was to collect, and digest into order, the opinions and answers of all the celebrated civilians, their remarks and comments on the Roman laws, especially on the edictum perpetuum, their different treaties, &c. in all above two thousand volumes. This hard and crabbed task was completed in the space of three years by Tribonianus and sixteen other able civilians, and called by the Latins digesta, because the opinions of the antient civilians were there digested into order, and by the Greeks pandectæ, as containing all the antient jurisprudence.

His pandects. When this great work was near completed, Justinian ordered Tribonianus, Theophilus and Dorodeus to compile, for the

His institutes. benefit of the youth, the institutes, or first principles of the law, which were published about a month before the pandects [b]. As many things were found to be wanting in the code, and Justinian himself had, after the publication of it, enacted several laws, in the eighth year of his reign, that is in 534, he ordered a second code to be made, in which were inserted all the constitutions, about two hundred in number, which he had enacted since the publication of the first, and several others contained in the former code, either corrected or annulled. This second code, styled de repetita prælectione, was published five years after the first, and at the same time a decree, declaring the first to be of no force, and forbidding any constitutions or laws to be quoted in the courts of justice, that were not contained in the new code de repetita prælectione [c]. Thus was the first code, in a manner, abolished, and all authority given to the second, viz. to that which has reached our times, divided into twelve books, and seven hundred and seventy-six articles, containing the constitutions of fifty-four emperors, from Adrian to Justinian. After the publication of the institutes, pandects and code, Justinian enacted several laws, which were joined together in a distinct volume, called the novellæ constitutiones. These were published from time to time by Justinian, not in the Latin, excepting some few, but in the Greek tongue,

His code de repetita prælectione

His novellæ.

[b] Vide Balduin in Justinian p. 497. Ritters, in jure Justin. in præm. c. 1. num. 4. Edmund. Meril. ad 50 decis. Justin.

[c] Balduin. Ritters, ibid.

tongue, and collected into one volume after his death. [d]. Juſtinian is not only commended for his indefatigable care in reforming the Roman juriſprudence, but for his piety, prudence, juſtice, clemency, and every virtue becoming a perſon in his high ſtation. As for the ſecret hiſtory, filled with moſt bitter invectives againſt Juſtinian, and the empreſs Theodora, it is, by the ableſt critics, looked upon as not the work of Procopius, but as a ſcandalous libel fathered upon that writer. It is true, he loaded the people with heavy taxes; but the money thus raiſed was neither hoarded up by him, nor applied to the gratification of any unlawful paſſion, but employed in paying his numerous forces; in carrying on the many wars in which he was engaged; in repairing the public buildings, and embelliſhing with ſtately edifices the cities of the empire. In the latter end of his reign, he ſeemed to countenance the Eutychians, no doubt, at the inſtigation of the empreſs Theodora, who held their doctrine; which has given occaſion to many bitter invactives againſt her memory. Juſtinian may deſervedly be called the laſt Roman emperor; for in his reign the majeſty of the empire ſeemed to revive, but ſoon vaniſhed again, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of the preſent hiſtory.

[d] Cujac. l. viii. obſ. c. ult. Balduin. Juſtin. p. 573. Ritterſ. in prœm. c. 4. num. 9.

CHAP. XXXIII.

The Roman hiſtory, from the death of Juſtinian the Great, to the depoſing of Irene, and the promotion of Nicephorus.

JUSTINIAN dying without iſſue, Juſtin, the ſon of his ſiſter Vigilantia, whom, in his life-time, he had deſigned for his ſucceſſor, was by the ſenate proclaimed emperor, and crowned, with great ſolemnity, by John patriarch of Conſtantinople. As the people were highly diſpleaſed with the deceaſed emperor, for aboliſhing the office of conſul, the only mark they had left of their antient liberty, Juſtin promiſed Juſtin proclaimed emperor.

miſed to reſtore it; and accordingly took upon him that title on the firſt of January of the year 566, diſtributing on that occaſion large ſums amongſt the people, according to the antient cuſtom. During his conſulſhip, the Avari, or Abari, a Scythian nation, ſent embaſſadors to demand the penſion formerly paid them by Juſtinian; but the Maſſagetes, who at this time began to be called Turks, and inhabited the country bordering on the Tanais to the eaſt, preſſing the emperor not to comply with the demands of the Avari, their declared enemies, nor take them under his protection, Juſtin not only refuſed to pay them the uſual penſion, but threatened to make war upon them, if they offered to diſturb the peace of the empire. The courage and reſolution which the emperor exerted on this occaſion, gave ſo great ſatisfaction to the people, that they began to prefer him even to Juſtinian, who, they ſaid, had, with the ſpoils of his own ſubjects, enriched the barbarians, the avowed enemies of the empire. But Juſtin ſoon forfeited, by his cruelty, and inſatiable avarice, the good opinion which the people entertained of him; for the following year, he cauſed Juſtin his kinſman to be ſeized in his houſe, and conveyed to Alexandria, where he was, by his orders, inhumanly murdered, for no other crime but becauſe he was beloved by the people. The empreſs Sophia, niece to the late empreſs Theodora, a woman of a cruel, haughty and ſuſpicious temper, is thought to have put him upon this, and ſeveral other bloody executions [e]. The following year 569, is remarkable for the irruption of the Lombards into Italy, where they founded a new kingdom, which continued for the ſpace of two hundred years, and upwards. But of their wars with Juſtin and his ſucceſſors, till the total reduction of Italy, and of the kings of the Lombards who reigned there from Alboin to Deſiderius, taken priſoner by Charlemagne, we ſhall ſpeak at length hereafter. Italy was anew diſmembered from the empire, and great part of it loſt in the reign of Juſtin; but ſome amends was made for ſo great a loſs by the acquiſition of Perſarmenia, the inhabitants, who were cruelly perſecuted by the Perſians, on account of the chriſtian religion, which they profeſſed, ſhaking off the yoke, and recurring to the protection of the Roman emperor, to whom they ſubmitted, upon certain articles ſworn to by both parties. Coſrhoes, informed of their revolt, diſpatched embaſſadors to Conſtantinople,

He refuſes to pay the uſual penſion to the Avari.

He cauſes Juſtin his kinſman to be murdered.

The Lombards invade Italy.

The Perſarmenians revolt to the Romans.

[e] Evagr. l. ii. c. 14. Phot. c. 113.

nople, to divert the emperor from eſpouſing their cauſe, which, he ſaid, was contrary to the treaties ſubſiſting between the two empires. Juſtin, deſpiſing their menaces, reſolutely anſwered, that the truce was expired, and that he could not deny his protection and aſſiſtance to a brave nation, who, profeſſing the ſame religion with himſelf, were on that ſcore cruelly perſecuted and oppreſſed. Hereupon Coſrhoes, having with incredible expedition raiſed a powerful army, divided it into two bodies, ordering the one to march directly into Syria, under the conduct of Artabanus, while he himſelf with the other invaded Meſopotamia. Juſtin in the mean time, utterly neglecting the neceſſary preparations to oppoſe ſo formidable an enemy, wallowed in his uſual pleaſures, till news was brought him, that the Perſians had already broken into his dominions. He then diſpatched Martianus, captain of his guards, into the eaſt, but without men, money or arms; ſo that he was forced to inrol ſuch vagabonds, thieves and robbers, as offered themſelves to him in his way. With theſe, however, he ſurpriſed and put to flight a ſmall body of Perſians, and elated with that advantage, however inconſiderable, he had the confidence to ſit down before Niſibis, the inhabitants, who ſcorned to ſhut their gates, rallying him from the walls, and asking him, Whether he had been placed there with his men to watch ſheep, or beſiege the town? The emperor nevertheleſs, highly incenſed againſt him for protracting, as he ſaid, the ſiege, deprived him of his command, and ſent one Acacius to ſucceed him; which ſo diſpleaſed the officers, who were well acquainted with the haughty and imperious temper of Acacius, that they abandoned the ſiege, and retired into Syria. In the mean time Artabanus, having paſſed the Euphrates, advanced to Antioch; but not being able to reduce that metropolis, he ſat down before Heraclea, which he took by aſſault, and laid in aſhes. From Heraclea, he marched to Apamea, which ſubmitted upon terms; but was nevertheleſs by his orders pillaged and burnt. After the reduction of Apamea, he joined the king, who had undertaken the ſiege of Daras; which being now carried on with freſh vigour, the garriſon was in the end obliged to ſubmit, after having held out with great reſolution and intrepidity for the ſpace of five months. The loſs of Daras, a place of the utmoſt importance, and the wonderful progreſs of the Lombards in Italy, affected the emperor, now convinced of his imprudent conduct, to ſuch a degree, that he was ſeized with

The Perſians invade the Roman dominions.

The Romans abandon the ſiege of Niſibis.

The Perſians take ſeveral places.

Juſtin ſeized with a kind of madneſs.

a kind of madneſs, which rendering him altogether incapable of managing the public affairs, Tiberius, by birth a Thracian, who had diſcharged, with great reputation, the firſt employments in the ſtate, was, by the advice and intereſt of the empreſs Sophia, with the unanimous conſent of the ſenate, appointed to govern in his room. Tiberius immediately diſpatched Trajan, a perſon highly eſteemed for his wiſdom and addreſs, to Coſrhoes, with a letter from the empreſs Sophia, wherein ſhe acquainted him with the misfortune that had befallen her husband, laid before him the deplorable ſtate of the empire, and conjured him by all that was ſacred, to forbear inſulting an helpleſs woman, or invading a weak and defenceleſs ſtate. She ended her letter by putting him in mind of the humanity formerly ſhewn him by the emperor Juſtinian, who, upon his being ſeized with a dangerous malady, ſent the beſt phyſicians of the empire to attend him. Coſrhoes was ſo ſenſibly affected with this letter, that looking upon it as highly ungenerous to purſue the war, he immediately conſented to a truce for three years [f]. The following year 573, the emperor, who continued ſtill indiſpoſed, by the advice of the empreſs Sophia, raiſed Tiberius to the dignity of Cæſar, reſigning to him the whole management of affairs, and reſerving for himſelf the bare name of emperor. Tiberius's firſt care was to put himſelf in a condition of making head againſt the Perſians, who, he apprehended, would not fail to invade the empire, as ſoon as the truce was expired. With this view he raiſed a very numerous and formidable army; but at the ſame time endeavoured, by means of his embaſſadors, to change the truce into a laſting peace, and to eſtabliſh a good underſtanding between the two empires. Coſrhoes, deaf to all propoſals, would not ſo much as admit the embaſſadors to his preſence, being bent upon recovering Perſarmenia; which accordingly he over-ran upon the expiration of the truce, committing every-where unheard-of cruelties, and was already marching to Cappadocia, with a deſign to beſiege Cæſarea, the metropolis of that province; but Juſtinian, the brother of Juſtin, who had been baſely murdered at Alexandria, as we have related above, meeting him at the head of a numerous army, obliged him to venture an engagement, in which great numbers of his troops were cut in pieces, and the reſt forced to ſave themſelves by a precipitous Tiberius governs in his room.

The generoſity of Coſrhoes.

Tiberius declared Cæſar.

Coſrhoes breaks into the Roman dominions.

Is defeated, and dies of grief.

[f] Evagr. l. v. c. 7—13. Cedren. l. iii. c. 18. Menand c. 16

precipitous and diſorderly flight. Coſrhoes was ſo grieved for this overthrow, that he fell ſick, and died, after a long and glorious reign of forty-eight years. Juſtinian in the mean time, entering Perſia with his victorious army, continued there, putting all to fire and ſword, till the latter end of June, when he returned in triumph to the Roman territories [g]. The following year, the emperor Juſtin died after having reigned ſixteen years, nine months, and ſome days. He is painted by all the writers of that age as a voluptuous prince, ſo addicted to his pleaſures, as utterly to neglect public affairs; whence the ſtate is ſaid to have ſuffered no leſs from his inactivity and indolence, than from the tyranny and cruelty of any of his predeceſſors [h]. Upon his death, Tiberius, who had for ſome years governed the empire with an abſolute ſway, was by the ſenate and people declared emperor. The new prince immediately conferred the title of Auguſta upon Anaſtatia, whom he owned for his wife, to the extreme diſappointment of Sophia, who, having greatly contributed to his preferment, upon a preſumption that he would marry her, grew his implacable enemy, when ſhe found him married to another, and attempted to raiſe Juſtinian to the empire. But the plot being ſeaſonably diſcovered, the emperor cauſed all her treaſures to be ſeized, which was the only puniſhment inflicted upon her; and depriving Juſtinian of the command of the army in the eaſt, ſent Mauritius to ſucceed him. Mauritius was deſcended from an antient Roman family; but born in Arebiſſus, a city of Cappadocia, had ſerved in the army from his infancy, and was no leſs eſteemed for his exemplary piety, and attachment to the orthodox faith, than for his courage and experience in war. Upon his arrival in the eaſt, he found Hormiſda, who had ſucceeded Coſrhoes in the kingdom of Perſia, obſtinately bent upon war, and deaf to the advantageous propoſals offered him by the emperor. Hereupon, having drawn together his forces, he marched with incredible expedition to the confines of Perſia, and falling unexpectedly upon the Perſian army, commanded by the king in perſon, gave them a total overthrow, took their camp, with all the royal plate and treaſure, which he immediately ſent to Conſtantinople, and made an incredible number of priſoners, who were likewiſe ſent to the emperor, by whoſe orders they were richly cloa-

Juſtin dies.

Tiberius declared emperor.

The empreſs Sophia, conſpires againſt him.

The Perſians defeated by Mauritius.

[g] Evag. l. v. c. 17. Agath. l. iv. c. 13.

[h] Paul. Diacon. de geſt. Langob. l. iii. c. 11.

thed, and ſuffered to return to Perſia, Tiberius hoping, by that generous behaviour, to incline the young prince to an accommodation. But Hormiſda, determined to purſue the war at all events, diſpatched his two generals, Tamochoſroes and Aduaſmanes, to the borders, at the head of the moſt numerous army that had been ſeen for many years in Perſia. Mauritius, however, according to the ſuccinct and confuſed account which Evagrius gives us of this war, gained a complete victory over them, diſperſed their numerous forces, took ſeveral caſtles, ſtrong-holds, and towns, enriched his army with an immenſe booty, and made ſuch numbers of captives, as were ſufficient to people the iſlands and countries that had been long uninhabited, and to form armies againſt other nations at enmity with the empire [i]. Upon his return to court, he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations imaginable of eſteem and affection by Tiberius, who ſoon after gave him in marriage his daughter Conſtantina, and raiſed him to the dignity of Cæſar; which was declaring him his ſucceſſor [k]. In the mean time, Hormiſda, quite diſheartened after the great loſſes he had ſuſtained, ſent embaſſadors to ſue for peace, which was in the end concluded; but not long obſerved by that faithleſs prince, as we ſhall ſee anon. The year following the Avari or Abari, dwelling on the banks of the Danube, made a ſudden irruption into Pannonia, under the conduct of their chagan, or king, and made themſelves maſters of Sirmium. The chagan, elated with this ſucceſs, diſpatched embaſſadors to Conſtantinople to demand the annual penſion, which the emperor had neglected to pay the year before, and beſides an immenſe ſum by way of intereſt. But Tiberius, highly provoked at the arrogance of the embaſſadors, inſtead of complying with their exorbitant demands, ordered his troops to take the field. The Avari, not caring to venture an engagement, retired beyond the Danube, watching an opportunity of invading anew the Roman territories [l]. The year following, that is, according to the moſt probable opinion, in 586, died the emperor Tiberius, after having reigned four years alone, and three years and eleven months with Juſtin. All the antients ſpeak of him as a prince of extraordinary abilities, and one who proved a true father to his people. Some time before his death, he had cauſed Mauritius to be declared emperor, in the preſence

He gains a ſecond victory, takes ſeveral places, &c.

He marries the emperor's daughter, and is declared Cæſar.

The Avari break into the empire.

Tiberius dies.

Mauritius ſucceeds him.

[i] Evag. l. v. c. 9. [k] Niceph. l. xviii. c. 6. Evag. ibid.
[l] Menand. c. 23 Theophyl. Simocat. c. 3.

ſence of John the patriarch of Conſtantinople, of all the nobility and the chief citizens, as a perſon the beſt qualified in the whole empire for that high ſtation. Hormiſda, king of Perſia, no ſooner heard of the death of Tiberius, than he broke into the empire at the head of a numerous and powerful army, pretending that the peace he had lately concluded with Tiberius was no longer binding. Againſt him the emperor diſpatched one John a Thracian, who at firſt gained ſome ſmall advantages over the enemy; but being ſoon after defeated, he was recalled, and Philippicus, who had married the emperor's ſiſter, ſent in his room. The new general was attended with better ſucceſs; for having engaged the Perſians, who, encouraged by the predictions of their magi, and confiding in their numbers, advanced to the battle as to a certain triumph, he obliged them to retire with great loſs to their camp. The next morning the Perſians renewed the fight, but were again defeated with a far greater loſs than they had ſuſtained the day before. After this victory, Philippicus detached Heraclius, his lieutenant, with part of his army, ordering them to enter and lay waſte the enemy's country. The Perſian general, named from his office Cardariga, being informed by ſome deſerters that the Roman army was divided, rallied his forces; and falling in the dead of the night upon Philippicus, put him to flight, and took a great number of priſoners. Heraclius, in the mean time, having paſſed the Tigris, laid waſte the country far and wide, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſtrong-holds, and then returned, loaded with booty, to Philippicus, who was drawing all his forces together with a deſign to retrieve the reputation of the Roman arms with ſome remarkable exploit. But in the mean time the emperor, being informed of his late miſconduct, ordered him to reſign the command of the army to Priſcus, and return to Conſtantinople. Priſcus was an officer of great courage and experience; but as he was univerſally abhorred by the ſoldiery, on account of his ſeverity and imperious temper, a few days after his arrival, they roſe up in a general mutiny againſt him, plundered his tent, and would have cut him in pieces, had he not ſaved himſelf by a timely flight, and taken refuge in the neighbouring city of Edeſſa. Upon his retreat the mutineers obliged Germanus, governor of Phœnicia, to take upon him the command of the army, which he had not held long, before the emperor, informed of the mutiny, ſent Philippicus again into the eaſt to bring them back to their

The Perſians defeated by Philippicus.

Who is defeated by them in his turn.

A general mutiny in the Roman army.

their duty. Germanus was for reſigning the command to him; but the mutinous ſoldiery openly declaring they would obey no other leader, he was forced, both againſt his own will and the emperor's, whom he was unwilling to diſoblige, to continue in the poſt to which they had raiſed him. In the mean time, the Perſians, taking advantage of theſe diſturbances, broke into the empire, deſtroying every thing with fire and ſword. But Germanus, marching againſt them, engaged them, according to Evagrius, with ſuch ſucceſs, that ſcarce one was left alive to carry the news of their defeat into Perſia [m]. Not long after this victory, the mutiny was at length appeaſed, after it had laſted a year and upwards, by Gregory, biſhop of Antioch, a perſon greatly beloved and revered by the ſoldiery for the ſanctity of his life, and the kindneſs he had on ſeveral occaſions ſhewed them. Moved by his tears and eloquence, they ſubmitted in the end to Philippicus, who, after having publiſhed a general act of oblivion, marched without loſs of time againſt the Perſians, whom he defeated in a pitched battle, in which the general himſelf, by name Marazas, and almoſt the whole army, were cut in pieces, only two thouſand two hundred of ſo great a multitude having eſcaped the general ſlaughter [n]. The ſame year, the city of Antioch was once more almoſt utterly deſtroyed by a dreadful earthquake, in which above thirty thouſand perſons were either buried under the ruins, or ſwallowed up by the earth [o]. The following year 588, Sittas, one of the citizens of Martyropolis, having betrayed that important place to the Perſians, Philippicus early in the ſpring laid ſiege to it; but not being able to reduce it, he was recalled, and Commentiolus appointed to command in his room, who falling upon the Perſians ſoon after his arrival, gained a complete victory over them, made himſelf maſter of a caſtle called Ochas, built on an high rock over-againſt Martyropolis, and from thence ſo annoyed the garriſon with his warlike engines, that they were in the end obliged to ſubmit, and deliver up the place. Hormiſda, aſcribing the bad ſucceſs of his arms to the cowardice of his general, by name Baranes, deprived him of his command, ſending him at the ſame time the habit of a woman, as more becoming him than the military attire. Barames, to revenge this affront, conſpired

The Perſians defeated by Germanus.

The mutiny appeaſed by Gregory, biſhop of Antioch.

The Perſians defeated by Commentiolus.

[m] Evagr. ibid. Theophylact c. 8, 9. [n] Evagr. ibid. Theophylact. c. 10, 15. [o] Evagr. l. iii. c. 10.

conſpired againſt Hormiſda, who was univerſally hated on account of his cruelty; and having eaſily gained over the greateſt part of the army, and amongſt the reſt Ferrochanes, who had been ſent to command in his room, he fell upon the king with the other conſpirators, and pulling him down from his throne, tore the diadem from off his head, and conveyed him under a ſtrong guard to the public priſon. The next day the nobility, whom he had provoked with his cruelties, ordered his wife, and one of his ſons, to be ſawed aſunder in his preſence; and then putting out his eyes, they threw him into a dungeon, where he was treated with great humanity by his eldeſt ſon Coſrhoes, whom the rebels had raiſed to the throne. But the depoſed king, not able to bear ſo great a change, inſtead of acknowledging the kindneſs ſhewn him by his ſon, who dared not releaſe him, trampled under foot whatever was ſent him; which provoked Coſrhoes to ſuch a degree, that in the tranſport of his paſſion he cauſed him to be beaten to death. Though the Perſians abhorred Hormiſda, yet the averſion they conceived againſt Coſrhoes, on account of this unnatural murder, was ſo great, that the nobility, people, and ſoldiery, conſpiring againſt him, drove him from the throne, and obliged him to take refuge in the Roman dominions. Mauritius, touched with compaſſion, and reflecting on the uncertainty of all human grandeur, received him at Conſtantinople with all poſſible demonſtrations of kindneſs, entertained him in a manner ſuitable to his condition, and having preſented him with immenſe ſums, ſent him back at the head of a powerful army, which, entering Perſia, defeated the rebels in a pitched battle, obliged Barames, their ringleader, to take refuge among the neighbouring barbarians, and, reſtoring the baniſhed prince to the throne of his anceſtors, returned in triumph to the Roman territories [p]. Upon the reſtoration of Coſrhoes, a profound peace enſued in the eaſt, ſo that the emperor was at leiſure to purſue the war againſt the Avari, who, paſſing the Danube, had entered Thrace, and made themſelves maſters of ſeveral ſtrong-holds in that province. Mauritius marched againſt them in perſon at the head of the army lately returned from the eaſt; but after ſeveral battles fought with dubious ſucceſs, he was in the end obliged to purchaſe a peace, which, however, the king of the Avari did not long obſerve: for entering into an alliance with the Gepidæ, Hormiſda, king of Perſia depoſed, and Coſrhoes, his ſon, raiſed to the throne.

Coſrhoes, driven out, reſtored by Mauritius.

The Avari invade the empire.

[p] Niceph. l. ii. c. 4. Evagr. ibid.

the Sclavi, and other neighbouring barbarians, he returned the following year, bragging that he would utterly abolish the Roman name, and establish a new empire over all people and nations. After he had laid waste Thrace, he approached Constantinople with his numerous army; which struck such terror into the inhabitants, that they were for quitting Europe, and retiring with their families and effects to Chalcedon, and other places in Asia. But the emperor, unmoved at the impending storm, prevailed upon them not to abandon their native country to the fury of the barbarians, assuring them, that heaven would not suffer the peace, which the chagan had confirmed with the most solemn oaths, to be thus violated with impunity. The citizens, encouraged by the words and example of the pious prince, began to prepare for a vigorous defence: but at this juncture their preparations proved unnecessary; for a violent plague breaking out in the enemy's camp, swept off daily great numbers of them, and among the rest seven of the chagan's sons; which so terrified the barbarians, that they resolved to abandon the Roman territories, and return beyond the Danube. The chagan, when upon the point of departing, offered to set at liberty the Roman captives, of whom he had twelve thousand, for a very inconsiderable sum an head. But the emperor refusing to ransom them, because they had been for the most part concerned in the mutiny, which happened in the beginning of his reign, the chagan, transported with rage, put them all to the sword. This occasioned a mutiny in the army, and a great tumult at Constantinople, where the populace insulted the emperor in a most outrageous manner [q]. The following year, the Avari, under the conduct of their warlike king, renewed their ravages, but were in five successive battles overthrown by Priscus, with the loss of above thirty thousand men, and obliged to quit the Roman dominions. Priscus returned to Constantinople; but Peter, the emperor's brother, who commanded an army on the Danube, was ordered to cross that river, and winter in the enemy's country. This order the soldiers, who had conceived an irreconcileable aversion to Mauritius ever since he refused to ransom the captives, would by no means comply with, looking upon it as given on purpose to expose them to new hard-

Obliged by a plague to return to their own country.

Mauritius disobliges the army and soldiery.

[q] Theophylact. l. vii. c. 1.—15. & l. viii. c. 2. Cedren. ann. Maur. 19. Zonar. p. 137.

hardſhips. Hereupon a general mutiny enſuing, they declared a centurion, by name Phocas, emperor, beſtowing upon him, with repeated acclamations, the title of Auguſtus. News of the revolt of the army, and the promotion of Phocas, being brought to Conſtantinople, the populace, ever fond of change, roſe againſt Mauritius, who finding himſelf abandoned by his guards, embarqued on a ſmall veſſel with his wife and children, propoſing to retire in diſguiſe to ſome place of ſafety; but being driven back by contrary winds, he took refuge in the church of the martyr Autonomus, about an hundred and fifty furlongs from Conſtantinople. In the mean time, Phocas, arriving with his army, entered the city amidſt the loud acclamations of the populace, and was ſolemnly crowned in the church of St. John Baptiſt, with his wife Leontia, by the patriarch, after he had promiſed to maintain the rights of the church, and to defend the faith of the councils of Nice and Chalcedon. The following days he exhibited public ſports, during which warm diſputes ariſing between the two factions, viz. the blue and the green, Phocas ſent his guards to appeaſe the tumult, who having uſed roughly a tribune of the blue faction, thoſe of the ſame party, threatening the emperor, cried out, that Mauritius, who would do them juſtice, was not yet dead. This awakened the jealouſy of the tyrant, who thereupon immediately ordered Mauritius to be dragged from his aſylum to Chalcedon, where, by the tyrant's orders, five of his children were firſt inhumanly murdered in his preſence, and then he himſelf beheaded. He beheld the death of his children with ſuch firmneſs and chriſtian reſignation, as can hardly be matched in hiſtory, frequently repeating the words of the royal prophet, Juſt art thou, O Lord, and righteous in all thy judgments; nay, he was ſo far from uttering any complaints, that the woman, who was charged with the care of his little children, having concealed one of them, and placed her own in his room, the emperor would not ſuffer this kind fraud to take place, but diſcovered it to the executioners. The heads of the emperor and the young princes were for ſome days left expoſed to public view, and then buried with the bodies near the tomb of St. Mamas[r]. Such

The army on the Danube declare Phocas emperor.

Mauritius retires.

Phocas crowned emperor at Conſtantinople.

Mauritius, and five of his children put to death.

was

[r] Theoph. l. viii. c. 10. Niceph. l. viii. c. 41. Cedren. Zonar. ibid. l. v, c. 23.

was the end of Mauritius, after he had lived ſixty years, and reigned ſixteen years, three months and ſome days [s]. The tyrant, not ſatisfied with the death of Mauritius, cauſed Peter his brother, Commentiolus, who had the chief command of the army, George the ſon of Philippicus, and Præſentinus, an officer of great diſtinction, and much attached to the family of the deceaſed emperor, to be inhumanly maſſacred. Theodoſius, the eldeſt ſon of Mauritius, had been ſent by his father in the beginning of the troubles to ſolicit ſuccours from Coſrhoes, whom he had reſtored to the throne of his anceſtors; but before the young prince reached the confines of the empire, he was ſeized, and executed at a place called Leucacta, at a ſmall diſtance from Nicæa in Bithynia [t].

The emperor's brother, and ſeveral others, murdered by Phocas.

PHOCAS, thus proclaimed and acknowledged at Conſtanple, ſent, according to cuſtom, his own image, and that of his wife Leontia, to Rome, where they were received, in the month of April of the preſent year 603, with loud and joyful acclamations, the people there being highly incenſed againſt Mauritius, on account of the cruel exactions of the exarchs, and his other miniſters in Italy. Gregory, ſurnamed the great, then biſhop of Rome, cauſed the images to be lodged in the oratory of the martyr Cæſarius, and wrote letters to the new emperor, congratulating him upon his advancement to the throne, which he ſaid was effected, by a particular providence, to deliver the people from the innumerable calamities and heavy oppreſſions, under which they had long groaned [u]. Had we no other character of Phocas and Leontia, but that which has been conveyed to us in Gregory's letters, we ſhould rank him amongſt the beſt princes mentioned in hiſtory. But all other writers paint him in quite different colours; and his actions, tranſmitted to us by ſeveral hiſtorians, evidently ſpeak him a moſt cruel and blood-thirſty tyrant. He was of middling ſtature, ſays Cedrenus [w], deformed, and of a terrible aſpect: his hair was red, his eye-brows met, and one of his cheeks was marked with a ſcar, which, when he was in a paſſion, grew black and frightful: he was greatly addicted to wine and women, blood-thirſty, inexorable, bold in ſpeech, a ſtranger to compaſſion, in his principles an heretic. His wife Leontia was no better than he; in their reign therefore, continues the Phocas's character.

The calamities of his reign.

[s] Niceph. ibid. Cedren. annal. an. Phoc. 1. [u] Greg. l. xi ep. 38. [w] Cedren. ad Phoc. ann. 1.

the ſame writer, the unhappy people were overwhelmed with all manner of calamities, both public and private; great numbers of people were ſwept off either by famine or peſtilence; the earth refuſed her fruits in ſeaſon; the winters were ſo ſevere, that the ſeas were frozen, and the fiſh deſtroyed. He endeavoured in the beginning of his reign to gain the affections of the people by celebrating the circenſian games with extraordinary pomp, and diſtributing on that occaſion large ſums amongſt the people; but finding that, inſtead of applauding, they reviled him as a drunkard, he ordered his guards to fall upon them, who wounded ſome, killed others, and ſeizing great numbers of them, dragged them to priſon: but the populace riſing, ſet them at liberty, and thenceforth conceived an irreconcileable averſion to the tyrant [x]. The death of Mauritius was no ſooner known in the eaſt, than the celebrated Narſes, who at that time commanded the troops quartered on the frontiers of Perſia, revolted; and ſeizing on the city of Edeſſa, eaſily perſuaded Coſrhoes to join him, in order to depoſe the tyrant, and revenge the death of a prince, to whom he was indebted for his crown. Coſrhoes, upon the firſt invitation, entered the Roman territories at the head of a mighty army, and over-ran without oppoſition all Meſopotamia. Hereupon Germanus was ſent into the eaſt; but Narſes meeting him not far from Edeſſa, engaged him, and put him to flight. Germanus dying a few days after of a wound he received in the engagement, Leontius, who was ſent to ſucceed him, having upon his arrival, ſuffered himſelf to be ſurpriſed by Narſes, was in like manner defeated, and his army diſperſed; which provoked the tyrant to ſuch a degree, that he not only recalled him, but ordered him to be led about in chains, expoſing him thus to the outrages and inſults of the populace. Phocas, deſpairing of ſucceſs ſo long as Narſes continued in the Perſian intereſt, left no ſtone unturned to gain him over; but after he had in the end, with the moſt ſolemn oaths, and repeated aſſurances of indemnity and favour, perſuaded him to return home, he no ſooner had him in his power, than, unmindful of his promiſes and engagements, he cauſed him to be burnt alive, to the great grief and diſſatisfaction of the Romans, by whom he was in a manner adored on account of the eminent ſervices he had rendered the empire, and to the no leſs ſatisfaction of the Perſians, who dreaded the very name of Narſes, and beſides were highly provoked againſt him for his having lately forſaken them

He is hated by the people.

Narſes revolts.

And defeats Germanus ſent againſt him.

Phocas gains over Narſes, who is by his orders burnt alive.

[x] Idem ibid.

them [y]. Though deſtitute of ſo renowned a leader, they purſued the war with great vigour, over-ran this year all Meſopotamia and Syria; and having committed every-where enormous cruelties, returned home with an immenſe booty, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition. Phocas finding himſelf univerſally hated by the people on account of his cruelties at home, and the advantages gained by the enemies of the empire abroad, to ſtrengthen and ſecure his authority by alliances with the nobility, in the fifth year of his reign, that is, in 607, married his daughter Domitia to Priſcus, a patrician, and captain of the guards. But in the magnificent ſhews that were exhibited on occaſion of the nuptials, the people having ſaluted the bride and bridegroom with the title of Auguſti, the jealous emperor ordered Theophanes and Pamphylus, who ſuperintended the ſports, and had expoſed the images of Priſcus and Domitia, without any evil deſign, to be beheaded in the circus; and would have likewiſe put Priſcus to death, had not the people interpoſed in his behalf [z]. The jealouſy of the tyrant being thus awakened, one Peronia, who was privy to all the ſecrets of Conſtantina, the widow of Mauritius, informed the emperor, that ſhe maintained a private correſpondence with Germanus, a man of great authority in the former reign, with a deſign to raiſe her ſon Theodoſius, whom ſhe believed ſtill living, to the empire. Hereupon Conſtantina was immediately ſeized, and being put to the rack, confeſſed, that Romanus, by rank a patrician, was privy to the conſpiracy. Romanus diſcovered upon the rack ſeveral others, and among the reſt Theodorus, prefect of the eaſt, Helpidius, John, Ziza, and many other perſons of great diſtinction, who were all, by the emperor's orders, put to death, together with Romanus and Germanus, the tyrant not ſparing even the daughter of the latter. As for Conſtantina, ſhe was carried to the place where her huſband had been put to death five years before, and there publicly executed with her three daughters [a]. The jealouſy of the ſuſpicious tyrant being heightened by theſe diſcoveries, incredible multitudes of perſons of all ranks were daily dragged to priſon, which by that means was ſo crouded, that great numbers died daily ſuffocated with the ſtench and noiſomneſs of the place, till a pious matron, touched with compaſſion for the unhappy perſons detained there, yielded her houſe adjoining to it to enlarge it [b]. While Phocas thus raged at homes Coſrhoes

The emperor's cruelty.

Conſtantina, with her daughters, and many others, put to death.

[y] Cedren. & miſc. hiſt. ad an. Phoc. 3. [z] Theoph. hiſt. miſcel. l. xvii. c. 40. [a] Idem ibid. Niceph. l. xviii. c. 41. [b] Glic. annal. in Conſt. mag.

Cosrhoes in the east laid waste without opposition Syria, Palestine and Phœnicia, putting all to fire and sword; and the following year having put to flight the troops that were sent against him, he entered Galatia, and committing dreadful ravages both in that province, and in Paphlagonia, advanced as far as Chalcedon [c]. In the mean time Phocas, instead of protecting his people against any implacable and insulting enemy, raged with greater fury than Cosrhoes himself; for this year, the sixth of his reign, he not only put to death all those who were any-ways related to Mauritius, but caused Commentiolus, governor of Thrace, and one of the best officers of the empire, with several other persons of great distinction, to be inhumanly murdered. These cruelties alarmed Priscus, son-in-law to the tyrant, who, apprehending sooner or later the same fate, resolved by some means or other to provide for his own safety, and to rid the world of so great a plague. Accordingly, being informed that Heraclius, governor of Africa, was privately carrying on a conspiracy in that province, instead of discovering it to his father-in-law, he drew over the chief men in the senate to the party of the conspirators, and at the same time dispatching persons, in whom he could confide, to Heraclius, advised him to send, without loss of time, his son Heraclius, and Nicetas, the son of Gregoras his lieutenant, with what forces he could spare, to support the people and nobility, who were ready to revolt [d]. Phocas, in the mean while, not apprized of the danger that threatened him, dispatched Bonosus, whom he had lately appointed count of the east, with a considerable army to make head against the Persians; but while he was on his march, he received fresh letters from the emperor, enjoining him to hasten to Antioch, where the Jews, rising against the christians, had massacred great numbers of them, and among the rest Anastasius, the celebrated patriarch of that city, whose dead body they had ignominiously dragged thro' the streets, and insulted in a most outrageous manner. Bonosus having attempted in vain to appease the tumult by fair means, fell upon the mutineers sword in hand, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and drove the rest out of the city [e]. Thus was the tumult suppressed at Antioch; but at the same time far greater disorders happened at Constantinople, where the people, reviling the emperor at the public shews for his cruelty, drunkenness

Syria, Palestine and Phœnicia over-run by the Persians.

Priscus conspires against the emperor.

An insurrection of the Jews at Antioch.

A tumult at Constantinople.

[c] Glic in annal. p. 170 Theoph. hist. misc. l. xvii Cedren. in annal. Phocæ. [d] Glic. Theoph. Cedr. ibid. [e] Hist. miscel. l. xvii. Ann Phoc. 7. Cedren. ann, 7.

drunkenneſs and debaucheries, provoked him to ſuch a degree, that, tranſported with rage, he cauſed ſeveral of them to be ſeized, who were either beheaded on the ſpot, or by his orders thrown headlong into the ſea; which ſo enraged the reſt, that they ſet fire to the palace, and the public priſon; by which means thoſe who were detained there made their eſcape. The tyrant's own court growing at length tired of him, a conſpiracy was formed againſt him by thoſe in whom he moſt confided. The chief authors of it were Theodorus, a Cappadocian, the præfectus prætorio, Helpidius, who had the care of the warlike engines, and Anaſtaſius, the comes largitionum. Theſe, with ſeveral others of great authority near his perſon, agreed to fall upon him in the hippodrome; but the conſpiracy being diſcovered by Anaſtaſius, the emperor ordered all thoſe who had been privy to it, Anaſtaſius himſelf not excepted, to be put to death [f]. Phocas eſcaped this danger; but the following year 610, the eighth of his reign, he was overtaken by the bloody doom he had long deſerved. For Heraclius, the ſon of the governor of Africa, who bore the ſame name, taking upon him the title of emperor, and being acknowledged as ſuch by the people of Africa, ſailed from thence with a mighty fleet, and a powerful army on board, for Conſtantinople, while Nicetas marched thither by the way of Alexandria and the Pentapolis. Heraclius ſteered his courſe to Abydus, where he was received with great demonſtrations of joy by ſeveral perſons of rank, who had been baniſhed by Phocas. From Abydus he ſailed to Conſtantinople, where he engaged and utterly defeated the tyrant's fleet. Phocas took refuge in the palace; but one Photinus, whoſe wife he had formerly debauched, purſuing him with a party of ſoldiers, forced the gates, dragged the cowardly emperor from the throne, and having ſtripped him of the imperial robes, and cloathed him with a black veſt, carried him in chains to Heraclius, who commanded firſt his hands and feet, then his arms and privy parts, and at laſt his head, to be cut off. The remaining part of his body was delivered up to the ſoldiers, who burnt it in the forum. We are told, that Heraclius having reproached him with his evil adminiſtration, he anſwered with great calmneſs, It is incumbent upon you to govern better [g]. Such was the deſerved end of this cruel and bloody tyrant, after he had reigned ſeven years and ſome months. Upon his

A conſpiracy againſt the emperor diſcovered.

Heraclius proclaimed emperor in Africa.

Phocas, overcome in a ſea-fight, is depoſed and put to death.

[f] Hiſt. miſcel. an 7. Phoc.

[g] Niceph. l. xviii. c. 26. Miſcel. ann. 7. Phoc.

his death, Heraclius was with loud acclamations proclaimed emperor; and being crowned by Sergius, the patriarch of Conſtantinople, he placed the imperial crown on the head of Fabia, thenceforth called Eudocia, the daughter of Rogatus, an African, who had been formerly bethrothed to him. Heraclius was deſcended of a noble and opulent family in Cappadocia, of a majeſtic aſpect, well ſkilled in the art of war, courageous, and able to bear the fatigues attending a military life. The people, who had long groaned under the tyrannical yoke of his predeceſſor, were highly pleaſed with the change: but their joy was ſomewhat allayed by diſmal tidings from the eaſt, where the Perſians made themſelves maſters of Edeſſa and Apamea, and penetrating as far as Antioch, cut off almoſt to a man a body of Romans, who attempted to ſtop them, committing everywhere, without controul, moſt dreadful ravages, and unheard-of cruelties. Heraclius, to anſwer the expectation the world had conceived of him, cauſed new levies to be made throughout the empire, the old corps being ſo entirely exhauſted, that, of the many thouſands who had ſeven years before revolted from Mauritius, and declared for Phocas, only two ſoldiers were now living, the reſt being cut off, ſays Cedrenus, by the avenging hand of providence, for their treachery to their lawful prince [h]. The new raiſed troops were ſent into Cappadocia under the command of Criſpus, who nevertheleſs could not prevent the Perſians from over-runing that province the following year, and making themſelves maſters of Cæſarea, which they ſacked, and laying waſte both that province and Armenia, returned home loaded with booty, and carrying with them an incredible number of captives [i]. On the third of May of the ſame year 611, the empreſs Eudocia was delivered of a ſon; but ſhe died ſoon after, and was interred with extraordinary pomp. The ſon was called Heraclius, and afterwards Conſtantine the younger [k]. Heraclius, not finding himſelf in a condition to reſtrain the Perſians by force of arms, diſpatched embaſſadors to Coſrhoes, offering to pay him a yearly penſion, and to conclude a peace upon his own terms. But Coſrhoes, deaf to all propoſals, ſent the next year a formidable army into Syria, under the conduct of Riſmizus, who, after having ravaged without oppoſition that country, broke into Paleſtine, and took the city

Heraclius proclaimed emperor.

The Perſians make themſelves maſters of ſeveral cities.

Ravage Cappadocia and Armenia.

[h] Cedren. Heracl. ann. 1. Heracl.

[i] Theoph. hiſt. miſcel. ann. 2.

[k] Zonar. p. 140.

Over-run Egypt and Paleſtine, And take Jeruſalem.

city of Jeruſalem, where they committed unheard of cruelties. They are ſaid to have ſold ninety thouſand chriſtians to the Jews, who purchaſed them, not with a deſign to uſe them as ſlaves, but to vent their inveterate hatred, and implacable rage againſt the chriſtians, by racking them with all the torments cruelty itſelf could invent. Zacharias, the patriarch, was carried into Perſia, with an immenſe booty, and part of the croſs, as was believed, on which our Saviour ſuffered [l]. The ſame year Heraclius married Martina, his brother's daughter, and cauſed her to be crowned with the uſual pomp by Sergius, the patriarch of Conſtantinople [m]. To this inceſtuous marriage Zonaras and Cedrenus aſcribe all the calamities that afterwards befell him. The following year the Perſians over-ran all Egypt, took and pillaged the city of Alexandria, and advancing from thence, as they met with no oppoſition, into Africa, laid ſiege to Carthage; but not being able to reduce it, they returned unmoleſted into Perſia, carrying with them infinite numbers of captives, and the ſpoils of the ſeveral provinces through which they paſſed [n]. Heraclius, who continued all this time at Conſtantinople, where he created his ſon Conſtantine Cæſar, and gave the title of Auguſta to his daughter, being well appriſed, that he had not ſufficient ſtrength to make head againſt ſo formidable an enemy, ſent once more embaſſadors to Coſrhoes, putting him in mind of the kindneſs formerly ſhewn him by Mauritius, and offering to conclude a laſting peace with him upon what terms he himſelf ſhould judge reaſonable. But Coſ-

Coſrhoes will hearken to no terms.

rhoes, elated with his ſucceſs, and aiming at nothing leſs than the utter deſtruction of the Roman name, returned the embaſſadors the following blaſphemous anſwer; Let your maſter know, that I will hearken to no terms, till he has, with all his ſubjects, renounced his crucified God, and adored the ſun, the great god of the Perſians*. Heraclius, by this impious and inſulting anſwer, awaked as it were from a lethargy, concluded a peace with the chagan or king of the Avari; and having, with the conſent of the clergy, coined into money the gold and ſilver veſſels belonging to the churches, Heraclius raiſes a powerful army.

as the treaſury was quite drained, he raiſed a powerful army, conſiſting not only of Romans, but of Hunns, Avari, and other barbarous nations. With theſe forces he reſolved to march in perſon againſt Coſrhoes; and accordingly having appointed appointed his ſon to govern in his abſence, and under him Sergius the patriarch, and the patrician Bonus, a perſon of great wiſdom and experience, he ſet out from Conſtantinople the day after Eaſter, training on his march ſuch of his men as were raw and unexperienced. In the mean time Saes, the Perſian general, who had ravaged all Cappadocia, taken by ſtorm the city of Ancyra, and penetrated as far as Chalcedon, hearing that Heraclius was advancing with a mighty army, ſent deputies to him to invite him to an interview, which he hoped, ſaid the treacherous Perſian, would end in a laſting peace between the two empires. The emperor complied with his requeſt; and believing him in earneſt, ſent ſeventy perſons of diſtinction on an embaſſy to the king of Perſia. But theſe the Perſian general, with the utmoſt treachery, loaded with chains, and carried them thus bound into Perſia, where they were thrown into priſon, and treated with great inhumanity by Coſrhoes. Saes met with the puniſhment his treachery deſerved; for the king, highly provoked againſt him for having ſeen the Roman emperor, and not brought him away priſoner with the reſt, cauſed him to be flayed alive [o]. One Sarbaras was appointed to command in his room, who entering Aſia at the head of a numerous army, made a dreadful havock in that province. Heraclius, in the mean time, bent his march to the confines of Armenia; and having put to flight a party of Perſians, who guarded the ſtreights leading into that province, he purſued his rout towards Pontus. As the year was far ſpent, the Perſians, imagining he deſigned to take up his winter quarters in Pontus, withdrew to theirs; which they had no ſooner done, than Heraclius broke into their territories, deſtroying all before him with fire and ſword. This ſudden irruption obliged the Perſians to quit Cilicia, which they had entered, and haſten to the defence of their own country. Heraclius, appriſed of their approach, drew together his men diſperſed about the country, and offered them battle, which they readily accepted, but were entirely defeated, the Romans remaining maſters both of their camp and baggage. The emperor being, by the ſeaſon, that was already far advanced, prevented from purſuing the advantages of this victory, put his forces into winter-quarters, and returned himſelf to Conſtantinople [p]. The following year Coſrhoes ſent

[l] Theoph ad. ann. Heracl. 5. [m] Idem ibid. [n] Hiſt. miſcel l. iv. Cedren. ann. Heracl. 6. Leont. in vit. Joan. Eleemoſ. * Hiſt. miſcell. l. xviii.

He marches in perſon againſt the Perſians.

The treachery of their general.

Heraclius invades Perſia, and gains a great victory.

[o] Theoph. ibid. Cedren. annal. ann. 4. [p] Niceph in Heracl. c. 5. Theoph. & Cedren. ad. ann. 13.

ſent early in the ſpring Sarbarazas or Sarmanazaris to lay waſte the Roman provinces, which obliged Heraclius to quit Conſtantinople, and haſten into the eaſt. Upon his arrival in Armenia, he diſpatched embaſſadors to Coſrhoes with new propoſals for an accomodation; which being by the Perſian monarch rejected with great pride and arrogance, he invaded Perſia anew, took ſeveral towns, which he levelled with the ground, and ravaged the country without controul. Being informed, that the king lay encamped with forty thouſand choſen men near the city of Gazacum or Gazacotis, he directed his march thither with a deſign to ſurprize him. But Coſrhoes, receiving timely notice of his approach, inſtead of making the neceſſary preparations to receive him, betook himſelf to a precipitous flight. Upon his retreat, the emperor entered Gazacum without oppoſition, where he is ſaid by Theophanes and Cedrenus to have found the immenſe treaſures of Cræſus, king of Lydia, which he ſeized; and having ſecured them, with the many rich ornaments of a celebrated temple of the ſun, he ſet fire to the city, and marching with all poſſible expedition in purſuit of the king, he arrived at Thebatman, where Theophanes places the above-mentioned temple; and laying waſte the countries through which he paſſed, continued his march to the frontiers of Media. But the ſummer being far ſpent, he thought it adviſeable to give over the purſuit. Accordingly having ſet apart three days to return public thanks for the ſucceſs of this glorious campaign, and implore the further protection of heaven, he opened the book of the goſpels, purſuant to a cuſtom which began to obtain about this time, and imagining he was enjoined there to winter in Albania, he directed his march to that province. In his retreat the Perſians, deſirous of recovering the immenſe booty which he carried with him, fell often upon his rear, but were conſtantly repulſed with great loſs. As the weather proved very ſevere, and the captives, fifty thouſand in number, were more affected with it than the reſt, as being accuſtomed to a warmer climate, the good-natured emperor ordered them all to be releaſed without ranſom, giving them leave to return unmoleſted to their reſpective countries [q]. The following campaign proved no leſs ſucceſsful to the Romans, Heraclius, having defeated the enemy in two pitched battles, and cut off great numbers of them, with their general Sarablacas, tho' the Lazians and other auxiliaries had ſhamefully Puts Coſrhoes to flight.

Ravages the Perſian dominions and takes ſeveral places.

An inſtance of his good nature.

He gains great advantages over the Perſians.

[q] Theoph. Cedren. Niceph. ibid.

fully abandoned him, and marched home. Encouraged with this ſucceſs, he took the field next year early in the ſpring; and croſſing the Euphrates, made himſelf maſter of Samoſata, and ſeveral other places. Sarbarazas, at the head of a numerous army, attempted to check the progreſs of his arms, but was utterly defeated on the banks of the Sanis. In this laſt battle the emperor gave ſignal proofs of his conduct, and perſonal courage. After this victory, Heraclius took up his winter-quarters at Sebaſtia, placing his troops in the neighbouring towns. Coſrhoes, tranſported with rage on ſeeing his armies thus ſhamefully defeated, ſeized on the wealth of all the churches within his dominions, and, out of hatred to Heraclius, raiſed a cruel perſecution againſt the catholics, ſparing none but ſuch as embraced the doctrine of Neſtorius. At the ſame time by his embaſſadors, he engaged in his cauſe the Avari, the Hunns, the Sclavonians, and other barbarous nations, who, by invading Thrace, and laying ſiege to Conſtantinople, were to divert the emperor from purſuing the war in Perſia. Heraclius, appriſed of theſe negotiations, tho' carried on with ſecrecy, divided his forces into three armies, of which one was appointed to defend the city of Conſtantinople; the ſecond under the conduct of Theodorus, the emperor's brother, was to watch the motions of Sais, who threatened to invade Aſia, while the emperor himſelf led the third into Lazica, in order to invade from thence the Perſian dominions. Purſuant to this plan, Heraclius advanced into Lazica, and being there joined by forty thouſand Chazari, or, as Cedrenus calls them, eaſtern Turks, he entered Perſia in the depth of winter; and meeting with no oppoſition, laid waſte ſeveral provinces. On the other hand the chagan, or king of the Avari, and the other barbarous nations in alliance with the king of Perſia, breaking into Thrace, committed dreadful ravages there, and in the end laid ſiege to Conſtantinople; but being in ſeveral attacks repulſed by the garriſon, and having loſt the flower of their army, they thought it adviſeable to drop the enterprize and retire. About the ſame time Sais, who had under his command the flower of the Perſian army received a dreadful overthrow from Theodorus, who loſt but a very ſmall number of men. The following year 626, Heraclius, invading Perſia in the depth of winter, advanced as far as Nineveh, where he was met by Razaſtes, to whom Coſrhoes, diſtruſting his other generals, had committed the whole management of the war. Hereupon a battle enſuing, the Perſians, after Coſrhoes ſtirs up the barbarians.

Who ſit down before Conſtantinople; but are forced to raiſe the ſiege.

The emperor gains other victories.

an obſtinate diſpute, were put to flight, and their general himſelf ſlain, the Romans having loſt on that occaſion but fifty men; which the eccleſiaſtic writers aſcribe to the miraculous aſſiſtance of heaven. In this battle the emperor behaved with his uſual bravery, having killed three Perſian commanders with his own hand [r]. Coſrhoes, upon the news of this defeat, fled to Seleucia on the Tigris, and there ſhut himſelf up with his wives, children and treaſures, while Heraclius, having now no army to oppoſe him, made a dreadful havock of the moſt fertile provinces of the Perſian dominions, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. At Diſtagerda he found the enſigns and ſtandards, which at different times had been taken from the Romans, and in other places reſcued incredible numbers of Roman captives. In the mean time Sarbarazes, to divert Heraclius from ravaging Perſia, laid ſiege to Chalcedon; but, after he had continued ſome time before the place, without being able to reduce it, Coſrhoes ſent private orders to Chardarichas, another officer, to murder the general, and lead the army back into Perſia. But the king's letter was intercepted, and brought to the emperor's ſon at Conſtantinople, by whom it was immediately ſent to Sarbarazas, who thereupon revolted with his whole army. About the ſame time the king, being taken ill, declared his younger ſon Merdaſa his ſucceſſor; which Siroes, his eldeſt ſon no ſooner underſtood, than he joined Chardarichas; and being aſſiſted by the Roman captives, whom he ſet at liberty purſuant to the advice given him by Heraclius, he ſeized on his father, and loading him with chains, threw him into a dungeon, where he was inhumanly murdered with Merdaſa, and his other children, after he had been, by the orders of his unnatural ſon, moſt outrageouſly inſulted by all the nobility [s]. Siroes, thus raiſed to the throne, concluded a perpetual peace with Heraclius, upon terms no leſs honourable than advantageous to the empire; for he reſtored all the provinces that had been ſeized by his predeceſſor, with three hundred enſigns, and the wood which was ſuppoſed to have been part of the croſs on which our Saviour died, and had been carried by Coſrhoes in triumph from Jeruſalem into Perſia. He likewiſe ſet at liberty all the Roman captives, and among the reſt Zacharias patriarch of Jeruſalem [t]. A peace

One of the Perſian generals revolts.

Coſrhoes depoſed and his ſon Siroes put in his room.

Who concludes a peace with the Romans.

[r] Idem ad ann. Heracl. 17. [s] Theoph. hoc ann. & Cedren. [t] Idem, ibid.

peace being thus concluded, Heraclius returned to Conſtantinople, which he entered in a kind of triumph, being met at ſome diſtance by his ſon Conſtantius, the patriarch, and almoſt all the nobility and people, who attended him to the palace with ſongs of triumph, and repeated acclamations. And truly no prince ever deſerved better of the empire; for in the ſpace of ſix years he recovered the ſeveral provinces which had been diſmembered from it by the Perſians, fully revenged all the indignities offered to the Roman name by that haughty nation, obliged their king, and his numerous armies, to fly before him, and brought the moſt potent and formidable of all the enemies of the empire to ſuch a low ebb, that they were never afterwards capable of attempting any memorable exploit. Theſe things Heraclius performed, though, upon his acceſſion to the empire, he found it over-run by ſeveral barbarous nations, the exchequer quite drained, the military diſcipline decayed, and the army conſiſting of raw and unexperienced levies, ſcarce deſerving the name of ſoldiers. Heraclius, having paſſed the winter at Conſtantinople, in the ſpring of the following year 628, took a progreſs to Jeruſalem, carrying with him that part of the croſs which had been taken by the Perſians fourteen years before. He entered the city in great pomp; and having returned in the chief church ſolemn thanks to the Almighty for the many ſignal victories he had been pleaſed to grant him, and for chuſing him to reſcue that ſacred pledge out of the hands of the enemies of the chriſtian name, he reſtored it with great ſolemnity to its former place. Upon this occaſion was inſtituted the feſtival of the exaltation of the holy croſs, which is celebrated to this day by the church of Rome on the fourteenth of September [u]. Of the miracles that are ſaid to have happened on this occaſion, the reader will find a particular account in Cedrenus, and other eccleſiaſtic writers. When the ceremony was over, the emperor publiſhed an edict baniſhing all the Jews from Jeruſalem, and forbidding them under ſevere penalties, to come within three miles of the holy city. From Jeruſalem, Heraclius took a farther progreſs into the eaſtern provinces. Upon his arrival at Hierapolis in Phrygia, he received news of the death of Siroes, the new king of Perſia, murdered, according to ſome, by Sarbaras, one of his generals, according to others, by his own ſon Ardeſer, who ſucceeded him, but was aſſaſſi-

Heraclius carries back the croſs to Jeruſalem.

[u] Theoph. Cedren. ad ann. Heracl. 19.

nated in the ſeventh month of his reign by Barrazas, whom the Perſians, a few months after, depoſed and put to death, raiſing Barahanes, the ſon of Coſrhoes, to the throne in his room. Barahanes, after a ſhort reign of ſeven months, was ſucceeded by Hormiſda, the laſt Perſian king of the race of Artaxerxes; for in his reign the Saracens put an end to the Perſian monarchy, and eſtabliſhed the kingdom of the Arabians in its room, as we ſhall relate at length in a more proper place. From Hierapolis the emperor removed to Edeſſa, where he received embaſſadors from the king of India in the eaſt, and from Dagobert, king of the Franks, in the weſt, ſent to congratulate him on his late ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, and to court his friendſhip and alliance [w]. While the emperor continued at Edeſſa, Athanaſius, the patriarch of the Jacobites, a man of great addreſs, having inſinuated himſelf into his favour, brought him by degrees to acknowledge but one will in Chriſt, which created a dangerous ſchiſm in the church, and gave riſe to warm diſputes, Heraclius ever after maintaining it to the utmoſt of his power, and countenancing the Monothelites, that is, thoſe who acknowledged but one will in Chriſt. This hereſy, however, did not prove ſo prejudicial to the church as the peſtilent and impious doctrine of the impoſtor Mohammed, which was firſt broached in the reign of Heraclius, and by him ſuffered to take ſo deep a root, that his ſucceſſors were never able to ſuppreſs it. The impoſtor died this year, the twenty-firſt of the reign of Heraclius, and 630th of the chriſtian æra, after having reduced, with the aſſiſtance of the rabble, whom he had ſeduced, and of the Saracens, who had joined him, the cities of Mecca and Medina, and part of Arabia, Heraclius, in the mean time neglecting the affairs of the ſtate, to promote and eſtabliſh the hereſy of the Monothelites, which he had lately embraced. Mohammed, who, by a double uſurpation, had declared himſelf both the king and prophet of the Saracens, was ſucceeded by Eububezer his kinſman who reduced great part of Perſia, and breaking into Paleſtine in 632, laid waſte the territory of Gaza, after having defeated and cut in pieces the governor of that province, with all his troops. The following year Eububezer died, and was ſucceeded by Haumar, who made himſelf maſter of Boſtra, and ſeveral other cities of Arabia, and gained a complete victory over Theodorus, the emperor's brother, ſent to Perſia conquered by the Saracens.

Heraclius embraces the doctrine of the Monothelites.

Mohammed preaches his doctrine.

He reduces the cities of Mecca and Medina.

The Saracens make themſelves maſters of ſeveral provinces.

[w] Theoph. ann. 22. Heracl. Aimoin. iv. c. 24.

to oppoſe him. Hereupon Heraclius appointed Boanes to command in the room of his brother, and at the ſame time diſpatched Theodorus Sacellarius into Arabia. The latter was met near Emeſa, by the Saracens, under the command of Haumar; but he prudently declined an engagement, being informed, that the emperor had enjoined Boanes, who lay encamped at Damaſcus, to join him. In the mean time Heraclius, dreading the iſſue of the war, leaving Edeſſa, haſtened to Jeruſalem, and repaired from thence to Conſtantinople, carrying with him the croſs, and what ever elſe was of value in the city, which, he feared, would ſoon fall into the enemy's hands. The following year Boanes having engaged the Saracens, was by them entirely defeated, Heaven itſelf ſeeming to eſpouſe their cauſe; for a violent wind aroſe in the beginning of the engagement, which blowing the duſt in the faces of the Romans, rendered them quite incapable of managing their arms; ſo that they were driven headlong into the Jerinochta, in which river moſt of them periſhed. After this victory they made themſelves maſters of Damaſcus; and advancing from thence into Phœnicia, reduced that province without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition. Haumar, encouraged with this ſucceſs, took the field early next ſpring; and dividing his numerous army into two bodies, he ſent one to invade Egypt, and led the other in perſon againſt Jeruſalem. They were met upon the borders of Egypt by Cyrus, biſhop of Alexandria, who, by promiſing in the name of the people to pay them an annual penſion of two hundred thouſand denarii, prevailed upon them to ſpare the country, and retire. This agreement was obſerved for three years, during which the Saracens never offered to moleſt the Egyptians. But in the mean time the emperor being adviſed to break the agreement, one Manuel, by birth an Armenian, was appointed governor of Egypt, and ſent thither with a ſtrong body of troops; ſo that the commiſſioners from the Saracens, when they came at the year's end to demand the uſual penſion, were received with contempt and diſdain by the governor, who told them, that he was not a prieſt, but a Roman general, at the head of an army, and therefore would not ſubmit to ſuch ignominious conditions. The Saracens, provoked at this anſwer, flew to arms; and invading Egypt, put Manuel to flight, and made themſelves maſters of the whole country. The emperor not having ſufficient ſtrength to drive them out, ſent Cyrus to them, promiſing to ſtand to the former agreement, provided they withdrew out of Egypt. But the Saracens, refuſed to quit upon any terms their new conqueſt [x]. The loſs of Egypt, which had continued ſubject to the empire ever ſince the time of Auguſtus, happened in the twenty-fifth year of Heraclius's reign, and 634th of the chriſtian æra. Egypt being thus reduced, the troops which had been employed in that expedition were by Haumar ſent into Syria; which province they conquered in the ſpace of two years, making themſelves maſters of all the ſtrong holds there, and of Antioch itſelf, the metropolis of the eaſt. Haumar in the mean time entering Paleſtine, marched without oppoſition to Jeruſalem, which city he took in 636, after a two years ſiege. Thus were the moſt wealthy and beautiful provinces of the empire torn from it by the Saracens, an upſtart nation, hitherto looked upon with a contempt ſuitable to their original. But of them we ſhall ſpeak at length in a more proper place. Heraclius in the mean time, who wanted neither courage nor abilities to check the progreſs of this new enemy, was ſo taken up with unſeaſonable diſputes about religion, with public feſtivals and entertainments, that he had not time, or perhaps was unwilling, to reflect on the dangers that threatened him. The eccleſiaſtic writers look upon his ſupine and unaccountable ſecurity, as a puniſhment inflicted upon him by heaven for countenancing the Monothelites, and perſecuting the catholics: for, not ſatisfied with holding the doctrine of thoſe heretics himſelf, he endeavoured to eſtabliſh it in all the provinces of the empire, by the famous edict called ectheſis, or expoſition. But, before he could put this wicked deſign in execution, he died of a dropſy, which was attended with ſtrange and unaccountable ſymptoms. His death happened in the month of May, after he had reigned thirty years, and ſome months [y].

They defeat the Romans, and take Damaſcus.

They reduce Egypt and Syria.

Jeruſalem beſieged, and taken by the Saracens.

Heraclius dies.

HERACLIUS was ſucceeded by his ſon Conſtantine, who died after a ſhort reign of ſeven months, poiſoned, as was ſuppoſed, by his ſtep-mother Martina, to make room for her own ſon Heracleonas; who was accordingly proclaimed, and crowned with the uſual ſolemnity. But he had not held the empire quite ſix months, when the ſenate revolting, depoſed him; and after having cut off his noſe, and pulled out Martina's tongue, ſent them both into baniſhment. Pyrrhus, the heretical patriarch of Conſtantinople, ſuppoſed to have been privy to the death of Conſtantine, abandoning his ſee, fled fled into Africa. The ſenate having thus delivered the empire from the uſurper Heracleonas, advanced Conſtans, the ſon of Conſtantine, and grandſon of Heraclius, to the throne. The firſt years of this prince's reign are almoſt quite barren of events; for Theophanes, and the other Greek writers, only tell us, that, in his ſecond year, Haumar began to build a temple at Jeruſalem; that in his third happened an eclipſe of the ſun, and violent ſtorms in his ſixth; which were looked upon as the forerunners of more violent concuſſions: for the ſame year the Saracens, not ſatisfied with Syria, Meſopotamia, Egypt, Phœnicia, Arabia, and Paleſtine, broke, like a torrent into Africa; and having defeated the imperial prefect, by name Gregory, made themſelves maſters of that ſpacious and fruitful country. The following year 648, Mahias or Mahuvias, one of their captains, with a great fleet, fell upon the iſland of Cyprus; which he eaſily reduced, and laid in aſhes the city of Conſtantia. From Cyprus he ſailed to the iſland of Aradus, which he took, together with the city; and from thence ſteering his courſe to Rhodes, made himſelf maſter of that iſland, deſtroying the famous coloſſus of the Sun, one thouſand three hundred and ſixty-ſix years after it had been ſet up by Laches or Chares. It had been overturned ſixty-ſix years after it was erected, by a violent earthquake, which ſhook the whole iſland; and the Rhodians, pretending the prohibition of an oracle, had never attempted to erect it anew; yet looking upon the braſs as in a manner ſacred, they had never preſumed to apply it to any other uſe; but Mahuvias cauſed it to be broken to pieces, and ſold it to a Jewiſh merchant of Emeſa, who, with the metal, loaded nine hundred camels. While Mahuvias was thus employed in the iſland of Rhodes, his countrymen, breaking into Armenia, laid waſte that country far and wide, the emperor in the mean time continuing idle at Conſtantinople, or buſying himſelf only in matters of religion, and promoting, as his grandfather had done, the doctrine of the Monothelites, which he had imbibed from his infancy. His ſupine negligence, and unaccountable indolence, encouraged Mahuvias to make an attempt upon Conſtantinople itſelf. With this view he fitted out a ſtrong fleet at Tripolis in Phœnicia, and would, in all likelihood, have ſuceeeded, had he not been prevented by two brothers, both chriſtians and the ſons of a Grecian trumpeter, who having found means to break open the public priſon, crouded with chriſtian captives, with their aſſiſtance killed the ameras, as the Saracens called him, or the governor of the place, ſet fire

[x] Theoph. ad ann. Heracl. 24, 25. [y] Theoph. ad ann. Heracl. 31.

Conſtans declared emperor.

Africa conquered by the Saracens.

And likewiſe the iſlands of Cyprus, Aradus, and Rhodes.

Armenia laid waſte.

fire to the fleet, deſtroyed all the naval preparations, and then eſcaped, in a ſhip provided for that purpoſe, into the Roman dominions. Mahuvias, having with incredible expedition fitted out another fleet, ſailed to Phœnice in Lycia, where he engaged and defeated the imperial navy, commanded by Conſtans in perſon, who with much-ado eſcaped in diſguiſe to Conſtantinople [z], whence to retrieve his reputation, he marched the following year againſt the Sclavi or Sclavonians, who had ſeized on that country, which to this day is called from them Sclavonia. The emperor defeated them in ſeveral encounters; but not being able to drive them quite out, he returned to Conſtantinople, where he found embaſſadors from the Saracens, now divided among themſelves, come to ſolicit a peace; which the indolent and unwarlike prince readily granted them, yielding to them the many provinces they had ſeized, upon their paying to him and his ſucceſſors, by way of tribute, a thouſand nummi a year, with a horſe and a ſlave. The following year 659, the emperor, looking with a jealous eye upon his brother Theodoſius, who, on account of his virtue and integrity, was the darling of the people, cauſed him to be ordained deacon, and received the holy cup at his hands; but his fears not being yet quite appeaſed, he ordered him ſoon after to be murdered; which he had no ſooner done, than he was ſeized with dread and terror, imagining that he ſaw his brother conſtantly ſtanding before him, with a cup of blood in his hand, commanding him to quench his inhuman thirſt. Haunted and terrified with this imagination, and the remorſe of his conſcience, he left Conſtantinople, where the murder had been committed, and repaired to Sicily, reſolving to transfer the ſeat of the empire to Syracuſe; but the inhabitants of Conſtantinople, appriſed of his deſign, kept in that metropolis his wife and children. From this time forward he wandered, like a ſecond Cain, from place to place; but his guilt purſuing him whitherſoever he went, he became an object of compaſſion even to his moſt inveterate enemies. In the mean time Mahuvias, who had cauſed his competitor Hali to be murdered, and now reigned alone, without any regard to the late treaty, ſent his ſon Izod to lay waſte the Roman territories, who advancing as far as Chalcedon, and having made himſelf maſter of Amorium, a ſtrong city of Phrygia, left a garriſon in the place, and returned with an immenſe booty to his father. Amorium however, was ſoon after ſurpriſed,

The emperor's fleet defeated.

A peace with the Saracens.

The emperor murders his brother.

The Saracens ravage the Roman territories.

[z] Idem ad ann. Conſt. 15—18.

priſed, and retaken by Andreas, one of the emperor's officers, who put all the Saracens he found in the place to the ſword. During the emperor's ſtay in Sicily, a war broke out between the Franks and Lombards; which he looking upon as a favourable opportunity of driving the latter out of Italy, fitted out a mighty fleet, and landing at Tarentum, marched directly to lay ſiege to Beneventum, taking Luceria, and ſeveral other cities belonging to the Lombards, in his way. But Grimoald, duke of Beneventum, marching after a ſignal victory over the Franks, to the relief of the place, the emperor, raiſing the ſiege in great haſte, retired to Naples. Not long after, a body of twenty thouſand Romans was almoſt entirely cut off, with Saburrus their general, by Romoald the ſon of Grimoald *. After this defeat, the emperor, laying aſide all thoughts of diſpoſſeſſing the Lombards of that part of Italy which they held, took a progreſs to Rome, which he entered in great pomp, being met ſix miles from the city by Vitalianus, biſhop of the place, and his clergy. After he had continued twelve days in Rome, and cauſed the moſt remarkable rarities he found there to be removed to Conſtantinople, he returned to Naples, and from thence to Syracuſe, where he reſided for the ſpace of five years, oppreſſing his people with moſt enormous exactions, and even plundering the churches of their rich ornaments, and ſacred veſſels. Having thus rendered himſelf both odious and contemptible to all his ſubjects, one Andrew the ſon of Troilus, reſolved to rid the world of ſo great a plague; and accordingly diſpatched him in the bath of Daphne at Syracuſe, by repeated blows on the head with the veſſel that was made uſe of to pour hot water upon him. Thus periſhed Conſtans II. in the twenty-ſeventh year of his reign, and 668, of the chriſtian æra. Upon his death, the people of Syracuſe proclaimed one Mezizius, by birth an Armenian, who had no other qualifications to recommend him to their favour but the comelineſs of his perſon. The news of his promotion no ſooner reached Conſtantinople, than Conſtantine, the ſon of the deceaſed emperor, having, with the utmoſt expedition, equipped a fleet, ſailed to Sicily; and having defeated, taken, and put to death the uſurper, cauſed himſelf to be acknowledged emperor in his room [a]. He muſt have continued ſome time in the weſt, ſettling the provinces that were ſtill ſubject to the empire there; for we are told by Zonaras, that he was, by

The emperor's unſucceſsful expedition againſt the Lombards.

His avarice.

He is murdered.

His ſon Conſtantine Pogonatus made emperor.

* Paul. Diac. l. iv. c. 6. [a] Theoph. annal. ad ann Conſt. 27. Paul. Diac. l. v. prope fin.

by the people of Conſtantinople, ſurnamed Pogonatus, becauſe, at his departrue from thence, only a little down appeared on his chin; whereas he returned with a beard. The people of Conſtantinople received him, on his return from Sicily, with loud acclamations; but he had not been long in the city, when ſome, miſled by a ſtrange notion, that as there were three perſons in the trinity, ſo there ought to be three emperors on the throne, preſſed him to take his two brothers, Tiberius and Heraclius, for his partners in the empire. This alarmed the young emperor, who, having got the broachers of this new doctrine into his power put them to death, and cauſed the noſes of his two brothers to be cut off, that deformity rendering them incapable of the empire [b]. While theſe things paſſed at Conſtantinople, the Saracens, entering Africa, where the people had inſulted ſome of their garriſons committed unheard-of barbarities, and having ravaged the country returned with eighty thouſand captives.

Several provinces ravaged by the Saracens.

The following year they made a deſcent upon Sicily, took and plundered the city of Syracuſe, and over-ran the whole iſland, deſtroying every thing with fire and ſword. They laid waſte in like manner Cilicia; and having paſſed the winter at Smyrna, they entered Thrace in the month of April of the following year 672, and laid ſiege to Conſtantinople itſelf; but were received with ſuch vigour and reſolution by the emperor, who had already, with indefatigable pains, reformed both the court and army, that they thought it adviſeable to withdraw in the month of September to Cyzicus. However, the enſuing ſpring they renewed the ſiege, continuing thus to attack the city in the ſummer, and retire to Cyzicus in the winter for the ſpace of ſeven years, ſay the Greek writers, though from ſome of them it appears, that in the fourth year of the ſiege, a peace was concluded between the Romans and Saracens, as we ſhall relate anon. In this long ſiege, the Saracens loſt incredible numbers of men, and many ſhips conſumed by ſea-fire as it was called, becauſe it burnt under water, being the invention of one Callinicus, a native of Heliopolis in Egypt. The enemy at length deſpairing of ſucceſs, abandoned the enterprize; but as they were returning home, their fleet was ſhipwrecked off the Scyllæan promontory. About the ſame time three of the emperor's lieutenants, viz. Florus, Petronius, and Cyprianus, gained a ſignal victory in Syria over Suphianus who commanded there a numerous body of Saracens; but loſt in the engagement thirty

They beſiege Conſtantinople;

But dropt that enterprize.

Their fleet ſhip-wrecked and their army defeated.

[b] Theoph. Cedren. ad hunc ann.

thirty thouſand of his men [c]. Theſe misfortunes encouraged the Mardaites, or Maronites to ſeize on mount Libanus, where they fortified themſelves; and being joined by multitudes of chriſtian captives flocking to them from all parts, they reduced the whole country between mount Taurus and Jeruſalem, made frequent incurſions into Syria, and ſo harraſſed and terrified the Saracens, that Mahuvias, not thinking himſelf able to contend with them and the Romans at the ſame time, ſent embaſſadors to treat of a peace with Conſtantine; which was in the end concluded upon the following terms: 1. That it ſhould be inviolably obſerved by both nations for the ſpace of thirty years. 2. That the Saracens ſhould retain the provinces they had ſeized. 3. That they ſhould pay yearly, by way of tribute, to the emperor and his ſucceſſors three thouſand pound weight of gold, fifty ſlaves, and as many choice horſes. This peace was thought as affairs then ſtood, very advantageous and honourable to the empire [d]. It was ſcarce concluded, when the Bulgarians, leaving their native ſeats on the banks of the Volga or Bulga, whence ſome think they took their name, advanced as far as the Danube, which they paſſed without oppoſition, to the number of one hundred thouſand perſons; and entering the territories of the empire, ravaged far and wide the countries through which they paſſed. The emperor ſent a conſiderable army againſt them; which being put to flight by the barbarians, he choſe rather to conclude a peace, by promiſing to pay them an annual penſion, than to purſue an expenſive and doubtful war. The emperor, being now diverted by no wars either foreign or domeſtic, laboured with indefatigable pains to eſtabliſh in the church that peace and tranquillity which reigned in the ſtate. In order to this, he aſſembled the ſixth general or œcumenical council, which was opened at Conſtantinople on the twenty-ſecond of November of the year 680. In this council, the doctrine of the Monothelites was condemned, and by that means tranquillity, in a great degree, reſtored to the church, the abettors of that doctrine not daring, under a prince who had ſo much at heart the purity of the faith, to raiſe diſturbances, as they had done under the preceding emperors. Conſtantine enjoyed the remaining part of his reign in that peace and quiet, which his piety, juſtice and moderation well deſerved, the Saracens religiouſly obſerving the treaty between them and the empire, and the Lombards being, by their inteſtine broils, diverted from

They conclude a peace with the empire.

The Bulgarians break into Thrace.

The ſixth œcumenical council.

[c] Idem ibid. ad ann. Conſt. 5. [d] Idem ad ann. Conſt. 9.

from extending their conquests in Italy. In the beginning of the year 685, he was seized with a lingering distemper, of which he died in the month of September, after having reigned seventeen years and some months [c].

Constantine dies.

Justinian II.

He was succeeded by his son Justinian, a youth but sixteen years old. With him Abdelmelech, the new prince of the Saracens, confirmed the peace made with the empire, and at the same time proposed by his embassadors a new treaty, in virtue of which Justinian was to repress the Maronites, who by their frequent excursions from mount Libanus, greatly harrassed the Saracens; and Abdelemech to pay him for this service a thousand nummi a day, an horse, and a slave. To this treaty the young and unwary prince readily agreed, and immediately dispatched Magistrianus, with a chosen body of troops, against the Maronites, whom he overcame, and put out of a condition of molesting the Saracens for a long time after. In the second year of his reign, he marched in person against the Bulgarians, who had been allowed to settle in Lower Mæsia, from them afterwards called Bulgaria, and without any regard to the treaty concluded with them by his father, ravaged their country, and took several of their strong holds. But the Bulgarians, soon recovering from their consternation, drew together their forces; and falling upon the emperor, drove him out of their country, and obliged him to abandon the places, and restore the captives, he had taken. He was attended with better success against the Sclavi or Sclavonians, whom he defeated in several battles; which encouraged him to break the treaty he had lately concluded with the Saracens, tho' Abdelemech had faithfully performed every thing required of him by that agreement, and did all that lay in his power to prevent a rupture. At length, finding the emperor obstinately bent upon a war, he raised a powerful army, and gave the command of it to one of his generals named Mohammed; who causing the articles of the late treaty to be carried before his men on the point of a spear, met the emperor in the neighbourhood of Sebastopolis; but in the engagement that ensued, was obliged to give ground, and retire to his camp, where he must have perished with hunger, or submitted to the conqueror, had he not in the mean time gained over the commander of the Sclavi in the emperor's service; whose unexpected desertion, with twenty thousand of his men, caused such a consternation in the Roman army, that Is put to flight by the Bulgarians.

Makes war upon the Saracens.

[c] Cedren. ad ann. Const. 17. Niceph. c. 3.

that they immediately betook themſelves to a precipitous flight, being purſued with great ſlaughter by the enemy. The emperor with much-ado reached Leucate, where tranſported with rage, he cauſed the Sclavi or Sclavini who had continued with him, to the number of ten thouſand, to be cut in pieces, with their wives and children, and their bodies to be thrown into the ſea. From Leucate he returned to Conſtantinople, where, without betraying the leaſt concern for his late diſgrace, or attempting to reſtrain the victorious Saracens, by whom the abandoned provinces were harraſſed in a moſt cruel manner, and Armenia entirely reduced, he was wholly taken up in embelliſhing his metropolis with new buildings. Among the reſt he erected a magnificent banquetting-houſe, from him called Juſtinianeum, and a theatre near the palace, cauſing a church dedicated to the virgin Mary, to be pulled down to make room for it. This unchriſtian and unpopular action gained him the ill-will of the people, whoſe averſion to him was heightened by the tyrannical, arbitrary and cruel conduct of his two chief miniſters Stephen and Theodotus. The former, by nation a Perſian, cauſed ſeveral perſons of diſtinction to be put to death, upon ſuſpicions altogether groundleſs; and in the end came to ſuch a pitch of arrogance, as to threaten in a moſt diſreſpectful manner Anaſtaſia Auguſta, the emperor's mother. Theodotus was by profeſſion a monk; but being by the emperor taken out of his cell, and intruſted with great power, he exceeded in cruelty Stephen himſelf, cauſing under various pretences, ſuch of the nobility as ſeemed to deſpiſe him, to be put to no leſs cruel than ignominious deaths. The emperor, dreading the dangerous effects of the hatred, which the people had on ſeveral occaſions ſhewn to him, and his two favourite miniſters, reſolved to be before-hand with them; and accordingly ordered Stephen the eunuch, and Rufus one of his generals, to fall upon the inhabitants of Conſtantinople in the night-time, and maſſacre them in their houſes, beginning with the patriarch Callinicus. But this bloody and inhuman maſſacre was happily prevented in the following manner: Leontius, a patrician, and formerly commander of the forces in the eaſt, after he had been by the jealous emperor kept three years in priſon, was at this time ſet at liberty, and appointed governor of Greece, with orders to embarque immediately for his government; but while he was waiting for a favourable wind, ſeveral of his friends came to viſit him, and among the reſt two monks, Gregory the ſuperior of a monaſtery, and Paul, who, as they were ſkilled in Aſtronomy,

He is defeated by them.

He renders himſelf odious to the people.

The cruelty of his miniſtery.

He orders a general maſſacre.

ſtronomy, ſays Cedrenus, had foretold him, while he lay in priſon expecting every moment his laſt doom, that he ſhould attain to the empire before his death. Theſe, upon his expoſtulating with them for having deceived him with vain promiſes, encouraged him to lay hold of the preſent opportunity to make good their prediction; which, they ſaid, he might eaſily do, the emperor being univerſally abhorred, both by the nobility and people, and ready to receive him as their deliverer. Leontius hearkened to them; and taking with him his own ſoldiers, that is, thoſe who had been appointed to attend him into Greece, he broke open the priſon and being joined by many others, who had been long detained there, he led them to the forum, inviting the people, as he went, to meet him in the church of St. Sophia; which being ſoon crouded, the patriarch appearing, cried aloud to the aſſembled multitude, This is the day which the Lord hath made. The people, thus animated by the patriarch, proclaimed Leontius emperor, and haſtening to the palace, ſeized on Juſtinian, carried him to the circus, and there, after many other indignities, cut off his noſe, and with one voice baniſhed him to Cherſona. At the ſame time Theodotus and Stephen were dragged to the forum, where they were burnt alive [f]. This revolution happened in the tenth year of Juſtinian's reign, and 694th of the chriſtian æra.

Juſtinian depoſed.

THE firſt year of Leontius's reign, was not diſturbed by any foreign wars or domeſtic troubles. In the ſecond Sergius, who commanded the Roman troops in Lazica, betrayed that province to the Saracens, who the following year invaded Africa, made themſelves maſters of Carthage, and over-ran the whole country; but they were driven out by John the patrician, a man of great valour, and experience in war, whom the emperor had ſent againſt them. The Saracens, to repair the great loſſes they had ſuſtained, equipped another fleet, and returning to Africa, obliged John to fly to the ſea-coaſt, where he embarqued with the troops under his command for Conſtantinople. But the fleet having touched at Crete, ſome of the chief officers, apprehending the emperor would call them to an account for thus abandoning Africa to the enemy, prevailed upon the ſoldiers to revolt, and proclaim Apſimar one of Leontius's generals emperor. Apſimar, or, as he was afterwards called, Tiberius, readily accepted the imperial dignity, and ſailing without loſs of time to Conſtantinople, ſurprized the city, took Leontius priſoner, Leontius.

The Saracens maſters of Africa.

Leontius depoſed, and Apſimar made emperor.

[f] Theoph. Cedren. ann Juſt. 10. Niceph. c. 4.

priſoner, and having cauſed his noſe to be cut off, confined him to a monaſtery in Dalmatia, after he had reigned ſcarce three years [g]. Tiberius, thus raiſed to the empire, ſent his brother Heraclius into Cappadocia, to watch the motions of the Saracens. He, taking advantage of ſome diviſions that reigned among them, penetrated into Syria as far as Samoſata, waſting all before him, and returned to Cappadocia loaded with booty, after having put to the ſword, as we are told, no fewer than two hundred thouſand of the enemy [h]. Notwithſtanding this loſs, the Saracens broke into the Roman territories the following year, and laid ſiege to Antaradus in Syria; but not being able to maſter that place, they ſat down before Mopſueſtia in Cilicia, which they reduced and fortified. In the fourth year of Tiberius's reign, Boanes, ſurnamed Heptadæmon, betrayed Armenia to the Saracens. The ſame year Tiberius baniſhed Philippicus a patrician, to whom he was chiefly indebted for his promotion, into Cephalenia, for relating a dream, which Tiberius interpreted, as portending the empire to him. The following year, the nobility of Armenia, taking arms againſt their new maſters, drove them out with great ſlaughter, and ſent to Tiberius, demanding his aſſiſtance. But in the mean time Mohammed, entering Armenia with a mighty army, recovered the country; and having got the authors of the revolt into his power, burnt them alive. Encouraged with this ſucceſs, they invaded Cilicia once more, under the conduct of Azar; but were, to the number of ten thouſand either cut in pieces by Heraclius, or taken priſoners, and ſent in chains to Conſtantinople [i]. In the mean time Juſtinian, the depoſed emperor, who had been confined to a monaſtery at Cherſona, having betrayed a great deſire of recovering his former dignity, the inhabitants of the place, dreading the indignation of Tiberius, and the evils attending a civil war, reſolved to prevent them, by either killing Juſtinian, or ſending him in chains to Conſtantinople; but he, ſuſpecting their deſign, fled privately to the chagan or king of the Chazari, who received him in a manner ſuitable to his rank, and gave him his ſiſter Theodora in marriage. But being ſoon after gained by the rich preſents and large promiſes of Tiberius, he undertook either to deliver up to him the unfortunate 200,000 Saracens cut in pieces.

Armenia betrayed to the Saracens.

Who are defeated in Cilicia.

[g] Theoph. Cedren. ad ann. Leont. 3. Niceph. c. 5. [h] Theoph. Cedren. ad ann. Tib. Apſ. 2. [i] Idem ad ann. Tib. Apſ. 3, 4, 5.

fortunate prince alive, or to ſend him his head. The deſign was revealed by one of the king's domeſtics to Theodora, and by her to her huſband, who thereupon fled to Trebelis king of the Bulgarians, by whom he was received with great demonſtrations of kindneſs. We are told, that being overtaken, on his flight from the country of the Chazari, by a violent ſtorm near the ſtreights of Danaprium, Myaces, one of his domeſtics, apprehending the veſſel to be in imminent danger, and therefore conjuring him to make a vow, that he would forgive his enemies, if it ever pleaſed Heaven to reſtore him to his throne, he anſwered ſternly, Let God drown me this moment, if I ſpare any of them[k]. Trebelis not only entertained the fugitive prince with extraordinary magnificence, but, having raiſed a powerful army, marched with him ſtrait to Conſtantinople, and laid ſiege to that metropolis, the inhabitants, who looked upon their city as impregnable, rallying and reviling both princes from the walls; but the third day of the ſiege, ſome Romans having got into the city through an aqueduct, opened the gates to the reſt; which Tiberius no ſooner knew, than he fled with his treaſures to Apollonias, leaving Juſtinian once more maſter of the imperial city and the empire. Being thus reſtored to his former dignity, he diſmiſſed Trebelis, loaded with rich preſents, and beſtowed upon him part of the Roman dominions, called afterwards Zagoria. Having, after a diligent ſearch, got into his power Tiberius, Leontius, by whom he had been driven out, and Heraclius the brother of Tiberius, he led the two former in triumph through the city, and carrying them to the circus, beheld the ſhews ſitting on the imperial throne, with his feet upon their necks, the inconſtant multitude repeating in the mean time that verſe of the pſalmiſt, Thou ſhalt tread upon the lion and adder, &c. After this inſulting pageantry, he cauſed their heads, and that of Heraclius, to be cut off. As for Callinicus the patriarch, he ordered his eyes to be put out, and then baniſhed him to Rome, that he might have the cruel mortification of depending for his ſubſiſtence upon the biſhop of that city, whoſe authority he had always oppoſed to the utmoſt of his power[l]. The emperor, having now got rid of thoſe whom he moſt dreaded, began to rage with implacable fury againſt all who had adhered to them, putting to death incredible multitudes of citizens and ſoldiers, and diſpeopleing, in the heat of his revenge, whole provinces at once. In the third year of his reſtoration Trebelis, king of the Bulgarians, eſpouſes the cauſe of Juſtinian.

Who is reſtored.

Leontius and Tiberius put to death.

[k] Niceph. c. 5. [l] Theoph. Cedren. ad ann. Tib. Apſ. 7 Niceph. ibid.

reſtoration, unmindful of the obligations which he owed to Trebelis king of the Bulgarians, he broke the alliance concluded with that prince, and invaded Thrace, at the head of a mighty army, with a deſign to recover the country he had yielded to him. But he was attended with no better ſucceſs than his ingratitude deſerved, his army being utterly defeated, and he himſelf obliged to make his eſcape in a light veſſel to Conſtantinople. The following year he equipped a mighty fleet, not with a deſign to oppoſe the Bulgarians, who ravaged the provinces of the empire without controul, but to be revenged on the inhabitants of Cherſona and the Boſphorans, who had reſolved to diſpatch him, or deliver him up to Tiberius, while he lived in exile among them. On board this fleet was embarqued a numerous army, with expreſs orders to put all the inhabitants of thoſe parts to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex or age, of guilty or innocent. Theſe cruel orders were executed with the utmoſt barbarity; multitudes of that unhappy people were put to the ſword; ſome were by the cruel ſoldiery roaſted alive, others caſt into the ſea, &c. The children, however, were ſpared; which the inhuman emperor no ſooner underſtood, than, tranſported with rage, he diſpatched freſh orders to his officers, commanding them not to leave a child alive in the place. They were accordingly all maſſacred; but ſome of the leading men among the Boſphorans having made their eſcape and taken refuge in the country of the Chazari, with the aſſiſtance of that neighbouring nation, they defeated in ſeveral encounters the emperor's forces; and, renouncing their allegiance to him, proclaimed Philippicus, the ſon of Baidanes, who had been baniſhed by Tiberius to Cephalenia, as we have related above, but happened to be then at Cherſona. The troops that were ſent againſt them by Juſtinian, finding they could not reduce the city of Cherſona, purſuant to his orders, and dreading the implacable humour of the tyrant, reſolved to conſult their own ſafety, by acknowledging Philippicus; which they did accordingly, joining thoſe againſt whom they had been ſent. Philippicus, thus proclaimed and ſupported by two powerful armies, marched ſtrait to Conſtantinople, which he entered without oppoſition, the emperor being then at Sinope in Paphlagonia with a body of Thracians, againſt whom Philippicus diſpatched Elias prince of the Boſphorans; who, having gained over the Thracians, took the emperor priſoner, and cutting off his head, ſent it to Philippicus, by whoſe orders it was conveyed to Rome. Tiberius, the emperor's ſon by Theodora, took ſanctuary in a church; but was drag-

Juſtinian defeated by the Bulgarians.

His cruelty.

Philippicus proclaimed emperor.

Juſtinian killed.

ged from the altar, which he graſped, and ſlain by Maurus a patrician, in the preſence of Anaſtaſia his grand-mother [m]. Such was the deſerved end of Juſtinian II. in the eighth year after his reſtoration, and 711th of the chriſtian æra.

Philippicus. PHILIPPICUS had no ſooner taken poſſeſſion of the throne, than, openly eſpouſing the cauſe of the Monothelites, he ſummoned a council of biſhops, who were all infected with that hereſy, and conſequently eaſily prevailed upon to condemn and revoke all the acts of the ſixth general council. The emperor was induced to ſummon this council by a Monothelite monk, who had foretold him he ſhould one day attain the empire, if Cedrenus is to be credited, and now promiſed him a long and happy reign, provided he aboliſhed the ſixth general council, and eſtabliſhed the doctrine of the Monothelites. But while Philippicus was thus buſying himſelf in matters relating to religion, the Bulgarians, breaking unexpectedly into Thrace, advanced to the very gates of Conſtantinople; and, having laid waſte the country, and put to the ſword an incredible multitude of people, returned, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition, loaded with booty. At the ſame time, the Saracens, invading the Roman territories, committed dreadful ravages, took the city of Medæa and ſeveral other places, and returned likewiſe unmoleſted, carrying with them great numbers of captives. Theſe calamities rendering Philippicus odious to the people, one Rufus, at the inſtigation of two patricians, viz. Theodorus, and Georgius commander of the troops in Thrace, entering the palace with a company of Thracians, while the emperor was repoſing after dinner, put out his eyes, and withdrew undiſcovered [n]. Nicephorus writes, that Rufus, ſeizing the emperor, dragged him to the hippodrome, and there cauſed his eyes to be plucked out [o]. Be that as it will, the next day, being Whitſunday, the people, aſſembling in the great church, proclaimed Artemius, chief ſecretary to Philippicus, emperor; who was accordingly crowned by the patriarch [p]. Artemius, or, as he was afterwards called, Anaſtaſius, was a man of great learning, and had been from his youth employed with uncommon ſucceſs in the management of public affairs. As he was a zealous catholic, he made it his chief ſtudy to heal the diviſions of the church, without neglecting the affairs of the ſtate; for, in the very beginning of his reign, he appointed Leo, an Iſaurian, a perſon of great experience in wa

The Bulgarians break into Thrace.

Philippicus depoſed.

Anaſtaſius ſucceeds.

[m] Theoph. ad ann. Juſt. 8. Niceph. c. 6. [n] Theoph. ad ann. Phil. 2. [o] Niceph. c. 7. [p] Idem ibid.

war, commander in chief of all his forces, and ſent him with a powerful army to the frontiers of Syria, to protect Aſia Minor againſt the inroads of the Saracens. Being informed, that the Saracens deſigned to lay ſiege to Conſtantinople, he cauſed a great number of light ſhips to be built, the walls to be repaired, and having filled the public granaries, ordered ſuch of the citizens as had not laid up proviſions for three years, to depart the city. But news being brought in the mean time, that the enemy's fleet was ſailed to Phœnicia, he ordered his to aſſemble from the different ports of the empire at Rhodes, appointing John, deacon of the great church, his admiral. The fleet met accordingly; but the admiral puniſhing with more ſeverity than prudence ſome refractory ſeamen, the reſt mutinied and killed him; and being well appriſed they could by no other means avoid the puniſhment due to their crime, but by openly revolting, they declared Anaſtaſius unworthy of the empire, and obliged one Theodoſius, a perſon of a mean extraction and then receiver of the revenue at Adramyttium to accept of the purple. Anaſtaſius, upon the firſt notice of the revolt, fled to Nice in Bithynia, leaving a ſtrong garriſon in Conſtantinople; which city Theodoſius immediately beſieged by ſea and land, and reduced, after having continued ſix months before it. He had no ſooner entered the city, than he diſpatched the magiſtrates and the patriarch to acquaint Anaſtaſius with what had happened, who, upon promiſe of his life, renounced all claim to the empire, and, taking the habit of a monk, delivered himſelf up to the new prince, by whom he was baniſhed to Theſſalonica, after he had enjoyed the title of emperor about two years [q]. But Leo, whom Anaſtaſius had appointed commander in chief of all his forces, refuſing to acknowledge Theodoſius, drew together all the forces in the eaſt, with a deſign, as he gave out, to reſtore the depoſed emperor; but being perſuaded by Maſalnias, prince of the Saracens, to aſſume the purple, and powerfully aſſiſted by Artavaſdes, an Armenian, a man of great intereſt in that country, he marched, at the head of a conſiderable army, to Nicomedia, where he met, defeated, and took priſoner the ſon of Theodoſius, who had been ſent againſt him. From Nicomedia he purſued his march to Conſtantinople, being acknowledged emperor in all the places through which he paſſed. Hereupon Theodoſius finding it was in vain to contend with ſo powerful a rival,

The ſeamen mutiny, kill their admiral and declare Theodoſius emperor.

Leo revolts from Theodoſius.

[q] Idem, c. 8. Theoph Cedren. ad ann. Anaſt.

diſpatched to him Germanus the patriarch, and ſome of the chief men in the ſenate, offering to reſign the purple, on condition his life was ſpared. To this Leo readily agreed; and Theodoſius, deveſting himſelf of the purple, entered, with his ſon, into orders, after having reigned one year. Thus Theophanes and Cedrenus [r]. But Nicephorus writes, that the officers of the army, finding Theodoſius unequal to the high ſtation to which he had been raiſed, perſuaded him to abdicate, and chooſe Leo in his room [s]. Be that as it will, Leo was received with loud acclamations at Conſtantinople, and crowned on the twenty-fifth of March of the preſent year 716, by the patriarch Germanus, after he had bound himſelf by a ſolemn oath to preſerve, and, to the utmoſt of his power, defend, the orthodox faith. He was a native of Iſauria, of a mean extraction, and had ſerved ſome time in the low ſtation of a common ſoldier, from which he was raiſed by Juſtinian II. and admitted on account of the tallneſs of his ſtature and comelineſs of his perſon, amongſt the ſpatarii, that is, the emperor's guards. Anaſtaſius appointed him commander in chief of all his forces, which poſt he held when he aſſumed the purple. He is diſtinguiſhed from the other emperors bearing the name of Leo by the ſurname of Iconomachus, which was given him on account of his combating the worſhip of images. In the firſt year of his reign, Maſalnias, prince of the Saracens, at whoſe inſtigation he had aſſumed the purple, took by ſurprize the city of Pergamus; which is looked upon by the hiſtorians, as a puniſhment juſtly inflicted by Heaven upon the wicked and barbarous inhabitants, who hearing the Saracens were preparing to invade Aſia, had ripped up the belly of a woman big with child, and boiling the infant in a kettle, had dipped their right hands in the water, being purſuaded by a magician, that they would by that means become invincible, and defend their city againſt all the attempts of the enemy [t]. In the ſecond year of Leo's reign, Solyman, one of the generals of the Saracens, broke into Thrace; but he dying, Haumar was appointed to command in his room, who loſt moſt of his men by the ſeverity of the winter. However, in the following ſpring he approached Conſtantinople, and inveſted it by land, while Suphiam and Izeth, arriving with two mighty fleets, the one from Egypt and the other from Africa, blocked it up by ſea; but moſt of their ſhips being deſtroyed

Theodoſius abdicates.

Leo crowned emperor.

Pergamus, taken by the Saracens.

Who beſieges Conſtantinople; but are forced to abandon the enterprize.

[r] Theoph. Cedren. ad ann. Leon. 1.
[s] Niceph. c. 9
[t] Idem ibid. Theoph. Cedren. ubi ſupra ſtroyed, either by the artificial fire, of which we have ſpoken above, or by ſtorms, they thought it adviſeable to abandon the enterprize, and retire, after having lain before the city thirteen months, or, as others will have it, two years. The calamities, which the inhabitants ſuffered during the ſiege, can hardly be expreſſed; thirty thouſand of them are ſaid to have periſhed with hunger, and the like number to have been ſwept of by the plague [u]. Haumar, prince of the Saracens, highly provoked at the diſappointment of his armies and fleets before Conſtantinople, began to rage with great fury againſt the chriſtians in his dominions, forbidding them at firſt the exerciſe of their religion, and ſoon after commanding them, on pain of death to renounce it, and embrace the abominable ſect of Mohammed. Many, to avoid death, made an outward profeſſion of the religion, if we may ſo call it, of their inſulting maſters, while ſome few, notwithſtanding the ignorance and depravity of that age, maintained, with unſhaken conſtancy, the true religion, at the expence of their lives [w]. The ſame year, Sergius, governor of Sicily, revolting, declared one Baſilius, the ſon of Onomagulus, emperor, changing his name into that of Tiberius; but Paul, an officer of the houſhould, who was ſent againſt the uſurper, having got him into his power and cauſed his head to be ſtruck off, reſtored the iſland to its former tranquillity. Sergius, the chief author of the revolt, took refuge amongſt the Lombards in Italy [x]. The ſame year, the empreſs Maria was, to the unſpeakable joy of the emperor and the inhabitants of Conſtantinople, delivered of a ſon, named Conſtantine, and commonly nicknamed Copronymus, from his having defiled the ſacred font at his baptiſm. Theophanes, the true author of the hiſtory intituled miſcella, which is aſcribed to Paulus Diaconus, tell us falſly, that Germanus the patriarch foretold from that accident, that the infant would one day prove a great plague to the church [y]. The joy for the birth of the young prince was ſomewhat allayed by the approach of a numerous army of Bulgarians headed by the late emperor Anaſtaſius, who, weary of a private life, had prevailed upon thoſe barbarians to acknowledge him for emperor, and ſupport his claim to the crown. They laid ſiege to Conſtantinople, hoping, by means of the partizans of Anaſtaſius, among whom were ſeveral perſons of great

They perſecute the chriſtians.

Sergius revolts in Sicily; but is cut off.

Conſtantine Copronymus born.

Anaſtaſius attempts to reſume the empire.

[u] Cedren. ann. Leon. 2. Beda de ſex ætat. Paul. Diacon. l. vi. c. 47. [w] Theoph. ad ann. Leon 3 [x] Niceph. c. 10. Theoph. Cedren. ibid. [y] Hiſt. miſcel. p. 74.

distinction, to make themselves soon masters of the city; but meeting, contrary to their expectation, with a vigorous opposition, they seized on the unfortunate Anastasius, and delivered him up to the emperor, who put him to death, with all his accomplices, among whom was the bishop of Thessalonica [z]. Leo, having happily weathered this storm, caused his son Constantine to be solemly crowned emperor, in order to secure the empire to his posterity. The ceremony was performed by the patriarch Germanus, on Easter-day in 720, the fifth of Leo's reign [a]. In the mean time the Saracens, under the conduct of their new prince Ized, who had succeeded Haumar, having equipped a mighty fleet, ravaged the coasts of Italy and Sicily; and landing in Sardinia, raged there with unspeakable fury, destroying all with fire and sword; but being soon after diverted from molesting the empire by the intestine divisions that arose amongst them, another Ized, surnamed Mualabis, having set up for himself in Persia, the emperor was more at leisure to reform several abuses, that had crept into the court and state under the former emperors. In the tenth year of his reign and 725th of the christian æra, he published the famous edict, commanding all images to be removed out of the churches, and forbidding any kind of worship to be paid to them. This edict was, with great vigour, opposed in the east by Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, and Johannes Damascenus; but Leo, having deposed Germanus, and raised Anastasius to the see of Constantinople in his room, caused his edict to be put in execution at Constantinople, and the images to be pulled down and destroyed by his officers throughout the city, without sparing the statue of our Saviour, which had been placed above the gate of the imperial palace by Constantine the Great. The people, struck with horror in seeing the images of our Saviour and his saints thus insulted, and either torn in pieces, or burnt by the emperor's officers, assembled in a tumultuous manner, and having first vented their rage upon Leo's statues and images, flew to the palace; but being repulsed and pursued with great slaughter by the emperor's guards, they were forced to disperse and suffer the edict to take place. But in the west, especially in Italy, it was had in such abhorrence, that the people openly revolted; which gave Luitprand, king of the Lombards, an opportunity of seizing on Ravenna and several other cities of the exarchate.

Constantine crowned emperor.

Leo's edict against images.

A tumult at Constantinople.

The people revolt in Italy.

[z] Niceph. c. 10. [a] Idem, c. 11. Theoph. Cedren. ad ann. Leon. 5.

exarchate. He was, however, ſoon after driven out by the Venetians; who, at that time, made no ſmall figure in Italy. Gregory II. then pope, or biſhop, of Rome, jealous of the growing power of the Lombards, had, by a letter to Orſus duke of Venice, prevailed upon him to eſpouſe the intereſt of the emperor, and lead his forces againſt Ravenna; which city he ſurprized, before Luitprand, who was then at Pavia, had the leaſt notice or ſuſpicion of his deſign. Gregory had, from the very beginning, oppoſed with great warmth the emperor's edict forbidding the worſhipping of images; and now, preſuming upon the eminent ſervice he had rendered the empire, he wrote a long letter to Leo earneſtly entreating him to revoke it. But the emperor, well appriſed, that Gregory had been prompted by his own intereſt, and not by that of the empire, to prevent the Lombards from making new conqueſts in Italy, was exaſperated to ſuch a degree againſt him, for continuing ſtill to oppoſe his edict, that he ſent private orders to his officers in Italy, eſpecially to Paul exarch of Ravenna, and to Mauritius, governor, or, as he was then ſtyled, duke, of Rome, enjoining them to get Gregory, by ſome means or other, into their power, and ſend him dead or alive to Conſtantinople. But the people of Rome, who had a great veneration for their biſhop, diſcovering the plot, guarded him ſo carefully, that the emperor's officers could never find an opportunity of putting their orders in execution. Three aſſaſſins undertook to murder him; but two of them were apprehended, and put to death, which the third eſcaped, by taking ſanctuary in a monaſtery, and there embracing a religious life. Gregory, finding himſelf thus ſupported by the people of Rome, ſolemnly excommunicated the exarch, for publiſhing, and attempting to put in execution, the emperor's edict, writing at the ſame time letters to the Venetians, to king Luitprand, to the Lombard dukes, and to all the cities of the empire, exhorting them to continue ſtedfaſt in the catholic faith, and oppoſe, with all their might, the execution of the impious, as he ſtyled it, and heretical edict. Theſe letters made ſuch an impreſſion upon the minds of the people, that the inhabitants of Italy, though of different intereſts and often at war with each other, viz. the people of Rome, the Venetians, and the Lombards, entering into an alliance, reſolved to act in concert, and prevent, to the utmoſt of their power, the execution of the imperial edict. The people of Rome and thoſe of the Pentapolis, now Marca d' Ancona, did not ſtop here; but pulling every-where down the emperor's ſtatues, openly revolted, Gregory II. oppoſes the emperor's edict.

Leo attempts upon his life.

The exarch excommunicated.

The people of Italy revolt.

revolted, and refuſing to acknowledge an iconoclaſt, that is, a breaker of images, for emperor, they choſe magiſtrates of their own; nay, they had ſome thoughts of electing a new emperor, and conducting him with a ſtrong army to Conſtantinople: but this ſcheme was oppoſed by the pope as impracticable. In Ravenna the people roſe in defence of the images againſt Paul the exarch; and having killed him and all the iconoclaſts in the city, ſubmitted to Luitprand king of the Lombards, a cunning prince, who took care to improve to his advantage the general diſcontent that reigned among the ſubjects of the empire. In Naples the people took arms againſt Exhilaratus their duke (for Naples was then governed by dukes ſent from Conſtantinople) and murdered him, with his ſon Adrian and one of his chief officers, for preſſing the inhabitants to receive the edict, and conform to the religion of their prince. However, as they hated the Lombards, with whom they had been almoſt conſtantly at war, they continued firm and conſtant in their obedience to Leo, and received Peter, who was appointed duke of Naples in the room of Exhilaratus. The people of Rome, finding the emperor inflexible in his deſign againſt the worſhip of images and the life of the pope, whom he looked upon as the chief author of all the diſturbances, reſolved at length to renounce their allegiance to Leo, and to continue united under the pope as their head, binding themſelves by a ſolemn oath to defend him againſt all the attempts both of the emperor and the Lombards, whom they had but too much reaſon to miſtruſt [b]. Theophanes, Cedrenus, Zonaras, Nicephorus, and other Greek writers, tell us, that the Romans, withdrawing their obedience to Leo, choſe pope Gregory for their prince, taking an oath of allegiance to him. They add, that the pope accepted of the principality, forbidding the Romans to pay thenceforth tribute to the emperor; that he publicly excommunicated Leo as an heretic, abſolved his ſubjects from their allegiance to him, and ſolemnly declared him fallen from the empire. Hence, ſay they, had the temporal and independent dominion of the pope over Rome its riſe, which was afterwards enlarged by Pepin and Charles the Great, and extended to the exarchate of Ravenna, the Pentapolis, and ſeveral other cities of Italy. But it appears from Paulus Diaconus, Anaſtaſius Bibliothecarius, Joannes Damaſcenus, who all flouriſhed nearer thoſe times, and in the places where the Ravenna ſubmits to the Lombards.

The inhabitants of Naples, kill their duke or governor.

The Romans revolt.

And chuſe the pope for their head.

The riſe of the temporal dominion of the pope.

[b] Anaſt. in Greg. II. Paul Diac. l. vi. Sigon. ad ann. 725, 726. Epiſt. 1 & 2 Greg. ad Leon.

the things they relate happened, nay, and from the letters of Gregory himſelf to Leo, that he acknowledged him for his lawful ſovereign as long as he lived, as did likewiſe Gregory III. his ſucceſſor [c]. The Latin writers take no notice of Gregory's excommunicating and depoſing the emperor, or abſolving his ſubjects from their oath of allegiance; but only tell us, that when Leo depoſed the patriarch Germanus and appointed Anaſtaſius in his room, Gregory excommunicated the latter; and rebuking the emperor by letters, earneſtly entreated him not to abuſe the power with which he had been truſted, to introduce innovations in the church [d]. However, the authority of the Greek hiſtorians has been preferred to that of the Latins, by all the proteſtant, and moſt of the Roman catholic, writers; but with very different views. The proteſtants followed them, that they might thence take occaſion to make a compariſon between our ſaviour and the pope. When the multitude, ſay they, offered to make our Saviour king, he rejected their offers, ſaying, My kingdom is not of this world: when the Romans offered the principality to Gregory, he readily accepted it, and from the ſervant of ſervants became the lord and maſter. Our Saviour expreſly commanded tribute to be paid to Cæſar: the pope would ſuffer no more tribute to be paid to Leo his lawful ſovereign, &c. [e]. On the other hand, the Roman catholics, by ſtanding to what the Greeks write, think they can defend the pope from all uſurpation, and eſtabliſh his temporal power and juriſdiction upon a better and more plauſible foundation, viz. the unanimous conſent of the people, conferring upon him, freely and without conſtraint, the principality [f]; not reflecting, that thoſe, who thus choſe him for their prince, had revolted from their lawful ſovereign; and conſequently that Gregory, by accepting the principality, became guilty both of rebellion and uſurpation. But from what we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of the Lombards in Italy, it will plainly appear, that the pope did not acquire the ſovereignty of Rome at this time, but many years after; nay, that his temporal dominion had not its riſe in Rome, but in the exarchate of Ravenna and the Pentapolis, which were taken by the celebrated Pepin, from Aſtulphus king of the Lombards, and given to pope Stephen, whom ſome call the ſecond, others the the third, of that name. As for the ſovereignty of Rome, the popes did not enjoy it, as we ſhall demonſtrate in a more proper place, till the year 876, when it was yielded to the apoſtolic ſee, as it began then to be called, by Charles ſurnamed the Bald. But to return to Leo: He was wholly taken up, during the remaining part of his long reign, in ſuppreſſing the worſhip of images throughout his dominions, and raging with great cruelty againſt thoſe, who refuſed to comply with his edict; while the Saracens, breaking into the eaſtern provinces, laid them waſte without controul, carrying yearly back with them an immenſe booty, and an incredible number of captives.

[c] Anaſt. Bibl. in Greg. II. Greg. II. in epiſt. 1. ad Leon. & Greg. III. epiſt. 3. ad. Bonifac. [d] Vide Anaſtaſ. ad ann. 658. [e] Vide Spanh. contra Maimburg. in hiſtor. imag. p. 52. [f] Giannetas. hiſt. Neap. l. v. p. 94.

Conſtantine married to Irene.

In the ſeventeenth year of his reign and 732d of the chriſtian æra, he married his ſon Conſtantine to the daughter of the king of the Chazari, after ſhe had been inſtructed in the principles of the chriſtian religion, and received at her baptiſm the name of Irene, a word ſignifying in the Greek tongue peace. The ſame year, the emperor cauſed a mighty fleet to be equipped, with a deſign to chaſtize and bring back to their duty the Romans and other people of Italy, who had revolted on occaſion of the edict againſt images; but, the fleet being ſhipwrecked in the Adriatic ſea, Leo could by no other means be revenged on the pope, who continued to oppoſe the execution of his edict, than by cauſing the revenues of the Roman ſee in Calabria and Sicily to be confiſcated [g].

Leo's fleet ſhipwrecked.

In the laſt year of Leo's reign, a dreadful earthquake happened at Conſtantinople, which overturned many churches, monaſteries, and private houſes, burying great numbers of people under the ruins. Not long after Leo died, having reigned twenty-five years, two months, and twenty days, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Conſtantine, who no ſooner ſaw himſelf ſole maſter of the empire, than he led an army againſt the Saracens, who had made an irruption into Aſia. In his abſence Artabazdus, who had married his ſiſter, gave out, that he was dead; and being thereupon acknowledged by the people and proclaimed emperor, he cauſed the ſons of Conſtantine to be ſecured; but as he was well apprized, that the report he had induſtriouſly ſpread of Conſtantine's death would be ſoon contradicted, he began to conſult with the patriarch Anaſtaſius, by what other means he might keep the people ſteady in their allegiance to him. Anaſtaſius had been a zealous iconoclaſt in the late reign; but to curry favour with Artabazdus, who had a great veneration for images, and to eſtrange the minds of the people from Conſtantine, Leo dies, and is ſucceeded by Conſtantine Copronymus.

Artabazdus revolts;

[g] Theoph. ad ann. Leon. 17.

ſtantine, he aſſembled them in the great church, and holding in his hand the wood of the holy croſs, he took the following oath: By him who died upon this wood, I ſwear, That Conſtantine one day addreſſed me with theſe words; I do not believe him to be the ſon of God, who was born of Mary, and is called Chriſt, but a mere man; for Mary was delivered of him after the ſame manner, as Mary my mother was delivered of me. This depoſition of the patriarch, whether true or falſe we cannot take upon us to determine, made ſuch an impreſſion on the minds of the multitude, that they immediately depoſed Conſtantine with one conſent, and, with repeated acclamations, ſaluted Artabazdus again emperor, who took Nicephorus his eldeſt ſon for his partner in the empire [h]. This gave riſe to a civil war, the greateſt, ſays Cedrenus, perhaps not without ſome exaggeration, that had happened ſince the beginning of the world. But all we know of it is, that Artabazdus and his ſon Nicephorus, being defeated by Conſtantine in ſeveral encounters, were in the end beſieged in Conſtantinople; which city held out, till the inhabitants were forced by famine to ſubmit. Artabazdus and his two ſons were taken and delivered up to the emperor, who cauſed their eyes to be pulled out, gave the city up to be plundered by his ſoldiers, and either baniſhed, maimed, or put to death all thoſe who had been any-ways concerned in the revolt. Anaſtaſius the patriarch was, by the emperor's orders, publicly beaten with rods, and then carried in an ignominious manner through the moſt frequented ſtreets of the city on an aſs, with his face to the tail. However, the time-ſerving prelate was continued in his ſee, becauſe the emperor could not find a worſe, ſays Theophanes, to prefer to it in his room [i]. Conſtantine, having thus got rid of his enemies at home, reſolved to march once more againſt the Saracens, who were at war among themſelves. Accordingly, having raiſed a powerful army, he entered Syria; and having overthrown the enemy in ſeveral encounters, made himſelf maſter of Germanicia and ſome other ſtrong-holds, which had been long in their hands. The Saracens, notwithſtanding their domeſtic quarrels, to divert the emperor from purſuing his conqueſts in Syria, aſſembled a mighty fleet, which ſteered its courſe to the iſland of Cyprus, where it was to be joined by other ſhips of war and a great number of tranſports with land-forces on board. But the Roman fleet coming unexpectedly

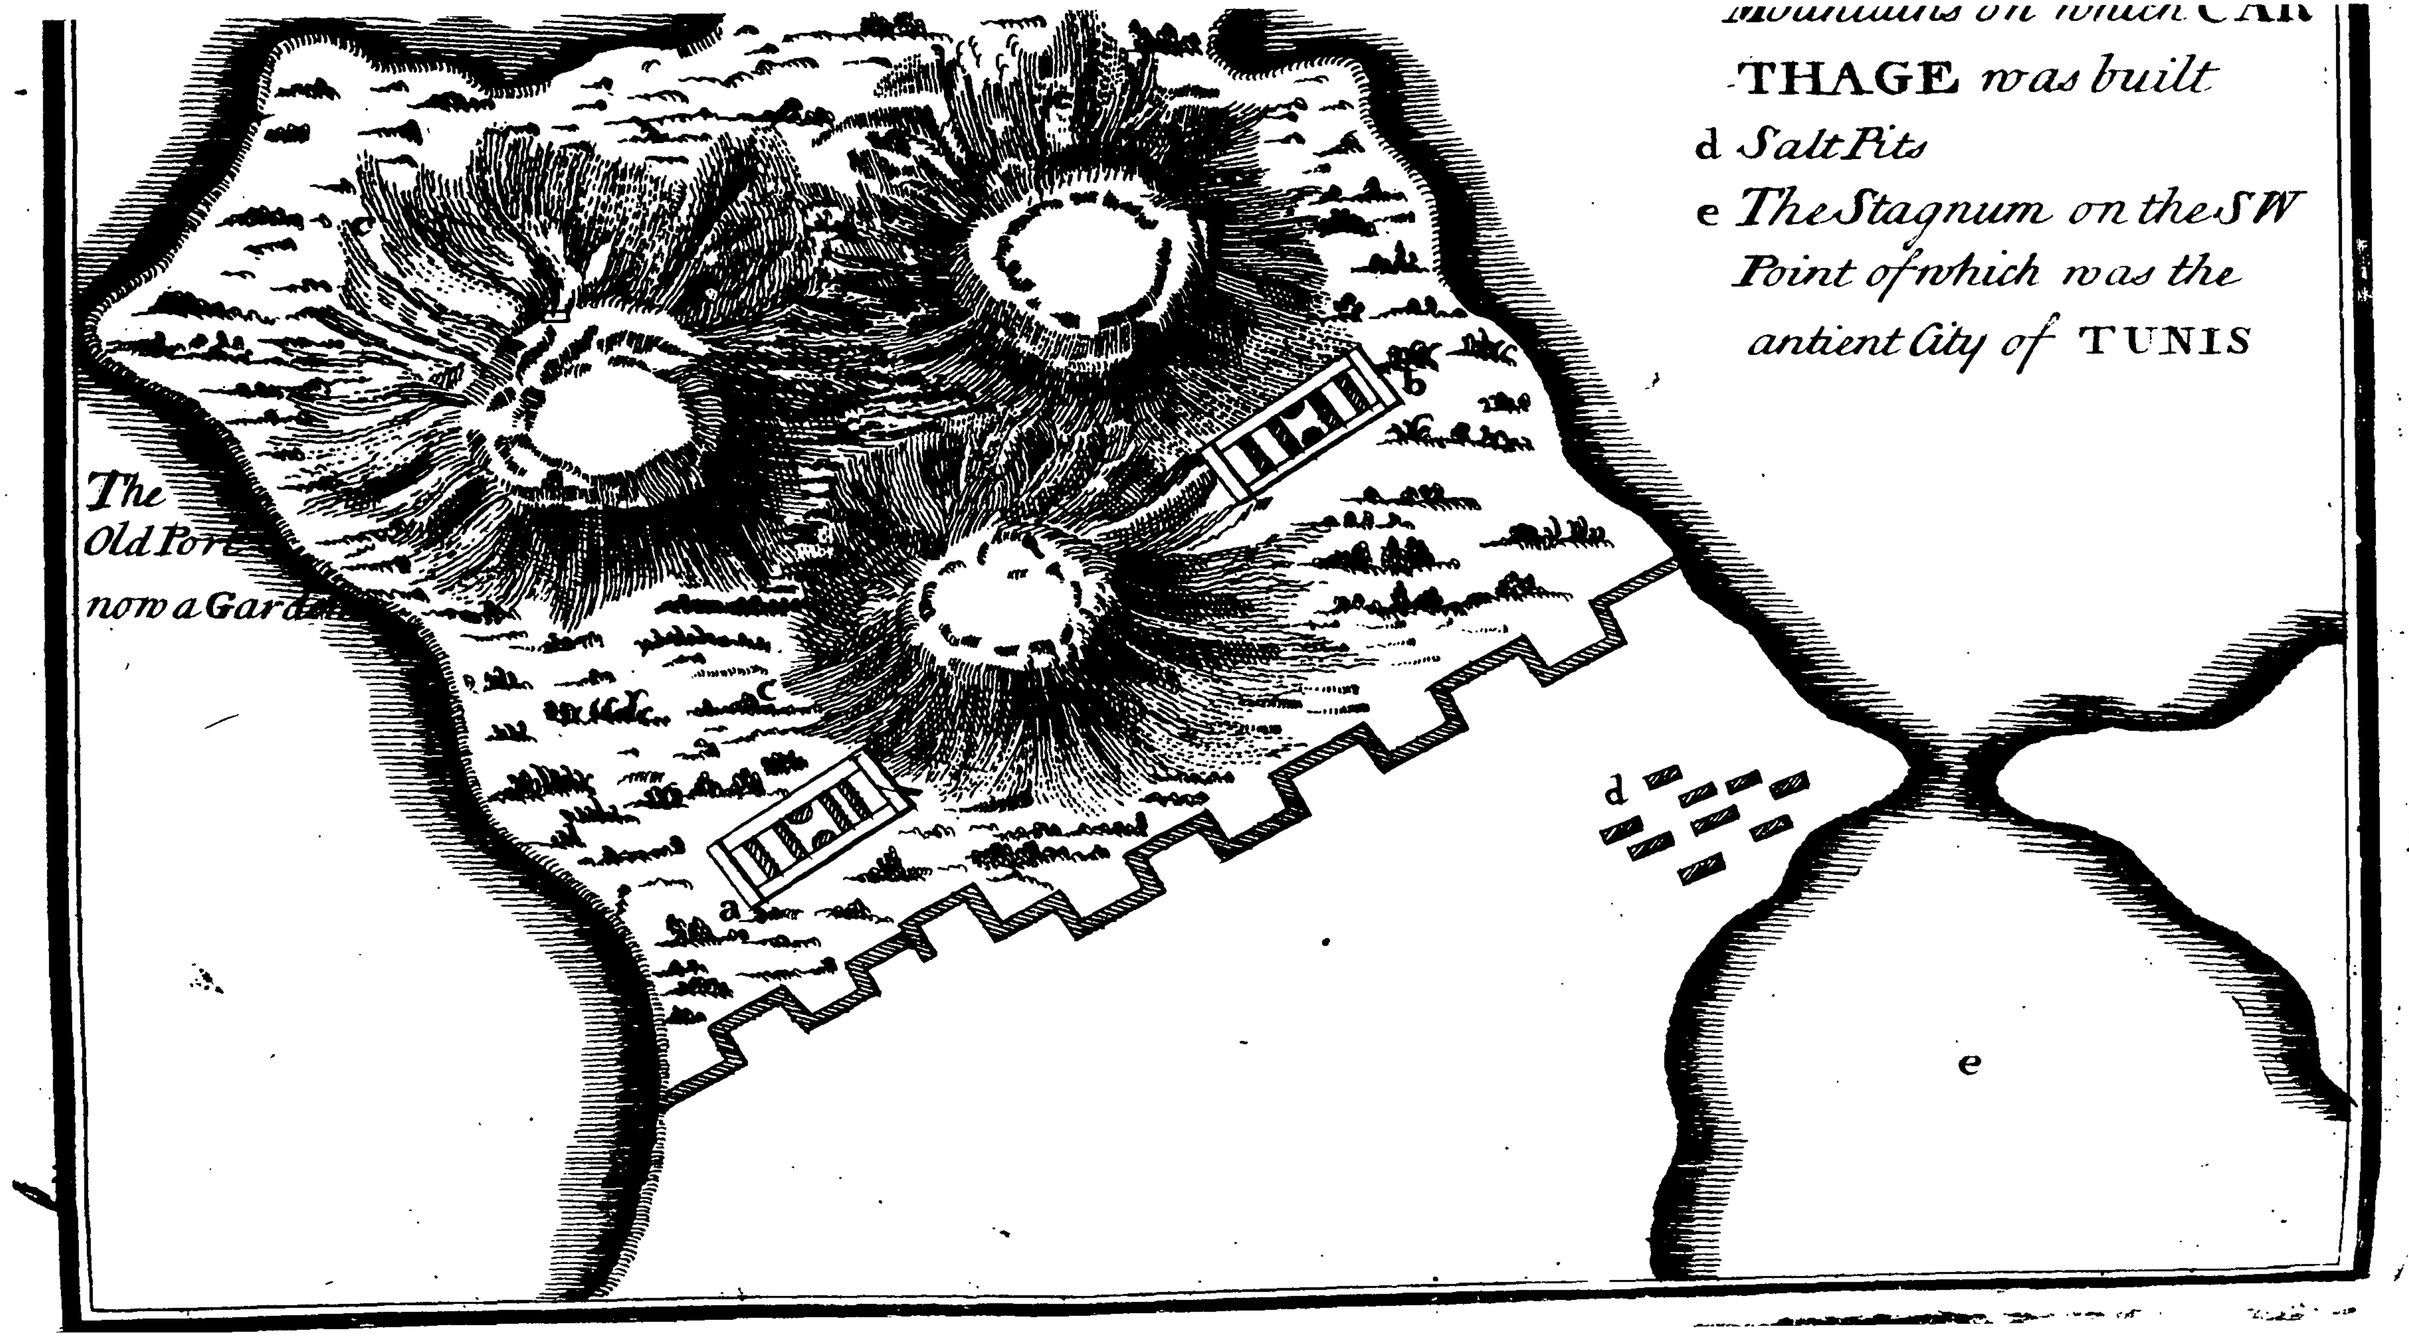
But is defeated, and Conſtantinople taken by Conſtantine.

Conſtantine recovers ſeveral places from the Saracens.

[h] Idem ad ann. Conſt. 1. [i] Idem ad ann. Conſt. 3.

Deſtroys their fleet.

pectedly upon them, while they were riding at anchor in one of the ports of that iſland, deſtroyed the whole navy, except three ſhips, which they ſuffered to eſcape with the news of ſo great a calamity [k]. However the emperor was diverted from purſuing the advantages that might have thence accrued to the empire, by the frequent earthquakes that happened about this time, and were by far the moſt deſtructive that had been known in any age. In Syria and Paleſtine ſeveral cities were ſwallowed up, others entirely ruined, and ſome, if we may give credit to Nicephorus, removed, without any conſiderable damage, ſix miles and upwards from their former ſeats. At the ſame time, happened an extraordinary darkneſs, which laſted from the fourth of Auguſt to the firſt of October, there being little or no diſtinction during that time, between day and night [l]. This calamity was followed by another ſtill more terrible, viz. a plague, which, breaking out in Calabria, ſoon ſpread all over Sicily, Greece, the iſlands in the Ægean ſea, and at length reached Conſtantinople, where it raged for three years together with ſuch fury, that the living were ſcarce ſufficient to bury the dead [m]. The plague no ſooner ceaſed, than Conſtantine, having cauſed his ſon Leo, then ſcarce a year old, to be proclaimed emperor, marched with what forces he could draw together into Armenia, and, taking advantage of the diviſions that ſtill reigned among the Saracens, made himſelf maſter of Miletene, Theodoſiopolis, and ſeveral other places. But he was diverted from purſuing his conqueſts in the eaſt, by a ſudden irruption of the Bulgarians, who, provoked at the emperor's cauſing ſome forts to be built on the frontiers of Thrace, broke into that province, and, advancing as far as the long wall, laid waſte the whole country. Conſtantine, having recalled his forces out of the eaſt, marched againſt them in perſon; but being ſurprized by the enemy in a narrow paſſage called Beragaba, his army was utterly defeated, and he obliged to ſave himſelf by flight to Conſtantinople [n]. Soon after his return to that metropolis, he renewed the edict publiſhed by his father againſt images, forbidding at the ſame time any worſhip to be paid to the ſaints, or their relics, and commanding their images to be removed out of the churches, and publicly burnt. Such of the biſhops as oppoſed the execution of this edict, were driven from their ſees; and the monks,



Dreadful earthquakes.

A violent plague.

Conſtantine defeated by the Bulgarians.

He perſecutes the worſhippers of images.

[k] Niceph. in Conſt. c. 13. [l] Idem ibid. Theoph. ad ann. Conſt 6. Cedren. ibid. [m] Niceph. Theoph. Cedren. ibid. [n] Theoph ad ann. Conſt. 19.

Mountains on which CAR THAGE was built
d Salt Pits
e The Stagnum on the SW Point of which was the antient City of TUNIS
The Old Port now a Garden a b c d e

CHARTA exhibens
Situm antiquum CAR
THAGINIS UTICÆ
TUNETIS et Sinus CARTHAGINIENSIS

Promont Herculis
Thermæ
Promont Apollinis
Ruscinona
Littus præsens Maris
El Merya
Carthage
Calinx
Stagnum
Adda
Aquæductus
Littus antiquum Maris
Sinus Hipponens
Prion Tunis
Promont Candidum
Ripæ antiquæ Fluminis Bagradæ Utica
Gorza
Hippo Diarrhytus
Hipponites et Præsens Fluv Bagradæ
Siara Lacus
M.t Cirna

A Birds View of the Situation of Antient Carthage

the Cothon

The Old Port now a Garden

a Cisterns or Reservoirs for the Aquæduct
b Cisterns for Rain Water
c A birds View of the three Mountains on which CARTHAGE was built
d Salt Pits
e The Stagnum on the SW Point of which was the antient City of TUNIS monks, who preached againſt either, ſent into baniſhment, or ſentenced to death. At the ſame time, an edict was publiſhed in Conſtantinople, and in all the cities of the empire, forbidding, under the ſevereſt penalties, any one to embrace a monaſtic life; nay, at Conſtantinople moſt of the religious houſes were ſuppreſſed, and the monks not only obliged to marry, but to lead their brides publicly through the ſtreets. But of this perſecution the reader will find a more particular and diſtinct account in the eccleſiaſtic writers, than it may be proper for us to give in this place[o]. The twenty-third year of Conſtantine's reign and 763d of the chriſtian æra is remarkable for an extraordinary froſt, which began on the firſt of October, and laſted till the latter end of February. At Conſtantinople both ſeas were frozen for an hundred miles from the ſhore, the ice being ſo thick as to bear the heavieſt carriages, and covered with ſnow twenty cubits deep. When the froſt broke, mountains of ice and frozen ſnow being driven by the winds through the ſtreights, did a great deal of damage to the walls and the caſtle of Conſtantinople. The reader will find a ſurprizing account of this froſt in Theophanes, who, with thirty others, paſſed the ſtreights upon one of theſe floating iſlands, as he ſtyles it [p]. The month following, ſeveral prodigies appeared, or were thought to appear, in the air. At the ſame time, a comet, which the Greeks called docites, becauſe it reſembled a beam, was ſeen for ten days in the eaſt, whence it moved to the weſt, and ſhone there for one-and-twenty days more, the people being ſtruck with terror and amazement at the ſight of theſe prodigies, and apprehending the laſt day to be at hand. Conſtantine in the mean time continued to perſecute with great ſeverity thoſe who appeared moſt zealous and forward in the worſhip of images, till he was diverted by a new irruption of the Bulgarians; who, breaking into the territories of the empire, committed every-where unheard-of cruelties. But Conſtantine marching in perſon againſt them, cut them all off to a man, and then returned in triumph to Conſtantinople. This the emperor ſtyled his noble war, becauſe not one chriſtian periſhed in it. However, he owed the victory, it ſeems, to the treachery of ſome Bulgarians, whom Elerich their king diſcovered by the following device: He wrote to Conſtantine, pretending a deſire to reſign the crown, and lead a private life at Conſtantinople; for which purpoſe he begged

A ſurpriſing froſt.

Several prodigies.

Conſtantine defeats the Bulgarians.

Is deluded by their king.

[o] Vide Theoph. Cedren. &c. ad ann. Conſt. 19—23. [p] Vide Theoph ad ann. Conſt. 23, 24.

begged the emperor to ſend him a ſafe conduct, and at the ſame time to acquaint him what friends he had among the Bulgarians, that he might repair with them to Conſtantinople, being unwilling to truſt his perſon or deſign to others. Hereupon Conſtantine, not ſuſpecting any deceit, ſent him a liſt of the names of thoſe who held intelligence with him; which the crafty prince no ſooner received, than he cauſed them all to be put to death. The emperor, finding himſelf thus deluded, reſolved at all events to be revenged on the treacherous prince; and accordingly, having ſpent the winter in warlike preparations, he marched early in the ſpring againſt Elerich; but being ſeized on his march with a violent fever, he returned to Achadiopolis, whence he was conveyed to Selymbria, and from thence by ſea to Strongylum, where he dyed on the fourteenth of September of the year 775, after he had reigned twenty-four years, two months, and twenty-ſix days [g]. As Conſtantine was a moſt zealous iconoclaſt, and did all that lay in his power to ſuppreſs the worſhip of the ſaints, their images, and relics, Theophanes, Cedrenus, and the other writers of thoſe times, paint him in the blackeſt colours, biaſſed in ſome meaſure, as we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, by paſſion, intereſt, and prejudice. However, ſtanding even to the accounts of his declared enemies, we muſt allow him to have been a prince of great temperance and moderation, well ſkilled in war, and in every reſpect equal to the high ſtation to which he was raiſed. As for the great ſeverity which he exerted againſt ſuch as continued, in defiance of his decree, to worſhip images, it was, no doubt, owing to his zeal for the purity of the chriſtian religion. After all, his ſeverity againſt the worſhippers of images did not exceed that of other emperors, highly commended by all chriſtian writers, againſt the worſhippers of idols. He defended the empire with equal bravery and ſucceſs againſt the Saracens and Bulgarians; but was not in a condition to prevent the loſs of the far greater part of his dominions in Italy, Aſtulphus, king of the Lombards, having reduced in 751, the city and exarchate of Ravenna with the Pentapolis, which were ſoon after wreſted from him by Pepin king of France, and given to pope Stephen III. and hence ſprung the temporal dominion of the pope in Italy, as we ſhall relate at length in a more proper place. The exarchate of Ravenna comprehended Ravenna, Bologna, Imola, Faenza, Forlimpopoli, Forli, Ceſena, Bobbio, Ferrara, Commachio, Adria, Ceavia,

He marches againſt them but dies.

His character.

The exarchate and Pentapolis given to the pope.

[g] Theoph. Cedren. ad ann. Conſt. 25.

Ceavia, and Secchia; the Pentapolis, now Marca d'Ancona, compriſed Rimini, Peſaro, Conca, Fano, Sinogaglia, Ancona, Oſimo, Umana, Jeſi, Foſſombrone, Montefeltro, Urbino, Cagli, Luceoli, and Eugubio, as appears from the grant of Lewis the Pious, confirming the donation of Pepin. The pope, thus enriched with large territories and dominions, would no longer be deemed a ſubject of the empire; but adding the ſovereignty to the prieſthood, and the ſceptre to the keys, he created a new principality in Italy on the ruins of the eaſtern empire, to which nothing now remained in that country, except the provinces of Calabria and Brutium, with the dukedoms of Naples, Amalfi, and Gaeta. But of the ſtate of Italy at this time, and the great revolutions that happened there, we ſhall ſpeak at length in the hiſtory of the Lombards.

CONSTANTINE was ſucceeded in the empire by his ſon Leo, who, ſoon after his acceſſion, took his ſon Conſtantine, whom he had by Irene, for his partner in the empire, cauſing him to be ſolemnly crowned by the patriarch in the hippodrome, and beſtowing at the ſame time the title of nobiliſſimi on his two brothers, Anthemius and Eudoxius, Nicephorus, his ſecond brother, having received that honour in his father's life-time [h]. Conſtantine was crowned in the latter end of April of the year 776, and the following month Nicephorus, Leo's brother, formed a conſpiracy againſt the emperor and his ſon; but the plot being diſcovered, he was apprehended, and baniſhed with his accomplices to Cherſona. The ſame year Elerich, king of the Bulgarians, who had done great miſchief to the empire in the preceeding reign, moved with an earneſt deſire of embracing the chriſtian religion, reſigned his crown and repaired to Conſtantinople, where he was received by Leo with extraordinary demonſtrations of kindneſs and eſteem, and, after he had received the ſacrament of baptiſm, created a patrician, and married to a relation of the empreſs Irene [i]. In the third year of Leo's reign, ſome advantages were gained by the emperor's forces over the Saracens, who, by way of revenge, began to perſecute the chriſtians in a moſt cruel manner, cauſing all their churches in Syria to be pulled down and levelled with the ground. The following year, Leo, who had hitherto diſſembled his real ſentiments concerning the worſhip of images, openly declared againſt that ſuperſtitious, as he ſtyled it, and idolatrous practice; reviving the edicts of his father and

Leo III.

Elerich, king of the Bulgarians, embraces the chriſtian religion.

Leo an enemy to images.

[h] Theoph. ad. ann. Leon. 1. [i] Idem ad ann. 2.

and grandfather, and puniſhing, with the utmoſt ſeverity, ſuch as preſumed to pay any kind of worſhip to the ſaints, the virgin Mary, or their images. Having found two images in the cloſet of the empreſs Irene, he never after admitted her to his bed, and cauſed thoſe who had conveyed them to her to be racked to death [k]. He did not long outlive them, being ſoon after ſeized with a violent fever, of which he died on the ſixteenth of September 780, after having reigned five years and ten days. Theophanes writes, that Leo, having taken out of the great church a crown, which had been depoſited there by the emperor Heraclius, and was enriched with carbuncles of an ineſtimable value, while he was one day wearing it, a carbuncle broke out on his head, and he was at the ſame time ſeized with a fever, which, by a juſt judgment, ſoon put an end to his life [l].

Conſtantine Porphyrogenitus and Irene.

Leo was ſucceeded by his ſon Conſtantine, ſurnamed Porphyrogenitus, becauſe he was born while his father was emperor; but, as he was then only ten years old, his mother Irene took upon her the adminiſtration. The young prince had ſcarce reigned forty days, when ſome of the ſenators and great officers conſpired againſt him, with a deſign to prefer his uncle Nicepherus to the imperial dignity; but Irene, having ſeaſonably diſcovered the plot, cauſed the chief authors of it to be ſeized, and confined to different iſlands, after they had been publicly beaten with rods. Awakened by this danger, to prevent any future attempts of the like nature, ſhe obliged all the late emperor's brothers to take holy orders, and adminiſter the ſacrament to the people on Chriſtmas-day, when ſhe and her ſon reſtored to the church the crown of Heraclius, which Leo had ſeized. The ſame year 780, the Saracens, upon the news of Leo's death, broke into the eaſtern provinces; but were driven back with great loſs by the troops, which Irene had, upon the firſt notice of their motions, diſpatched againſt them [m]. The following year, the empreſs, to procure a ſtrong alliance by the marriage of her ſon, ſent embaſſadors into France, to propoſe a match between him and the daughter of Charles king of that country, who was afterwards ſurnamed the Great, and crowned emperor of the weſt. The propoſal being well received by Charles, an eunuch, by name Eliſæus, was left at his court to teach his daughter, named Rotdrudris, the Greek tongue, and inſtruct her in the manners and cuſtoms of the Greeks [n].

A conſpiracy diſcovered, and the conſpirators puniſhed.

The

[k] Idem ad ann. 5. Cedren in comp. annal. [l] Theoph. ibid. [m] Idem ad ann. Conſt. 1. [n] Idem ad ann. 2.

The ſame year, Helpidius governor of Sicily revolted; but was driven out of the iſland by Theodorus a patrician, whom Irene had ſent with a powerful fleet againſt him, and obliged to take refuge among the Saracens in Africa, who acknowledging him for emperor in oppoſition to Conſtantine, fell with ſuch fury upon the eaſtern provinces, that Irene was glad to avert the danger that threatened the empire, by obliging herſelf to pay them an annual penſion [o]. The peace with the Saracens was ſcarce concluded, when the Sclavi or Sclavini, breaking into Greece and Peloponneſus, ſeized on thoſe countries. Againſt them the empreſs diſpatched Saturacius a patrician, who overcame them in ſeveral battles; but ſuffered them to continue in the countries they had ſeized, upon their promiſing to acknowledge the authority of the empire, by the payment of an annual tribute. In 788, the match between Conſtantine and Rotdrudris, which had been approved of by both parties, was broken off by Irene, who obliged her ſon, much againſt his inclination, to marry a woman of a mean deſcent, named Mary, by birth an Armenian or Paphlagonian, and the niece or daughter of one Philaretus, remarkable for his good nature and charitable diſpoſition. Some aſcribe the breaking off the match with Rotdrudris to the ambition of Irene, apprehending, that Conſtantine would no longer be governed by her, but by his father-in-law. Others tell us, that the empreſs was provoked againſt Charles, on account of his invading the dukedom of Benevento in Italy, which ſhe had taken under her protection. Be that as it will, the conduct of the empreſs on that occaſion diſobliged her ſon to ſuch a degree, that he was never after truly reconciled to her. The young prince's courtiers, appriſed of the miſunderſtanding that paſſed between him and his mother, and deſirous of getting the power into their own hands, took care to put him in mind, that he was no longer a minor, but of an age to govern without the directions or counſels of a woman. Conſtantine hearkening to their inſinuations, they reſolved to ſeize on Saturacius, who governed with an abſolute ſway, as Irene's firſt miniſter, and, after having baniſhed him, to oblige the empreſs to reſign the adminiſtration. But Saturacius, having notice of their deſign as ſoon as it was concerted, immediately imparted it to Irene, who cauſed all thoſe who had been privy to it to be beaten with rods and ſent into baniſhment. As for her ſon, ſhe chaſtized him with her own hands, and, having Helpidius revolts.

An annual penſion paid to the Saracens.

Miſunderſtanding between Conſtantine and Irene.

[o] Idem ibid.

Irene obliges the senate and soldiery to take an oath of allegiance to her.

ving confined him to his apartment, obliged the senate and soldiery to bind themselves by a solemn oath not to acknowledge Constantine, but her alone, for their sovereign, so long as she lived. This oath was taken by all the forces quartered in the different provinces, except some legions in Armenia, who resolutely declared they would adhere to Constantine, pursuant to the oath which they had already taken. The resolution of the Armenian legions encouraged the rest, notwithstanding their late oath, to proclaim Constantine anew, and demand, with unanimous consent, that he might be forthwith vested with the whole power and authority. Irene, dreading the fury of the incensed multitude, immediately released her son from his confinement, who, being received with the repeated acclamations of the citizens and soldiery, took the reins of the empire into his own hands. Constantine, now at liberty to act without controul, recalled and advanced to the first employments such as had been banished on his account, sending into exile Saturacius and his mother's other favourites, after they had been publicly beaten with rods. As for Irene, he led her with great respect out of the palace, and attended her in person to an house built by herself, in which she had laid up an immense treasure [p]. The same year 790, a dreadful fire happened at Constantinople, which consumed great part of the city, with the patriarch's palace, in which were the comments of St. Chrysostom on the scripture, written with his own hand. The following year, the city was alarmed with a violent earthquake, which obliged the inhabitants to quit their habitations and retire to the open fields [q]. The same year the emperor marched at the head of a considerable army against the Bulgarians, who had broken into the empire, and engaged them in Thrace; but with what success, is uncertain: for Cedrenus writes, that he gained a great victory; but Zonaras will have the two armies to have parted upon equal terms. Upon his return to Constantinople, the friends of Irene, what by extolling her wisdom, prudence, and experience in public affairs, what by entreaties and arguments drawn from filial duty, prevailed upon him to recal his mother to court, and restore her to her former authority; which, however, the Armenian legions could never be induced to acknowledge [r]. Being thus reconciled to his mother, he marched anew against the Bulgarians, encouraged thereunto

Constantine deprives her of the administration.

Irene recalled.

[p] Idem, & Cedren. ad ann. Const. 10. [q] Idem ad ann. 10; 11. [r] Idem ad ann. Const. fol. 2.

unto by ſome mathematicians, who promiſed him certain victory; but while, depending upon their vain predictions, he neglected the proper means to obtain it, the Bulgarians, taking advantage of his ill-grounded ſecurity, gave him a dreadfull overthrow. Beſides a great number of common ſoldiers, the beſt officers of the army and the moſt conſiderable men in the empire loſt their lives in the battle, with Pancratius the mathematician, who, by his lying predictions, had given occaſion to the overthrow [s]. The emperor growing jealous and diſtruſtful upon this defeat, ſome malicious and deſigning courtiers took care to improve that diſpoſition, by inſinuating to him, that the ſoldiers quartered in Conſtantinople had formed a deſign of preferring Nicephorus to the empire; which heightened his jealouſy to ſuch a degree, as he was conſcious to himſelf of his evil conduct, that he not only cauſed his eyes to be put out, but thoſe likewiſe of his other uncles, Nicetas, Anthemius, and Eudoxius, though nothing had been alledged againſt them. Alexius Moſoles, whom the Armenian legions had demanded for their leader, when they refuſed to conſent to the reſtoration of Irene, was, at her inſtigation, treated with the like ſeverity; which ſo provoked thoſe legions, that they refuſed to obey Camilianus, appointed by the emperor to command them. Hereupon Conſtantianus, Artaſeras, and Chryſochires were ſent againſt them at the head of a ſtrong party; but the mutinous legions, having defeated and taken them priſoners, cauſed, by way of retaliation, their eyes to be pulled out; which ſo provoked Conſtantine, that he marched againſt them in perſon; and having defeated them in a pitched battle; put all their officers to death, cauſing the common ſoldiers to be led in chains to Conſtantinople, and conveyed from thence into different iſlands [t]. The Armenian legions, who had always ſuſpected and been ready to oppoſe the ambitious deſigns of Irene, being thus broken and diſperſed, ſhe began to put the emperor, now deſtitute of that ſupport, upon ſuch meaſures, as, ſhe thought, would render him odious to the people. As he had no great affection for the empreſs Mary, whom ſhe had forced him to marry, contrary to his inclination, ſhe adviſed him to divorce her, and marry Theodota or Theodecta, one of the maids of her chamber; who was accordingly crowned empreſs at Conſtantinople, where the nuptials were ſolemnized with extraordinary pomp and magnificence for three days together.

The emperor defeated by the Bulgarians.

His cruelty.

The Armenian legions broken and diſperſed.

Conſtantine divorces Mary and marries Theodota.

[s] Idem ibid. [t] Idem ad ann 3.

This marriage occaſioned great conteſts among the clergy concerning the lawfulneſs of it, in which Irene artfully ſided with thoſe who oppoſed her ſon, encouraging them underhand to eſtrange the minds of the people from him. However, the ſucceſs which attended his arms againſt the Saracens and Bulgarians, prevented the people from revolting, tho' privately ſtirred up, by Irene and her emiſſaries, to depoſe him. The Saracens had broken into Cilicia; but were driven back with great loſs by the troops which Conſtantine ſeaſonably diſpatched againſt them. As for the Bulgarians, Cardames their king having ſent embaſſadors to demand a tribute, threatening to come as far as the golden gate of Conſtantinople, and there take it by force, if it was refuſed him, Conſtantine replied, that ſince he was ſtricken in years, he would ſave him the trouble of ſo long a journey, by coming in perſon to wait upon him. Accordingly he marched againſt him at the head of a conſiderable army; upon the ſight of which the barbarians, ſtruck with a panic, fled in the utmoſt conſternation. Upon his return to Conſtantinople, he attended his mother from thence to the baths of Pruſa in Bithynia, where he had not been long, when news was brought him, that the empreſs Theodota was delivered of a ſon; at which he was ſo overjoyed, that he returned in great haſte to Conſtantinople. Irene, taking advantage of his abſence, gained over the chief officers of the army, who promiſed to depoſe Conſtantine, and commit the government to her alone. Purſuant to this promiſe, ſome of them, returning to Conſtantinople, ſeized on the unhappy prince, and carrying him to the palace of Porphyra, where he was born, pulled out his eyes in ſuch a cruel and barbarous manner, that he died a few days after in the utmoſt agony, having reigned ſeven years alone, and ten with his mother [u]. Our hiſtorian obſerves, that five years before his uncles loſt their eyes by his orders, on the ſame day of the ſame month, and in the ſame chamber [w]. Nicephorus and Chriſtopher, her huſband's brothers, hearing of the death of Conſtantine, took ſanctuary in the great church; but were dragged from thence and baniſhed to Athens, where they are ſaid to have been killed by the inhabitants, upon their attempting to raiſe diſturbances in the empire. In them ended the family of Leo Iſauricus; ſo that no one was now left to diſpute with Irene her title to the empire. She no ſooner received intelligence of the death of her ſon, than,

He puts the Bulgarians to flight.

He is murdered.

[u] Idem ad ann. 7. Conſt. fol. [w] Idem ibid.

than, leaving Pruſa, ſhe repaired to Conſtantinople; which ſhe entered in a gilded chariot, drawn by four horſes, being attended by ſeveral patricians, who waited as her ſlaves on either ſide, while ſhe threw money among the people, as was uſual at the ſolemnity of a coronation [x]. In the mean time, the Saracens, hearing the empire was governed by a woman, broke into the eaſtern provinces; and having defeated the forces Irene ſent againſt them, entered Thrace, made their excurſions to the very gates of Conſtantinople, deſtroying all with fire and ſword, and returned home unmoleſted, carrying with them an immenſe booty and an incredible number of captives. In 798, the ſecond of Irene's reign, her great favourite Saturacius, prompted by his boundleſs ambition, conſpired againſt her, with a deſign to deprive her of the crown, and to place it upon his own head; but his deſign being diſcovered before it was ripe for execution, Irene, after upbraiding him with treachery and ingratitude, contented herſelf, in conſideration of his former ſervices, with forbidding any one to keep him company. The partiality which the empreſs ſhewed him, joined to a lively ſenſe of his ingratitude to her, made ſuch a deep impreſſion upon his mind, that he died of grief ſoon after [y]. Irene, finding ſhe could not depend even upon thoſe whom ſhe thought ſhe had moſt reaſon to confide in, made it her chief ſtudy to gain the hearts of her people. With this view ſhe remitted an annual tribute, which had been long paid by the citizens of Conſtantinople, encouraged commerce, and, what moſt of all obliged the people, promoted, to the utmoſt of her power, the worſhip of images, cauſing them to be ſet up anew in the churches, and annulling the edicts enacted againſt them by former emperors [z]. In 802, Charles, ſurnamed the Great, who had been crowned emperor of the weſt by pope Leo III. on Chriſtmas-day of the year 800, ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to Conſtantinople, with propoſals of a firm and laſting peace between him and Irene. To theſe embaſſadors were joined legates from the pope, who were received with extraordinary pomp at Conſtantinople. The embaſſadors of Charles, among their other inſtructions, were ordered to propoſe a match between him and Irene, that the two empires might be once more happily united in their perſons. Irene readily entered into the negotiation; but Aetius an eunuch, who bore the chief ſway

Irene proclaimed empreſs.

Saturacius conſpires againſt her.

She ſtudies to gain the affections of the people.

A match propoſed between Irene and Charles the Great.

[x] Idem ad ann. Iren. 1. [y] Idem ad ann. Iren 3. [z] Idem ad ann. 4.

at court, by daily ſtarting new difficulties, put off from time to time the concluſion of the treaty. As he was excluded from the empire himſelf, on account of his condition, he had been long labouring under-hand, to prefer it to his brother, by name Leo, at that time governor of Thrace and Macedon; but being well-appriſed, that his deſign would be unavoidably defeated, ſhould the treaty between Irene and ſo powerful and warlike a prince take place, he left no ſtone unturned to divert the empreſs from it, at leaſt to get the concluſion of it ſuſpended, till a favourable opportunity offered of putting in execution his private deſign. In the mean time, the nobility, who hated Aetius, on account of his haughty and imperious conduct, ſuſpecting his deſign, and apprehending the empreſs, over whom he had gained a great aſcendant, might by him in the end be prevailed upon to take Leo for her partner in the empire, reſolved to ſet up Nicephorus, a patrician of great wealth and intereſt among the people. Accordingly, having firſt diſpoſed the minds of the citizens to a revolt, by giving out, that Irene not only deſigned to marry Charles, but to transfer the ſeat of the empire to the weſt, by which means the eaſtern empire would ſoon become a province to the new empire of the weſt, they aſſembled one night, and went in a large body to the palace, where they ſeized on Irene without oppoſition; and confining her under a ſtrong guard to her chamber, conducted Nicephorus, their new emperor, with the uſual ſolemnity to the great church, where he was crowned in a tumultuous manner, the populace, whom Irene had obliged by ſeveral acts of generoſity and good nature, uttering reproaches and curſes againſt him. Nicephorus treated Irene with great civility and reſpect, till he had, by his obliging behaviour, prevailed upon her to diſcover to him the place where her treaſures lay concealed; which ſhe had no ſooner done, than, contrary to his ſolemn promiſe, he confined her to a monaſtery, which ſhe herſelf had built in an iſland; but ſoon after removed her from thence to the iſland of Leſbos, where ſhe died of grief [a]. She is greatly extolled, notwithſtanding her unnatural conduct towards her ſon, by all the writers of thoſe times, no doubt, on account of her zeal for the worſhip of images, and the great pains ſhe took utterly to ſuppreſs the hereſy, as it was then called, of the iconoclaſts. She built a great many monaſteries and hoſpitals for the relief of the poor and aged, and, by many other acts of piety, gained, if

Which is oppoſed by Aetius.

The nobility revolt, and ſet up Nicephorus.

Irene depoſed, and Nicephorus created emperor.

[a] Theoph. ad ann. Niceph. 1.

if the writers of thoſe times are to be credited, both the eſteem and affections of her ſubjects. Her great attachment to the ſee of Rome, and the indefatigable pains ſhe took to get the doctrine of the iconoclaſts condemned in the ſecond council of Nice, by her aſſembled for that purpoſe, have ſo far biaſſed ſome writers of that party, that they have not been aſhamed to vindicate, even by texts of holy ſcripture, her unnatural and barbarous conduct towards her ſon, who perhaps well deſerved ſuch treatment, but not at the hands of his mother. Irene was thus depoſed in 802, after having reigned ten years with her ſon, and five alone.

CHAP. XXXIV.

The Roman hiſtory, from the promotion of Nicephorus, to the death of Baſilius II.

THE embaſſadors who had been ſent, as we have related in the foregoing chapter, by Charles the Great to propoſe a marriage between him and the empreſs Irene, in order to unite by that means once more the two empires, were, no doubt, greatly concerned at the unexpected revolution, which happened during their ſtay in Conſtantinople, and utterly diſconcerted the ambitious views of their maſter. However, as they were enjoined to conclude a firm and laſting peace with the eaſtern empire, they readily made their court to the new prince, who being well appriſed of the advantages that might accrue to him from the friendſhip of Charles, received his embaſſadors in a very obliging manner, and the year following concluded a treaty with him, in virtue of which Charles was acknowledged emperor of the weſt, and all Italy to the rivers of Vulturnus and Aufidus yielded to him. Nicephorus, in the third year of his reign, cauſed Nicetas Triphyllius, to whom he was chiefly indebted for his promotion, to be taken off with poiſon, for no other crime but becauſe he was beloved by the army. He gave ſeveral other inſtances of a moſt cruel, ſuſpicious, and covetous temper, which, as they rendered him odious to the people, encouraged Bardanes, governor of one of the eaſtern provinces, to revolt, and aſſume Nicephorus.

Concludes a treaty with Charles the Great.

Bardanes revolts;

the

the title of emperor. Michael and Leo, two officers of great reputation in the army, joined him at firſt; but ſoon after, finding him unequal to ſo great a charge, they abandoned him and went over to Nicephorus, who raiſed them to the firſt poſts in the army. Bardanes, thus forſaken by his friends, ſent a ſubmiſſive meſſage to Nicephorus, and, upon his promiſing to pardon him, retired to a monaſtery, and there embraced a religious life. The emperor, pretending to be entirely reconciled to him, invited him in a friendly manner to Conſtantinople; but on his way to that city, his eyes were plucked out by perſons ſent for that purpoſe. The emperor, to prevent any future attempts of the like nature, and ſecure the crown to his family, took his ſon Saturacius for his partner in the empire, and cauſed him to be crowned with the uſual ſolemnity. Having thus ſettled his affairs at home, he marched againſt the Saracens, who had broken into the eaſtern provinces; but his army was utterly defeated, and he obliged to ſave himſelf by a ſhameful flight, having narrowly eſcaped falling into the enemy's hands. The following year, the Saracens, to the number of three hundred thouſand men, invaded the empire anew; and advancing without oppoſition as far as Tyana, the metropolis of Cappadocia Minor, made themſelves maſters of that city and ſeveral other fortified places, extending their ravages to the very gates of Ancyra in Galatia. Nicephorus marched againſt them with what forces he could raiſe; but not daring to venture an engagement, he diſpatched embaſſadors with rich preſents to Aaron their kaliff, who with much-ado was prevailed upon to grant a peace upon the following terms: That the emperor ſhould pay to the Saracens a yearly tribute of thirty thouſand pieces of gold, beſides three thouſand for his own head and as many for that of his ſon; and that he ſhould not preſume to repair ſuch forts as had been diſmantled. Nicephorus agreed to theſe terms; but the enemy was no ſooner retired, than, with an open breach of the treaty, he rebuilt the forts that had been demoliſhed; which ſo provoked the Saracens, that they returned the ſame year, and raged with more fury than ever, putting all to fire and ſword, both on the continent and in the iſland of Cyprus, where they demoliſhed the churches, and put an incredible number of the inhabitants to the ſword. The following year they made a deſcent upon the iſland of Rhodes, and took a great number of priſoners; but their fleet ſuffered much by a violent ſtorm, which overtook them as they were returning home [x]. The ſame

But ſubmits.

Nicephorus defeated by the Saracens.

Nicephorus concludes a diſhonourable peace with them.

They invade the empire anew.

[x] Theoph. ad ann. Niceph. 2——6. Cedren. ibid.

ſame year Nicephorus married his ſon Saturacius to Theophania, a near relation of the late empreſs Irene, though ſhe had been ſome time before contracted to another, which gave occaſion to great complaints, and encouraged ſome to conſpire againſt him: but they were all detected and puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity; nay, many perſons of great diſtinction, eccleſiaſtics as well as laymen, were, upon bare ſuſpicions, dragged to priſon, and there either put to death or racked with the greateſt cruelty. In the ſeventh year of his reign, the Bulgarians, making an irruption into the empire, under the conduct of Crumus, their king, ſurpriſed Sardica, a city of Mœſia, and put the whole garriſon, conſiſting of ſix thouſand men, to the ſword. Nicephorus marched againſt them with a conſiderable army; but the enemy retiring with their booty at his approach, inſtead of purſuing them, he returned to Conſtantinople, and impoſed a new tribute upon the city for the repairing of Sardica; which incenſed them to ſuch a degree, that they roſe in a tumultuous manner, and attacked the palace, but were repulſed by the emperor's guards with great ſlaughter. In the ninth year of his reign, he raiſed a powerful army, and, marching at the head of it, entered the country of the Bulgarians, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. Crumus, their king, alarmed at his approach, ſent embaſſadors to ſue for peace, which he offered to conclude upon terms highly honourable to the empire. But Nicephorus, rejecting them with indignation, purſued his ravages, waſting the country, deſtroying the cities, and putting all the inhabitants to the ſword, who had the misfortune to fall into his hands, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition. Crumus, ſenſibly affected with the calamities of his ſubjects, ſent the emperor a ſecond ſubmiſſive meſſage, offering to agree to any terms, on condition he would quit his country. But Nicephorus diſmiſſing the embaſſadors with ſcorn, Crumus, puſhed on by deſpair, attacked unexpectedly the emperor's camp; and having forced it, in ſpite of all oppoſition, cut off almoſt the whole army, with the emperor himſelf, a great number of patricians, and moſt of the chief officers. Saturacius received a dangerous wound in the neck, but eſcaped in a litter to Adrianople. All the arms and baggage fell into the enemy's hands; and the body of Nicephorus being found among the ſlain, Crumus cauſed his head to be cut off; and after having kept it for ſome time expoſed to the view of the ſoldiery, he incloſed the ſcull in ſilver, and made uſe of it inſtead of a cup [y]. Such was the end of Nicepho-

The Bulgarians take Sardica.

A tumult in Conſtantinople.

Nicephorus ravages with great cruelty the country of the Bulgarians.

He is defeated and ſlain.

rus,

[y] Theoph. ad ann. Niceph. 9.

rus, after having reigned eight years, as many months, and twenty-six days. He is said to have been strongly inclined to the execrable doctrine of the Manichees, to have denied providence, and to have exceeded all the princes who reigned before him, in lewdness, cruelty, avarice, and all manner of debaucheries [z].

Saturacius. SATURACIUS fled, as we observed above, to Adrianople, where he was acknowledged emperor by some of the officers, who had escaped the general slaughter. But as he was not in a condition, on account of his wound, to appear in public, and at the same time knew himself to be universally hated both by the nobility and people, he resolved to confer the empire on his wife Theophania. But, in the mean time, the senate caused Michael, who had married Procopia, sister to Saturacius, to be proclaimed emperor in the circus; which Saturacius no sooner understood, than he retired with his wife to a monastery, where he embraced a religious life, and died soon after, having reigned two months and ten days. Michael proclaimed emperor. Michael, mindful of the oath he had taken to Nicephorus and his son, declined at first the imperial dignity; but being afterwards informed, that Saturacius, the better to secure the crown to his wife, had resolved to deprive him of his sight, he accepted the offer, and was crowned in the great church by Nicephorus the patriarch, after he had by a solemn promise under his own hand obliged himself to maintain the privileges of the church, and to abstain from shedding christian blood [a]. The new emperor a few days after caused his wife Procopia to be likewise crowned by the patriarch with his son Theophylact, whom he took for his partner in the empire. Takes his son for his colleague. He was scarce warm in his throne, when the Saracens broke into the empire on one side, and the Bulgarians on the other. The former were defeated and driven back by Leo, who governed the eastern provinces, with the loss of two thousand men. Against the Bulgarians Michael marched in person; but having, after several slight skirmishes, ventured an engagement, his army was utterly defeated, and he obliged to fly back with shame and disgrace to Constantinople. The emperor was affected with this misfortune to such a degree, that he Is defeated by the Bulgarians, and resigns the empire. resolved to quit the purple, which required a person of a more warlike and active genius, and retire to a cloyster. Accordingly he earnestly pressed Leo to accept of the empire, who, as he was free from all ambition, inviolably attached to Michael, chael, and at the ſame time ſenſible of the dangerous ſtate of affairs, was with much ado prevailed upon to comply with his requeſt, though backed by the entreaties of the magiſtrates, the ſoldiery, and the patriarch. Michael no ſooner underſtood, that Leo had in the end ſuffered himſelf to be proclaimed emperor, than he retired, with his wife Procopia and his children, to the monaſtery of Pharus, where he took the monaſtic habit on the eleventh of July 813, after having reigned one year, nine months, and as many days [b]. Thus Theophanes, who lived at this time, and was an eye-witneſs of what he wrote. But Cedrenus gives us a very different account of the promotion of Leo. According to that writer, Michael had the advantage in the engagement with the Bulgarians, till Leo, who aſpired at the empire, drew off the forces under his command; which ſo diſheartened the Romans, that they betook themſelves to a diſorderly flight, leaving the Bulgarians maſters of the field. The emperor, with much ado, eſcaped to Adrianople, and from thence to Conſtantinople, attended by a ſmall body of horſe. In his abſence, Leo, by exclaiming againſt him as a weak, effeminate, and cowardly prince, prevailed upon the army to revolt from Michael, and offer the empire to himſelf; which, however, he pretended to decline, till Michael Traulus or Balbus, one of the chief officers of the army, drawing his ſword, as it had been agreed on beforehand, threatened him with preſent death, if he did not immediately comply with the earneſt entreaties of the whole army, who, he ſaid, placed their ſafety and that of the empire in him alone. When news was brought to Conſtantinople of the revolt of the army and the uſurpation of Leo, ſome of the emperor's friends adviſed him to maintain his title, and prepare for a vigorous defence. But the good-natured emperor ſharply reprimanded them, declaring, he had rather loſe his life, than involve the ſtate in a civil war, which would be inevitably attended with the effuſion of much chriſtian blood. Accordingly he ſent to Leo the diadem, the purple robes, and the ſcarlet ſhoes, the enſigns of ſovereignty, requiring him to come, without the leaſt apprehenſion of danger, to Conſtantinople, and take poſſeſſion of the imperial palace. Thus Cedrenus, to whoſe authority we ſhould, without the leaſt heſitation, prefer that of Theophanes, were we ſure that the latter part of the hiſtory, which goes under his name, was done by him; but as ſome able critics pretend, that he concluded it with the reign

[z] Cedren. Zonar. in Niceph. Theoph. ibid. [a] Theoph. ad ann. Niceph. 9.

Leo raiſed to the empire.

[b] Idem ad ann. Mic. 2. [c] Cedren. in Leon.

reign of Nicephorus, and that the remaining part was added by ſome other writer, who, favouring Leo, concealed his ambitious practices in obtaining the empire, we will not take upon us to decide whether Leo uſurped the ſovereignty, or was raiſed to it by the voluntary abdication of Michael. The new emperor, upon his arrival at Conſtantinople, took care to have Michael and his wife, who had retired to the ſame monaſtery, ſeparated; and therefore confined him to a monaſtery on the iſland Prota, and baniſhed Procopia, with her children, to another place, having firſt cauſed Theophylact, their eldeſt ſon, to be cruelly maimed, that he might have no iſſue [d]. He had ſcarce taken poſſeſſion of the throne, when the Bulgarians, elated with their late ſucceſs, entered Thrace, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. Leo having drawn together what forces he could, marched out againſt them, and offered them battle; which they not declining, great multitudes were ſlain on both ſides, but at length the Romans, over-powered with numbers, were put to the rout. As they were purſued by the enemy in great diſorder, Leo, who beheld all from a neighbouring eminence, falling unexpectedly upon the barbarians with a reſerve of choſen men, who attended him, renewed the fight, and in the end obtained an entire victory. Great numbers of the enemy were ſlain, and more taken priſoners. Some reckon the king himſelf, by name Crumus, among the former; but others will have him to have been only wounded. However that be, the Bulgarians were ſo diſheartened by this overthrow, that they made no inroads into the empire for ſome years after [e]. The emperor, having now nothing to fear either from the Bulgarians or the Saracens, who were at variance among themſelves, applied himſelf wholly to the ſuppreſſing of the worſhip that was paid to images. In order to this, he enforced the obſervance of the council held at Conſtantinople in 754, under Conſtantinus Copronymus, and publiſhed an edict forbidding any worſhip to be paid to images, and commanding them to be removed out of the churches. Nicephorus the patriarch, Nicetas a patrician, and one of the empreſs Irene's relations, Theodorus a monk in great reputation, Theophanes the hiſtorian, and many others, were baniſhed for refuſing to comply with the emperor's edict. But while the emperor was wholly intent upon redreſſing the abuſes both in the church and ſtate, Michael, ſurnamed Balbus, or the ſtammerer, whom he had preferred to the firſt employments, conſpired againſt

He gains a complete victory over the Bulgarians.

He oppoſes the worſhip of images.

hael
but cons againſt

[d] Zonar. Cedren in Mich. [e] Idem ibid.

againſt him, with a deſign to deprive him of the crown, and place it upon his own head. But the plot being diſcovered, Michael was apprehended, tried, and condemned to be burnt alive. But as the officers were leading him on Chriſtmas eve, to the place of execution, the empreſs Theodoſia, by upbraiding her huſband with cruelty and irreligion for not reſpecting that holy time, when he was to partake of the holy ſacrament, prevailed upon him to reſpite the execution. However, that the criminal might not in the mean time make his eſcape, the emperor ordered him to be loaded with irons, of which he kept the keys himſelf. But Michael having, by means of ſome religious perſons, who had been admitted to him, with the emperor's permiſſion, acquainted his accomplices, that he was determined to diſcover them to Leo, unleſs they ſpeedily procured his releaſe, alarmed them to ſuch a degree, that they reſolved, without loſs of time, to put their deſign in execution. Accordingly, mixing themſelves with thoſe who performed divine ſervice in the emperor's chapel, they were admitted early in the morning into the palace, and lay concealed in a corner of the chapel, till the emperor came to his devotions, when, upon a ſignal agreed on beforehand, they ſtarted up; but by miſtake, as it was not yet day-light, fell upon the perſon who preſided over the clerks, or, as we may call them, the dean of the chapel. Leo, in the mean time, well appriſed of their deſign, retired to the altar, where he was attacked by the conſpirators, now ſenſible of their miſtake; but defended himſelf with the chain of the incenſory, or, as ſome write, with the croſs, till, one of his hands being cut off, he fell to the ground, when the conſpirators ruſhing upon him, diſpatched him with many wounds, and in the end ſtruck off his head [f]. Such was the end of Leo IV. after he had reigned ſeven years, five months, and fourteen days. He is allowed, even by ſuch as were his avowed enemies on account of his zeal in ſuppreſſing the worſhip of images, to have been a vigilant and active prince, and to have reformed many abuſes, that had long prevailed in the ſtate. In conferring employments, he had regard to merit alone, was quite free from avarice, and endowed with many princely qualities; whence the patriarch Nicephorus, who had been baniſhed by him, in hearing the news of his death, could not help owning him to have been a great, though a wicked, prince. The body of the unhappy

But is ſeized and condemned.

Leo murdered.

His character.

[f] Inat. in Taraſ. Theodor. ſtuditæ. ep. lxi. Leo, Grammat. in Leon.

happy emperor was dragged to the circus, and there expoſed for ſome time to public view. After this, the conſpirators having ſeized on the empreſs Theodoſia, confined her to a monaſtery, and baniſhed her four ſons, viz. Sabbatius, called alſo Conſtantine, Baſil, Gregory, and Theodoſius, to the iſland of Prota, where they were afterwards made eunuchs by Michael's orders, in which cruel operation Theodoſius died. Michael, in the mean time, being ſet at liberty, and conducted by the conſpirators from the priſon to the palace, placed himſelf upon the imperial throne, loaded, as he ſtill was, with his irons, the keys being no-where to be found: at length the bolts being knocked off with a hammer, he repaired to the great church, where he was crowned by the patriarch.

Michael Balbus proclaimed emperor.

MICHAEL, thus raiſed to the empire, was a native of Amorium, a city of Phrygia, inhabited chiefly by Jews, and ſuch chriſtians as had been driven from their own countries on account of their heretical opinions. Michael himſelf obſerved the Jewiſh ſabbath, denied the reſurrection of the dead, and held ſeveral other tenets condemned by the catholic church [g]. In the firſt year of his reign he recalled a great number of biſhops, monks, and others, who had been baniſhed by Leo for not complying with his edict forbidding the worſhip of images, but at the ſame time ſummoned them to diſpute in a council at Conſtantinople the point in queſtion. With this ſummons they refuſed to comply, alledging, that as the worſhipping of images had been already approved of and eſtabliſhed by a general council, it could admit of no diſpute. This anſwer greatly provoked the emperor, who nevertheleſs was ſo far from proceeding with rigor againſt them, that he indulged them in the uſe of images without the city.

He is an enemy to images.

In the ſecond year of his reign and 823d of the chriſtian æra, a civil war broke out in the eaſt, which involved the empire in endleſs calamities. It was raiſed by one Thomas, concerning whom authors are greatly divided in their accounts. According to ſome, he was meanly born, and at firſt a menial ſervant to a ſenator at Conſtantinople, whoſe wife he debauched, and then, to avoid the puniſhment due to his crime, fled to the Saracens, among whom, after he had continued for the ſpace of twenty-five years, profeſſing their religion, he obtained of their kalif a conſiderable body of troops, boaſting, that he could eaſily ſubdue the whole Roman empire. The better to entice the Romans over to his intereſt,

Thomas revolts in the eaſt.

[g] Cedren. in Mich.

intereſt, he gave out, that he was Conſtantine, the ſon of Irene. Others will have him to have been a man of great power in the eaſt, and inviolably attached to Leo, whoſe death he reſolved to revenge, and with that view took arms. However that be, he was a man of a grave aſpect, of extraordinary ſtrength and courage, and acceptable to the ſoldiery on account of his affable and engaging behaviour. Being well received in the eaſtern provinces by the inhabitants, who hated Michael, he ſoon raiſed a very numerous army, and over-ran, without controul, all Aſia, ſeizing everywhere on the public revenues, and plundering ſuch cities as refuſed to ſubmit to him. And now being maſter of all Aſia and Syria, he aſſumed the purple and diadem, and cauſed himſelf to be acknowledged as emperor by the patriarch of Antioch. Michael, in the mean time, diſpatched all the troops he could aſſemble againſt him; but Thomas, meeting them in Aſia, gave them a total overthrow; and having with incredible expedition fitted out a ſtrong fleet, he engaged and defeated that of the emperor; and then croſſing over into Thrace appeared unexpectedly before Conſtantinople, not doubting but the inhabitants would open their gates to him at his firſt approach. But to his great ſurprize, they received him with moſt opprobrious language, repulſed him in two ſucceſſive attacks, and in ſeveral ſallies killed great numbers of his men. Thomas made the neceſſary preparations for a third aſſault, being reſolved to make an utmoſt effort, and attack the city at the ſame time by ſea and land. But a moſt violent ſtorm ariſing, when he was upon the point of giving the ſignal, his fleet was diſperſed, and his battering engines overturned and rendered quite uſeleſs. This diſappointment, and ſome ſucceſsful ſallies of the beſieged, obliged him, as the ſeaſon was already far advanced, to raiſe the ſiege, and put his troops into winter-quarters, but with a reſolution to return before the city early in the ſpring; which he did accordingly: but Michael having in the mean time equipped a fleet and raiſed a land-army, he met with far greater oppoſition at his return than he had done before. His army was routed with great ſlaughter in a ſally, and his fleet driven aſhore by that of the emperor. The uſurper had in his army a commander of great valour and experience, named Gregory, who, having been baniſhed by Michael to the iſland of Scirus, becauſe he was a near relation of Leo, the late emperor, had in the beginning of the war declared for the uſurper, and been entruſted by him with the command of twelve thouſand men; but now obſerving, that fortune, which had hitherto attended Thomas in all his undertakings, began to forſake him, he reſolved to make his peace with Michael, the rather becauſe his wife and children were in his hands. This negotiation was not carried on ſo privately, but Thomas had timely notice of it, who thereupon leaving a ſufficient number of troops before Conſtantinople to carry on the ſiege, led the reſt againſt Gregory; and coming up with him, while he was marching away with the forces under his command to join the emperor, defeated his whole party, took him alive, but put him immediately to death, and then returned in triumph to purſue the ſiege. But in the mean time, Mortagon, king of the Bulgarians, hearing the emperor was beſieged in his metropolis, and either pitying his condition, or deſirous of gaining his friendſhip, marched at the head of a numerous army to his aſſiſtance. Thomas, when informed of his approach, was ſome time in ſuſpenſe, whether he ſhould continue the ſiege, or march with all his forces againſt the barbarians, but at length reſolved on the latter; and accordingly breaking up the ſiege, he met and engaged the Bulgarians at a place called Cedoctus, but was by them put to flight with great ſlaughter. Upon the news of his defeat, his fleet before Conſtantinople revolted to the emperor; which obliged him to lay aſide all thoughts of purſuing the ſiege, and to retire to Diabeſis, a place diſtant a few furlongs from the city; whence by his parties he laid waſte all the neighbouring country. While he lay encamped there, the emperor ordered all his troops to march out againſt him, under the command of Catacelas and Olbianus, whom he received with great bravery, but was overthrown by the treachery of his own men, moſt of whom went over to the emperor in the heat of the engagement. Thomas, with much ado, eſcaped to Adrianople, where he was immediately beſieged by the emperor's forces, and at length delivered up to Michael by his own people, no longer able to endure the famine and the unſpeakable hardſhips, to which they were reduced. The emperor, having cauſed his hands and feet to be cut off, ordered him, thus maimed, to be carried upon an aſs round the camp. He died ſoon after in the utmoſt agony. Anaſtaſius, his adopted ſon, who for that honour had forſaken the monaſtic life, which he profeſſed before, being delivered up to the emperor by the inhabitants of Byria, met with the ſame treatment as his father had done. Pavium and Heraclea, two maritime cities of Thrace, which

Makes himſelf maſter of Aſia and Syria.

Beſieges Conſtantinople.

He defeats and puts to death Gregory, who deſigned to betray him.

He isdefeated by the Bulgarians.

Is delivered up to the emperor, and put to death.

Thomas

Thomas had ſeized, refuſed to ſubmit, not ſo much out of affection to him, as out of hatred to the emperor, on account of his oppoſing the worſhip of images. But the walls of the former city were overturned by an earthquake, and the latter was taken by ſtorm. Some other cities and caſtles continued to hold out for ſome time, but they were all in the end reduced, and the civil war entirely extinguiſhed [h].

In the mean time, the Saracens, who had ſettled in Spain and were grown too numerous for that country, taking advantage of the diſtracted ſtate of the empire, having equipped ſeveral ſhips, diſpatched them in queſt of ſome fruitful iſland, in which they might plant a colony. Apochapſus, who commanded this ſquadron, having ravaged moſt of the iſlands in the Mediterranean without oppoſition, all the ſhips and garriſons being gone to the aſſiſtance of Thomas, touched in the end at Crete; and being greatly taken with the fertility and pleaſantneſs of that iſland, deſcribed it to his countrymen upon his return as a place, to uſe his expreſſion, flowing with milk and honey. Hereupon the Saracens, having equipped, during the winter, a fleet conſiſting of forty ſhips well armed and manned, put to ſea early in the ſpring; and landing in the iſland, encamped on the promontory Charax, whence Apochapſus ſent ſpies to diſcover the country, who upon their return informed him, that the iſland was quite deſtitute of ſoldiers, and that he would no-where meet with the leaſt oppoſition. Hereupon he ordered the fleet to be ſet on fire, that his men, laying aſide all thoughts of returning home, might look upon that iſland as their native country. The emperor, upon the firſt notice of this deſcent, diſpatched Damianus with a conſiderable body of troops to drive the Saracens out of the iſland. Damianus, being joined by Photinus, advanced, as ſoon as he had landed his forces, againſt the enemy, who killed him at the firſt onſet, and put his whole army to flight, Photinus having with much ado made his eſcape in a light veſſel, and carried the news of the overthrow to the emperor. The Saracens, having now no enemy to oppoſe them, built and fortified a city in a very convenient place, called Chandax, pointed out to them by a monk. From thence they made frequent excurſions, and in a ſhort time reduced the whole iſland, which by its new maſters was thenceforth called Chandax, and by others Candia, from the above-mentioned city [i]. This happened in the ſecond year of the reign of Michael Balbus and the 822d of the

The Saracens land in Crete.

And ſettle there.

The city of Candia built.

[h] Idem ibid. [i] Cedren. ibid.

the chriſtian æra. Michael, thinking it would reflect eternal ignominy, if he ſuffered the Saracens to ſettle in Crete, as ſoon as he had put an end to the civil war, diſpatched Craterus, with a powerful fleet and a numerous army, to recover the iſland. Craterus, having landed his men without oppoſition, fell upon the enemy with great reſolution, who received him with equal intrepidity. The fight continued from day-break to noon, the victory inclining to neither ſide; but ſoon after the Saracens, great numbers of them being ſlain and more taken priſoners, began to give ground, and towards the evening fled in great confuſion. Had the Romans purſued them, they might have eaſily, in that conſternation, cut them all off to a man, and made themſelves maſters of their city. But, inſtead of following the fugitives, and aſſaulting, without loſs of time, the place whither they had all retired, they ſpent the night in riot and drunkenneſs, as if the war had been already concluded, without ſo much as placing a guard or centry to prevent their being ſurpriſed. The enemy, appriſed of their ſecurity, reſolved, however fatigued with the duty of the preceding day, not to neglect ſo favourable an opportunity of being revenged on their conquerors. Accordingly ſallying out in the dead of the night, they fell upon them while they were partly intoxicated with wine and partly aſleep, and cut them off almoſt to a man. Craterus, their general, with great difficulty eſcaped on board a ſmall veſſel to the iſland of Cos. But the prince of the Saracens, not finding his body among the ſlain, diſpatched ſome veſſels with troops after him, who, landing on the iſland, ſurpriſed him, and nailed him to a croſs. After this defeat, the emperor, deſpairing of being able to recover the iſland of Crete, contented himſelf with defending the other iſlands, and reſtraining the piracies of the Cretan Saracens[k]. Beſides the loſs of the pleaſant and fruitful iſland of Crete, ſeveral other public calamities happened in this wicked emperor's reign, viz. great conflagrations, deſtructive earthquakes, which overturned whole cities, inundations, ſtrange phænomena in the heavens, general dearth and ſcarcity of proviſions, violent ſtorms, &c. which are all aſcribed by Cedrenus to the contempt of images. But theſe calamities did not reclaim him from the looſe and diſſolute life which he led, without any regard to religion, or the laws. In the ſixth year of his reign, his wife being dead, he forced Euphroſyne, the daughter of Conſtantine Porphyrogenitus, out of a monaſtery, where ſhe had led from her infancy a recluſe life and married

The emperor's forces defeated, and cut in pieces.

Several public calamities.

[k] Idem ibid.

married her. Soon after, Euphemius, an officer of great intereſt and authority in the army, falling in love with another ſacred virgin, and encouraged by the example of the prince, took her by force out of the monaſtery and debauched her. Of this outrage her brothers made loud complaints to the emperor, who thereupon ordered the governor of Sicily, where the fact was commited, to examine into the matter; and if he found what was alledged againſt Euphemius to be true to cut off his noſe. To avoid this puniſhment, Euphemius drew ſeveral other officers of the army into a conſpiracy; repulſed the governor, when he came to execute his orders; and then flying to the Saracens in Africa, promiſed to betray Sicily into their hands, and pay them a large tribute, provided they would declare him emperor of the Romans. To this the Saracen governor of Africa readily conſented; and having acknowledged him emperor, ſent him back with a ſufficient number of troops to make good his title. He landed in Sicily without oppoſition; and advancing to Syracuſe, endeavoured, by a flattering ſpeech, to perſuade the inhabitants, who ſtood on the wall, to open their gates to him, and own him for emperor. Among the reſt he obſerved two brothers, who were men of great intereſt in the city, to pay him great reſpect and hear him with more attention than the reſt; which encouraged him to call them to him. But as he advanced from the reſt of his company to meet and ſalute them, one of them, taking hold of him by the hair, held him till the other cut off his head. The Saracens, however, did not quit the advantage which he had put into their hands; but, being thus introduced by him, made themſelves by degrees maſters of the whole iſland; and paſſing over into Italy landed at Taranto; whence they drove the Romans, and got poſſeſſion of Calabria and the adjoining provinces [1]. The emperor died ſoon after of a flux, having reigned eight years, nine months, and ſeven days; and was buried in the church of the apoſtles. His death happened on the firſt of October 829.

Euphemius acknowledged emperor by the Saracens.

He is killed.

The Saracens reduce Sicily.

Michael dies.

He was ſucceeded by his ſon Theophylus, who, in the beginning of his reign, to gain the affections of the people and prevent conſpiracies, pretended to be a ſtrict obſerver of juſtice, and a ſevere aſſertor of the laws of the empire. Though his father owed both his life and dignity to the murder of Leo, yet he reſolved to puniſh all thoſe who had been Theophylus.

[1] Cedren in Mich, ann. 8. Zonar. p. 173.

any-ways acceſſory to it, in order to deter others from attempts of the like nature. With this view he ſummoned the chief of the nobility, and the great officers of the empire, to attend him in the palace Magnaura, or, as it was called from the five towers, Pentapyrgium. When they were aſſembled, he told them, that his father had in his life-time reſolved to reward the eminent ſervices of thoſe, who had been inſtrumental in his promotion; but ſince death had prevented him, he thought it incumbent upon himſelf as the executor of his father, to pay that debt. He therefore deſired them to withdraw from the reſt into a particular room, where he would examine the merit of each perſon, and reward him accordingly. Hereupon thoſe, who had been acceſſory to the murder of Leo, readily diſcovered themſelves, in expectation of ſome great reward. But the emperor having thus got them, convicted by their own confeſſion, into his power, he ordered one of his officers to put the laws againſt murder in execution, and to puniſh, according to their deſerts, thoſe who had not only ſhed innocent blood, but had inhumanly maſſacred the anointed of the Lord within his temple. He then diſmiſſed the aſſembly, and the officer, purſuant to his orders, puniſhed all thoſe who had conſpired againſt Leo as murderers [m]. After this he ſent Euphroſyne back to the monaſtery, from whence his father had taken her, and applied himſelf with great diligence to public affairs, hearing once a week all complaints that were brought againſt his miniſters, adminiſtering juſtice with the utmoſt impartiality, and frequently viſiting in perſon the markets, in order to ſettle the prices of the neceſſary proviſions. In the third year of his reign, he married his favourite daughter, by name Mary, to Alexius Moſeles, an Armenian by birth, a perſon of comely and majeſtic aſpect, then in the flower of his age, and endowed with many excellent qualities. As he repoſed in him an entire confidence, he conferred upon him the dignity of patrician, raiſed him to the proconſulſhip, and at laſt, as he had yet no iſſue-male of his own, created him Cæſar, and ſent him at the head of a numerous army to reſtrain the Saracens, who committed dreadful devaſtations in Italy. Being attended there with uncommon ſucceſs, his rivals at court, jealous of the eſteem he was in with the emperor and the reputation he had acquired, repreſented him as one who aſpired at the empire, ſtrengthening their malicious ſuggeſtions with an old prediction, that A ſhould one day

He puniſhes the murderers of Leo.

He marries his daughter to Alexius Moſeles.

[m] Joann. Curopal. in Theophyl.

day drive out Th. This Alexius no ſooner underſtood, than he deſired leave of Theophylus to retire, and embrace a monaſtic life. The emperor, who gave no ear to theſe inſinuations denied his requeſt, and commanded him to keep his rank and power. However, Theophylus having a ſon ſoon after, and his daughter, who was married to Alexius, dying about the ſame time, he was at length prevailed upon, by the repeated importunities of his ſon-in law, to comply with his requeſt and ſuffer him to retire [n]. Beſides Alexius, the emperor had two other eminent commanders, viz. Manuel and Theophobus. The former had been raiſed, by Leo and the late emperor Michael, to the firſt poſts in the army. The latter was the natural ſon of a Perſian embaſſador, deſcended from the blood royal of that nation, who, dying ſoon after the birth of his ſon, left him at Conſtantinople, where he was educated after the Roman manner. All thoſe of the royal family of Perſia being either deſtroyed or driven out by the Saracens, who had made themſelves maſters of their country, the few Perſians, who had outlived the general ſlaughter of their nation, hearing of Theophobus, ſent to the emperor, deſiring him for their king. But Theophylus choſe rather to raiſe him to the rank of a patrician, and give him one of his ſiſters in marriage, giving at the ſame time, by a law enacted for that purpoſe, all his ſubjects leave to intermarry with the Perſians; which brought great numbers of that nation over to the Romans, who formed them into one body, called the Perſian legion, from which the emperor promiſed himſelf no ſmall ſervice in the expedition, which he was about to undertake againſt the Saracens, who had invaded the Roman territories. Againſt them the emperor, attended by Manuel and Theophobus, marched in perſon; but in the battle which enſued, the Romans, after a moſt bloody and obſtinate conteſt, gave ground and fled in the utmoſt confuſion. The emperor, with his guard, two thouſand Perſians, and Theophobus, gained a neighbouring hill, where he was immediately ſurrounded by the enemy, who exerted their utmoſt efforts to take him priſoner, his own men ſtriving with equal reſolution and intrepidity to defend him. The day being thus ſpent, when night came on, the Romans, by the advice of Theophobus, filled all on a ſudden the air with loud acclamations, ſounding at the ſame time their trumpets and other warlike inſtruments.

Who embraces a monaſtic life.

The Romans defeated by the Saracens.

The emperor in great danger.

[n] Idem, ibid.

ſtruments. The Saracens, deceived by this ſtratagem, and concluding they had received ſome reinforcement, retired in great haſte, leſt they ſhould be ſurrounded; and gave the emperor an opportunity of making his eſcape to the reſt of the army. The Perſians were ſo taken with the conduct of Theophobus on this occaſion, that they addreſſed the emperor, begging he would ſuffer them to ſerve under him in a ſeparate body, which was readily granted. The following year, he was attended with better ſucceſs; for having engaged the Saracens, he gained a complete victory, killed great numbers of them, and took above twenty thouſand priſoners, whom he carried in triumph to Conſtantinople. This encouraged him to make another attempt the next ſpring; but his army was utterly defeated, and he himſelf in great danger of been taken priſoner, while he advanced too far into the enemy's ranks. Manuel, appriſed of the danger he was in, broke through to him with a body of choſen men, in order to bring him off. But he refuſing to retire, leſt by his retreat he ſhould diſcourage his army, Manuel preſenting his ſword to his breaſt, and telling him, that the ſtate would ſuffer more by his captivity than his death, threatened to kill him, unleſs he retreated with him to the reſt of the army. The emperor then complied, Manuel and his choſen band opening him a way through the midſt of the enemy. Theophylus had, at firſt, a juſt ſenſe of this eminent piece of ſervice, ſtyling Manuel his deliverer; but afterwards, envying him the reputation he had thereby acquired, and aſhamed of being indebted to one of his ſubjects for his ſafety, he readily gave ear to the malicious inſinuations of ſome courtiers, accuſing him of ambitious views, and privately reſolved to deprive him of his ſight; of which Manuel being ſeaſonably informed by the emperor's cup-bearer, he fled to the Saracens, and, upon condition he ſhould not be obliged to change his religion, entered into their ſervice, and was ſoon raiſed to the higheſt honours, and truſted with the command of their armies againſt the Cermatæ, a neighbouring nation, whom he overcame in ſeveral battles. The fame of his great exploits reaching Conſtantinople, the emperor, grieved for the loſs of ſo brave and faithful a commander, reſolved to bring him back by any means. Accordingly he wrote a letter to him with his own hand, inviting him home, and promiſing to reinſtate him in all his honours and employments. This letter being privately conveyed to Manuel by a monk, he received it with

He defeats the Saracens.

His ingratitude to Manuel.

Who flies to the Saracens.

unſpeakable

unſpeakable joy, and waited only a favourable opportunity of complying with the emperor's kind invitation. He had hitherto declined fighting againſt the Romans; but now, pretending a deſire of being revenged on thoſe by whom he had been unjuſtly accuſed to the emperor, he deſired leave of Iſhmael, prince of the Saracens, to make war upon the Romans in Cappadocia. Iſhmael, highly pleaſed with this demand, not only gave him the command of a powerful army, but, as he had already given ſignal proofs of his fidelity, appointed the young prince his ſon to ſerve under him. Being arrived in Cappadocia, while the army lay encamped at a convenient place for the execution of his deſign, he went out with the young prince, under pretence of hunting; and being met, as had been agreed on before-hand between him and the governor of the province, by ſome Roman troops, he acquainted the prince with his deſign, deſiring him to return to the army and acquaint them with it. From Cappadocia he immediately repaired to Conſtantinople, where he was received with great ſolemnity by the emperor in the church of Belchernæ, raiſed to the higheſt poſt in the army, and choſen to ſtand as godfather to his ſon Michael, whom he ſoon after took for his partner in the empire. The following year, the Saracens invaded Cappadocia under a general of their own nation, and the emperor marched againſt them in perſon; but both armies, ſeized, while they were already in ſight of each other, with a panic fear, betook themſelves to flight, and returned home, without coming to an engagement. The following year 837, Theophylus invaded Syria, ravaged the country far and wide, and having made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſtrong-holds, returned in triumph to Conſtantinople, leaving Theophobus to command the army. In his abſence the Perſians, now encreaſed to thirty thouſand, depending upon their ſtrength and numbers, ſeized on Theophobus at Sinople, and, notwithſtanding all his entreaties, proteſtations, and arguments, declared him emperor. Theophobus gave the emperor private notice of what had paſſed, aſſured him of his loyalty, though he had, in appearance, accepted of the imperial dignity, and laid hold of the firſt opportunity that offered to make his eſcape to Conſtantinople, where he was received by the emperor with the greateſt demonſtrations of kindneſs, and continued in his former honours and employments. The rebellious Perſians were, at his requeſt, pardoned and received into favour; but diſperſed into ſeveral provinces [n]. Theophylus,

But returns to the Romans.

The Perſians mutiny.

The fidelity of Theophobus.

[n] Joann. Curopal. in Theoph. Zonar. Cedren. ibid.

phylus, in ravaging Syria, had, notwithſtanding the earneſt entreaties of the prince of the Saracens, deſtroyed Sozopetra, the place of his nativity; which provoked him to ſuch a degree, that, breathing nothing but revenge, he raiſed a mighty army, ordering every ſoldier to engrave upon his ſhield the word Amorium, the birth-place of Theophylus and capital of Cilicia, which he was reſolved, at all events, to deſtroy. The emperor, informed of theſe mighty preparations, raiſed what forces he could, and marched with them to Dorylæum, diſtant about three days journey from Amorium. There, in a council of war, ſeveral officers adviſed him to decline an engagement with the Saracens, whoſe army was far more numerous than that of the Romans, and to remove the inhabitants of Amorium to ſome other place; but the emperor, imagining ſuch a proceeding would reflect no ſmall diſgrace upon him, reſolved to venture all in the defence of his native city; and accordingly ſent thither a ſtrong detachment, under the command of Actius, general of the eaſt, Theodorus, Craterus, Theophilus Bubutzicus, and other experienced generals. In the mean time, the prince of the Saracens diſpatched his ſon, with ten thouſand Turks and a ſtrong party of Armenians, to try the ſtrength of the emperor's forces. The two armies met at a place called Dazymenum; whereupon an engagement enſuing, the Saracens were at firſt put to the rout; but the Romans, in purſuing the fugitives, were ſo galled by the arrows of the Turks, that they not only gave over the purſuit, but betook themſelves to a diſorderly flight. The Perſians, however, though abandoned by the reſt of the army, ſtood their ground, and ſurrounding the emperor, made head againſt the enemy, till night coming on gave them an opportunity of retiring. The prince of the Saracens, informed of his ſon's ſucceſs, marched directly to Amorium, and being there joined by the young prince, laid cloſe ſiege to the place, which, after a long and obſtinate reſiſtance, was in the end betrayed to him by one of the inhabitants, named Badiates, who, upon ſome diſcontent, had abjured the chriſtian religion. The Saracens, enraged at the reſolute oppoſition they had met with, put moſt of the men to the ſword, carried all the women and children into captivity, and levelled the city with theground. The emperor was ſo affected with the deſtruction of the place, that, falling into a deep melancholy, he abſtained from all nouriſhment, drinking nothing but ſnow-water, which threw him into a dyſentery. Being appriſed that his end approached, he cauſed himſelf to be carried to Magnaura; and having ſummoned

The Saracens invade the empire.

Defeat the Romans.

Amorium taken and deſtroyed.

ſummoned the ſenate and chief officers of the empire to meet him there, he exhorted them in a pathetic ſpeech to continue faithful to his wife and ſon, and protect them from all treachery. After this, ſinking under the affliction of his mind and diſtemper of his body, he fainted away and expired, having reigned twelve years, three months, and twenty days. Joannes Curopalates, whom we have followed in the hiſtory of this prince's reign, as the neareſt to thoſe times, tells us, that, when he was at the point of death, he commanded the head of Theophobus, who had been arreſted upon ſome groundleſs ſuſpicions, to be cut off and brought to him; and that, touching it with his hand, he expired, uttering theſe words, Neither ſhall I be henceforth Theophylus, nor thou Theophobus [o]. But Zonaras and Cedrenus write, that he was put to death by one of the emperor's officers, without his knowledge [p]. He profeſſed a greater enmity to images, and perſecuted with greater ſeverity, than any of his predeceſſors had done, thoſe who worſhipped them. Hence he is painted by the writers of thoſe times in the blackeſt colours; but his actions, even as they are related by his ſworn enemies, ſpeak him a prince endowed with many excellent qualities, an exact obſerver of juſtice, a true lover of his people, and an utter enemy to covetouſneſs. Of the latter Cedrenus gives us the following inſtance: having one day obſerved from his palace a ſhip of great burden fraught with merchandize entering the harbour of Conſtantinople, he aſked the mariners, To whom the cargo belonged? They anſwering, To the empreſs; he replied with great indignation, God has made me a prince, and my wife a merchant! Was ever any emperor before married to a merchant? Having thus ſpoken, he commanded the mariners to come aſhore, and fire to be ſet to the veſſel, ſaying, If princes apply themſelves to trade, their ſubjects muſt ſtarve [q]. He beautified the city of Conſtantinople with many ſtately edifices, and fortified it with new walls, which could not, on account of their height, by any art be ſcaled. He baniſhed all looſe and ſcandalous women out of the city, being a great enemy to all manner of diſſoluteneſs, and a pattern of the antient Roman temperance, which he endeavoured to revive by ſeveral wholſome laws [r].

Theophylus dies.

His character.

THEOPHYLUS was ſucceeded by his ſon Michael; but, as he was then only ſix years old, his mother Theodora took Michael III.

Theodora regent.

[o] Joan. Curopal. ibid. [p] Cedren Zonar. ibid. [q] Cedren. in Theoph. [r] Cedren. Zonar. ibid.

took upon her the adminiſtration; which ſhe began by exerting her zeal for the worſhiping of images, recalling all thoſe who had been baniſhed on that account in the late reign, and baniſhing ſuch as differed in opinion from her. She drove from his ſee John the patriarch of Conſtantinople, and placed Methodius, a monk and zealous patron of images in his room, ordering the ſecond council of Nice, in which the worſhip of images was approved of and eſtabliſhed, to be obſerved throughout the empire. Having thus, in a few years, utterly ſuppreſſed the iconoclaſts, whoſe doctrine had prevailed in Conſtantinople and moſt cities of the eaſt, for the ſpace of one hundred and twenty years, ſhe fell in the next place upon the Manichees, of whom no fewer than an hundred thouſand are ſaid to have been deſtroyed, which drove the reſt to deſpair and rebellion, having one Carbeas of that ſect for their leader; who, hearing that his father had been crucified on account of his perſuaſion, fled with four thouſand of the ſame ſect to the Saracens, and opened them a paſſage into the Roman territories, where they ravaged and unpeopled whole provinces. In the mean time, the emperor, having attained the twentieth year of his age, began to think of governing by himſelf, being inſtigated thereunto by Bardas, brother to Theodora, who promiſed himſelf mighty advantages from a change of affairs; but deſpairing of being able to ſucceed in his deſigns, ſo long as Manuel and Theoctiſtus, whom the late emperor had appointed tutors to his ſon, continued near his perſon, he reſolved, in the firſt place, to remove them by ſome means or other. He had ſcarce taken this reſolution, when a miſunderſtanding aroſe between thoſe two faithful miniſters; which Bardas improved with ſuch art, that Manuel quitting the court, retired to a private life. He being removed, Bardas eaſily perſuaded the emperor, that Theoctiſtus, having nothing leſs in view than the empire, deſigned to marry either the empreſs, or one of her daughters, and to render him incapable of governing, by depriving him of his ſight. Upon theſe malicious, and altogether groundleſs, inſinuations, Theoctiſtus was, by the young prince's orders, apprehended, dragged to priſon, and there moſt inhumanly murdered. Michael and Bardas reſolved to finiſh what they had begun, by removing the empreſs, who, well appriſed of their deſign, to ſpare them the crime of ſhedding more blood, determined to retire of her own accord. Accordingly, having ſummoned the ſenate, ſhe laid before them the preſent condition of the treaſury, to obviate, by

She perſecutes the iconoclaſts and Manichees.

Manuel retires from court.

Theoctiſtus murdered.

by that means, the extravagant expences of her ſon, and at the ſame time to ſhew them how careful and frugal ſhe had been during her adminiſtration; for ſhe had, by a commendable œconomy, not only ſpared the immenſe treaſure left by her husband, but greatly improved it. After this, ſhe reſigned her power, and quitted the court, to the great ſatiſfaction of her brother and ſon, now at liberty to act without reſtraint or controul. However, leſt he ſhould attempt to reſume the power ſhe had ſo readily quitted, Michael ordered her and her three daughters to be ſhut up in a monaſtery, where ſhe died ſoon after of grief [s]. This happened in 854, after Theodora had governed the ſtate for the ſpace of fourteen years. Michael, thus free from all reſtraint, abandoned himſelf to the moſt infamous debaucheries, taking pride in imitating Nero, whom he propoſed to himſelf for his pattern, and even ſeemed to exceed in all manner of wickedneſs. He, in a ſhort time, ſquandered away the immenſe treaſure left him by his mother, being always attended by a crew of moſt extravagant, debauched, and profligate wretches, whom, to expoſe to ridicule the moſt ſacred things, he often cauſed to appear in copes and other veſtments, in which prieſts uſed to officiate, and in that apparel to imitate the moſt holy functions and ceremonies. One Gryllus, the moſt profligate of the crew, he ſtyled patriarch; others he called metropolitans; and took to himſelf the title of one of the chief biſhops. Thus attended, he uſed to walk in broad daylight, as in proceſſion, through the ſtreets, imitating and deriding the patriarch and his clergy. Having once cauſed the infamous Gryllus to be apparelled like the patriarch, he ſent for his mother in the name of Ignatius, who then held that ſee. The empreſs came immediately; but as ſhe fell down upon her knees to crave his bleſſing, Gryllus, diſcovering himſelf, derided the piety of the good empreſs with indecent geſtures, applauded with a loud laugh of the whole aſſembly [t]. The diſſolute prince, having in a ſhort time waſted all his treaſures, was reduced to the neceſſity of melting down and coining certain trees of gold, which had been made in the late reign by a biſhop named Leo, the greateſt man of his age, and were the admiration of all who beheld them; for among the boughs were diſperſed ſeveral golden birds, which, by the help of an engine, ſung melodiouſly, while the ſpectators were at the ſame time no leſs agreeably ſurpriſed and frightened

The empreſs Theodora reſigns.

Michael a wicked and impious prince.

His prodigality.

[s] Joann. Curopalat. Cedren. Zonar. ibid. [t] Idem, ibid.

frightened by the roaring of a golden lion, effected by the ſame artifice. The prodigal emperor had likewiſe diſpoſed of the imperial robes, and other curioſities, for which the palace was famous, had he not been prevented by death. In the year 855, he undertook an expedition againſt the Saracens, and laid ſiege to a city of theirs on the Euphrates; but the beſieged ſallying out upon the Romans, while they were at their devotions on a Sunday, put the whole army to flight, and made themſelves maſters of their camp and all their baggage, the emperor himſelf having with much-ado made his eſcape. Two years after, the Saracens, entering with an army of thirty thouſand men the Roman dominions, put the emperor to flight, though at the head of forty thouſand Thracians and Macedonians. The loſs of this battle, however, was ſoon repaired by the good fortune of Petronas, the emperor's brother, who falling unexpectedly upon the Saracens in the neighbourhood of Epheſus, cut off the kaliff himſelf and his whole army, took his ſon priſoner, and returned in triumph to Conſtantinople. In 860, he raiſed his uncle Bardas, who had hitherto governed with an abſolute ſway, to the dignity of Cæſar, in which high ſtation he acted in a moſt arbitrary manner, without the leaſt regard to the laws and cuſtoms of the empire. He divorced his wife, without being able to lay any thing to her charge, and married his own niece. Hereupon the holy patriarch Ignatius refuſed to communicate with him on the feaſt of the epiphany; which provoked him to ſuch a degree, that having aſſembled a ſynod at Conſtantinople, he ſuborned ſeveral falſe witneſſes, who accuſed Ignatius of having murdered his predeceſſor Methodius; upon which he was depoſed and thrown in priſon, Photius being raiſed to the patriarchal ſee in his room; which occaſioned great diſturbances at Conſtantinople. In 867, the emperor, at the perſuaſion of Bardas, who ruled with an abſolute ſway, undertook an expedition againſt the Saracens, who had ſettled in Crete, whence they were continually infeſting the coaſts of the empire, and made this year a deſcent upon Thrace, penetrating far into the country, and committing every where dreadful ravages. Againſt them the emperor marched in perſon, attended by Bardas; and arriving at a place called Chorus, ordered his army to encamp there. The ſervants of Bardas, whether on purpoſe or unadviſedly, is uncertain, pitched their maſter's tent on a hill, which overlooked the emperor's pavilion placed in the plain. This the emperor ſeemed to reſent; and the enemies of Bardas

Is routed by the Saracens.

Bardas created Cæſar.

at

at court, laying hold of that opportunity to convince the prince how much reaſon he had to be jealous of ſo inſolent and ambitious a favourite, incenſed him to ſuch a degree, that he gave them private orders to diſpatch him; which they did accordingly on the firſt of April of the preſent year. The ſoldiers, upon the news of his death, began to mutiny, and would have revenged it upon the emperor himſelf, had he not privately retired from the army, and returned to Conſtantinople [u]. The ruin of Bardas made room for Baſilius, the emperor's great chamberlain, and the chief author and promoter of the late murder; for the emperor, who had an utter averſion to all manner of buſineſs and application, immediately committed to him the whole management of public affairs, and ſoon after, that is, on the twenty-ſixth of May of the ſame year, declared him his partner in the empire. Baſilius was born in Macedon, but an Armenian by deſcent, and, according to Cedrenus, deſcended from the royal family of the Arſacidæ; but others affirm, he was come of mean and obſcure parents. At the ſacking of Adrianople by Crumus king of the Bulgarians, being then a child, he was carried into captivity with his parents; but ſet at liberty upon the concluſion of the peace. As he was tall in ſtature, of a comely aſpect, and well-ſhaped, Theophilizes, a nobleman of great diſtinction, took him into his family, and appointed him his protoſtrator, that is, his gentleman of the horſe. Having ſoon after tamed an unruly horſe belonging to the emperor, he was, by the intereſt of Bardas, taken into the emperor's ſervice, and raiſed to the poſt of maſter of the horſe; which giving him an opportunity of converſing often with the prince, he gained, by degrees, a great aſcendant over him, and was advanced to the high office of great chamberlain. Hereupon Bardas, jealous of the credit he was in with the emperor, and looking upon him no longer as his creature, but his rival, reſolved on his deſtruction. But Baſilius, appriſed of his deſign, was before-hand with him, as we have related above. Baſilius, being upon the death of Bardas advanced to the imperial dignity, did all that lay in his power to redreſs the many abuſes that had crept into the ſtate, and to reclaim Michael from his vicious courſes; but the diſſolute prince was ſo far from following his wholſome counſels, that he reſolved to rid himſelf of ſo troubleſome a cenſor; which haſtened on his own ruin: for Baſilius, finding he could by no other means ſave himſelf,

He is murdered.

Michael takes Baſilius for his partner in the empire.

[u] Idem ibid. Cedren. Zonar. in Mich.

ſelf, but by deſtroying his collegue, entered one night his room, while he was drunk and aſleep; and, with the aſſiſtance of ſome others privy to his deſign, firſt cut off both his hands as he held them up, and then diſpatched him with many wounds, after he had reigned fourteen years with his mother, and five years three months alone [w].

Michael murdered.

Baſilius.

BASILIUS, now ſole maſter of the empire, governed with great juſtice and moderation, preferring ſuch only as were perſons of known probity, and allowing all his ſubjects free acceſs to him; which greatly endeared him to his people, who looked upon him rather as their father than their prince. However, in the very beginning of his reign, a conſpiracy was formed againſt him by George and Symbatius, two patricians; but, it being ſeaſonably diſcovered, their eyes were put out, and their accomplices baniſhed. To obviate any future attempts of the ſame nature, in the ſecond year of his reign he raiſed his eldeſt ſon Conſtantine to the imperial dignity, and in the third he created Leo and Alexander, his ſecond and third ſons, Cæſars. As for his fourth ſon, by name Stephen, he cauſed him to take orders, with a deſign to raiſe him to the patriarchal ſee. His four daughters took the religious habit in the monaſtery of St. Euphemia, where they led exemplary lives. Having thus ſettled his domeſtic affairs, he reſolved to make war upon the Manichees. We have obſerved above, that in the late reign one Carbeas, a Manichee, fled, with four thouſand of the ſame ſect, to the Saracens, with a deſign to revenge the death of his father, who had been crucified on account of his perſuaſion. Great numbers of the perſecuted Manichees flocking to him for ſhelter, he made frequent inroads into the Roman territories from three ſtrong-holds in Armenia, viz. Arganum, Armera, and Tephrica, which had been yielded to them by the Saracens. Againſt theſe Manichees Baſilius marched in perſon, laid waſte their country, took or killed their beſt commanders, and returned with an immenſe booty to Conſtantinople; which city he entered in triumph. The following year, the Manichees, reſolved to revenge the loſſes they had ſuſtained, broke unexpectedly into the empire, under the command of Chryſochir; but being met by the imperial troops, they were almoſt to a man cut off, with their leader, whoſe head was ſent to Conſtantinople. By this defeat the ſtrength of the Saracens was ſo broken

He breaks the power of the Manichees.

[w] Curopalat. Zonar. Cedren. ibid.

broken that they were never afterwards in a condition of moleſting the empire, as they had done for ſeveral years together. Encouraged with his ſucceſs againſt the Manichees, he entered Syria the following year 880, attended by his eldeſt ſon Conſtantine, recovered ſeveral ſtrong-holds out of the hands of the Saracens, and took an incredible number of priſoners. On his return he made himſelf maſter of Cæſarea, the metropolis of Cappadocia, and of ſeveral other ſtrong-holds, which he levelled with the ground. The priſoners he took in this expedition were ſo numerous, that not being able to ſpare ſufficient forces to guard them, he commanded multitudes of them to be put to the ſword; which ſtruck ſuch terror into the Saracens, that ſome of their governors not only ſubmitted, but joined the emperor againſt their own nation. The African Saracens and thoſe of Crete, attempting to invade the empire, were likewiſe defeated with great ſlaughter, and the fleet of the former utterly deſtroyed by Nazar the Roman, admiral. Theſe extraordinary advantages were, in ſome degree, counterbalanced by the loſs of Syracuſe, which the Saracens of Carthage took and deſtroyed. Adrian, a patrician, who had been ſent to relieve it, arriving too late, the emperor upon his return to Conſtantinople, cauſed him to be dragged from the great church, where he had taken ſanctuary, and ſent him into exile [x]. Baſilius, at ſuch times as he was not engaged in wars, buſied himſelf in building and repairing churches, of which Cedrenus mentions a great number. Zonaras blames him for erecting and dedicating ſo many churches to the honour of St. Michael, as if he had deſigned thereby to expiate the murder of the emperor Michael. His eldeſt ſon Conſtantine being dead, he raiſed his ſecond ſon Leo to the imperial dignity, who being offended at the great ſway which Theodorus Santabarenus, by profeſſion a monk, but commonly reputed a magician, bore at court, endeavoured to remove him from the emperor's preſence. Of this the jealous monk was ſoon apprized, and therefore reſolved to deſtroy him. With this view, pretending to have private intelligence of a conſpiracy againſt Baſilius, which was to be put in execution while he was hunting, he firſt perſuaded the young prince privately to arm himſelf and ſome of his attendants, that he might be ready to oppoſe any attempt upon the life of his father; and then haſtening to the emperor, told him in great conſternation, that his

His ſucceſs againſt the Saracens.

Syracuſe taken by the Saracens, and deſtroyed.

The treachery of a monk.

[x] Curopalat. Cedren. Zonar. ibid.

his ſon deſigned to murder him; that his deſign was to be put in execution the firſt time he went out to hunt; and that if he cauſed him to be ſearched, he would find him armed accordingly. The emperor, giving ear to the wicked and malicious inſinuations of the monk, ordered his ſon to be ſearched; and a dagger being found under his garments, committed him to cloſe priſon in an apartment of the palace, where his eyes had been put out at the inſtigation of the monk, had not the patriarch and the ſenate interpoſed in his behalf. However, he was long kept under cloſe confinement; but at length releaſed, at the earneſt and repeated entreaties of the ſenate, and reſtored to his former dignity. Curopalates tells us, that the emperor having forbidden the ſenate to mention to him the young prince's name, or make any further application in his favour, while he was one day entertaining ſeveral of the nobility, a parrot, which hung up in a cage in the room, in imitation of ſome, who uſed to lament there the unfortunate prince's condition, cried out all on a ſudden, Alas, unhappy Leo! His friends, laying hold of that opportunity, as if the bird reproached them with their neglect, notwithſtanding the emperor's prohibition, renewed their former applications; to which Baſilius at length yielded [y]. Baſilius not long after died, having reigned eighteen years, ten months, and ſeven days. Cedrenus writes, that he was carried off by a diarrhœa; but Zonaras tells us, that while he was hunting, a ſtag thruſting his horns under his girdle, and lifting him up from the ground, ſhook him with ſuch violence, that he died ſoon after. The ſame writer adds, that one of the emperor's attendants having diſengaged him from the ſtag, by cutting his girdle, he, inſtead of rewarding him, cauſed his head to be cut off, for drawing his ſword in the preſence of his ſovereign. But of this no mention is made either by Cedrenus or Curopalates. Some pretend, that before he died, he embraced a monaſtic life, but without deveſting himſelf either of his power, or the enſigns of majeſty. It is certain, that towards the latter end of his reign, he addicted himſelf entirely to the converſation of monks, and to works of piety. To his ſon Leo, whom he appointed his ſucceſſor, he left, with the empire, ſome excellent rules or maxims of government, compriſed in ſixty-ſix chapters, the initial letters of which form the following ſentence; "Baſilius, emperor of the Romans in "Chriſt, to Leo, his dear ſon and collegue in the empire."

Leo impriſoned.

And releaſed.

Baſilius dies.

His inſtructions to his ſon Leo.

The [y] Curopalat. in Anaſt.

The maxims contained therein are truly worthy of a great prince and a chriſtian philoſopher. Baſilius made a new collection of the laws, known by the name of baſilicæ, that is, royal or imeprial laws; for they did not take their name, as ſome have imagined, from the emperor Baſilius, by whoſe orders they were compiled. They were written in the Greek tongue, the Latin, in which the laws of Juſtinian were compiled, being at this time ſcarce underſtood in the eaſtern empire. Baſilius is, by all the antient writers, deſervedly ranked among the beſt emperors.

Leo.

BASILIUS was ſucceeded by his ſon Leo, whom he had taken for his partner in the empire, upon the death of his eldeſt ſon Conſtantine. The new prince was a great lover of learning, and ſo well verſed in all the branches of literature, that he deſervedly acquired, as Antoninus had done, the ſurname of Philoſophus. His firſt care was to puniſh Theodorus Santabarenus the monk, whom he ordered to be whipt in an ignominious manner, and then baniſhed him to Athens, where his eyes were put out. Photius, patriarch of Conſtantinople, had favoured Theodorus, and conſpired with him to raiſe a kinſman of his own to the throne; he had beſides raiſed great diſturbances in the church: for which crimes he was, by Leo's orders, depoſed, and baniſhed into Armenia, Stephen, the emperor's brother, being raiſed to the patriarchal ſee in his room. To ſhew his gratitude to the emperor Michael, who had firſt preferred his father, and had been murdered by him, he cauſed his body to be conveyed with extraordinary pomp from the monaſtery of Chryſopolis, where it had been interred, to the church of the Apoſtles in Conſtantinople, and there to be depoſited in a ſtately monument of marble. In the year 893, the eighth of Leo's reign, a war broke out between the Romans and Bulgarians on the following occaſion: A great trade had been long carried on between the two nations, and the public mart was kept at Conſtantinople, whence it was, at the requeſt of ſome merchants, removed to Theſſalonica. There the collectors of the cuſtoms oppreſſing with new and unlawful impoſitions the Bulgarian merchants, Simeon their king having firſt applied in vain to the emperor for redreſs, reſolved to do himſelf juſtice; and accordingly, entering the Roman territories at the head of a powerful army, ravaged and laid waſte the country as far as Macedon, where he was met by the Roman army, under the command of Procopius Crenites and Curticius, who were both cut off, with moſt of their men, in the engagement that enſued. Simeon, having taken

He honours the memory of Michael.

His army defeated by the Bulgarians.

in the purſuit a great number of priſoners, cauſed their noſes to be cut off, and ſent them back thus deformed to Conſtantinople. The emperor, highly provoked at this outrage, prevailed upon the Ungri or Hungarians, whom our author ſtyles Turks, to invade the country of the Bulgarians on one ſide, while he entered it on the other. Againſt the Hungarians Simeon marched in perſon; but was by them utterly defeated, the flower of his army being cut off, and he himſelf with much-ado eſcaping to a city named Doroſtolum, whence he ſent embaſſadors to Leo ſuing for a peace; which was readily granted him upon very honourable terms. But the emperor's forces were no ſooner withdrawn, than Simeon fell unexpectedly upon the Hungarians; and having put them to flight, ravaged their country, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. Leo, provoked at this breach of the treaty, and more at his new and unreaſonable demands, reſolved to fall upon him with the whole ſtrength of the empire, and utterly deſtroy him. A powerful army was accordingly raiſed, and ſent into Bulgaria, under the conduct of Catacalon and Theodoſius a patrician. But Simeon, who carefully watched their motions, falling unexpectedly upon them, cut moſt of them in pieces, with Theodoſius and a great number of officers of diſtinction; which obliged the emperor to ſubmit to the beſt terms he could obtain [z]. While Leo was engaged in theſe wars abroad, ſeveral conſpiracies were formed againſt him at home; which, however, were ſeaſonably diſcovered, and the conſpirators ſent into exile, the emperor being averſe to the ſhedding of blood. In 901, the empreſs Theophano, or, as others call her, Theophania, being dead, the emperor married one Zoe, the moſt beautiful woman of her age, whom he had kept as his concubine in his wife's life-time, and cauſed her to be crowned with the uſual ſolemnity, conferring at the ſame time on her father, by name Zantzas, the title of father to the emperor. Zoe did not long enjoy her new dignity, and, upon her death, Leo married to his third wife a lady of extraordinary beauty, named Eudocia; but ſhe dying in child bed, together with the infant, Leo, who had yet no iſſue male to ſucceed him, married to his fourth wife another Zoe, who brought him a ſon, called Conſtantine. This fourth marriage, which was then held unlawful, gave riſe to great diſturbances and diviſions in the church of Conſtantinople; for Nicolaus Myſticus, at that time patriarch, not only declared againſt the marriage, but excom-

The treachery of the Bulgarians.

The emperor marries a ſecond and third wife.

[z] Idem in Leon. Zonar. Cedren. ibid.

excommunicated the emperor; who thereupon, after having earneſtly begged, but in vain, to be reſtored to the communion of the church, confined the patriarch to a monaſtery, and placed one Euthymius Syncellus in his room. Some of the clergy adhered to Nicolaus, and others to Euthymius; which occaſioned a ſchiſm in the church. Though Euthymius reſtored the emperor to the communion of the faithful, yet he reſolutely oppoſed him, when, by the advice of the ſenate he was about to publiſh an edict, declaring it lawful to marry the fourth time. Leo had formerly publiſhed an edict, ſubjecting thoſe who married thrice to the penalties which had been decreed againſt them by ſome antient councils, and the clergy would not ſuffer him to revoke that edict [a]. Some time before his fourth marriage, as he was going on Whitſunday in a ſolemn proceſſion to the church of St. Mocius, as was cuſtomary on that day, a perſon of a mean condition, watching that opportunity, juſt as he entered the church, gave him ſuch a blow on the head with a club, that he fell to the ground, and thoſe about him believed him dead; and truly he had been killed upon the ſpot, had not the violence of the blow been broken by a chandelier, which hung in the way. Alexander, the emperor's brother, was thought to have been privy to this attempt; but no proof could be alledged againſt him, the traitor, though tortured in a moſt cruel manner, obſtinately refuſing to diſcover his accomplices. As they could extort nothing from him, he was burnt alive in the circus, after his hands and feet had been cut off [b]. The following year 902, the ſixteenth of Leo's reign, the Saracens, having equipped a mighty fleet, took Tauromi-nium in Sicily, reduced the iſland of Lemnos, and, ravaging without controul the coaſts of Aſia, threw the imperial city itſelf into great conſternation. In the end of the ſummer, they laid ſiege to Theſſalonica, which they took, and would have deſtroyed, had it not been redeemed with a large ſum by Simeon, one of the emperor's ſecretaries, who was on that account raiſed to the rank of a patrician. Leo, not able to make head againſt the Saracens at ſea, raiſed a powerful army, which he ſent into the eaſt, under the conduct of Euſtathius Argyrus and Andronicus Ducas, in order to attack them by land; which they did with great ſucceſs, having gained ſeveral victories over them. However, the year following, they invaded with a mighty army the Roman territories;

Is excommunicated for marrying a fourth.

An attempt upon the emperor's life.

Taurominium and Theſſalonica taken by the Saracens.

Who are defeated by the emperor's generals

[a] Vide Conſt. Porphyrogen. in præamb. ad edict. unionis.
[b] Leo Grammat. l. iii. and iv.

tories; which obliged the emperor to diſpatch Himerius and Andronicus Ducas againſt them. They were both generals of great courage, experience and conduct; but a fatal miſunderſtanding between them, which was owing to the malicious intrigues of one Samonas, put a ſtop to the progreſs of their arms. Samonas, a Saracen by birth, and, formerly chamberlain to the emperor, having diſcovered a conſpiracy, had been on that account, advanced to the firſt employments in the ſtate. Having by that means acquired immenſe wealth, he attempted to eſcape into his own country, carrying with him his treaſures; but was ſtopped upon the road, and brought back to Conſtantinople by Conſtantine Ducas, the ſon of Andronicus. The emperor, provoked at his thus abandoning him, notwithſtanding the many favours he had heaped upon him, kept him for ſome time under cloſe confinement; but in the end reſtored him to his former rank and honours. As Samonas bore an irreconcillable hatred to Andronicus, on account of his ſon Conſtantine, by whom he had been intercepted on his way home, he prevailed upon one of that general's intimate friends, with a large ſum, to warn him by letter not to join Himerius, who, he ſaid, had orders from the emperor to put out his eyes, as ſoon as he had him in his power. Andronicus, giving credit to this letter, refuſed to join Himerius, who nevertheleſs engaged the Saracens, and gave them a total overthrow. Andronicus, dreading the emperor's indignation, ſeized a caſtle near Iconium, called Cabala, with a deſign to revolt; which Samonas no ſooner underſtood, than making uſe of all his authority at court to his deſtruction, he prevailed upon the emperor, with his artful inſinuations, to declare Andronicus a traitor, and to diſpatch a ſtrong army againſt him, under the command of Iberitzas Gregoras. Hereupon Andronicus deſpairing of pardon, fled to the Saracens, by whom he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of kindneſs and eſteem. Leo, greatly concerned for the loſs of ſo brave a commander, who had hitherto ſerved him with much honour and integrity, and dreading him as an enemy, reſolved to perſuade him, if poſſible, to return home. With this view he releaſed a Saracen captive, on condition he delivered to Andronicus a letter, wherein the emperor invited him home, promiſed to reſtore him to his former honours, and gave him repeated aſſurances of his friendſhip and eſteem; but the captive, bribed by Samonas, inſtead of conveying the letter to Andronicus, delivered it to the kalif, who immediately cauſed the unfortunate Andronicus, with his ſon Conſtantine and Andronicus Ducas, diſgraced, flies to the Saracens.

the

the reſt who had attended him in his flight, to be thrown into priſon, where they were treated with the utmoſt cruelty. Andronicus ſoon periſhed under the hardſhips he endured; ſeveral others purchaſed their liberty by renouncing their religion; but Conſtantine, the ſon of Andronicus, made his eſcape with a ſmall number of attendants, and though purſued, ſometimes by fighting, and ſometimes by caſting gold in the way, and by that means diverting the greedy ſoldiery, got ſafe to Conſtantinople, where he was kindly received by the emperor, and feaſted upon his arrival in the golden room. We are told, that as he was departing, when the banquet was over, the emperor, calling him back, warned him not to ſuffer himſelf to be ſo far miſled by the omen of his name as to aſpire at the empire; adding, that he had been aſſured by thoſe who could fortel things of that nature, that his own ſon Conſtantine was deſtined by heaven to the empire; and that, if Ducas ever attempted the imperial dignity, his head would inevitably be cut off, and brought through the gate of that very place, where he was now treated with ſo much honour and magnificence. The event confirmed the truth of this prediction, as we ſhall relate anon. About this time, Samonas the emperor's chief favourite, who had hitherto governed with an abſolute ſway, was at length diſgraced on the following occaſion: He had recommended a youth, named Conſtantine, by birth a Paphlagonian, to wait on the empreſs, who, being greatly taken with his adreſs and other good qualities, uſed all her intereſt to prefer him. This gave no ſmall jealouſly to Sammonas, who, apprehending he might in time be ſupplanted by this new favourite, did all that lay in his power to remove him; but finding all his efforts ineffectual, he arrogantly accuſed the empreſs of too much familiarity with him, and even had the boldneſs to publiſh a libel againſt the emperor himſelf, who, finding him to be the author of it, confined him to a monaſtery; and appointed his rival Conſtantine great chamberlain in his room [c]. In 911, the twenty-ſixth and laſt year of his reign, the Saracens, under the conduct of Damianus a Tyrian and Leo of Tripolis, committing dreadful ravages, on the coaſts and in the iſlands of the Ægean ſea, Himerius was ſent with a powerful fleet againſt them; but in a ſea-fight near the iſland of Samos, the Roman navy was utterly defeated, Himerius himſelf having with much difficulty eſcaped

He dies; but his ſon Conſtantine returns to Conſtantinople.

Samonas diſgraced.

The Roman fleet defeated by the Saracens.

[c] Curopalat. in Leon. Zonar. Cedren. Leo Grammat. ibid.

Leo dies.

ſcaped to Mitylene. The emperor did not long outlive this calamity; but died of the colic on the eleventh of May of the preſent year, after having reigned twenty five years and three months. He left behind him only one ſon, by name Conſtantine; but, as he was ſcarce five years old, he bequeathed the empire to his brother Alexander, after having earneſtly entreated him to leave it at his death to his ſon, Conſtantine, whom he recommended to his care [d]. Leo is allowed on all hands to have been a prince of great prudence and uncommon penetration in the management of public affairs. He is highly extolled by the eccleſiaſtic writers, on account of his zeal for the purity of the catholic faith, and by them compared to the moſt zealous and vigilant among their biſhops. As he was a man of great learning, he left ſeveral works behind him, viz. a letter to Omarus king of the Saracens, concerning the myſteries and truth of the chriſtian religion, and the hereſies and blaſphemies of the Saracens; a book of military diſcipline, which had been tranſlated into Latin; another on hunting; ſeveral theological and hiſtorical tracts, ſtill to be ſeen, tho ſtrangely maimed and corrupted, in the Vatican library; a circular letter, which, in imitation of the biſhops, he wrote to all his ſubjects, encouraging them to the practice of every chriſtian virtue; but as he applied himſelf above all to the ſtudy of the law, he new-modelled the Roman juriſprudence. His father Baſilius had, in the year 870, with the aſſiſtance of his two ſons Conſtantine and Leo, publiſhed an epitome of Juſtinian's code, which he called "procheiron." This work, which conſiſted of forty titles, is ſtill to be found among the manuſcripts in the Vatican library. It is by ſome aſcribed to Baſilius, Conſtantine, and Leo, by others only to Leo and Conſtantine, and by ſome to Leo alone; whence Cujacius and other civilians conclude it to have been reviſed by Leo, and brought into a better form. Leo, not ſatisfied with that, publiſhed, about the year 886, his baſilicæ, divided into ſixty books and ſix volumes. In this great work the emperor followed the order which Juſtinian had obſerved in his laws; for it was compiled from his code, edicts, novellæ, and from the conſtitutions of the ſucceeding emperors down to Baſilius, whatever was ſuperfluous, or had been abrogated by the cuſtom of after-times, being retrenched. The baſilicæ were no ſooner publiſhed, than the books of Juſtinian were quite laid aſide, both in the ſchools and court, of juſtice. Leo dying, his his ſon Conſtantine reviſed and corrected the baſilicæ, which had been publiſhed by his father, and ordered them, thus corrected to be made uſe of both at the bar and in the ſchools. The baſilicæ of Leo were called priores, and thoſe of Conſtantine poſteriores; but the latter alone were in force, and continued to be the foundation of the Greek juriſprudence to the end of the empire [e].

His character and works.

[d] Curopalat. Zonar. Conſt. Manaſſ. Glycas, ibid.

Alexander a debauched prince.

Leo being dead, his brother Alexander was by the ſenate and people acknowledged emperor; but he, in the very beginning of his reign, gave ſuch inſtances of his cruelty, avarice, and debauchery, as rendered him odious to all his ſubjects. Theſe who ſeemed to diſcountenance him in his lewd and diſſolute courſes, he baniſhed under various pretences, placing perſons of moſt infamous characters in their room, and ſuffering himſelf to be entirely governed by debauchees and proſtitutes. He was ſo taken with one Baſilitzas, a perſon of a mean deſcent, but of a moſt diſſolute life and his inſeparable companion in the moſt abominable extravagancies, that he reſolved to ſettle the empire on him, and, by caſtrating his nephew Conſtantine, to deprive the young prince of all hopes of ſucceſſion. But he was diverted from ſuch an unpopular attempt, by ſome of the late emperor's friends, repreſenting to him, that the child, who was of a weak and ſickly conſtitution, would, in all likelihood, be ſoon removed out of the way by a natural death. In the mean time, he baniſhed the empreſs Zoe from the court, ſuffering none to continue there, but ſuch as were ſlaves to his ſenſual pleaſures, and ſubſervient to his brutiſh appetites.

He provokes the Bulgarians.

Simeon, prince of the Bulgarians, no ſooner heard of his acceſſion to the empire, than he diſpatched embaſſadors to him to renew the treaties of peace and friendſhip concluded by former emperors between the two nations; but Alexander, inſtead of cultivating the friendſhip of that warlike and powerful nation, diſmiſſed their embaſſadors in an ignominious manner; at which Simeon juſtly provoked, invaded with a mighty army the Roman territories, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. Alexander, inſtead of offering to oppoſe him, purſued without interruption his diſſolute courſes, till death, haſtened on by his intemperance, delivered the world from ſo pernicious a monſter. As he was one day uſing violent exerciſes, after having eaten and drunk to a great exceſs, ſome of the veſſels breaking, he continued to bleed inwardly till [e] Struv. hiſt. jur. Græc. c. 4. Cujac. l. vi. obſer. c. 10. Doviat. hiſt. jur. civil. p. 47.

He dies.

till he died. Before his death, which happened in 912, after he had reigned about a year and a month, he declared Conſtantine his ſucceſſor; but appointed him for his governors, as he was yet a child, ſuch perſons as had been moſt ſubſervient to him in his infamous pleaſures, and were, on that account, deſpiſed and abhorred by all men of honour and integrity. This encouraged Conſtantine Ducas, the ſon of Andronicus, of whom we have ſpoken above, to attempt the ſovereignty, notwithſtanding the warning given him by the late emperor; but as he endeavoured to force the imperial palace, after he had been proclaimed emperor by his friends in the circus, he was ſeized by the guards, who immediately cut off his head, and carried it to the emperor. With him fell the hopes of his party, moſt of his accomplices, who were men of great power and authority in the city, being diſcovered, and puniſhed either with death or baniſhment. During theſe domeſtic broils, Simeon, king of the Bulgarians, having laid waſte Thrace, was advanced to the very gates of Conſtantinople, which city he had great hopes of reducing in a ſhort time; but the unexpected and vigorous oppoſition he met with from the inhabitants, obliged him, after ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts, to abandon the enterprize and retire to Hebdomon, whence he ſent embaſſadors to the young prince's governors with overtures for a treaty; which were received with great joy. While the negotiations were carrying on, Simeon was admitted to dine with the emperor in the palace of Blachernæ, whence he returned home loaded with rich preſents. Cedrenus writes, that a peace was concluded; but Zonaras aſſures us, that the treaty was broken off, before it could be brought to an happy concluſion, the prince of the Bulgarians refuſing to ſubmit to the conditions inſiſted upon by the regents. If an agreement was made, it was broken ſoon after, as we ſhall relate anon. In the mean time, the regents, diſagreeing amongſt themſelves, at the earneſt requeſt of the people of Conſtantinople and of the young prince himſelf, recalled to court the empreſs Zoe; who, having ſoon got all the power into her own hands, removed from the emperor's preſence the favourites of Alexander, and put others in their room, who were better qualified for that high truſt [f]. Zoe had ſcarce taken upon her the adminiſtration, when the Bulgarians broke into the empire on one ſide, and the Saracens on the other. The former, after having laid waſte Thrace,

Conſtantine VIII.

The Bulgarians break into the empire.

The empreſs Zoe gets all the power into her own hands.

The Bulgarians invade the empire.

ſat

[f] Cedren. Zonar. Leo Grammat. & Curopalat. in Conſtant.

ſat down before Adrianople, which was betrayed to them by one Pancratucus an Armenian, whom Simeon had bribed with rich preſents, The Saracens, under the conduct of Damianus, kalif of Tyre, having equipped a powerful fleet, committed great devaſtations on the coaſts. Zoe, thus attacked by two powerful enemies at once, reſolved, purſuant to the advice of the ſenate, to make peace upon any terms with the Saracens, and employ the whole ſtrength of the empire againſt the Bulgarians. Accordingly a treaty was happily concluded with the former, and a mighty army ſent againſt the latter, under the conduct of Leo Phocas, who, having muſtered his numerous forces in the ſpacious plain of Diabaſis, led them ſtrait againſt the enemy, encamped at a ſmall diſtance. Before the engagement, Conſtantine, the chief chaplain of the palace, or, as he was ſtyled protopapa, expoſing the wood of the holy croſs to the view of the whole army, commanded them to kneel down, and ſwear, that they would fight to the laſt. After this, both armies engaged with a fury hardly to be expreſſed; but the Romans prevailing after a moſt obſtinate diſpute, the Bulgarians fled in the utmoſt confuſion. The victory, however, was unluckily ſnatched out of their hands by the following accident: Leo, the Roman general, alighting at a fountain to quench his drought during the purſuit, his horſe broke looſe, while he ſtooped down to drink. The ſoldiers, who knew him, ſeeing him without a rider, concluded from thence, that their general was ſlain, and thereupon, giving over the purſuit, began to retire in a diſorderly manner; which Simeon quickly perceiving, rallied his men, and, facing about, fell unexpectedly upon the Romans, put them to flight, and purſued them with great ſlaughter, not only great numbers of the common ſoldiers being ſlain in that confuſion, but many officers of great diſtinction[s]. To this unhappy miſtake ſome aſcribe the dreadful overthrow which the Romans received on this occaſion; but others relate the matter in a quite different manner. They tell us, that while Leo was buſy in the purſuit of the enemy, news was brought him, that Romanus Lacapenus, the admiral, a man of great power and authority, who had been ordered to hover on the coaſt with his fleet and aſſiſt Leo, if required, was returned to Conſtantinople, with a deſign to ſeize on the empire in the abſence of the army and the chief officers. Upon this intelligence, Leo, ſay they, who had the ſame ambitious view, returned immediately to the camp, the

The Romans defeated.

[s] Curopalat. ibid.

the better to be informed of the truth. But the ſoldiers, imagining he retired out of fear, were ſo diſcouraged, that they turned their purſuit into a ſudden and diſorderly flight [h]. Simeon, elated with this unexpected ſucceſs, reſolved to return before Conſtantinople; but, two ſtrong detachments from his army being met on their march by the imperial troops, and utterly defeated, he thought it adviſeable to drop that enterprize and return home. In the mean time, the two rivals, Leo and Romanus, returning to court, began to plot, not only againſt the emperor, but againſt each other; for they had both nothing leſs in view than the ſovereignty. But the faction of Romanus prevailing at length over that of Leo, the latter was declared a traitor; and being ſeized in a caſtle named Atcas, whither he had fled for ſhelter, he was, by the emperor's orders, deprived of his ſight, and by that means rendered incapable of any further attempts. Romanus, having thus got rid of Leo, and driven all his partizans from the emperor's preſence, perſuaded the young prince to marry his daughter, and to appoint his ſon Chriſtopher commander in chief of the allies, which poſt was at that time one of the greateſt dignities in the empire. Having in this manner engroſſed to himſelf the whole power, he drove the empreſs Zoe from the palace, and confined her to the monaſtery of St. Euphemia. Soon after her departure, he cauſed himſelf to be firſt declared Cæſar, and afterwards to be ſolemnly crowned emperor by the patriarch, the young prince rather ſilently permitting, than approving of theſe extraordinary proceedings. The following year 921, Romanus cauſed his two ſons, Stephen and Chriſtopher, to be crowned in the great church, reſerving the other, by name Theophylactus, for the patriarchal dignity; nay, with the utmoſt arrogance he ordered himſelf to be named before Conſtantine in all public edicts and monuments. Several projects were ſet on foot by the friends of young Conſtantine to deliver him from the controul, or rather captivity, in which he lived; but they were all diſcovered, before they were ripe for execution, and the authors of them puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity. Simeon, king of the Bulgarians, taking advantage of theſe inteſtine broils, broke anew into the Roman territories; and having defeated, with great ſlaughter, the imperial troops diſpatched againſt him, he advanced, without oppoſition, to the very gates of Conſtantinople; but deſpairing of being ever able to reduce that metropolis, he deſired an interview

Two parties of the Bulgarians routed.

Leo diſgraced and deprived of his ſight.

Zoe confined to a monaſtery.

Romanus crowned emperor.

[h] Zenar. Cedren. Glycas in Conſtant.

interview with the emperor Romanus; which being readily granted, a peace thereupon enſued between the two nations, Romanus having in a pathetic ſpeech put the Bulgarian in mind of the account he was to give one day to the eternal Judge of the chriſtian blood he had already ſhed. At the ſame time, the Saracens, who had long infeſted the coaſts and the iſlands, being ſurpriſed by John Radenus, the Roman admiral, in the harbour of Lemnos, were cut off almoſt to a man, and their whole fleet deſtroyed. Not long after, Simeon, king of the Bulgarians, died, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Peter, who, breaking into the Roman dominions, deſtroyed all with fire and ſword, without any regard to the treaty lately concluded between the emperor and his father. When he heard Romanus was marching againſt him at the head of a powerful army, he diſpatched a monk to him, with propoſals for a peace, which he deſired might be ſtrengthened and confirmed with a marriage. This overture being well received by Romanus, the Bulgarian prince, after ſeveral negotiations, repaired to Conſtantinople, where he was ſplendidly entertained by Romanus in the palace of Blachernæ, and with great ſolemnity married by Stephen, the patriarch, to Mary, the daughter of Chriſtopher, the emperor's ſon. At one of many public entertainments that were made on this occaſion, the Bulgarians loudly complaining, at the inſtigation of Romanus, as was ſuppoſed, that the emperor Conſtantine ſhould take place of Chriſtopher, the father-in-law of their prince, Romanus, pretending to gratify them, cauſed his ſon, with a ſeeming reluctancy, to take the moſt honourable place. The nuptial ſolemnities were ſcarce over, when the Saracens in Syria invaded the Roman territories; but John Curcuas, the imperial general in thoſe parts, not only drove them back with great loſs, but having beſieged and taken the city of Melitena, reduced the adjoining country to the form of a province. The following winter proved very ſevere; and the long froſt, ſaid to have laſted an hundred and twenty days, was followed by a dreadful plague, which ſwept off incredible numbers of people: earthquakes were felt in ſeveral provinces, and whole cities overturned. At Conſtantinople a fire broke out, which conſumed many ſtately buildings. But Romanus was not ſo much affected with theſe public calamities, as with the death of his ſon Chriſtopher, who died on the fourteenth of Auguſt of the preſent year 933 [i]. The following year, one Baſilius, a native of Macedon, giving out,

A peace concluded with the Bulgarians.

The king of the Bulgarians marries the granddaughter of Romanus.

Melitena taken from the Saracens.

[i] Curopalat. in Roman. Leo Grammat. in Rom.

out, that he was Conſtantine Ducas, who had been ſlain in the beginning of the preſent reign, drew vaſt crowds after him; but being ſeized by an officer in the army, he was brought to the emperor at Conſtantinople, who, after having cauſed one of his hands to be cut off, ſet him at liberty. But he continuing ſtill to paſs himſelf upon the credulous multitude for the ſon of Andronicus, got together great numbers of malecontents, who, having ſeized on a ſtrong hold, made from thence frequent incurſions into the neighbouring country, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. But Romanus, having with much difficulty got him once more into his power, ordered him to be burnt alive [k]. In 944, the Roſſi, who inhabited the European Sarmatia, and were known to the antients by the names of Roxolani and Baſtarnæ, having equipped a numerous fleet, conſiſting, according to ſome of ten, according to others of fifteen, thouſand veſſels, committed dreadful ravages on the coaſts of the empire. But Theophanes, the Roman admiral, falling unexpectedly upon them, deſtroyed their whole fleet; and the two generals Bardas and Curcuas, purſuing thoſe who had ſaved themſelves aſhore, made ſuch a havock of them, that very few returned home with the news of their misfortune [l]. All this while Conſtantine, the lawful prince, lived without the leaſt authority, having but the bare name of emperor. However, he carefully watched an opportunity of recovering his former power; and with this view gained over ſome perſons of great credit and eſteem with Romanus and his ſons, who being well appriſed, that to remove Romanus was the firſt ſtep towards the re-eſtabliſhment of Conſtantine, applied to Stephen, the uſurper's youngeſt ſon, and by degrees brought him to rebel againſt his father, whom he ſeized on the ſixteenth of December of the preſent year 944, and confined to a monaſtery in the iſland Prota. He being thus removed, Stephen cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor in his room, obliging his elder brother Conſtantine, who had been raiſed by his father to the imperial dignity, to acknowledge him for his partner in the ſovereignty. This gave riſe to a miſunderſtanding between the two brothers, which proved fatal to both. For Conſtantine having invited them to an entertainment, as if he had been deſirous of bringing about an accommodation, cauſed them both to be ſeized in the midſt of their jollity, and to be immediately conveyed away, viz. Stephen to

The Roſſi utterly defeated by the Romans.

Romanus depoſed by his own ſon.

[k] Idem ibid. [l] Idem. Zonar. Cedren. in Rom. Luitprand. p. 384.

to the iſland of Panormus, and Conſtantine to Terebintus, where they were both ordained prieſts. Stephen was afterwards removed to Proconneſus, and from thence to Rhodes, then to Mitylene, and laſtly to Leſbos, where he died, after having borne his misfortunes for many years with great conſtancy and reſolution. Conſtantine having two years after killed one of his keepers, with a deſign to make his eſcape out of the iſland of Samothrace, whither he had been removed, the reſt, tranſported with rage, fell upon him and ſlew him. As for Romanus, their father, he died in the beginning of the fourth year of his exile [m]. Conſtantine, thus reſtored to his former power and authority, amply rewarded all thoſe who had been inſtrumental in his reſtoration, preferring them to the firſt employments in the ſtate. Soon after, in order to prevent any future deſigns that might be formed againſt him, he cauſed his ſon Romanus to be crowned with the uſual ſolemnity, and Romanus the ſon of Stephen, with Baſilius the natural ſon of Romanus the elder, and Michael the ſon of Chriſtopher, to be made eunuchs, and to enter into orders. In 948, the Saracens breaking into the empire with a mighty army, Bardas Phocas and his two ſons Nicephorus and Leo were diſpatched with the flower of the Roman forces againſt them. Bardas was one of the beſt officers of his age; but being hated by the ſoldiery on account of his extreme covetouſneſs, he performed nothing anſwerable to the high character he bore; nay, his men having abandoned him in an engagement, he was dangerouſly wounded in the forehead, and with much ado brought off alive by ſome of his friends. His two ſons gained ſeveral victories over the enemy, by whom, however, they were not more feared than beloved by thoſe who ſerved under them: Leo, having overthrown the Saracens in a pitched battle, took, among the other priſoners, Apolaſemus, a perſon of great diſtinction, and nearly related to Chabdanus the kalif; which the emperor no ſooner knew, than he ordered the captive to be ſent to Conſtantinople, where the vain prince, after having led him in triumph, trod in an inſulting manner upon his neck. The kalif, highly provoked at this indignity, uſed in a moſt barbarous manner Conſtantine the third ſon of Bardas Phocas, whom he had taken priſoner, in order to make him abjure the chriſtian religion; but not being able to prevail with him,

His ſons depoſed and baniſhed.

Conſtantine reſtored to his former power.

Leo and Nicephorus gain great advantages over the Saracens.

[m] Curopalat. Cedren. Zonar. ibid. Luitprand. l. v. c. 9, 10, 11.

him, he caused him to be poisoned. Phocas, to revenge his death, put to the sword all the relations of the kalif, who had the misfortune to fall into his hands. On the other hand, the kalif, having raised a numerous and formidable army, marched against Phocas and his sons, carrying with him Nicetas, a patrician, and several other prisoners of distinction, with an intent to cause them to be massacred in the sight of the Roman army. But Nicetas, who was a man of great address, having in the mean time insinuated himself into his favour, was by him made privy to all his designs, which he found means to impart to Phocas, who lying in ambush for him in a narrow pass, cut off his numerous army almost to a man, the kalif himself escaping with much difficulty, after having put to the sword all the Roman prisoners, except Nicetas, who, by bribing his keepers, had made his escape in the beginning of the engagement. After this victory, Phocas, invading the territories of the Saracens, took several strong-holds, and laid waste whole provinces. But, in the mean time, the Saracens, who had settled in Crete, committing dreadful ravages on the coasts, the emperor having with incredible expedition fitted out a powerful fleet, dispatched it with a strong army on board against the island of Crete, where they landed, without the least opposition from the Saracens, altogether unprovided against so sudden a descent, and would have easily made themselves masters of the whole island, had they been commanded by an officer of any skill or experience. But the emperor having appointed commander in chief in this expedition one of his chamberlains named Constantine Gongylas, who had been brought up in the court, and was consequently an utter stranger to the art of war, through his ignorance the whole undertaking miscarried. For the Saracens, finding he neither took care to fortify himself by any works, nor to send out scouts to get intelligence, concluded from thence, that he was no warrior; and recovering from their consternation, fell upon him unexpectedly, put his army to flight with great slaughter, and made themselves masters of his camp and baggage. He had himself fallen into the enemy's hands, had not some of his guards, in spite of their utmost efforts, conveyed him on board one of his vessels [n]. Not long after this defeat, Romanus, the emperor's son, prompted by his ambition, and egged on by his wife Theophano or Theophania, conspired with her against his father; and having gained over Nicetas, one of the attendants

The Romans utterly defeated by the Saracens in Crete.

Romanus, the emperor's son, attempts upon his life.

[n] Curopalat. in Constantin.

tendants at the emperor's table, prevailed upon him to adminiſter poiſon to the prince inſtead of a potion, which had been preſcribed to him by his phyſicians. But the emperor happening to ſtumble after he had taken in his hand the poiſonous cup, the greater part of the draught was ſpilt by that lucky accident; ſo that what remained had not the deſired effect, tho' his life was for ſome time in great danger. In the month of September of the ſame year, he undertook a journey to mount Olympus, to beg the prayers of the monks, as given out, for the ſucceſs of his arms againſt the Saracens, whom he deſigned, if poſſible, to drive out of Syria: but the true motive of his journey was to adviſe with Theodorus, biſhop of Cyzicus, by what means he might drive from the patriarchal ſee Polyeuctus, who had ſucceeded Theophylactus, the ſon of Romanus. Being taken ill on his journey, either by the wicked practices of his ſon, or through the bad habit of his body, he was carried back in a litter to Conſtantinople, where he died on the ninth of November 960, after having lived fifty-four years and two months, and reigned thirteen with his father, uncle, and mother, twenty-five with Romanus, and fifteen alone [o]. Curopalates, from whom other authors have copied, charges him with being too much addicted to wine, and with committing the whole management of affairs to his wife Helena and his favourite Baſilius, who, abuſing the truſt repoſed in them, ſet everything to ſale, beſtowing the firſt employments in the ſtate on the higheſt bidder. By this means all the offices, both civil, and military, were filled with perſons no ways qualified for them, which equally redounded to his diſhonour and the detriment of the ſtate. He is likewiſe condemned for puniſhing the ſmalleſt faults with the utmoſt ſeverity. On the other hand, he was a great encourager of learning, which he is ſaid to have revived, after letters had been long neglected. He was himſelf well ſkilled in moſt branches of literature, eſpecially in hiſtory, arithmetic, aſtronomy, philoſophy, and geometry. Zonaras commends him on account of his piety, which, ſays he, appeared in all his writings and epiſtles [p].

Conſtantine dies.

His character.

CONSTANTINE was ſucceeded by his ſon Romanus, ſurnamed the boy, to diſtinguiſh him from the other Romanus, his grandfather; for he was the ſon of Conſtantine by Helena, Romanus.

[o] Idem, ibid. [p] Curopalat. Zonar. ibid.

A debauched prince.

lena, the daughter of Romanus the uſurper. He is deſervedly reckoned amongſt the moſt lewd and debauched princes mentioned in hiſtory. Tho' he was himſelf capable of governing well, being endowed with uncommon parts, yet he committed the whole management of affairs to one Joſeph, his chief chamberlain, that he might, with more liberty and without interruption, purſue his pleaſures; which he did, wallowing in all manner of debaucheries, without beſtowing one thought on the public. Soon after his acceſſion, he cauſed his young ſon Baſilius to be crowned with the uſual ſolemnity by the patriarch Polyeuctus; and imagining he had by that means ſecured the empire to his poſterity, he took no further care either of his family or the public. In the ſecond year of his reign, Nicephorus Phocas, a perſon of extraordinary merit, who had been raiſed by Conſtantine to the chief command of all the forces of the empire, undertook, with the conſent of Romanus and the ſenate, an expedition againſt the Saracens in Crete; and landing in that iſland, defeated the enemy in ſeveral engagements, made himſelf maſter of all their ſtrong holds, Chandax itſelf not excepted, took Curupes, the kalif, and Arcemas, his lieutenant, priſoners, and in the ſpace of ſeven months reduced the whole iſland. But before he could ſettle affairs there, he was recalled by the emperor, at the inſtigation of Joſeph, who, growing jealous of the ſucceſs of Nicephorus, alarmed the young prince with a pretended prediction, that "he who conquered Crete ſhould become

The iſland of Crete recovered.

The Saracens o ercome in the eaſt.

"maſter of the whole Roman empire." While Nicephorus was thus ſignalizing himſelf in Crete, his brother Leo was attended with equal ſucceſs in the eaſt, where he gave the Saracens the greateſt overthrow they had ever received. Chabdanus, their kalif, with much difficulty, made his eſcape; but the reſt were either killed upon the ſpot, or taken priſoners. Such numbers of captives were ſent by Leo to Conſtantinople, that all the houſes, both in the city and the neighbouring country, were, if we may give credit to the writers of thoſe times, filled with Saracen ſlaves. Leo, on his return to Conſtantinople, was honoured with a triumph; but his brother Nicephorus, of whom the emperor entertained no ſmall jealouſy, on account of the above-mentioned prediction, was not allowed to come to court, but ordered to march againſt Chabdanus, the kalif of Syria, who, having recruited his army after his late defeat, threatened the empire with a new invaſion. But Nicephorus, meeting him on the borders

borders of Syria, overthrew him in a pitched battle; and then laying siege to Berœa, made himself master of that important place, in which he found great wealth, and multitudes of christian captives, who on that occasion recovered their liberty. The news of this victory had not yet reached Constantinople, when the emperor died, after having lived twenty-four years, and reigned thirteen years four months and five days, viz. ten with his father, and the rest alone. His death, which happened on the fifteenth of March of the year 963, is by some ascribed to poison, administered to him by his wife Theophano; by others, to his great lewdness and intemperance [q]. He left two sons behind him, viz. Basilius and Constantine; but as they were yet very young, the empress Theophano took upon her the administration; which she had no sooner done, than she commanded Nicephorus to repair to Constantinople, much against the will of Joseph, the prime minister, and honoured him with a triumph in the circus, where he displayed the rich spoils he had taken in the island of Crete and the city of Berœa. During his stay at Constantinople, he found that Joseph suspected him of ambitious designs, as if he aspired at the empire, which he was well apprised would end in his ruin, Joseph still bearing great sway at court. In order therefore to remove the suspicions of the prime minister, having desired and obtained of him a private audience, he told him, that looking upon all worldly grandeur with that contempt it deserved, he had long panted after a retired and monastic life; but had been prevented from complying with his inclination by the kindness of his masters, who had forced employments upon him of the greatest trust. At the same time, he shewed him a hair-cloth, which he pretended he wore constantly next his skin. The credulous minister, surprised at his speech and the sight of the hair-cloth, fell down at his feet, and with tears in his eyes, begging his pardon, declared, that for the future he would give no credit to any thing that could be alledged against him. Nicephorus, having thus gained the good opinion of Joseph, was suffered to return to the army in the east; where he had not been long, ere Joseph, jealous of the esteem he was in with the army, began to repent he had let him escape out of his hands, and seriously to consider by what means he might put him out of a condition of raising disturbances in the state. As his apprehensions daily encreased, he wrote in the end to Tzimisches

Romanus dies.

Nicephorus comes to Constantinople, and triumphs.

[q] Curopal. in Roman.

and Curcuas, two principal commanders in the eaſt, promiſing to prefer them to the firſt poſts in the army, provided they ſeized on Nicephorus, and ſecured him in a monaſtery, or by any other means removed him out of the way. But the two officers not only delivered the letters to Nicephorus, but adviſed him to provide for his own ſafety by the only means that was now left him, viz. that of taking upon him the ſovereignty. This propoſal he rejected at firſt, or ſeemed to reject, with the utmoſt horror; but Tzimiſches and Curcuas threatening him with their drawn ſwords, he accepted of the empire, as was given out, to ſave his life, and ſuffered himſelf to be proclaimed emperor on the ſecond of July of the year 963 [z]. Some writers tell us, that he was not ſo much prompted by his ambition to uſurp the ſovereignty, as by his love for the empreſs Theophano, of whom he had been long enamoured. They add, that he maintained a private, and perhaps not altogether innocent, correſpondence with her, which greatly heightened the ſuſpicions of the prime miniſter, who had ſecret intelligence of all that paſſed. As Nicephorus was no leſs beloved by the people of Conſtantinople, on account of his affability and mighty exploits, than Joſeph was hated for his pride and haughty carriage, the news of what had happened in the eaſt was received by all ranks of people with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable, nothing being heard in the ſtreets but ſucceſs and proſperity to Nicephorus Callinicus, or the brave conqueror. The houſe of Joſeph and thoſe of his friends and adherents were in an inſtant levelled with the ground by the tumultuous rabble. The new prince, being arrived at Chryſopolis, was there met by the chief nobility, and conducted to Hebdomon, where he was crowned with great ſolemnity by the patriarch Polyeuctus. Being thus acknowledged both by the people and ſenate, he began his reign by baniſhing Joſeph into Paphlagonia, and confining him to a monaſtery in that province, where he died two years after. In the ſecond year of his reign, he married the empreſs Theophano, though he was therein oppoſed with great warmth by the patriarch, becauſe he had been married before, and was ſaid to have ſtood godfather to one of the empreſs's children; nay, Polyeuctus proceeded ſo far as to excommunicate the emperor, pretending his marriage to be unlawful, on account of the two above-mentioned impediments. But the matter being examined in a ſynod held for that purpoſe at Conſtantinople,

He is proclaimed emperor.

Nicephorus Phocas crowned emperor.

[z] Idem Cedren. Zonar. & alii. in Niceph.

nople, Nicephorus was by the aſſembled biſhops reſtored to the communion of the church [a]. In the third year of his reign, he raiſed a powerful army, with a deſign to drive out of Sicily the Saracens, who had ſettled there, and were daily committing dreadful ravages on the coaſts of Italy. With the command of this army he entruſted Manuel, the natural ſon of his uncle Leo, who, being an entire ſtranger to the art of war, ſuffered himſelf to be drawn by the enemy into the mountainous parts of the iſland, where he was cut off with all his men. John Zimiſces, who commanded in Cilicia, was attended with better ſucceſs; for the Saracens, who had invaded that province, were defeated by him with ſuch ſlaughter, that the hill, on which the battle was fought, was from that time forward called the bloody hill. The ſame year, the Saracens in Cyprus were overthrown in ſeveral ſucceſſive battles, and in the end driven quite out of the iſland, which was reunited to the dominions of the empire. The following year, the emperor marched in perſon againſt the Saracens in Cilicia, took three of their ſtrongeſt cities; and having wintered in Cappadocia, inveſted early in the ſpring the cities of Mopſueſta and Tarſus at the ſame time, which, after an obſtinate defence, were obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. A fleet, with a great number of troops on board, was ſent from Egypt to the relief of Tarſus; but the city having ſubmitted three days before their arrival, they ſailed back, when they were overtaken by a violent ſtorm, which deſtroyed moſt of their ſhips, and drove the reſt on the coaſts of the empire, where they were ſeized, with the ſoldiers on board, by the Romans. Nicephorus, encouraged with the ſucceſs that attended his arms, broke into Syria the following year; and having eaſily reduced ſuch cities and forts as refuſed voluntarily to ſubmit, he marched forward, the Saracens flying every-where before him, and laid ſiege to Antioch itſelf. But as that metropolis was defended by a numerous garriſon, and well ſtored with proviſions, the emperor, after having continued three months before it, was obliged by the approach of winter, to drop the enterprize and return to Conſtantinople [b]. Cedrenus writes, that he might have reduced the place, but was deterred from it by an old prediction, that the prince who took Antioch would not long enjoy that conqueſt [c]. Upon his return to Conſtantinople, Burtzas, a patrician, whom he had left in Syria

The Roman army cut off by the Saracens in Sicily.

Nicephorus gains great advantages over the Saracens.

Antioch beſieged.

The ſiege raiſed.

[a] Curopolat. in Nicoph. [b] Idem ibid. [c] Cedren. in Niceph.

ria with a large body of troops, to ſecure the places he had conquered in thoſe parts, having drawn together his forces in the depth of winter, marched ſtrait to Antioch, and appearing unexpectedly before the place, ſtruck the garriſon with ſuch terror, that they immediately ſubmitted. Thus was the metropolis of Syria once more reunited to the empire. But Nicephorus, mindful, ſays Cedrenus, of the above-mentioned prophecy, inſtead of rewarding Burtzas for ſuch an eminent piece of ſervice, diſcharged him, and forbad him the court. John Zimiſces, who had ſerved him with the utmoſt fidelity and uncommon ſucceſs, was likewiſe diſmiſſed ſoon after upon ſome groundleſs ſuſpicion, and baniſhed the court, which in the end proved the ruin of the unhappy prince. For Zimiſces, highly provoked at the undeſerved treatment he met with, conſpired with Burtzas, and ſeveral others, and found means to draw the empreſs herſelf into the conſpiracy, incenſed againſt her huſband, according to the moſt probable opinion, on account of his deſigning, as ſhe apprehended, to make her two ſons Baſilius and Conſtantine eunuchs, and to leave the empire to his brother Leo. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the empreſs was not only privy to the conſpiracy, but acted the chief part in it; for by her means Zimiſces and the other conſpirators were privately let into the palace in the night-time, and conducted to the emperor's room, where they diſpatched him with many wounds, before the guards could come to his relief. When they received the alarm, Leo Abalantius, cutting off the emperor's head, ſhewed it out of the window; which unexpected ſight ſtruck the guards with ſuch terror, that, without offering to revenge the unfortunate prince's death, they continued quiet, expecting what farther deſigns the conſpirators had in view [d]. Such was the end of Nicephorus Phocas, in the fifty-eighth year of his age and ſeventh of his reign. He was without all doubt a prince of great valour and experience in war, gained ſeveral ſignal victories over the Saracens, drove them out of the iſland of Cyprus, recovered Cilicia and the greater part of Syria and Aſia Minor, and would in all likelihood, if he had lived longer, have reſtored the empire to its antient ſplendor. But his abominable covetouſneſs and the exorbitant taxes, with which he loaded his ſubjects, eſtranged from him the minds of the people; ſo that he was, notwithſtanding the glory he had acquired in arms, univerſally hated both by the nobility and the populace, who were ſo

Antioch ſurpriſed by Burtzas.

A conſpiracy againſt Nicephorus.

Who is murdered.

[d] Curopalat. Cedren. Zonar. ibid.

ſo far from revenging his death, that they received the news of it with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable.

NICEPHORUS being thus murdered, John Zimiſces was proclaimed by the conſpirators, and by all acknowledged emperor. His firſt care was to remove from their employments, both in the ſtate and army, all the friends of the deceaſed emperor, and among the reſt Leo, the brother of Nicephorus, whom he confined to the iſland of Lesbos. All thoſe who had been baniſhed by his predeceſſor he recalled, and reſtored them to their former honours. When he thought himſelf by this means thoroughly ſettled on the throne, he went to the great church to receive the crown at the hands of the patriarch. But Polyeuctus, meeting him at the door, oppoſed his entrance, telling him, that he could not ſuffer the church to be profaned by one who had imbrued his hands in the blood of his ſovereign, till he had atoned by a public penance for ſo enormous a crime. Zimiſces heard the patriarch with great ſubmiſſion; and, being unwilling to quarrel with the church in the beginning of his reign, offered himſelf ready to give what ſatisfaction ſhould be thought proper, alledging at the ſame time in his own defence, that the emperor had not been murdered by him, but by Abalantius, at the inſtigation of the empreſs. Hereupon the patriarch commanded him to baniſh them both, and to revoke all the edicts publiſhed by his predeceſſor to the prejudice of the church and the eccleſiaſtics; which he readily complying with, and at the ſame time promiſing to ſettle his paternal eſtate on the poor, the patriarch admitted him into the church, where he was crowned with great ſolemnity on Chriſtmas-day. As for the empreſs Theophano, ſhe was baniſhed into Armenia, and there ſhut up in a monaſtery. Some writers are of opinion, that the oppoſition made by the patriarch was not real, but feigned, and concerted beforehand between him and Zimiſces, who only wanted a plauſible pretence to remove her. However that be, the new emperor took her two ſons Baſilius and Conſtantine for his collegues, and cauſed them to be acknowledged as ſuch by the ſenate and people of Conſtantinople. In the mean time, the Saracens, hearing of the death of Nicephorus, raiſed without loſs of time one of the moſt numerous armies that had been ſeen for ſome ages in thoſe parts; and, giving the command of it to one Zochares, a perſon well ſkilled in the art of war, ſat down before Antioch, not doubting, but they ſhould be able to reduce the place, before it could be relieved by the emperor. But, in ſpite of their utmoſt efforts, the beſieged held out, till Nico-

John Zimiſces proclaimed emperor.

He is crowned by the patriarch.

las, an eunuch, declared general by the emperor, having raiſed what forces he could in Meſopotamia and the neighbouring provinces, fell unexpectedly upon them, gave them a total overthrow, and obliged them to raiſe the ſiege, and return with ſhame and diſgrace to their own territories. The following year 970, the Roſſi, having driven out the Bulgarians and ſeized on their country, advanced with an army of above three hundred thouſand men into the dominions of the empire, and, having waſted all Thrace, ſat down before Adrianople. Zimiſces, having firſt endeavoured in vain to come to an agreement with them, ordered Bardas Sclerus, or the bold, his wife's brother, to make head againſt them with what troops he could draw together. Bardas, purſuant to his orders, marched ſtrait to Adrianople; but not daring to venture an engagement, as he had with him but thirteen thouſand men, he had recourſe to ſtratagems; and having drawn a ſtrong party of the enemy into an ambuſcade, he firſt cut them all off to a man; and then falling, when leaſt expected, upon the main body of their army, he gave them a total overthrow, put moſt of them to the ſword, took an incredible number of priſoners, and would not have ſuffered one to eſcape, had not night coming on obliged him to give over the purſuit. The Romans are ſaid to have loſt but twenty-five men in both engagements [f]. The ſucceſs which attended the emperor's arms abroad did not deter ſeveral of the nobility from conſpiring againſt him at home, with a deſign to raiſe to the empire Bardas Phocas, the late prince's nephew, who, upon the encouragement given him by his friends at Conſtantinople, withdrew on a ſudden out of Amaſia, the place of his baniſhment; and, being joined by ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, made himſelf maſter of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, and there took upon him the imperial title and enſigns. At the ſame time, Leo, the father of Phocas, who had been confined to the iſland of Leſbos, attempted to make his eſcape from thence with his other ſon Nicephorus, in order to join Bardas; but being apprehended by the emperor's officers, both he and Nicephorus were ſentenced to death, but ſoon after pardoned by the good-natured emperor. In the mean time, Bardas Sclerus, who had been diſpatched by the emperor at the head of a conſiderable army againſt Phocas, arriving at Dorylaus the capital of Phrygia, endeavoured firſt by fair offers to bring him and his accomplices back to their duty; for he had been ſtrictly enjoined by

The Saracens defeated before Antioch.

The Roſſi defeated by Bardas Sclerus.

Bardas Phocas revolts.

[f] Idem in Zimiſc.

by the emperor to abſtain, as much as poſſible, from ſhedding blood. But when he found them deaf to his offers and promiſes, he left Dorylaus, and advanced to Cæſarea, in order to lay ſiege to that place. Upon his approach, thoſe who had appeared the moſt ſanguine in the revolt agreed among themſelves to abandon Phocas, and conſult their own ſafety. Accordingly, they withdrew with their attendants, before Bardas inveſted the place; ſo that Phocas, who had with him but a ſmall number of troops, thought it adviſeable to retire from Cæſarea, and ſhut himſelf up in a ſtrong caſtle called Cyropæum, which at firſt he reſolved to defend to the utmoſt extremity. But when Bardas inveſted the place, and by repeated meſſages aſſured him of all imaginable kindneſs on his part, and at the ſame time undertook to obtain his pardon of the emperor, he ſubmitted; and depending upon the promiſes of Bardas, delivered himſelf up into his hands. The emperor granted him his life; but, to prevent his raiſing new diſturbances, confined him to the iſland of Chios. The rebellion being thus ſuppreſſed, the emperor married with great ſolemnity Theodora, according to ſome the ſiſter, according to others the daughter, of the late emperor Romanus. The following year 971, the emperor, being informed that the Roſſi, notwithſtanding their late defeat, were preparing to invade the empire anew, reſolved to be beforehand with them. Accordingly having raiſed a powerful army, and committed the adminiſtration of affairs at home to ſuch as he thought he had the greateſt reaſon to confide in, he ſet out from Conſtantinople early in the ſpring; and marching with great expedition over mount Hæmus, inveſted Perſthalba, the principal city of Bulgaria, before the enemy received the leaſt intelligence of his approach. A party of the Roſſi, conſiſting of eight thouſand men, attempted to throw themſelves into the city, but were all to a man either cut off, or taken priſoners, by the Romans: among the latter was Sphagellus, a perſon of great authority among the Bulgarians. The Romans, animated with this ſucceſs, attacked the city with great reſolution and intrepidity, but were obliged, by the approach of night, to retire to their camp, before they could maſter it. Early next morning, Zimiſces, having drawn out his men, offered the beſieged very advantageous conditions; which they rejecting, he gave the ſignal for a general attack. The Roſſi made a moſt vigorous reſiſtance; but, the Romans prevailing in the end, the city was taken, and great numbers of the inhabitants, without diſtinction of ſex or age, put to the ſword by the incenſed ſoldiery. Eight thouſand Scythians, part

Is abandoned by his followers.

The rebellion ſuppreſſed.

The emperor invades the country of the Roſſi.

Takes their metropolis by aſſault.

part of the garriſon, finding the Romans maſters of the city, retired to the citadel, with a deſign to defend themſelves there to the laſt extremity. As the caſtle ſtood on a ſteep rock, and the Romans were already greatly fatigued, they ſeemed inclined to put off the aſſault to the next day. But Zimiſces advancing in perſon againſt the enemy, at the head of a ſmall band of choſen men, the whole army followed him, every one ſtriving who ſhould firſt thruſt himſelf between his prince and the danger that threatened him. The Scythians fought like men in deſpair; but the Romans, after a terrible ſlaughter on both ſides, made themſelves in the end maſters of the place. All the Scythians were either driven down the rocks and precipices, or put to the ſword. In the city, when the firſt fury of the ſoldiery was over, the women and children were ſpared, and, together with ſuch men as were found without arms, made priſoners. Among the captives was Boriſes, king of the Bulgarians, who being conducted to the emperor in his royal robes, was received by him in a manner ſuitable to his rank, magnificently entertained, and releaſed with his wife, and children, and all the Bulgarians, Zimiſces declaring he was at war with none but the Roſſi. The city of Perſthalba was utterly deſtroyed; but the emperor, having cauſed it to be rebuilt, called it after his own name Joannopolis. From thence he marched to Doroſterum, a city of great ſtrength on the Danube, where he was met by the army of the Roſſi, three hundred and thirty thouſand ſtrong. However, he reſolved to venture an engagement, which they not declining, one of the moſt bloody battles enſued we find mentioned in hiſtory. It continued from morning to night, victory inclining ſometimes to one ſide, and ſometimes to another. As night approached, the left wing of the Roſſi began to give ground, which the emperor obſerving, he charged them at the head of a choſen body with ſuch reſolution, that they betook themſelves in the end to a precipitous and diſorderly flight. Upon their retreat, the Romans, animated by the example of their prince, fell with freſh vigour upon the main body of the enemy, and bearing all down before them, carried the day. The Roſſi fled in the utmoſt confuſion to Doroſterum, whither the emperor purſued them, and laid cloſe ſiege to the place, which brought on a ſecond battle, wherein the Roſſi were defeated anew with great ſlaughter. However, they ſtill held out, and in their daily ſallies made a dreadful havock of the Romans, till their proviſions failing them, they unanimouſly agreed to quit the city, and open themſelves a way, ſword in hand, through the midſt of the Roman army. This they

The citadel taken.

The Roſſi defeated with great ſlaughter.

Doroſterum beſieged.

The Roſſi overcome in a ſecond battle.

they attempted with great boldneſs and reſolution, and ſucceeded in the attempt, though great numbers of them were cut in pieces, and the reſt obliged to ſavè themſelves by a precipitous flight. Their general, by name Sphendoſthalbus, finding himſelf no longer in a condition to make head againſt the Romans, ſent embaſſadors to the emperor, offering to relinquiſh Bulgaria, and conclude a peace upon the following terms; viz. That he ſhould be acknowledged as a friend and ally of the empire; that he and his countrymen ſhould be ſuffered to return home unmoleſted; and that a free commerce ſhould be ſettled between the two nations. The emperor, who was grown weary of the war, readily agreeing to theſe articles, the treaty was concluded and ſigned by both parties. After this Sphendoſthalbus went to wait on the emperor, who received him in a very obliging manner, entertained him with great magnificence, and diſmiſſed him loaded with rich preſents. The Roſſi being obliged, on their way home, to paſs through the territories of the Patcinacæ, that fierce and ſavage people fell upon them unexpectedly, and cut of the general and moſt of his men. The war with the Roſſi being thus ended, to the great reputation of Zimiſces, and the ſafety of the empire, the emperor cauſed all the towns on the Danube to be fortified, and then returned to Conſtantinople, where he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable. He was met at ſome diſtance from the city by the patriarch, the clergy, the ſenate, and the people, with crowns, and a triumphal chariot, drawn by four horſes richly capariſoned; but he, placing the image of the virgin Mary in the chariot, followed it in a ſolemn proceſſion, mounted on a white horſe, and thus entered the city amidſt the joyful acclamations of the people[g]. During the war with the Roſſi, ſeveral cities in the eaſt, which had been reduced by his predeceſſor, revolted, which obliged him to undertake another expedition. Leaving therefore Conſtantinople, he marched into the eaſtern provinces; and having reduced ſeveral cities, partly by force, partly by fair promiſes, he advanced as far as Damaſcus, and there reſided ſome time, applying himſelf with great care to the affairs of ſtate. During his ſtay in the eaſt, he was informed, that Baſilius the eunuch had engroſſed almoſt the whole wealth of thoſe provinces to himſelf; that moſt of the fine palaces and fruitful territories, which he obſerved on the road, belonged to him; that in the late reign he had oppreſſed the people in a moſt cruel manner, &c. Upon which he broke out with a ſigh in this

A peace between the two nations.

Zimiſces recovers ſeveral cities in the eaſt.

[g] Curopalat. ibid. Cedren. & Leo Gramm. in Zimiſc.

this expreſſion; "How unhappy is the preſent condition of the "Roman empire, which is thus pillaged by an avaricious "and aſpiring eunuch!" Baſilius had ſerved with great reputation under ſeveral emperors in their wars with the Saracens; and, as he was a man of great authority, had not a little contributed to the promotion of Nicephorus, who out of gratitude raiſed him to the poſt of prime miniſter, in which he was continued by Zimiſces, on account of his great knowledge and experience in affairs of ſtate. As he had many friends at court, he was ſoon informed of the emperor's reflection; and apprehending he might be called to an account, he reſolved to prevent, by ſome means or other, the evil conſequences, which he had reaſon to fear would attend it. Accordingly, by large preſents and greater promiſes, he prevailed upon the emperor's cup-bearer to adminiſter him poiſon; which brought him to his end, before he reached Conſtantinople. Though he miſtruſted his prime miniſter, yet he would not ſuffer any enquiries to be made about the treaſon, but ſpent the ſhort time he lived in exerciſes of chriſtian piety. He died in 976, after having reigned ſix years and as many months, and was univerſally lamented, eſpecially by the inhabitants of Conſtantinople, whom he had eaſed of many heavy taxes, with which they had been burdened by his predeceſſors. He is deſervedly reckoned amongſt the beſt and greateſt emperors, on account of his equity, moderation, courage, and piety, in which he excelled moſt of his predeceſſors. He was the firſt who cauſed the image of our Saviour to be engraved on the coins, with this legend, "Jeſus Chriſt, the King of kings. The writers of thoſe times tell us, that in the laſt battle with the Roſſi, a champion on a white horſe was obſerved by the whole army fighting before the firſt ranks; that to his ſingle valour was owing the victory gained on that occaſion; and that, as he had never been ſeen before and diſappeared after the battle, they all believed him to be St. Theodore the martyr, on whoſe anniverſary the victory was obtained. The emperor himſelf ſeemed to be of this opinion; for he repaired a church dedicated to that martyr, and changed the name of Euchaneia, the city in which it ſtood, to that of Theodoropolis [h].

He is poiſoned by Baſilius the eunuch.

His character.

ZIMISCES, dying without children, appointed Baſilius and Conſtantine, the ſons of the late emperor Romanus by Theophano, for his ſucceſſors. But as both princes were under age, the eldeſt being but nineteen and the other ſeventeen, Baſilius and Conſtantine.

[h] Curopalat. ibid.

teen, Baſilius the eunuch, took upon him the adminiſtration; and, the better to eſtabliſh his authority, recalled Theophano, the young princes mother, who had been baniſhed by Zimiſces. His next care was to remove Bardas Sclerus, of whom we have ſpoken above. He had been rewarded for his eminent ſervices by Zimiſces with the chief command of all the forces in the eaſt, and was greatly beloved by the ſoldiery, among whom he had been brought up from his youth. This gave no ſmall jealouſy to the prime miniſter, who thereupon deprived him of his command, and ſent him into Meſopotamia, to reſtrain the incurſions of the Saracens into that province. Sclerus broke out into bitter invectives againſt Baſilius; but the prime miniſter threatening to deprive him of all his employments and confine him to his houſe, he thought it adviſeable to obey the orders he had received, and to depart into the province which had been aſſigned him. He carried with him a firm reſolution of being revenged on his rival; and accordingly, ſoon after his arrival, he acquainted the chief officers of the army with his deſign, who all to a man promiſing to ſtand by him, and encouraging him to ſet up for himſelf, he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor, and was ſaluted as ſuch with loud acclamations by the whole army. Having ſpent the winter in warlike preparations, and entered into an alliance with the Saracens, who ſent him large ſupplies of money and horſes, he ſet forward in the beginning of the ſpring towards Conſtantinople. Baſilius, ſtruck with terror and diſmay at the news of his revolt, left no means unattempted to divert the impending ſtorm. He diſpatched orders to Peter, who had been appointed, in the room of Sclerus, commander of the forces in the eaſt, to draw together all his troops, and encamp with his whole army in the neighbourhood of Cæſarea. At the ſame time, Syncellus, biſhop of Nicomedia, a man famed for his eloquence and the holineſs of his life, was ſent to try whether he could prevail upon Sclerus to quit his unjuſt pretenſions, and diſband his army. The uſurper received the prelate with the greateſt demonſtrations of eſteem and affection; and, having heard him in appearance with great ſubmiſſion, returned him this ſhort anſwer; That having once appeared in the purple, he was firmly reſolved never to quit it but with his life. Upon the return of the biſhop to court, Peter was ordered to ſecure all the paſſes, and to prepare for a vigorous defence, in caſe he was attacked, but by no means to begin hoſtilities. Peter, purſuant to his orders, poſted ſtrong parties in all the paſſes; but Sclerus having,

Bardas Sclerus uſurps the ſovereign.

ving, in ſpite of all oppoſition, opened himſelf a way into Cappadocia, encamped at a ſmall diſtance from the imperial army. Hereupon ſeveral ſkirmiſhes enſued, without any conſiderable advantage on either ſide. But at length Sclerus, falling unexpectedly upon the emperor's army, cut great numbers of them in pieces, before they could put themſelves in a poſture of defence; and having forced the reſt to ſave themſelves by flight, made himſelf maſter of their camp, in which he found great ſums of money and an immenſe quantity of arms and proviſions. The fame of this victory induced moſt of the eaſtern provinces to renounce their allegiance to the young princes, and declare for Sclerus, who, elated with this ſucceſs, would not ſo much as admit to his preſence the embaſſadors, who were ſent to him with very honourable and advantageous propoſals. In the mean time, Leo, who had been appointed to ſucceed Peter in the command of the army, arriving in Phrygia, marched from thence at the head of a ſtrong detachment into the eaſtern provinces, which had ſubmitted to the uſurper, but had been left quite deſtitute of troops. This obliged Sclerus to divide his army, and ſend a body of men to cover thoſe countries. But Leo falling in with them on their march, a battle enſued, in which the emperor's troops had the advantage, great numbers of Sclerus's men being ſlain, and many taken priſoners. The uſurper, alarmed at the news of this defeat, left Cappadocia, and haſtening after Leo, came up with him in a few days march, engaged him, and gained a complete victory. Moſt of the chief officers in the emperor's army were ſlain, and Leo himſelf taken priſoner, with ſeveral other perſons of great diſtinction. Such of them as had abandoned Sclerus to ſide with Leo, had their eyes pulled out by the uſurper's orders at the head of the army. As for Leo himſelf, he was treated with great civility, but kept under cloſe confinement. Bardas, animated with this ſucceſs, marched ſtrait to Nice, the metropolis of Bithynia, not doubting, but he ſhould carry the place at the firſt aſſault. But Manuel Eroticus, whom Baſilius had ſent with a conſiderable body of troops to defend it, repulſed the uſurper in ſeveral ſucceſſive attempts with ſuch vigour, that, deſparing of being able to take a place ſo well garriſoned by force, he reſolved to reduce it by famine. Manuel, appriſed of his deſign, and ſenſible of the great ſtreights to which the numerous garriſon would be ſoon reduced, filled the empty granaries with ſand, which he ſtrewed over with corn, and ſhewed them to ſome priſoners he had

And defeats the emperor's army.

He gains another victory.

He lays ſiege to Nice.

had taken; who, being diſmiſſed, repreſented to Sclerus, that he attempted invain to reduce a place by famine, that was ſo plentifully ſupplied with corn. Soon after, Manuel ſent deputies to acquaint Sclerus, that, conſidering the doubtful events of war, he was willing to ſurrender upon certain conditions, one of which was, that the garriſon ſhould be allowed to march out with their arms and baggage, and to paſs unmoleſted to Conſtantinople. To theſe conditions the uſurper readily conſented; but was highly provoked, when, entering the city, he diſcovered the deceit, and found the place quite deſtitute of proviſions [i]. Sclerus, after the reduction of Nice, was preparing to march to Conſtantinople, where he had many friends, who were ready to declare for him as ſoon as he appeared. But, in the mean time, Bardas Phocas, whom Baſilius had recalled from exile, and appointed commander in chief againſt Sclerus, as the only man in the empire able to contend with him, arriving, with all the troops he could draw together, at Amorium, the uſurper thought it adviſeable to march in the firſt place againſt him. Accordingly he haſtened with all his forces to Amorium; and coming there to an engagement, put Phocas's army to the rout. Though Phocas himſelf diſcharged all the offices of a valiant ſoldier and experienced officer, yet his ſoldiers were ſo diſpirited by former defeats, that he could neither with words nor his example inſpire them with courage. Phocas, no longer able to keep the field, retired to Phrygia, and having there received large ſupplies out of Iberia and the other provinces, which continued ſtedfaſt in their allegiance, he reſolved to venture a ſecond engagement. Accordingly, leaving Phrygia, he advanced into Cappadocia, where he found Sclerus encamped on a large plain named Pancalea, and ready to receive him. Both armies engaged with a fury hardly to be expreſſed; but Phocas's men beginning, after an obſtinate diſpute, to give ground, the brave general, determined to conquer or periſh, opened himſelf a way, ſword in hand, into the midſt of the enemy's ranks, and there engaging Sclerus himſelf, dangerouſly wounded him. Some of the enemy's officers, appriſed of the danger their general was in, haſtened to his reſcue; and finding him covered all over with blood, they carried him to a neighbouring fountain, there to waſh his wound and refreſh him, as he was fainting with drought. In the mean time, his horſe

The place ſurrenders.

Bardas Phocas defeated by Sclerus.

[i] Curopalat. Cedren. Leo Gramm. ibid.

horſe running in with his bloody main among the ranks, his ſoldiers concluded from thence, that their general was ſlain, which occaſioned ſuch conſternation in the army, that, inſtead of purſuing the emperor's troops, who had, in ſpite of Phocas's utmoſt endeavours, begun to fly, they fled themſelves in the greateſt confuſion, ſome throwing themſelves headlong down vaſt precipices, others taking to the river Halys, in which great numbers were drowned. Thus was the fortune of the day turned, and the victory, by a lucky miſtake, ſnatched out of the hands of the enemy, who were purſued with great ſlaughter by Phocas. Sclerus eſcaped with a ſmall body of horſe to Martyropolis, and from thence to Babylon, to implore the protection and aſſiſtance of Choſrhoes, ſultan of the place; which the emperor Baſilius no ſooner underſtood, than he diſpatched embaſſadors to Choſrhoes, repreſenting to him the evils that might accrue from one prince's protecting ſuch as had, by an open revolt, taken arms againſt another. The embaſſadors were at the ſame time enjoined to aſſure Sclerus in the emperor's name, that he ſhould not only be pardoned, but received into favour and reſtored to his former honours, provided he renounced his pretenſions and returned home. Choſrhoes, finding the embaſſadors were privately treating with Sclerus, ordered both him and them to be thrown into priſon, whence we ſhall ſee him in a ſhort time releaſed, to raiſe new diſturbances in the empire.

Bardas gains a complete victory over Sclerus.

Who flies to Babylon.

THE rebellion of Sclerus being thus ſuppreſſed, the emperor Baſilius, who had taken the adminiſtration into his own hands, reſolved to be revenged on the Bulgarians, who had made frequent inroads into the empire, while the emperor's troops were employed in the eaſt. With this view he put himſelf at the head of his army, and, without imparting his deſign either to Phocas or any other of his generals in the eaſt, he entered Bulgaria, and, leaving Leo Meliſſenus to ſecure the narrow paſſes behind him, marched ſtrait to Sardica. But while he was preparing to lay ſiege to that important place, Stephen, commander in chief of the weſtern forces, and an avowed and irreconcileable enemy to Leo Meliſſenus, coming in the dead of the night to the emperor's tent, conjured him to lay aſide all other deſigns whatſoever, and to return with all poſſible expedition to Conſtantinople, whither Leo had already marched, with a deſign to ſeize on the ſovereignty in his abſence. The emperor, alarmed at this unexpected news, and apprehending the enemy might, by ſeizing on the poſts which Leo was ſaid to have abandoned, cut off his retreat, ordered in a great frigh Baſilius enters Bulgaria.

fright his army to march the ſame night; which being obſerved by Samuel, prince of the Bulgarians, he fell upon them in their retreat, and put great numbers of them to the ſword. The emperor with great difficulty reached Philippopolis, where he found Leo carefully attending his duty on the ſtation which had been aſſigned him. Hereupon, highly provoked againſt Stephen, who had thus impoſed upon him, he immediately diſcharged him, and conferred his employment on his competitor. Stephen, however, maintained to the laſt, that Leo really intended to uſurp the empire; which incenſed the emperor to ſuch a degree, that he could not forbear ſtriking him, and dragging him in a violent paſſion on the ground by his hair and long beard [k]. The emperor had undertaken the Bulgarian expedition, as we have obſerved above, without imparting his deſign to Bardas Phocas, commander in chief of all the eaſtern forces. This that general highly reſented; and apprehending the young prince would act for the future without any regard to his counſels, he began to entertain thoughts of uſurping the ſupreme authority. The officers of the army, to whom he imparted the motive of his diſcontent, encouraged him in his attempt, and promiſed to ſupport him to the laſt; ſo that, after ſeveral private conferences, they all met at the houſe of one Euſtathius Melenius, and there inveſting Phocas with the imperial ornaments, unanimouſly proclaimed him emperor. At the ſame time, Bardas Sclerus, of whom we have ſpoken above, being ſet at liberty by Choſrhoes ſultan of Babylon, returned into the territories of the empire, at the head of three thouſand Roman captives, the ſultan having granted them their liberty, in regard of their eminent ſervices againſt the rebellious Perſians. With theſe Sclerus thought himſelf once more in a condition to renew his former pretenſions; and accordingly entering Meſopotamia, cauſed himſelf to be there acknowledged emperor. But being, in the mean time, informed of the revolt of Phocas, after having been ſome time in ſuſpenſe whether he ſhould join him or Baſilius, he offered in the end to aſſiſt Phocas, and ſhare the empire with him; but at the ſame time he adviſed his ſon Romanus privately to abandon him, and fly to Baſilius at Conſtantinople. By this means, if Phocas prevailed, he thought he ſhould be able to obtain of him his ſon's pardon; and if Baſilius got the better, he did not doubt, but his Bardas Phocas proclaimed emperor.

Sclerus, ſet at liberty, joins Phocas.

[k] Idem, ibid.

his ſon would have intereſt enough to obtain his of the emperor. Romanus, upon his arrival at Conſtantinople, was received by Baſilius with all poſſible demonſtrations of kindneſs, and raiſed to the firſt employments in the ſtate. But Sclerus met with a far different treatment from Phocas: they agreed at firſt to divide the empire between them; Sclerus was to have for his ſhare Antioch, Phœnicia, Paleſtine, Cœle ſyria, Meſopotamia, and Egypt; Conſtantinople, with the reſt of the provinces, was allotted to Phocas. This agreement being ratified and ſworn to by both parties, Sclerus and Bardas joined their forces; which was no ſooner done, than Phocas cauſed Sclerus to be privately ſeized; and, having ſtripped him of his imperial ornaments, committed him to cloſe priſon. His men at firſt mutinied; but, being overpowered with numbers, they were forced to ſubmit, and in the end prevailed upon with large promiſes to ſerve under Phocas; who, being thus reinforced, ſent Calocyrus Delphinus with part of his army to Chryſopolis, while he removed with the reſt to Abydus, in order to beſiege that important place, and, after reducing it, to block up Conſtantinople itſelf. But, in the mean time, the emperor Baſilius, acquainted with the enemy's motions, having paſſed the ſtreights in the night, fell unexpectedly upon Delphinus; and having put his army to flight at the firſt onſet, took him and ſome other officers of great note priſoners, who were all immediately nailed to ſeveral trees on the highway, to ſtrike terror into the reſt. Phocas met with a vigorous reſiſtance at Abydus, the inhabitants and garriſon being encouraged by the arrival of the imperial fleet, which was immediately followed by the emperor Baſilius, and he ſoon after by his brother Conſtantine. Upon the arrival of the two princes, Phocas reſolved to give them battle; and accordingly, leaving part of his forces before Abydus to purſue the ſiege, he drew up the reſt in a neighbouring plain. Some of the young princes generals adviſed them to throw themſelves into Abydus, and there wait the arrival of freſh ſupplies; but the greater part thinking it adviſable to engage the enemy without loſs of time, they marched at the head of their forces in battle-array into the plain where the uſurper had drawn up his. But while both armies were ready to engage, or, as ſome write, when the battle was begun, Phocas was taken off. The manner of his death is differently related: ſome write, that his horſe threw him, and that he died of the fall; others, that he was killed in the firſt onſet. The emperor Conſtantine bragged, that

They agree to divide the empire between them.

Phocas betrays and ſeizes Sclerus.

He lays ſiege to Abydus.

Phocas dies.

that he had killed him with his own hand; but the moſt received opinion is, that one of his domeſtics, by name Symeon, in whom he repoſed an entire confidence, at the inſtigation of Baſilius, adminiſtered him poiſon before the battle, of which he died ſoon after. Be that as it will, the report of his death was no ſooner ſpread abroad in the army, than his men betook themſelves to a precipitous and diſorderly flight. The emperor's forces purſued them cloſe, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and having taken moſt of the leading men of the party priſoners, conveyed them to Conſtantinople, where they were puniſhed according to their deſerts, ſome being publicly executed, and others ſtripped of their eſtates and ſent into baniſhment. However, the death of Phocas and the defeat of his army did not put an end to the civil wars; for ſuch of the party as had the good luck to make their eſcape, having ſet Sclerus at liberty, encouraged him to purſue his former pretenſions; and he, though now in a very advanced age, hearkening to their ſuggeſtions, put himſelf at their head, and marching into Cappadocia, reduced great part of that province. But the emperor having written a friendly letter to him, offering him his favour and protection, and his ſon Romanus earneſtly entreating him at the ſame time not to involve the empire in new wars, but to enjoy the ſmall remainder of his life in peace and tranquillity among his friends and relations, he was prevailed upon to quit his pretenſions, and return to Conſtantinople, where he was received by Baſilius with uncommon civility, entertained at his table, and declared great ſteward of the houſhold. Such of his followers as had enjoyed offices of honour or profit under him, were continued in the ſame employments, or preferred to others equally advantageous and honourable. We are told, that when he firſt appeared before Baſilius, ſupported, on account of his age and corpulency, by two of his domeſtics, the emperor, in reflecting how much he had dreaded him, could hardly forbear laughing.

Sclerus ſet at liberty.

He ſubmits.

THE civil war being thus happily ended, Baſilius took a progreſs into Thrace and Macedon; and having left a ſufficient number of troops at Theſſalonica to awe the Bulgarians, he paſſed over into Aſia with the reſt, to ſettle the affairs of the eaſtern provinces. On his march through Cappadocia, he was entertained with his whole army by Euſtathius Melenius, commander of the troops in that province. The wealth which Melenius diſplayed on that occaſion gave the emperor ſuch umbrage, that, pretending a particular eſteem Baſilius viſits the eaſtern provinces.

for him, he took him with him to Conſtantinople, whence he never after ſuffered him to depart, leſt he ſhould raiſe diſturbances in the empire; and, after his death, ſeized on his vaſt eſtate. The emperor, upon his return to Conſtantinople, was informed, that Samuel, king of the Bulgarians, had ſurpriſed the city of Theſſalonica, and, having croſſed the Peneus, was laying waſte Theſſaly, Bœotia, Attica; nay, that ſome of his parties had penetrated into the very heart of Peloponneſus. Hereupon Nicephorus Uranus, commander in chief of the weſtern forces, was diſpatched againſt him, at the head of a powerful army. Uranus, leaving his baggage at Lariſſa, reached by long marches the Sperchius, and encamped with his whole army over-againſt the enemy, who lay on the oppoſite bank. As the river was greatly ſwelled with the heavy rains that had fallen, Samuel, not imagining the Romans would attempt to paſs it, ſuffered his troops to roam in large parties about the country in queſt of booty. But Uranus, having at length found out a place where the river was fordable, paſſed it in the dead of the night; and falling unexpectedly on the Bulgarians, who were left in the camp and lay for the moſt part aſleep, cut great numbers of them in pieces, took their baggage, with many priſoners, and made themſelves maſters of their camp. Samuel and his ſon were dangerouſly wounded, and would unavoidably have been taken, had they not all that day concealed themſelves among the dead. The next night they ſtole away to the mountains of Ætolia, and from thence made their eſcape into Bulgaria[1]. The following year 1001, the emperor Baſilius entered Bulgaria at the head of a numerous and well-diſciplined army; and having defeated Samuel in a pitched battle on the banks of the Axius, took Vidina, Scopi, and ſeveral other ſtrong cities. However, the emperor narrowly eſcaped being cut off with his whole army in the ſtreights of Cimba, where he was unexpectedly attacked by Samuel; but reſcued from the danger he was in by the ſeaſonable arrival of Nicephorus Xiphias, governor of Philippopolis, who falling upon the enemy's rear, put them to flight. Baſilius purſued them cloſe, and having taken an incredible number of priſoners, cauſed their eyes to be pulled out, leaving to every hundred a guide with one eye, that he might conduct them to Samuel; who, not able to ſtand the ſhock of ſo terrible and affecting a ſpectacle, fell into a deep ſwoon and died two days after. Samuel was ſucceeded by his ſon Gabriel, who was ſoon after murdered

His war with the Bulgarians.

Samuel, king of the Bulgarians defeated.

Samuel dies.

[1] Idem ibid.

dered by John Bladiſthlabus, a perſon nearly related to him. Bladiſthlabus, having cauſed himſelf to be acknowledged prince of the Bulgarians, ſent embaſſadors to Baſilius, offering to ſubmit to any terms, and to own himſelf, and behave on all occaſions, as a ſubject and vaſſal of the empire. The emperor received the embaſſadors in a very obliging manner, but the new prince declining, under various pretences, to execute the conditions agreed on, Baſilius returned the following year into Bulgaria, firmly reſolved not to ſheath his ſword, till he had entirely reduced it. Accordingly, having in the ſpace of two years made himſelf maſter of moſt of the enemy's ſtrong-holds, and gained ſeveral victories over Bladiſthlabus, who had defended his country with incredible valour, but was at length ſlain in a battle fought near Achridus, the Bulgarians ſent deputies to the Roman camp, with offers of a total and unfeigned ſubmiſſion. Baſilius received them with his uſual civility; and having raiſed to the rank of patricians ſuch of the Bulgarian nobility as ſeemed moſt forward in ſurrendering their caſtles and ſtrong-holds, he was received with loud acclamations into the city of Achridus, where he found the vaſt treaſures of the Bulgarian princes, which he diſtributed, by way of donative, amongſt his ſoldiers. Soon after, the widow of the late king, with her ſix daughters and three of her ſons, delivered herſelf up to the emperor, who received her with the greateſt kindneſs and reſpect, and entertained her ſuitable to her rank. This obliging behaviour in the emperor encouraged her three other ſons, with moſt of the princes of the blood, who had taken ſhelter among the mountains, to ſubmit and throw themſelves upon the emperor's mercy. However, Ibatzes, a perſon nearly allied to the royal family, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very eminent manner during the whole courſe of the war, refuſing to ſubmit, fled to a ſteep and craggy mountain, with a deſign to defend himſelf there to the laſt extremity. Baſilius endeavoured by fair means to induce him to ſubmit to neceſſity, and comply with the preſent poſture of affairs; but he equally deſpiſing the emperor's threats and promiſes, Euſtathius Daphnomelus, whom Baſilius had lately appointed governor of Achridus, without imparting to any one his deſign, repaired, with two perſons in whom he could confide, to the mountain where Ibatzes had fortified himſelf. He hoped to paſs undiſcovered among the many ſtrangers, who flocked thither to celebrate the approaching feaſt of the aſſumption of the virgin Mary, for whom Ibatzes had a particular veneration; but being known to the guards, he was ſeized and carried before Ibatzes, to whom he

The Bulgarians ſubmit to the emperor.

Ibatzes alone holds out.

A deſperate attempt of Daphnomelus.

pretended to have matters of the greateſt importance to communicate. Ibatzes received him in a very obliging manner; and having, at his requeſt, followed him into a remote place, Daphnomelus threw himſelf all on a ſudden upon him; and his two men, who attended at ſome diſtance, and with whom the whole ſcheme had been concerted before-hand, coming up, and thruſting their cloaths violently into his mouth, pulled out both his eyes, and got ſafe to an abandoned caſtle on the top of the hill; which Ibatzes's men inveſted on all ſides, as ſoon as they heard of the misfortune which had befallen their leader. But Daphnomelus exhorting them to follow the example of their countrymen, and, now that they were deſtitute of a leader, to ſubmit to the emperor, by whom, he aſſured them, they ſhould be well received and amply rewarded, inſtead of attacking the caſtle, they congratulated Daphnomelus on his ſucceſs, and took an oath of allegiance to the emperor of the Romans. Hereupon Daphnomelus, quitting the caſtle, carried Ibatzes, without the leaſt oppoſition, to Baſilius, who, no leſs ſurpriſed at the boldneſs than the ſucceſs of the attempt, rewarded his officer with the government of Dyrrhachium and all the rich moveables of his priſoner. Baſilius, having thus at length accompliſhed the entire reduction of Bulgaria, returned with an incredible number of priſoners and hoſtages to Conſtantinople, where he was received with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy by the ſenate and people. After the concluſion of this war, which began in 995, and ended in 1019, the emperor undertook an expedition into Iberia; but with what ſucceſs, we are no-where told. During his abſence, Xiphius and Nicephorus, the ſon of Bardas Phocas, revolted; but Xiphius, being gained over by Baſilius, put a ſtop to the rebellion, by diſpatching his fellow conſpirator. Baſilius proceeded with great ſeverity againſt all who had been, or were, only ſuſpected of having been, privy to the conſpiracy. Great numbers of the nobility were on this occaſion either put to death, or ſent into exile; which occaſioned ſome commotions at Conſtantinople: but the ringleaders being ſeized and publicly executed, the city was reſtored to its former tranquillity. In 1025, the emperor, though then in the ſeventieth year of his age, reſolved to engage in a new war againſt the Saracens, who had ſettled in Sicily and committed dreadful ravages on the coaſts of Naples and Calabria; which countries were ſtill ſubject to the empire. Accordingly, having aſſembled a powerful army and equipped a mighty fleet, he ſent before a ſtrong body of forces, under the Bulgaria entirely ſubdued.

Baſilius reſolves to make war upon the Saracens.

the conduct of Oreſtes his favourite eunuch, with a deſign to follow in perſon ſoon after with the reſt of the army; but was prevented by death, which overtook him in the month of December of the year 1025, after he had lived ſeventy years, and reigned fifty. He was highly eſteemed by his ſubjects, on account of his application to public affairs, and his ſucceſs in the long and bloody war, which he undertook againſt the Bulgarians. But as his jealouſy encreaſed with his years, towards the cloſe of his reign he grew inexorably ſevere; on which account he was rather feared than beloved by his ſubjects. The abſolute conqueſt of Bulgaria, which had been in vain attempted by ſo many of his predeceſſors, but was happily accompliſhed by him, has rendered the name of Baſilius II. famous among the Roman, or rather the Conſtantinopolitan, princes.

But is prevented by death.

CHAP. XXXV.

The Roman hiſtory, from the death of Baſilius II. to the taking of Conſtantinople by the Latins.

BY the death of Baſilius, Conſtantine, who had borne the name of emperor in conjunction with his brother, remained ſole maſter of the empire. As he was an effeminate, vicious, and indolent prince, he entirely neglected all public affairs, to follow his private diverſions, ſuffering his miniſters, moſt of them perſons no leſs infamous than himſelf, to oppreſs the provinces without controul, and lay on the people what burdens they thought fit. By this means the empire, which had begun to revive under Nicephorus, Zimiſces, and Baſilius, was, in the ſhort reign of Conſtantine, brought to as low an ebb as it had ever been at. Such perſons as had, either by their exploits or virtues, acquired reputation in the late reign, were removed from their employments, to make room for the emperor's companions in his debaucheries. Nicephorus Comnenus, a perſon no leſs eſteemed for his virtue than his experience in war, was at the ſame time deprived of his command and his ſight, under pretence of conſpiring againſt the emperor, though, in reality, his eminent

Conſtantine

His wicked reign.

Several perſons of diſtinction put to death or ſent into exile.

virtues, which gave umbrage to the abandoned prince, were his only crimes. Bardas, the ſon of the celebrated Phocas who had ſerved Baſilius with the utmoſt fidelity, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf on many occaſions in a moſt eminent manner, was treated with the like ſeverity, for no other reaſon, but becauſe his extraordinary merit gave umbrage to the emperor's favourites. Many other perſons of great diſtinction, who ſeemed to diſlike the emperor's conduct, were, under various pretences, either put to death, or ſent into exile. Such proceedings raiſed a general diſcontent at home, and at the ſame time encouraged the nations abroad to make irruptions into the territories of the empire; but they were reſtrained by the care and vigilance of thoſe who commanded on the borders. It was happy for the ſtate, that, Conſtantine's reign was ſhort; for he had ſcarce governed three years alone, when he fell dangerouſly ill, and was given over by his phyſicians; which divided the court into two factions concerning his ſucceſſor, ſome propoſing Conſtantine Delaſſenus, commander of the forces in Armenia, and others uſing all their intereſt in favour of Romanus Argyrus, a perſon of an antient family and nearly related to the emperor. As Conſtantine had three daughters, it was agreed, that whoever ſucceeded him ſhould marry one of them. Romanus was already married, and therefore ſeemed by this agreement to be excluded from the empire; but his friends, who were the moſt powerful at court and the emperor's chief favourites, prevailed upon the prince to declare in his favour, and ſending for him, to put it to his choice, either to be deprived of his ſight, or to divorce his wife, and, marrying one of the emperor's daughters, be raiſed to the dignity of Cæſar. Romanus ſeemed at the firſt inclined rather to loſe his eyes and the imperial dignity, than part with his wife, whom he tenderly loved; but ſhe, informed of what paſſed, retired immediately to a monaſtery, and, by embracing there a monaſtic life, made room for Zoe, the emperor's ſecond daughter, to whom Romanus was married, and at the ſame time created Cæſar. Three days after the nuptials, Conſtantine died, in the year 1028, the ſeventieth of his age, and third of his reign without a collegue.

Conſtantine dies.

Romanus II.

ROMANUS, thus raiſed to the empire, began his reign by eaſing the people of the many taxes, with which they had been burdened by his predeceſſor; which gained him the hearts of his ſubjects. His liberality to the church knew no bounds, and his indulgence to the unhappy captives, who had been taken in the late wars, was no leſs remarkable; for they they were all ranſomed at his private expence, ſupplied with money to defray the charges of their journey, and ſent back to their reſpective countries [m]. In his ſecond year, the Saracens, who had continued quiet in the reign of Baſilius, but had begun to prepare for war in that of Conſtantine, broke into that part of Syria which belonged to the Romans, and with their daily incurſions, greatly haraſſed the territory of Antioch. Spondyles, who commanded the troops quartered in Antioch and that neighbourhood, endeavoured to reſtrain them; but being in ſeveral encounters worſted and put to flight, the emperor reſolved to march in perſon into Syria, and retrieve, if poſſible, the reputation of the Roman arms there. Purſuant to this reſolution he ſet out from Conſtantinople, at the head of a very numerous and formidable army. But before he had advanced far on his way, he was met by embaſſadors from the Saracens of Berœa, who, alarmed at his vaſt preparations, were come to ſue for peace, promiſing at the ſame time to pay their uſual tribute for the future, and never more to infeſt the territories of the empire. Moſt of the officers in the army adviſed Romanus to accept of their ſubmiſſion, and not to engage raſhly in a war, which in all likelihood, would prove both bloody and expenſive. But he, promiſing himſelf great glory and advantages from that expedition, diſmiſſed the embaſſadors with diſdain, and entering Syria, detatched a ſtrong party to obſerve the enemy's motions. The party, falling unhappily into an ambuſcade, were all cut off to a man; and the Saracens, elated with this ſucceſs, attacked unexpectedly Conſtantine Delaſſenus, who had been ſent out with a ſtrong body of troops to cover the Roman foragers, put him to flight at the firſt onſet, and purſued him to the very gates of the camp, which they inveſted on all ſides. The emperor's army being ſoon reduced to the utmoſt extremity for want of proviſions, and above all of water, it was agreed in a council of war, that they ſhould decamp in the night and march to Antioch. But the Saracens, who carefully watched their motions, falling upon them with great violence in their retreat, put moſt of them to the ſword, the emperor himſelf eſcaping with the utmoſt difficulty to Antioch. The enemy took all the emperor's baggage; which however, was recovered by George Maniaces, at that time governor of a ſmall town in thoſe parts, in the following manner: Eight hundred Saracens, loaded with the rich plunder of the emperor's

He marches in perſon againſt the Saracens.

His army is cut off.

The baggage of the army recovered by Maniaces.

[m] Curopalat. in Roman.

peror's camp, appeared before the place, and affirming that the emperor himſelf was taken and his army totally defeated, ſummoned Maniaces to ſurrender. Maniaces, already informed of the emperor's eſcape, but pretending to give credit to what they ſaid, ſent them out a great quantity of proviſions to refreſh themſelves that night, and promiſed to deliver up the town to them as ſoon as it was light. Hereupon the enemy, without the leaſt diſtruſt, paſſed the greater part of the night in mirth and jollity; but when, after having eaten and drank to a great exceſs, they were all aſleep, Maniaces, ſallying out, cut them all off to a man, without the leaſt oppoſition; and having taken two hundred and eighty camels loaded with the ſpoils of the Roman army, he ſent them to the emperor, who rewarded him for this ſeaſonable piece of ſervice with the government of Media [n]. In the mean time, Romanus, having with much-ado reached Cappadocia, returned from thence, with the remains of his ſhattered army, to Conſtantinople; and there laying aſide all thoughts of any warlike attempt for the future, made it his whole ſtudy to fill the exchequer, which had been quite drained by the prodigality and extravagance of his predeceſſor. In order to this, he renewed his claim to old debts, thought to have been utterly forgotten, and proceeded with ſuch rigor in the recovery of them, that many perſons of diſtinction were driven from their eſtates, and reduced with their families to beggary. Theſe ſevere exactions raiſed a general diſcontent in the people, which gave riſe to ſeveral plots and conſpiracies, for the moſt part carried on by Theodora, the late emperor's youngeſt daughter, who was on that account confined to a monaſtery, and obliged to take the religious habit; which we ſhall ſee her hereafter exchange for the imperial purple. In 1033, the fourth of Romanus's reign, a dreadful plague broke out in Cappadocia, and raged with ſuch violence in that province, as well as in Paphlagonia and Armenia, that the inhabitants were forced to abandon their dwellings and retire to other parts of the empire. The plague was followed by a terrible famine, and that by earthquakes, which deſtroyed ſeveral cities, and overturned many ſtately edifices at Conſtantinople, where it was felt for the ſpace of forty days. At the ſame time, a comet appeared, which paſſed with a terrible noiſe from the north to the ſouth, the whole horizon ſeeming to be in a flame. Romanus, alarmed at theſe and ſeveral other public calamities Romanus oppreſſes the people.

Several public calamities.

[n] Curopalat. Cedren. Zonar.

calamities and prodigies, with which the hiſtories of thoſe times are filled, applied himſelf wholly to the works of piety, hoping by that means to avert the wrath of Heaven, which ſeemed to threaten the empire. He erected ſeveral hoſpitals for the relief of the poor, repaired thoſe which had been deſtroyed by the late earthquakes, rebuilt the aqueducts, ſupplied the city with water, of which it began to be in great want, and, above all, enriched with large donations the monaſteries, beſtowing on the monks whole cities and the moſt fruitful lands in the provinces, purchaſed by him at the public expence. In the mean time, the empreſs Zoe, a moſt lewd and incontinent woman, deſpiſing her husband, now in the ſixty-ſixth year of his age, caſt her eyes on Michael, the brother of John an eunuch, in great authority with the emperor. As Michael, though meanly born, was a man of a moſt comely aſpect, of a graceful perſon, and great addreſs, the empreſs began to entertain a violent paſſion for him; which, as ſhe abandoned herſelf to it, grew in a ſhort time ſo powerful, that ſhe reſolved to diſpatch her husband and marry him. Accordingly, having imparted her deſign to ſuch of her creatures as ſhe could confide in, poiſon was adminiſtered by them to the unhappy prince, which, in a ſhort time, reduced him to a moſt deplorable condition. However, the empreſs thinking it too ſlow in its operation, hired an aſſaſſin to diſpatch him, who, entering the bath where the emperor was refreſhing himſelf, held his head under water till he expired. His death happened on the eleventh, or as others write on the fifteenth, of April of the year 1034, after he had reigned five years and ſix months.

The emperor applies himſelf wholly to works of piety.

The empreſs falls in love with Michael.

Romanus murdered.

ROMANUS being dead, the empreſs Zoe ſent for the patriarch Alexius in great haſte, who was then celebrating in the church the office appointed for Good-friday; for on that day the emperor was murdered. As Alexius had been ſent for in Romanus's name, he was greatly ſurpriſed, when he heard he was dead; and much more when the empreſs, upon his being introduced to her, ordered him to marry her to Michael. Struck with horror and amazement, he declined the office for ſome time; but was in the end, with a preſent of an hundred pounds weight of gold, prevailed upon to comply. When the ceremony was over, the new emperor acquainted the people with the death of Romanus and his own marriage with Zoe, who, he ſaid, had taken him for her partner in the empire, to which ſhe had an undoubted right. Letters to the ſame purpoſe were diſpatched into the provinces, where none of the great men ſeemed diſpleaſed at the promotion promotion of Michael, except Conſtantine Delaſſenus, who had been named by ſome to ſucceed Baſilius II. and being, on account of his rank and family, the firſt man in the empire, was highly offended, that a perſon of Michael's obſcure birth ſhould be preferred to him. But John the eunuch, Michael's brother, having, with repeated oaths, promiſes, and aſſeverations, prevailed upon him to come to court, baniſhed him, as ſoon as he had him in his power, to the iſland Prota, whence he was removed to a ſtrong tower, and there kept under cloſe confinement, till he was ſent for to court by the empreſs Zoe, as we ſhall relate hereafter. At the ſame time, John took care to remove, and, under various pretences, to ſend into exile, ſuch as gave him the leaſt umbrage, or ſeemed to be ill-affected to his family: Conſtantius Monomachus, afterwards emperor, was confined to a caſtle; Maniaces, who was highly eſteemed and beloved by the people, was ſent into Upper Media, under pretence of reſtraining the incurſions of the Saracens; all the friends and relations of the late emperor were driven from their eſtates and employments, and the government of the provinces, as well as the charge of civil affairs, committed to none but eunuchs. John, having thus eſtabliſhed his brother's intereſt in the provinces, began to reflect on the fate of Romanus; and diſtruſting the fickle temper of Zoe, removed from her all the women, in whom ſhe repoſed any confidence; and diſcharging her eunuchs, appointed others in whom he could confide, to attend, or rather to watch, her; ſo that ſhe could not ſtir out of the palace without his knowledge and conſent. The empreſs, highly provoked at the reſtraint put upon her, and looking upon John as no other than her goaler, endeavoured to get rid of him by poiſon; but the deſign being diſcovered, before it could be put into execution, the miniſter ſtood thenceforth on his guard, and watched her more narrowly. As for Michael the emperor, he ſuffered John to govern with an abſolute ſway, applying himſelf wholly to his devotions. Being conſcious of the heinous crime he had committed in murdering his ſovereign, he hoped to attone for it by works of piety, by his liberality to the poor, and by erecting and endowing churches, hoſpitals, oratories, &c. As he began to grow diſtempered in his body and diſordered in his mind, John, concluding that, if he died, the empreſs would endeavour to recover her authority, and would not fail, if ſhe ſucceeded therein, to gratify her revenge with the utter ruin of him and his family, prevailed upon the emperor to prefer Michael, ſurnamed Calaphates, his Several perſons of diſtinction baniſhed by John the eunuch.

Michael the Paphlagonian marries Zoe, and is raiſed to the empire.

Who governs with abſolute power.

his ſiſter's ſon, to the dignity of Cæſar, and to baniſh all the friends and relations of the empreſs Zoe [o]. In the third year of Michael's reign, a peace for thirty years was concluded between him and the Saracens of Egypt, whoſe kalif being dead, his widow is ſaid to have embraced the chriſtian religion, and to have brought about an agreement between her ſubjects and the Romans. The following year 1036, was remarkable for dreadful earthquakes, which overturned ſeveral cities in different parts of the empire, and for an attempt of the Saracens on the city of Edeſſa, which narrowly eſcaped falling into their hands. Twelve of the chief men of their nation, preſenting themſelves before the gates, with five hundred horſes and as many camels, loaded with large cheſts, demanded admittance, pretending they were carrying preſents to the emperor. The governor received into the city the twelve embaſſadors, as they ſtyled themſelves, and entertained them at a banquet; but could not be prevailed upon to admit the horſes and camels: which diffidence preſerved the place; for the cheſts were filled with armed men, who, in the dead of the night, were to be let out, and, killing the centinels, to ſeize on the city. The deſign was diſcovered by an Armenian to the governor; who, ſuddenly withdrawing from the banquet, and taking a ſufficient force with him, ſurprized and put to the ſword all the Saracens without the town; then returning to his gueſts, treated them in the like manner, ſparing but one, whoſe hands, ears, and noſe he cut off, and ſent him home in that condition, to give his countrymen an account of what had happened [p]. The following year, the Bulgarians revolted, and, ſhaking off the yoke, choſe one Delcanus, or as ſome call him Dolianus, for their king. He was ſervant to a citizen of Conſtantinople; but eſcaping from his maſter, fled into Bulgaria, his native country; and there gave out that he was the ſon of Gabriel and grandſon of Samuel. The Bulgarians, weary of the yoke, to which they had but lately ſubmitted, received him as their deliverer, and having proclaimed him king, murdered all the Romans, who had the misfortune to fall into their hands. At the ſame time, the inhabitants of Dyrrachium, no longer able to bear the cruel exactions of their governor Michael Dermocaitas, roſe up againſt him, drove him out of the town, and, deſpairing of pardon, openly revolted, and choſe one Teichomerus, a ſoldier of great reputation amongſt them,

Michael Calaphates created Cæſar.

An attempt of the Saracens upon Edeſſa defeated.

The Bulgarians revolt.

And the inhabitants of Dyrrachium.

[o] Idem ibid. [p] Idem ibid.

them, for their king. Deleanus, the new king of Bulgaria, no ſooner heard of this revolt, than he wrote an obliging letter to Teichomerus, offering to take him for his partner in the kingdom of Bulgaria, provided he joined him with all his followers. Teichomerus, not ſuſpecting the leaſt treachery, readily received him into Dyrrachium; but Deleanus, inſtead of performing his promiſe, cauſed the credulous and unhappy Teichomerus to be put to death; and then marching without loſs of time to Theſſalonica, where the emperor lay encamped, ſtruck with his unexpected approach ſuch terror into the Roman army, that they fled with Michael in the utmoſt confuſion to Conſtantinople, leaving all their baggage behind them to the care of Manuel Ibatza, who, betraying his truſt, delivered it up to the enemy. In the mean time, Aluſianus, the brother of John the laſt king of Bulgaria, who, when that country ſubmitted to Baſilius, had been raiſed to the dignity of a patrician, having made his eſcape from Conſtantinople and got undiſcovered into Bulgaria, was there received by his countrymen with great demonſtrations of joy. As he was a real deſcendent of the royal family, his arrival gave no ſmall umbrage to Deleanus, who nevertheleſs, to ingratiate himſelf with the people, took him for his collegue in the empire, and ſent him, at the head of forty thouſand men, to lay ſiege to Theſſalonica. Aluſianus diſtinguiſhed himſelf on that occaſion in a very eminent manner; but the vigorous oppoſition he met with from Conſtantine the patriarch, obliged him to raiſe the ſiege and retire, after he had loſt fifteen thouſand men in the undertaking. Deleanus laid hold of this opportunity to leſſen the credit of his collegue, giving out, that he maintained a private correſpondence with the Romans. But Aluſianus, appriſed of his evil deſigns, reſolved to be before-hand with him; and accordingly, having invited him to an entertainment, he cauſed his eyes to be plucked out; and then, diſtruſting the fickle humour of the Bulgarians, returned to Conſtantinople, after his friends had obtained of the emperor his pardon. Upon his return, Michael, though grievouſly afflicted with a dropſy, entered the enemy's country at the head of a powerful army, and falling upon the Bulgarians, now deſtitute of a head to adviſe and command them, put them to flight, and obliged them to ſubmit anew to the yoke. After this, the emperor returned in triumph to Conſtantinople; but finding his diſtemper daily encreaſed, he ſoon after deveſted himſelf of the imperial purple, and entering

The emperor is put to flight.

Theſſalonica beſieged.

The emperor enters Bulgaria, and reduces it; but reſigns the empire.

entering into a monaſtery, which he himſelf had built, ſpent there the remaining part of his life in acts of piety and repentance. He died on the tenth of December 1041, after he had reigned ſeven years and eight months. Upon his death, Michael Calaphates, his ſiſter's ſon, who had been created Cæſar, and at the ſame time adopted by Zoe, as ſome authors write, was proclaimed emperor. He, upon his acceſſion to the empire, probably out of complaiſance to Zoe, who appeared very zealous in his intereſt, baniſhed his uncle John the eunuch, and proceeded with the like unnatural ſeverity againſt his other relations, cauſing moſt of them, without any regard to their age or circumſtances, to be made eunuchs. Over-jealous of his authority, he cauſed in the end the empreſs Zoe to be confined to a monaſtery, under pretence, that ſhe had, by witchcraft and ſorcery, attempted to take away his life. His monſtrous ingratitude to one, who had been chiefly inſtrumental in his promotion, and was ſtill held in great veneration by the people, on account of her high birth, provoked them to ſuch a degree, that, breaking out into a general ſedition, with an unanimous conſent they ſent for Theodora, the emperor Conſtantine's youngeſt daughter, who had been ſhut up in a monaſtery, as we have obſerved above, and ſaluted her empreſs, with her ſiſter Zoe. Michael, finding the people univerſally bent againſt him, retired of his own accord, with his uncle Conſtantine, to a monaſtery, where they both took the religious habit, hoping by that means to appeaſe the enraged multitude. But Theodora, who was more incenſed againſt them than Zoe herſelf, moving that their eyes ſhould be plucked out, the populace, breaking into the church of St. John the baptiſt, where they had taken refuge, dragged them from the altar to the forum, and there, in a moſt cruel manner, deprived them of their ſight. After this, they were baniſhed, with all their relations and adherents, Michael having enjoyed the ſovereignty ſcarce four months [q].

Michael Calaphates.

Zoe and Theodora raiſed to the ſovereignty.

Michael depoſed and baniſhed.

Zoe, ſeeing herſelf once more inveſted with the ſovereignty, baniſhed all the friends of the late tyrants, and recalled from exile ſuch as had ſerved her father and uncle, preferring them to the firſt employments in the ſtate and army. Among the reſt Maniaces, of whom we have ſpoken above, was ſent for to court, and appointed commander in chief of all the weſtern forces. Zoe had ſcarce reigned three months, when [q] Curopalat. Zonar. Cedren. ibid.

when the people preſſing her to marry, and by that means prevent the diſturbances that might ariſe among competitors for the empire, ſhe recalled from baniſhment Conſtantine, ſurnamed Monomachus, a perſon of a noble extraction and comely aſpect; and having married him, cauſed him to be crowned by the patriarch with the uſual ſolemnity. He had been baniſhed, during the reign of Michael, to the iſland of Leſbos, and from thence removed, at the inſtigation of John the eunuch, to Mitylene, where he was ſent for to court, and raiſed to the empire. He no ſooner ſaw himſelf inveſted with the imperial dignity, than he baniſhed the eunuch, to the iſland of Leſbos; where, his eyes being pulled out by the emperor's orders, he died ſoon after. In the very beginning of Conſtantine's reign, Maniaces not able to brook the ill treatment he met with from Sclerus, one of the emperor's chief favourites, revolted with the troops under his command, and, aſſuming the imperial ornaments, paſſed with his army into Bulgaria, where he was joined by the malecontents of that country. Conſtantine diſpatched Stephen Sebaſtophorus againſt him, at the head of a very numerous army; which, however, was defeated and put to flight by Maniaces at the firſt onſet. Maniaces did not live to reap the fruit of his victory, being ſlain a few days after it, by a perſon unknown, who had the good luck to make his eſcape. Upon his death, thoſe who had been moſt forward in the rebellion, were the firſt who threw down their arms, and ſubmitted to Stephen, the emperor's general, who, notwithſtanding his defeat, was, on his return to Conſtantinople, honoured with a triumph. The ſame year 1043, the Roſſi, who had continued long quiet, appeared unexpectedly before Conſtantinople with a mighty fleet; but being defeated by the emperor's navy in the ſtreights, they were glad to renew their antient alliance with the empire. Upon their retreat, the emperor marched in perſon into the eaſt, and there recovered ſeveral cities, which the Saracens had ſeized in the two late reigns. But while he was purſuing the war with great ſucceſs, Leo Tornicius, eſcaping out of a monaſtery, to which he had been confined, aſſumed the purple, and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor. Leo was a perſon of extraordinary parts, and nearly related to the emperor, by whom he had been, out of jealouſy, removed from his government of Iberia, and ſhut up in a monaſtery; but having found means to make his eſcape from thence he fled to Adrianople, where he was received with loud acclamations by the people,

Zoe marries Conſtantine Monomachus, who is declared emperor.

Maniaces revolts; but is murdered.

The Roſſi defeated.

Leo Tornicius revolts; and beſieges Conſtantinople.

people, who had been lately diſobliged by Monomachus. Being joined there by great multitudes, who flocked to him from all parts, he advanced to Conſtantinople, and laid ſiege to that metropolis; but meeting, contrary to his expectation, with a vigorous oppoſition from the inhabitants, and ſeveral of his accomplices falling off from him, he raiſed the ſiege, and retired to Arcadiopolis, where he defended himſelf for ſome time againſt the forces the emperor had ſent to reduce him; but being in the end overpowered with numbers, he was taken, and ſent in chains to Monomachus, who firſt cauſed his eyes to be pulled out, and then confined him to a remote iſland. The rebellion being thus happily ſuppreſſed almoſt in its birth, and the Saracens in the eaſt awed by the emperor's preſence, a profound tranquillity reigned the two following years throughout the provinces. But in 1048, the Roman dominions were invaded by a new enemy, ſcarce mentioned before in hiſtory; but reſerved by providence for the utter deſtruction of the empire, which we ſhall ſee them accompliſh four hundred years hence, and put a period to the very name of a Roman empire. Theſe were the Turks, who, quitting their antient habitations in the neighbourhood of mount Caucaſus, and paſſing the Caſpian ſtreights, had ſettled in Armenia Major, about the year 844. There they continued an unknown and deſpicable people, till the wars of the Saracens among themſelves gave them an opportunity of aggrandizing their nation. The Saracens, having, with amazing ſucceſs and rapidity, ſubdued Perſia, Aſſyria, Egypt, Africa, and a conſiderable part of Europe itſelf, divided their vaſt ſpreading dominions into ſeveral governments or principalities, which were ruled by their reſpective ſultans or commanders, who, in proceſs of time quarrelling with one another, haſtened the ruin of the empire, which they had ſo ſucceſsfully eſtabliſhed. About the year 1030, Mohammed, the ſon of Sambrael, ſultan of Perſia, not finding himſelf a match for Piſaris, ſultan of Babylon, with whom he was at war, had recourſe to the Turks, who ſent him from Armenia Major, where they ſettled, as we have obſerved above, three thouſand of their nation, under the conduct of one Tangrolipix, a leading man amongſt them. Mohammed, ſtrengthened with this ſupply, gained a complete victory over the ſultan of Babylon; but when the Turks, to whom it was chiefly owing, deſired leave to return home, he refuſed to comply with their juſt demand, being unwilling to part with them, till he had ended the war, in which he was engaged with the Indians. Hereupon the Turks, withdrawing without his conſent to the deſert of Carbonitis, and being there joined by ſeveral diſcontented Perſians, began to make frequent inroads into the territories of the Saracens. Mohammed immediately diſpatched an army of twenty thouſand men againſt them, who were ſurpriſed in the night by Tangrolipix, and utterly defeated. The fame of this victory, and the immenſe booty which the Turks acquired by it, drew multitudes to them, from all parts, of criminals, fugitive ſlaves, robbers, &c. inſomuch, that Tangrolipix ſaw himſelf in a ſhort time at the head of fifty thouſand men. Mohammed, enraged at the defeat of his forces, ordered the ten generals, who had commanded them, to be deprived of their ſight, and at the ſame time a new army to be raiſed, which he headed in perſon; but as he was riding about in the heat of the engagement to animate his men, he fell from his horſe, and ſoon after died of the fall. His death was no ſooner known, than his men threw down their arms, and ſubmitting to Tangrolipix, proclaimed him king of Perſia. This battle, which gave riſe to the Turkiſh power, was fought about the year 1034, in the neighbourhood of Aſpacan, now Iſpahan, the metropolis of Perſia [r]. Tangrolipix, now maſter of Perſia, having firſt opened a paſſage for his countrymen into that kingdom over the Araxes, parting it from Armenia, made war upon Piſaris or Piſafiris, kalif of Babylon, whom he at length ſlew, and annexed his dominions to his own. He then ſent his nephew, Cutlu-Moſes or Cuthimuſes, againſt the Arabians; but he was overthrown by them in a pitched battle, and obliged to take ſhelter in Media, through which Stephen, the Roman governor, denying him a paſſage, he put his troops to flight, took the governor himſelf priſoner, and, without any further oppoſition, reached Briſcium, on the confines of Perſia, where he ſold Stephen for a ſlave. Returning from thence to Tangrolipix, he excuſed, in the beſt manner he could, the bad ſucceſs of his expedition, acquainting him at the ſame time with his victory over the Romans in Media, and encouraging him to invade that fertile country, which, he ſaid, might be eaſily ſubdued, as it was inhabited by none but women, meaning the Romans. Tangrolipix did not then hearken to his advice, being wholly bent on revenging the late defeat on the Arabians, againſt whom he marched in perſon, at the head of a numerous army; but

He raiſes the ſiege, is taken and deprived of his ſight.

The Turks conquer Perſia under the conduct of Tangrolipix.

Tangrolipix proclaimed ſultan of Perſia.

Reduces Babylon.

[r] Niceph. Bryenn. l. i. c. 3.

but being himſelf defeated and put to flight by that warlike nation, he gave over all thoughts of reducing them; and reflecting on what Cutlu-Moſes had told him, he ſent Aſan, his brother's ſon, ſurnamed the Deaf, with an army of twenty-thouſand men, to reduce Media; which Aſan entered, committing every-where dreadful ravages. But being in the end drawn into an ambuſh by the Roman generals, he was cut off, with his whole army. Tangrolipix, no-ways diſcouraged at this misfortune, ſent a new army into Media, near an hundred thouſand ſtrong; who, after having laid waſte the country without oppoſition, the Romans ſhutting themſelves up in their ſtrong-holds, laid ſiege to Artza, a place of great trade, and on that account eſteemed the moſt wealthy in thoſe parts; but not being able by any other means to maſter it, they ſet fire to it, which in a ſhort time reduced it to aſhes. Of the inhabitants an hundred fifty thouſand, and upwards, are ſaid to have periſhed, either by the ſword, or in the flames. After this, Abraham Halim, half-brother to Tangrolipix, who commanded the Turks, hearing that the Romans, reinforced with a body of troops under the command of Liparites, governor of Iberia, had taken the field, marched againſt them, and offered them battle; which they not declining, the two armies engaged with a fury hardly to be expreſſed. The victory continued long doubtful; but at length inclined to the Romans, who nevertheleſs did not think it adviſeable, as their general Liparites was taken priſoner, to purſue the fugitives. The emperor, greatly concerned for the captivity of Liparites, diſpatched embaſſadors, with rich preſents and a large ſum, to redeem him, and at the ſame time to conclude an alliance with Tangrolipix. The ſultan received the preſents; but generouſly returned them, with the money, to Liparites, whom he ſet at liberty without ranſom, only requiring him, at his departure, never more to bear arms againſt the Turks. Not long after, Tangrolipix ſent a perſon of great authority among the Turks, with the character of embaſſador, to Conſtantinople, who, having arrogantly exhorted the emperor to ſubmit to his maſter, and acknowledge himſelf his tributary, was by Monomachus diſmiſſed with ſcorn, and driven out of the city. On his return, he acquainted Tangrolipix with the reception he had met with; who thereupon reſolved to renew the war. Monomachus, on the other hand, did not neglect the neceſſary preparations to oppoſe ſo powerful an enemy; but was diverted from it by a war, which ſuddenly broke out between him and the Patzinacæ, a Scythian nation, whoſe

Is defeated by the Arabians.

Invades Media.

Is defeated by the Romans.

The Patzinacæ break into the empire;

whoſe king, by name Tyrach, highly provoked at the kind reception Kegenes, after revolting from him, had met with from the Romans, paſſed the Danube on the ice, and entering, if the authors of thoſe times are to be credited, with eight hundred thouſand men the Roman provinces, deſtroyed all with fire and ſword. Conſtantine Arianites was ſent againſt them with all the troops quartered in Macedon and Bulgaria; but he, not thinking it adviſeable to venture an engagement, ſuffered them to ravage the country without controul, till great multitudes of them being ſwept off by the diſtempers which raged in their army, he was adviſed by Kegenes, who joined him with twenty thouſand men, to fall upon them ſuddenly; which he did with ſo much reſolution, that the barbarians, weakened with ſickneſs, and terrified at ſo ſudden an onſet, threw down their arms and ſubmitted. Great numbers of them were allowed to ſettle at Sardica, Naiſſus, Eutzapolis, and in other cities of Bulgaria; ſome returned to their own country; but Tyrach and an hundred and forty of the moſt noble among them were ſent to Conſtantinople, where they were kindly received by the emperor; and upon their embracing the chriſtian religion, as Kegenes had done before, with all his followers, they were entertained in a manner ſuitable to their rank, and even raiſed to conſiderable employments. However, the emperor having ſent fifteen thouſand of thoſe who had ſettled in Bulgaria, under the conduct of Catalunes, one of their own officers, to reinforce the army in Iberia, they revolted on their march; and being joined by great numbers of their countrymen, encamped on the banks of the Danube, making from thence frequent incurſions into the Roman territories. The emperor ſent ſome of his beſt generals againſt them; but was not able to ſuppreſs them, his forces being, in three ſucceſſive engagements, put to the rout. Having at length reſolved to employ the whole ſtrength of the empire againſt them, they were ſo terrified at the noiſe of the preparations the emperor was making, that they ſent deputies to ſue for peace; which was readily granted them for thirty years [s]. During this war, Tangrolipix affronted at the reception of his embaſſador, as we have related above, entered Iberia, and having laid the country waſte far and near, returned from thence into Media, and laid ſiege to Mantzichierta, a place defended by a numerous garriſon, and fortified with a triple wall and deep ditches. However, as it was ſituated in a plain and open country, he hoped

But are utterly routed.

Iberia laid waſte by the Turks; who before Mantzichierta.

[s] Niceph. Bryenn. Curopal. Cedren. Zonar. in Monomach.

hoped to be maſter of it in a ſhort time; but finding, after he had continued before it thirty days together, that the beſieged were reſolved to defend themſelves to the utmoſt extremity, deſpairing of ſucceſs, he reſolved to raiſe the ſiege, when Alcan, one of his chief officers, prevailed upon him to continue it but one day longer, and to commit to him the conduct and management of the attacks. This being granted, Alcan the next day diſpoſed his men with ſuch ſkill, and encouraged them by his example to fight with ſo much bravery and reſolution, that, notwithſtanding the vigorous oppoſition they met with, the place would, in all likelihood, have been taken, had not Alcan been ſlain, while, in ſpite of the inceſſant ſhowers of arrows, darts, ſtones, &c. he was mounting the wall. The beſieged, knowing him by the richneſs of his armour, drew him by the hair into the city, and cutting off his head, threw it over the wall amongſt the enemy, who, diſheartened at that ſight, gave over the aſſault, and retired, Tangrolipix pretending ſome urgent affairs had called him home. However, he returned the ſpring following, and ravaging Iberia, ſpared neither ſex nor age. But upon the approach of Michael Acoluthus, who was ſent againſt him at the head of a conſiderable army, he retired to Tauris, leaving thirty thouſand men behind him, to infeſt the frontiers of the empire; which they did with great ſucceſs, the borders being, through the avarice of Monomachus, left unguarded; for, till his time, the provinces bordering on the countries of the barbarians, had maintained, at their own charge, forces to defend them, and were on that account exempted from paying tribute. But Monomachus exacting of them the ſame ſums that were paid by the other provinces, they were no longer in a condition to reſtrain the incurſions of the enemy [t]. About this time died the empreſs Zoe, and ſoon after the emperor himſelf. Though he had always expreſſed a great eſteem and regard for Theodora, the ſiſter of Zoe, yet he was prevailed upon by the eunuchs at court to name for his ſucceſſor Nicephorus, who commanded the forces in Bulgaria, and was privately ſent for, when the emperor's recovery was deſpaired of. But Theodora, informed by her friends at court of the emperor's intention, privately withdrew from the monaſtery of St. George, whither ſhe had attended him; and returning to Conſtantinople, attended by her moſt faithful friends, cauſed herſelf to be proclaimed, and ſaluted empreſs; which gave Monomachus ſo much con-

But are forced to raiſe the ſiege.

The empreſs Zoe dies.

And Monomachus.

[t] Niceph. Bryenn. c. 4. Curop. ibid.

cern, that he fell into a ſwoon, and died ſoon after, having reigned twelve years and eight months. Some authors write, that both he and Zoe died of the plague, which indeed raged at that time with great fury in Conſtantinople; but moſt authors aſcribe his death to the gout, which he encreaſed by his intemperance, lewdneſs, and debaucheries.

Theodora. Theodora no ſooner received the news of his death, than ſhe cauſed all thoſe to be ſecured, who had propoſed the promotion of Nicephorus; and depriving them of their employments, named others in their room, in whom ſhe thought ſhe could confide. Theodorus, the eunuch, was ſent at the head of a conſiderable army into the eaſt to awe the Turks, who, hearing of the emperor's death, were preparing to renew the war. He prevented with his care and vigilance the enemy from making inroads into the Roman territories; ſo that the eaſtern provinces enjoyed, during Theodora's ſhort reign, a profound tranquillity, to which they had been long ſtrangers. Her prudent choice of the great officers and miHer excellent government. niſters of ſtate, her impartial adminiſtration of juſtice, (for ſhe heard all cauſes herſelf) and her great moderation in the uſe of the authority with which ſhe was inveſted, gained her the affections of her people, and the reſpect and eſteem of all foreign nations. But the empire did not long enjoy the many valuable bleſſings that attended her adminiſtration; for in the ſecond year of her reign ſhe was ſeized with a violent Her death. pain in her bowels, which in a few days put an end to her life. Before ſhe died, ſhe was perſuaded by Leo Straboſpondylus, her prime miniſter, and her favourite eunuch, to beMichael Stratioticus. queath the empire to Michael Stratioticus, a perſon ſtricken in years, and altogether ignorant of ſtate-affairs, which chiefly recommended him to the eunuchs, who hoped to govern in his name with an abſolute ſway. Theodora died, ſoon after ſhe had named him, in the month of Auguſt 1056, having reigned one year and nine months. The death of Theodora, and promotion of Michael, which had been managed with the utmoſt ſecrecy, being known at the ſame time, Theodorus, couſin-german to the deceaſed emperor, laying claim to the empire, as of right belonging to him, proteſted againſt what had been done in favour of Michael; and ſummoning all his friends, ſervants, and dependents, moved in the evening with a great train through the moſt frequented ſtreets to the palace; but finding the gates ſhut and well guarded, he went from thence to the great church, not doubting but he ſhould be well received there by the patriarch and the clergy. But they refuſing, contrary to his expectation expectation, to admit him, he had recourſe to the people, who, unmoved by his offers and promiſes, continued firm in the reſolution they had taken a few hours before to ſupport Michael. Theodorus, now well appriſed he could not ſucceed in his attempt, and dreading the reſentment of the new emperor, renounced all claim to the imperial dignity, and took refuge with his ſon in the church; but he was ſoon dragged from thence by the emperor's orders, and baniſhed to Pergamus, where he died ſome years after. The rebellion being thus ſuppreſſed, Michael enjoyed the imperial dignity without a competitor, but ſoon ſhewed himſelf altogether unequal to ſo eminent a poſt. As he was an entire ſtranger to ſtate-affairs, having been brought up from his youth in the camp, he ſuffered the eunuchs, to whom he was indebted for his promotion, to govern without controul. At their inſtigation he diſobliged moſt of the general officers of the army, whom he ought to have regarded as his chief ſupport, and among the reſt, Iſaac Comnenus, and Ambuſtus Catacale, men renowned for their eminent ſervices and experience in war. The former he deprived of his command in the army, and the latter he removed from the government of Antioch, recalling Bryennius, a man of a turbulent and reſtleſs ſpirit, who had been baniſhed by Theodora, and appointing him commander in chief of the eaſtern forces. Bryennius, upon his return to court, petitioned the emperor for his eſtate, which had been confiſcated in the late reign, but met with a ſurly denial; which provoked him to ſuch a degree, that he reſolved to revolt, and employ the forces under his command againſt the perſon who had entruſted him with them. Having imparted his deſign to Ambuſtus, Comnenus, and ſeveral others, who had been diſobliged by Michael, they all met, in order to proceed to the election of a new emperor, when, by the unanimous conſent of the whole party, Ambuſtus was choſen; but he declining the burden on account of his age, Iſaac Comnenus was propoſed next, as a perſon in every reſpect well qualified for ſo great a truſt. As the propoſal was received by all with great applauſe, Comnenus did not oppoſe it, but ſuffered the conſpirators to take an oath of allegiance to him, promiſing at the ſame time to govern with juſtice and moderation. After this, they all departed from Conſtantinople, where they had met, according to cuſtom, at Eaſter, and repaired to their ſeveral poſts, where each of them was, in his reſpective ſtation, to promote the general deſign. Bryennius haſtened to the army in the eaſt; but falling out there with John Opſaras, a patrician, whom the emperor had appointed to diſtribute a largeſs among the ſoldiers, the quar-

A rebellion ſuppreſſed.

Michael diſobliges the officers of the army.

Several of them conſpire againſt him.

rel was carried to ſuch an height, that Bryennius, in defiance of the emperor's orders, committed Opſaras to cuſtody, after having cauſed him to be publicly beaten with rods. Hereupon Lycanthes, who commanded in that neighbourhood a ſtrong body of Lycaonians, and Piſidians, concluding that Bryennius deſigned to revolt, fell upon him unexpectedly in his camp; and having taken him priſoner, delivered him to Opſaras, by whoſe orders his eyes were pulled out. The officers of the eaſt, informed of his misfortune, and apprehending he might, upon examination, reveal their deſigns, (for he was ſent in chains to the emperor) reſolved openly to declare themſelves; and accordingly having drawn together, in a ſpacious plain, all the forces under their command, they ſent for Comnenus, who was then at his houſe in Paphlagonia, and preſented him in the imperial robes to the ſoldiery, by whom he was, with univerſal conſent, ſaluted emperor on the eighth of June 1057.

Iſaac Comnenus ſaluted emperor.

COMNENUS, thus raiſed to the imperial dignity, took upon him the command of the army, which he immediately marched over the river Sangarius in Phrygia Major, bending his rout towards Nice, which he ſurpriſed, moſt of the ſoldiers, who garriſoned it, being retired to their own homes. In the mean time, Stratioticus, receiving news of the revolt, aſſembled all the forces quartered in the weſt; and having muſtered his army, choſe for his generals Theodorus the eunuch, and Aaron Ducas, an officer of great experience in war, and brother to the wife of Comnenus. The two generals marched at the head of their army to Nicomedia, and from thence to Nice, in the neighbourhood of which city they found Comnenus encamped. Upon their approach, he drew up his army, Ambuſtus having the command of the left wing, Romanus Sclerus of the right, and Comnenus himſelf of the main body. The emperor's generals accepted the challenge, and the two armies engaged with great reſolution and intrepidity. At firſt Aaron, who commanded the left wing of the imperial army, broke the oppoſite wing of the enemy, took Romanus himſelf priſoner, and purſued the fugitives to their camp. But Ambuſtus, on the other hand, bearing all down before him, pierced into the enemy's camp, which he took and plundered; and then charging with freſh vigor the emperor's left wing, obliged them to give over the purſuit, and retire in ſome confuſion. In their retreat they were attacked by Comnenus, and eaſily put to flight; which ſo diſcouraged the reſt of the emperor's troops, that throwing away their arms, they fled in great diſorder. Comnenus, having

An army ſent againſt him.

Which is defeated by Comnenus.

having thus gained a complete victory, began his march to Conſtantinople, not doubting, but the citizens would open their gates to him, as ſoon as he appeared before them. In the mean time, Stratioticus, informed of the overthrow of his forces, ſent ſome of the chief men in the ſenate to Comnenus, with propoſals for an agreement, which was concluded on the following terms; That Comnenus ſhould be declared Cæſar; that a full pardon ſhould be granted to all his followers; and that ſuch of them as enjoyed employments, ſhould be continued in them, and confirmed by the emperor. But this agreement was made void by the emperor himſelf ſoon after he had ratified it: for, at the inſtigation of ſome about him, he obliged, partly by promiſes, partly by menaces, the ſenate and people to bind themſelves by a moſt ſolemn oath never to give Comnenus the title of emperor, nor own him for their ſovereign. This oath was exacted, when Comnenus was ſtill in Aſia; but news was no ſooner brought, that he was within a day's march of Conſtantinople, than he was, by a decree of the ſenate, and the unanimous conſent of the people, proclaimed emperor, and all thoſe, who ſhould oppoſe him, adjudged enemies to their country. The decree being paſſed in the ſenate without oppoſition, the patriarch diſpatched meſſengers to Comnenus, inviting him to the city, and at the ſame time ſome biſhops to Stratioticus, commanding him in the name of the ſenate and people to reſign the imperial dignity, and quit the palace. We are told, that when the biſhops delivered their meſſage, Stratioticus aſked them, What they intended to give him in exchange for the empire? and that they anſwering, The kingdom of heaven, he immediately deveſted himſelf of the purple, and, quitting the palace, retired to his own houſe, and from thence to a monaſtery, after he had reigned one year. Comnenus arrived the ſame evening, and was the next day, the firſt of September 1057, crowned in the great church by the patriarch Michael Cerularius [t]. The new emperor's firſt care was to reward thoſe, to whom he was chiefly indebted for his promotion, and above all the patriarch, whoſe nephews and relations he preferred to the firſt employments in the ſtate. As he was well ſkilled in military affairs, and had given ſignal proofs of his courage and reſolution, the neighbouring barbarians continued quiet, during his ſhort reign. At home he Stratioticus forced to reſign.

Iſaac Comnenus crowned emperor.

[t] Curopalat. Cedren. Zonar. in Stratiot. & Iſaac. Comn.

he was more feared on account of his ſeverity, than beloved. As he found the exchequer quite drained, he loaded the people with heavy taxes, and at length fell upon the monaſteries, depriving them of the immenſe wealth, with which they had been enriched by his predeceſſors. This the patriarch highly reſented, and with great arrogance threatened to pull him down from the throne, to which he had raiſed him, unleſs he reſtored to the monaſteries the eſtates which he had unjuſtly ſeized. But the emperor, inſtead of yielding to his threats, immediately baniſhed him, and raiſed Conſtantine Lichudes to the patriarchal ſee in his room. Iſaac had not reigned above two years, when he was ſeized with a violent diſtemper, occaſioned, as ſome authors write, by a flaſh of lightning. Being ſenſible that his end approached, and at the ſame time touched with remorſe in reflecting by what means he had obtained the imperial dignity, he voluntarily reſigned it, and retiring to a monaſtery, there ſpent the remainder of his days in exerciſes of piety, having reigned but two years and three months. Being adviſed, before he reſigned, to chuſe a ſucceſſor, though he had ſeveral children and near relations of his own, yet, preferring the public good to his private intereſt, he named Conſtantine Ducas, a perſon generally eſteemed the beſt qualified in the whole empire for ſo eminent a ſtation. Ducas, thus choſen by Comnenus, and received by the ſenate and people, was crowned with the uſual ſolemnity by the patriarch. He applied himſelf with great diligence to the affairs of ſtate, adminiſtered juſtice with the utmoſt impartiality, reformed ſeveral abuſes, which had prevailed under his predeceſſors, and behaved on all occaſions with ſuch moderation, that he might have been reckoned amongſt the beſt princes, had not his inſatiable avarice drowned, in a manner, all his good qualities. He choſe rather to leave the frontiers naked and unguarded, than to maintain the neceſſary garriſons; which encouraged the Turks to extend their conqueſts on all ſides, and the Uzians, a Scythian nation, to paſs the Danube to the number of five hundred thouſand men, and ravage the neighbouring countries. Nicephorus Botoniates, afterwards emperor, and Baſilius Apocapes, were ſent againſt them. But the barbarians having put the emperor's forces to flight at the firſt onſet, and taken both the generals in the purſuit, laid waſte all Thrace and Macedon; and, penetrating without oppoſition into Greece, deſtroyed all with fire and ſword. The emperor, affected with the calamities of his ſubjects, but yet unwilling to be at the charge of raiſing the neceſſary forces to deliver them

He baniſhes the patriarch.

He reſigns the empire to Conſtantine Ducas.

The Uzians ravage the empire.

them from the oppreſſion under which they groaned, endeavoured at firſt to purchaſe a peace with rich preſents, and even with promiſing to pay them an annual tribute. To ſuch meanneſs was the emperor brought by his ſordid temper. But the barbarians refuſing to hearken to any terms, he ordered a general faſt to be obſerved throughout his dominions, and then marched out againſt them with an handful of men. But, in the mean time, the enemy being greatly weakened by a plague that began to reign among them, the Hungri, or Hungarians, whoſe country they had ravaged, fell unexpectedly upon them, and cut them off almoſt to a man. Nothing elſe happened, during this unactive prince's reign, which authors have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity, except a dreadful earthquake, which overturned ſeveral ſtately edifices at Conſtantinople, and the appearing of a comet, which was ſeen for forty days together, and thought to portend the emperor's approaching fate. And indeed Conſtantine was ſoon after ſeized with a violent diſtemper, which in a few days put an end to his life. He left the empire to his three ſons, Michael, Andronicus, and Conſtantine; but as they were yet very young, he appointed the empreſs Eudocia, their mother, regent during their minority, after having required of her an oath never to marry, which was lodged with great ſolemnity in the hands of the patriarch. He likewiſe obliged the ſenators ſolemnly to ſwear that they would acknowledge none for their ſovereign but his three ſons. Having thus ſecured, as he thought, the imperial crown to his family, he died in 1067, after having reigned five years and ſix months [u]. He was no ſooner dead, than the Turks, hearing the empire was governed by a woman, broke with great violence into Meſopotamia, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. The empreſs was no-ways in a condition to oppoſe them, the greater part of the army having been diſbanded in her husband's lifetime, and the troops, that were ſtill on foot, being undiſciplined and altogether unfit for ſervice. This gave the empreſs great concern, which was aggravated by the ſeditious ſpeeches of a diſcontented party at home, repeating in all aſſemblies, that the preſent ſtate of the empire required a man of courage and addreſs at the helm, inſtead of a weak and helpleſs woman. As they imagined the empreſs would never think of marrying, in regard of the oath ſhe had taken, they hoped by theſe ſpeeches to induce the people to revolt, and

But are cut off by the Hungarians.

The Turks invade the empire.

[u] Idem ibid. & Niceph. Bryenn.

and chuſe a new emperor. This Eudocia was aware of; and therefore, to prevent the evils that threatened her and her family, ſhe reſolved to marry ſome perſon of merit, capable of defeating the deſigns of her enemies both at home and abroad.

Romanus Diogenes.

At this time, Romanus Diogenes, a perſon of a moſt beautiful aſpect, extraordinary parts, and an illuſtrious birth, for he was deſcended from the emperor Romanus Argyrus, being accuſed of aſpiring at the empire, tried and convicted, was brought forth to receive the ſentence of death, which his ambition had deſerved. But the empreſs, touched with compaſſion at the appearance of the unhappy priſoner, who, ſhe thought, deſerved a better fate, put a ſtop to the ſentence; and, having gently upbraided him with his ill-timed ambition, ſet him at liberty, and ſoon after appointed him commander in chief of all her forces; in which ſtation he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that the empreſs reſolved to marry him, if ſhe could but recover the writing, in which her oath was contained, out of the hands of the patriarch. In order to this, ſhe applied herſelf to a favourite eunuch, who, going to the patriarch, told John Xiphiline, that the empreſs was ſo taken with his nephew, by name Bardas, that ſhe was determined to marry him, and raiſe him to the empire, provided he abſolved her from the oath ſhe had lately taken, and convinced the ſenate of the lawfulneſs of ſuch a marriage. The patriarch, though a man of great probity and learning, yet dazzled with the proſpect of his nephew's promotion, readily undertook to perform both; and accordingly, having firſt obtained the conſent of the ſenate, by repreſenting to them the dangerous condition of the empire, and exclaiming againſt the raſh oath, which the jealouſy of the late emperor had extorted from the empreſs, he publicly diſcharged her from the obſervance of it, reſtored the writing to her, and exhorted her to marry ſome deſerving perſon, who, being entruſted with an abſolute authority, might protect her and her children, and defend the empire againſt the many enemies, who threatened it, and were not to be repreſſed by the hands of a weak woman, or awed by three young children. The empreſs, thus diſcharged from her oath, married a few days after, to the great diſappointment of the patriarch, Romanus Diogenes, who was thereupon proclaimed emperor. As he was a man of great activity and experience in war, he no ſooner ſaw himſelf inveſted with the ſovereign power, than, taking upon him the command of the army, he paſſed over into Aſia with the few forces he could aſſemble,

The empreſs marries him.

ble, recruiting and inuring them on his march to the military discipline, which had been utterly neglected in the preceding reigns. Upon his arrival in Asia, he was informed, that the Turks, having surprized and plundered the city of Neocæsarea, were retiring with a rich booty. Hereupon, hastening after them at the head of a chosen body of light-armed troops, he came up with them the third day; and falling upon them, while they were marching in disorder, without the least apprehension of an enemy, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and recovered the booty. He then pursued his march to Aleppo, which he retook, together with Hierapolis, where he built a strong castle. As he was returning to join the forces he had left behind him, he was met by a numerous body of Turks, who attempted to cut off his retreat; but the emperor, pretending at first through fear to decline an engagement, attacked them afterwards, when they least expected it, with such vigor, that he put them to flight at the first onset, and might have gained a complete victory, had he thought it advisable to pursue them. After this, several towns submitted to him, the Turks abandoning them upon the first news of his approach. But the autumn being already far spent, he retired to Cilicia, and from thence to Constantinople. The following year, he passed over into Asia early in the spring; and being informed, that the Turks, having defeated Philaretus, who had been left to guard the banks of the Euphrates, were advanced into Cilicia, and had there surprised and sacked Iconium, the most rich and populous city of that province, he marched in person against them. But the Turks, not thinking it advisable to wait his arrival, retired in great haste. However, the Armenians, encouraged by the approach of the emperor's army, fell upon the enemy in the plains of Tarsus, put them to flight, and stripped them both of their baggage and the booty they had taken. The enemy being retired, the emperor spent the remaining part of the summer in settling the affairs of the provinces; and, upon the approach of winter, returned once more to Constantinople, which he entered in triumph, amidst the loud acclamations of the people. The spring following, the emperor marched anew into Asia, at the head of a considerable army, which he had raised, and with incredible pains disciplined, during the winter. As the Turks had already taken the field, several skirmishes happened between the parties detached from the two armies, in one of which Nicephorus Basilacius, one of

He passes over into Asia.

His success against the Turks.

of the emperor's chief officers, was taken priſoner, and carried to Axan, the Turkiſh ſultan, and ſon of the celebrated Tangrolipix, who received and entertained him with great civility. When the two armies drew near, the ſultan, obſerving the diſpoſition and number of the emperor's forces, and dreading, as he was a man of great experience and ſagacity, the uncertain iſſues of war, ſent embaſſadors to Romanus, with propoſals for a laſting and honourable peace, which being rejected by the emperor with diſdain, both armies prepared for an engagement. Though the emperor's troops were not near ſo numerous as thoſe of the enemy, Ruſelius, one of his beſt commanders, having been detached a little before with a conſiderable body; yet Romanus, preſuming upon the courage of his men and the ſucceſs that had hitherto attended his arms, cauſed the ſignal to be given, and falling with great fury upon the enemy, put them into ſome diſorder. However they ſoon rallied, and charged with freſh vigor, ſo that the diſpute continued with various ſucceſs, till the emperor, fearing the ſultan ſhould ſend part of his army to attack his camp, which he had left weakly guarded, cauſed, as the day was already far ſpent, a retreat to be ſounded, and retired in good order with that part of the army, which he commanded in perſon. But Andronicus, the ſon of John Ducas brother to the late emperor Conſtantine, and in his heart an enemy to Romanus, whoſe good fortune he envied, cried out, that the emperor was put to flight; and at the ſame time, turning his horſe about, fled with great precipitation to the camp. The reſt of the army followed his example, and were purſued by the Turks, who in that confuſion put great numbers of them to the ſword. The emperor did all that lay in his power to make them rally and face the enemy; but, in ſpite of his utmoſt efforts, they continued their flight, every one ſhifting for himſelf in the beſt manner he could. The emperor, though thus forſaken by his army, yet ſtood his ground, till he himſelf being wounded and his horſe killed under him, he was at length overpowered with numbers and taken priſoner. When news was firſt brought to the ſultan of his captivity, he could hardly give credit to it. But being aſſured of the truth, both by the embaſſadors, whom he had ſent to him before the battle, and by Baſilacius his captive, he ordered the emperor to be brought before him, and tenderly embracing him, "Grieve not, noble emperor, ſaid he, at your "misfortune; for ſuch is the chance of war, ſometimes "over-

He rejects the propoſals of the ſultan.

He is defeated, and taken priſoner.

But kindly entertained, and ſet at liberty, by the ſultan.

" overwhelming one, and ſometimes another; you ſhall " have no occaſion to complain of your captivity; for I " will not uſe you as my priſoner, but as an emperor:" which he did accordingly, lodging him in a royal pavilion, aſſigning him attendants, with an equipage ſuitable to his quality, and diſcharging ſuch priſoners as he deſired. After he had entertained for ſome days his royal captive with extraordinary magnificence, a perpetual peace was concluded between them, and the emperor diſmiſſed with the greateſt marks of honour imaginable. Being thus ſet at liberty, he proceeded, attended by the ſultan's embaſſadors, for Conſtantinople, where the peace was to be ratified. He ſtopped at Theodoſiopolis, and continued ſome days there to have his wounds dreſſed, with a deſign to purſue his journey to the imperial city, as ſoon as he was able to travel. But, in the mean time, he was informed, that John, the brother of Conſtantine Ducas, with Pſellus, a leading man in the ſenate, and ſeveral others, having, upon the news of his captivity, driven Eudocia from the throne, and ſhut her up in a monaſtery, had proclaimed her eldeſt ſon Michael Ducas emperor. Upon this intelligence he left Theodoſiopolis, and repairing to a ſtrong caſtle called Docia, he fortified himſelf there, not doubting, but he ſhould be ſoon joined by his friends, and by great numbers of the officers and ſoldiers, who had ſerved under him. But, in the mean time, John, who had taken upon him to act as guardian to the young prince, and governed with an abſolute ſway, diſpatched his eldeſt ſon Andronicus againſt him with a ſtrong body of troops, who having defeated the ſmall army the unfortunate prince had with him, purſued him to Adana, a city in Cilicia, where he was cloſely beſieged, and in the end forced to ſurrender. Andronicus carried his priſoner into Phrygia, where he fell dangerouſly ill, being, as was ſuſpected, ſecretly poiſoned. But the poiſon being too ſlow in its operation, John ordered his eyes to be pulled out, which was done with ſuch cruelty, that he died ſoon after in the iſland Prota, to which he had been confined, having reigned three years and eight months [w]. Romanus Diogenes being thus removed, Michael Ducas was univerſally acknowledged emperor; but he being an indolent and unactive prince, the whole power was lodged in John his uncle, who preferred ſuch only as had been inſtrumental in the late revolution, and,

Michael Ducas proclaimed emperor.

Romanus dies.

[w] Niceph Bryenn. c. 2—10. Curopalat. in Rom. Diog.

and, under various pretences, baniſhed thoſe who gave him the leaſt umbrage.

The Turks invade the empire.

In the mean time, Axan, the Turkiſh ſultan, hearing of the unhappy end of the late emperor, reſolved to revenge the death of his friend and ally; and accordingly, having raiſed a powerful army, he broke into the territories of the empire, not with a deſign only to ſpoil and plunder, as formerly, but to conquer and hold what he had once conquered. The emperor, alarmed at the motions of the Turks, diſpatched Iſaac Comnenus, ſon to the late emperor of that name, againſt them, who gained at firſt ſome advantages over them; but having ſoon after ventured a general engagement, his army was, after a long and obſtinate diſpute, utterly defeated, and he himſelf taken priſoner. Another army was ſoon diſpatched againſt them, under the command of John Ducas, the emperor's uncle, who gained ſeveral advantages over the enemy, and would, in all likelihood, have put a ſtop to their farther conqueſts, had he not been diverted by Ruſelius, or Urſelius, a native of Gaul, who, revolting with the troops of his own nation under his command, reduced ſeveral cities in Phrygia and Cappadocia, cauſing himſelf to be every-where proclaimed emperor. Againſt him John marched with all his forces, ſuffering the Turks in the mean time to purſue their conqueſts; but coming to an engagement with the rebels on the banks of the Sangarius, he received a total overthrow and was taken priſoner. Notwithſtanding this victory, Ruſelius, to ſtop the progreſs of the Turks, who threatened the empire with utter deſtruction, not only releaſed his priſoner, but joined him againſt the common enemy, by whom they were both overcome and taken priſoners. However, Axan was for ſome time diverted from purſuing his conqueſts, and reaping the fruit of his victory, by Cutlu-Moſes, couſin to the late ſultan Tangrolipix, from whom he had revolted; but being defeated by him in a pitched battle, he had taken refuge in Arabia, whence he now returned, at the head of a conſiderable army; and laying claim to the ſovereignty, was preparing to decide the controverſy by dint of ſword. But while the two armies were ready to engage, the kalif of Babylon, who had been deprived of his temporal juriſdiction by Tangrolipix, as we have related above, but ſtill continued to exerciſe his authority in matters of religion, being looked upon as the ſucceſſor of their great prophet, interpoſed; and by repreſenting to them the dangers, to which their inteſtine diſſenſions expoſed them, brought them to this agreement; that Defeat the emperor's army.

Gain a ſecond victory.

that Axan ſhould enjoy undiſturbed the monarchy lately erected by his father Tangrolipix, and that Cutlu-Moſes, and his family, ſhould quietly poſſeſs ſuch provinces of the empire as he or his ſons ſhould, in proceſs of time, conquer. This agreement being made, Cutlu-Moſes turned all his forces againſt the empire; and being aſſiſted by Axan, made himſelf, in this and the following reign, maſter of all Media, Lycaonia, Cappadocia, and Bithynia, fixing the ſeat of his new empire at Nice in the latter province. While the Turks were buſied in reducing the above-mentioned provinces, Ruſelius, who had been ranſomed by his wife, and, notwithſtanding his late revolt, reſtored to favour and entruſted with a conſiderable command in Aſia Minor, revolted anew, and, depending upon the aſſiſtance of the Turks, with whom he had privately entered into an alliance, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor. Michael ſent the beſt commanders in the empire againſt him; but they were all ſucceſſively overcome in the ſeveral battles that were fought, Ruſelius being powerfully ſupported by the Turks, whoſe intereſt it was to ſow and maintain diviſions in the empire. At length the emperor was adviſed to ſend Alexius Comnenus againſt him, he being eſteemed, though then very young, a man of uncommon addreſs and well ſkilled in the art of war. Alexius, by intercepting the enemy's proviſions, and conſtantly haraſſing them on their marches, without ever coming to an engagement, reduced them in a ſhort time to ſuch ſtreights, that they were forced to take refuge in the dominions of the ſultan, where they were kindly entertained, and ſupplied with neceſſaries at the public expence. But Alexius applying to Tutach, the Turkiſh commander in thoſe parts, he prevailed upon him with a large ſum to ſeize on Ruſelius, and ſend him in chains to Amaſia, whence he was conveyed to Conſtantinople. The rebels, deſtitute of a leader, readily ſubmitted, and ſurrendered the cities and ſtrong-holds which they had reduced. The civil war being thus ended, Alexius returned to the imperial city, which he found highly diſſatisfied with the emperor's conduct, and grievouſly afflicted with a famine, during which the emperor, inſtead of relieving the diſtreſſed inhabitants, had leſſened the meaſure of the corn, which deſervedly procured him the nick-name of Parapanaces. The averſion which people of all ranks had for the emperor, on account of his avaricious temper, encouraged Nicephorus Botoniates, who commanded the forces in Aſia, to revolt;

The progreſs of the Turks.

Ruſelius revolts.

The rebellion ſuppreſſed by Alexius Comnenus.

volt, and enter into an alliance with the Turks, upon whom he had been ſent to make war. Cutlu-Moſes promiſed to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of his power; upon which he aſſumed the purple, and was ſaluted emperor by the army under his command. At the ſame time, Nicephorus Bryennius, who commanded in Dyrrhachium, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor there; and depending upon the affection of his ſoldiers, whom he had obliged with his liberality, was preparing to march ſtrait to Conſtantinople. Michael, well appriſed that he was not in a condition to oppoſe either of the two competitors, reſolved to reſign the empire, and leave the throne empty for which of them ſhould prevail. Accordingly, deveſting himſelf of the imperial ornaments, he retired to a monaſtery, where he took holy orders, and was ſoon after raiſed to the ſee of Epheſus[x]. He had reigned ſix years and as many months, and reſigned in the year 1078. Upon his reſignation, Botoniates entered Conſtantinople without oppoſition; and being crowned by the patriarch on the twenty-fifth of March 1078, he immediately diſpatched Alexius Comnenus with the flower of his army againſt Bryennius, who was advancing with long marches to the imperial city at the head of a numerous and well-diſciplined army, and received with loud acclamations in all the places through which he paſſed, he being univerſally beloved by the people, and looked upon as a perſon in every reſpect well qualified for the empire. The two armies met at Calaura in Thrace; and an engagement enſuing, the fortune of the day continued doubtful, till the Scythians, who ſerved under Bryennius, purſuing the advantage they had gained over the forces of Alexius, fell upon his baggage and began to plunder; which occaſioned great confuſion in the army of Bryennius, the reſt of his troops following the example of thoſe barbarians. Of this Alexius took advantage, and charging them with freſh vigor, put them to flight. However, they rallied, and, encouraged by Bryennius, returned to the charge; but Alexius having, in the mean time, taken the horſe of Bryennius, adorned as he was, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, with the imperial ornaments, he ordered him to be led up and down the ranks, giving out that the general was ſlain. His own men being, by this device, greatly encouraged, and thoſe of the enemy equally deſpirited, the victory continued no longer doubtful. Bryennius, Nicephorus Botoniates and Bryennius revolt.

Michael reſigns.

Nicephorus Botoniates crowned emperor.

Bryennius [illegible] and [illegible] priſoner.

[x] Nicep. Bryen. hiſt.-Michael c. 2—8. Ann. Comnen. l. I. c. 2.

ennius, by ſhewing himſelf at the head of his army, convinced them of their miſtake; but, as they were already put into diſorder, and had begun to give ground, after having attempted in vain to ſtop their flight, he was himſelf obliged to fly with the reſt. As he was purſued cloſe by the emperor's forces, he had the misfortune to fall into their hands, after having given extraordinary proofs of his perſonal valour. Alexius received him in a moſt obliging manner, entertained him at his own table, and ſoon after, having put his troops into winter-quarters, ſet out with his unfortunate priſoner for Conſtantinople; but was met on the road by Borilus with orders from court to deliver up Bryennius to him, and march back againſt Baſilacius, who had cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor at Dyrrhachium; and being ſupported by all the men of intereſt in the weſt, had ſurpriſed Theſſalonica, and was preparing to march to the imperial city at the head of a conſiderable army. Alexius having drawn his troops out of their winter-quarters, marched againſt the enemy, and encamping at a ſmall diſtance from Baſilacius, began to ravage and lay waſte the neighbouring country. Hereupon Baſilacius, having attempted in vain to bring him to an engagement, reſolved to fall upon his camp in the night, which he did accordingly; but Alexius, informed beforehand of his deſign, received him, while he expected to meet with no oppoſition, ſo briskly, that his forces were ſoon put to flight, and he himſelf obliged to throw himſelf, with part of his army, into Theſſalonica, which was immediately inveſted by the conqueror. Baſilacius, who was a man of great reſolution and intrepidity, rejecting the advantageous conditions offered by Alexius, prepared to hold out to the laſt extremity; but the inhabitants, dreading the emperor's reſentment, opened their gates, allowing Baſilacius juſt time enough to retire into the caſtle, which he defended with incredible bravery, till he was betrayed by his own men, and delivered up to Alexius, who ſent him to Conſtantinople, where his eyes were pulled out by the emperor's orders, and he confined to a monaſtery [y]. As the emperor was ſtricken in years and had no iſſue male, Borilus and Germanus, two brothers, natives of Scythia and the chief favourites of Botoniates, perſuaded him to name in his will one Synademus for his ſucceſſor, a youth of uncommon parts and nearly Baſilacius revolts.

But is defeated by Alexius.

[y] Niceph. Bryenn. in Botan. l. i. c. 1, 2. Ann. Comnen. l. i. c. 4, 5.

related to the emperor. Though this was managed with great ſecrecy, yet Mary the empreſs had ſome intimation of it. She was firſt married to the emperor Michael Ducas, and afterwards to his ſucceſſor Nicephorus Botoniates. By her former husband ſhe had Conſtantine Ducas, who, by marrying the daughter of Botoniates, had acquired an indiſputed right to ſucceed him. The empreſs therefore, highly provoked both againſt the emperor and his favourites, for thus excluding, with the utmoſt injuſtice, her ſon from the empire, diſcloſed the whole to the two brothers Alexius and Iſaac Comneni, who promiſed her all imaginable aſſiſtance.

Iſaac and Alexius Comneni reſolve to depoſe the emperor.

But in the mean time, the two favourites, taking umbrage at the intimacy that appeared between the empreſs and the Comneni, reſolved to remove, by ſome means or other, the two brothers out of the way. Of this Alexius being ſeaſonably informed, he applied to Pacurianus, an officer of great experience in war and equally verſed in ſtate-affairs, acquainted him with the deſign they had formed of depoſing the emperor, and begged him to aſſiſt them with his advice. Pacurianus, having heard him with great attention, anſwered without the leaſt heſitation, "That if they withdrew to the "army early next morning, he would attend them in their "flight; but if they delayed one moment longer, he would "diſcover to the emperor their treaſonable deſigns." Alexius, charmed with this reſolute and generous anſwer, fled early in the morning, with his brother Iſaac, Pacurianus, and the reſt of their friends, towards the army, which then lay encamped on the borders of Thrace. Upon their arrival, they acquainted the chief officers of the army with their deſign of creating a new emperor; which being univerſally approved of, a council was ſummoned; and after ſome deliberation, whether Iſaac or Alexius ſhould be raiſed to the empire, the latter was unanimouſly choſen, and ſaluted emperor by the whole army, which, without loſs of time, he led to Conſtantinople, being received with joyful acclamations in all the cities through which he paſſed. The inhabitants of Conſtantinople, awed by the troops of Botoniates, ſhut their gates againſt him; but an officer, to whoſe charge one of the quarters of the city was committed, having privately admitted part of Alexius's forces, the gates were by them opened in the night to the reſt, who, ruſhing in, made themſelves maſters of the city, before Botoniates knew it was aſſaulted. As Alexius's army was compoſed of barbarians as well as chriſtians, the unhappy city was plundered in a moſt cruel manner, without any regard to the churches themſelves, which,

Alexius ſaluted emperor by the army.

He takes Conſtantinople.

which, together with the monaſteries, were ſtripped of all their wealth and ornaments. George Palæologus, a perſon of great authority in the empire and a zealous champion for the Comneni, eaſily prevailed upon the officers of the imperial navy, then riding in the haven of Conſtantinople, to declare for the new emperor. Botoniates, thus forſaken by all, ſent ſome ſenators to Alexius, offering the whole power to him, provided he were ſuffered to retain the bare name of emperor, and with it the ornaments of the imperial dignity. Alexius was inclined to comply with his requeſt; but John Ducas brother to the late emperor Conſtantine Ducas, an irreconcileable enemy to Botoniates, would not ſuffer him to hearken to an accommodation upon any terms whatſoever. Hereupon Barilus, the reigning favourite, obſerving with how much ſecurity the troops of Alexius ranged through the city in queſt of plunder, drew together a conſiderable body of reſolute men; and having encouraged them with large ſums and greater promiſes, was preparing to fall upon the unwary enemy. But Coſmas the patriarch, a man famed for his piety, adviſing Botoniates rather to ſubmit to providence and reſign the empire, than ſuffer the city to be polluted with the effuſion of chriſtian blood, he readily embraced his counſel; and leaving the imperial palace, withdrew to the great church, and from thence to a monaſtery, where he took the religious habit, after he had reigned two years and ten months [z].

Botoniates reſigns.

Botoniates having thus reſigned the ſovereign power, Alexius was, by the unanimous conſent of the ſenate and people, proclaimed emperor, and crowned by the patriarch in the month of April 1081. His firſt care was to reward thoſe who had been inſtrumental in his promotion, conferring on them the chief employments in the ſtate, and even inventing new honours and dignities to gratify them. Conſtantine Ducas, the ſon of the late emperor Michael, was ſuffered to wear an imperial crown, and appear with the other enſigns of ſovereignty, purſuant to a promiſe, which he is ſaid to have made to the empreſs Mary, before he took arms againſt Botoniates. As the barbarous behaviour of his ſoldiers, upon their firſt entering the city, had given great offence both to the clergy and people, Alexius, either being really, or pretending to be, touched with remorſe for the diſorders they had committed, reſolved to make an open confeſſion, and undergo a public penance. Accordingly he appeared before the patriarch and ſeveral other eccleſiaſtics, in Alexius Comnenus crowned emperor.

[z] Ann. Comnen. l. ii. c. ult. & l. iii. c. 1.

the attire of a penitent; and, acknowledging himſelf guilty of the many diſorders that had been committed by his ſoldiers, begged the patriarch to impoſe upon him a penance anſwerable to the enormity of his crimes. The patriarch enjoined him, and all his relations and adherents, to faſt, to lie upon the ground, and to practiſe ſeveral other auſterities, for the ſpace of forty days; which no one performed with more chearfulneſs than the emperor himſelf. Having thus attoned for his crimes, or at leaſt gained the affections and eſteem of the clergy, he began to make the neceſſary preparations for putting a ſtop to the conqueſts of the Turks, who had ſeized on ſeveral provinces during the late diſtractions, and threatened the empire with utter deſtruction. But Solyman, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Cutlu-Moſes, alarmed at the warlike preparations that were carrying on in all the provinces of the empire, diſpatched embaſſadors to Alexius with overtures for a laſting peace, which he at firſt rejected, but was in the end glad to accept, tho' he had gained ſeveral advantages over the enemy, upon certain advice, that Robert Guiſchard, duke of Puglia and Calabria, was making great preparations againſt him in the weſt. Robert was by birth a Norman, the ſon of Tancred lord of Hauteville, who, having a numerous family and but a ſmall eſtate, ſent his two eldeſt ſons to try their fortune in the wars againſt the Saracens in Italy, where they diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a very eminent manner; and having driven out the Saracens, ſeized on the places they had held, eſtabliſhing by that means a new principality in Italy. Robert, the third ſon, upon the death of his two elder brothers, did not content himſelf with the principality of Puglia, which they had held, but reduced the greater part of that country which is now called the kingdom of Naples, taking upon him the title of duke of Puglia and Calabria. Towards the end of the reign of Botoniates, Michael, who had been forced to reſign the empire, having made his eſcape into the weſt, prevailed upon Robert whoſe daughter had been ſome years before betrothed to Conſtantine, Michael's ſon, to eſpouſe his cauſe and attempt his reſtoration. With this view Robert made great preparations both by ſea and land, which were continued even after the reſignation of Botoniates, Robert being determined to drive Alexius from the throne, if poſſible, and reſtore Michael, or, as ſome authors inſinuate, to ſeize on the empire for himſelf. Be that as it will, Robert, having left his ſon Roger as his lieutenant in Italy, ſailed with all his forces from Brunduſium; and landing at Buthrotum in Epirus, made

He puts a ſtop to the conqueſts of the Turks.

Robert Guiſchard's expedition againſt Alexius.

Robert paſſes over into Epirus.

made himself master of that place, while his son Bohemond, with part of the army, reduced Aulon, a celebrated port and city in the country now called Albania. From thence they advanced to Dyrrhachium, which they invested both by sea and land, but met with a most vigorous opposition from George Palæologus, whom the emperor had entrusted with the defence of that important place, and who, in spite of the utmost efforts of the enemy, held out, till the Venetians, with whom the emperor had entered into an alliance, arriving with a powerful and well-appointed navy, fell upon the enemy's fleet commanded by Bohemond, and gave them a total overthrow, the admiral himself, whose ship was sunk with several others, having narrowly escaped falling into their hands. After this victory, the Venetians, landing without loss of time, and being joined by Palæologus from the town, fell with great fury upon Robert's men, who were employed in the siege, destroyed their works, burnt their engines, and having driven them back to their camp, returned to their ships loaded with booty. As the Venetians were masters at sea, the besieged were supplied with plenty of provisions, while a great famine raged in the enemy's camp, attended, as usual, by a pestilential distemper, which is said to have destroyed ten thousand men in the space of three months, among whom were some of the chief officers, and many other persons of great distinction. However, Robert, who was a prince of great intrepidity, address, and resolution, pursued the siege; and, having with great difficulty repaired and equipped his fleet, found means to supply his famished troops with provisions, brought in great plenty from Italy. Palæologus, finding the courage of the garrison and citizens began to fail them, sent repeated advices to the emperor of the straights, to which they would, in all likelihood, be reduced. Hereupon Alexius resolved to march in person to the relief of the place; and accordingly, leaving his brother Isaac at Constantinople, to prevent any disturbances there during his absence, he set out for Thessalonica; and being joined there by Pacurianus and the troops under his command, he pursued his march with incredible expedition to Dyrrhachium; and encamping at some distance from the town, on a rising ground, with the sea on the left, and an inaccessible mountain on the right, he summoned a council of war, in which, after a warm debate, it was resolved by a great majority, but contrary to the opinion of the most experienced officers in the army, that the whole should be put to the issue of an engagement; which Robert was so far from declining, that, observing the emperor's pre-Takes Buthrotum and Aulon.

Besieges Dyrrachium.

His fleet defeated by the Venetians.

The emperor marches to the relief of the place.

parations, he ordered all his ſhips to be ſunk, which was giving his men to underſtand, that they had no hopes of ſafety, but in victory. However, the emperor's forces had at firſt the advantage, and drove a body of Robert's troops quite to the ſea, which occaſioned no ſmall diſorder in the army; but they being encouraged and brought back to the charge by Gaita, Robert's wife, a woman of a maſculine courage and behaviour, the fight was renewed with freſh vigor, and the victory long diſputed. At length the emperor's forces began to give ground, and being warmly preſſed by the enemy, the whole right wing betook themſelves to a precipitous and diſorderly flight, moſt of them eſcaping to a neighbouring church, dedicated to St. Michael, as to a place of ſafety. But the victorious enemy, purſuing them cloſe, ſet fire to the church, which was ſoon conſumed, with all who were in it. In the mean time, Robert having put to flight the main body of the emperor's army, Alexius himſelf was forced to retire, though he was the laſt, if we may give credit to his daughter Ann Comnena, who turned his back. The flower of the emperor's troops were cut off, either in the flight or in the purſuit, with an incredible number of officers and perſons of diſtinction, among whom were Conſtantius, the ſon of Conſtantine Ducas, Nicephorus Synademus, Nicephorus Palæologus, the father of George, Zacharias, Aſpetes, &c. The emperor with much ado made his eſcape, and reached Achris, leaving the enemy maſter of his camp and the whole baggage of the army. Robert, elated with this victory, returned before Dyrrhachium, which immediately ſubmitted, and opened its gates to the conqueror, who, as the year was already far ſpent, put his troops into winter-quarters, with a deſign to purſue his conqueſts early in the ſpring. In the mean time, Alexius, who had loſt the flower of his troops in the battle, ordered new forces to be raiſed in all the provinces of the empire, ſeizing for that purpoſe, as the exchequer was quite exhauſted, on the wealth of the churches and monaſteries, which gave great offence to the clergy, and had like to have occaſioned dreadful diſturbances in the imperial city. At the ſame time, Alexius, entering into an alliance with Henry, emperor of Germany, perſuaded him to invade the territories of Robert in Italy, which he did accordingly early in the ſpring, entering Calabria at the head of a numerous army. Robert was no ſooner informed of the emperor's motions, than, ſummoning a council of war, he appointed his ſon Bohemond his lieutenant in the eaſt; and having recommended him to the officers

But is defeated.

Dyrrhachium ſurrenders.

officers of the army, he ſet out without delay for Italy, where he relieved the pope, beſieged by the emperor's forces in the caſtle of St. Angelo, retook Rome, and drove the emperor out of Italy, as we ſhall relate at length in a more proper place. In the mean time, Bohemond reduced ſeveral places in Illyricum; and, having defeated Alexius in two pitched battles, entered Theſſaly, and ſat down before Lariſſa; which, being defended by an officer of great experience in war, held out till the emperor, having recruited his army, marched to its relief. Soon after his arrival, he found means to draw a ſtrong party of Bohemond's men into an ambuſcade, who were almoſt all cut off. However, in the battle, which was fought a few days after, Bohemond had the advantage; but his troops mutinying, and refuſing to continue the war, till they had received their arrears, he was obliged to repair to his father in Italy. Alexius, taking advantage of his abſence, recovered ſeveral cities; and being informed, that Robert was making great preparations againſt him, he had recourſe once more to the Venetians, who, having with incredible expedition equipped a powerful fleet, engaged Robert, and overthrew him in two ſucceſſive battles, but were ſoon after ſurprized by him, and defeated with the loſs of almoſt their whole navy. We are told, that Robert uſed his victory with the greateſt barbarity, putting ſeveral of his priſoners to unheard-of torments. The Venetians equipped a ſecond fleet; and, joining that of the emperor, fell unexpectedly upon Robert's navy, while they were riding without the leaſt apprehenſion of an enemy near Buthrotum, ſunk moſt of his ſhips, and took a great number of priſoners, his wife and younger ſons having narrowly eſcaped falling into their hands. But Robert, not in the leaſt diſheartened with this overthrow, ordered his fleet to be refitted, new ſhips to be built, and levies to be made throughout his Italian dominions, with a deſign to purſue the war with more vigor than ever. But being in the mean time ſeized with a violent fever, he died in the iſland of Cephalenia, being then in the ſeventy-ninth year of his age. Upon his death, Rogér, his ſon and ſucceſſor, not thinking it adviſable to purſue ſo dangerous and expenſive a war, recalled his troops; ſo that Dyrrhachium, and the other places, which they had ſeized in Illyricum, ſubmitted anew to the emperor [a].

Robert obliges the emperor Henry to quit Italy.

Several places in Illyricum reduced by Bohemond.

Robert defeated by the Venetians at ſea.

He dies.

THIS war was ſcarce ended, when another broke out with the Scythians, who, paſſing the Danube, laid waſte great great part of Thrace, committing every-where unheard-of cruelties. Againſt them the emperor diſpatched Pacurianus and Branas, who, engaging the enemy, tho' far ſuperior to them in numbers, were both cut off, with the greater part of the army, to the uſpeakable grief of the emperor, who had a particular eſteem for Pacurianus, on account of his extraordinary parts, his experience in war, and his approved fidelity. This overthrow was owing to the raſhneſs of Branas, who in a manner forced his collegue to venture an engagement, contrary to his own opinion. Talicius, who had ſignalized himſelf on ſeveral occaſions, being appointed to command the army in their room, fell upon the enemy as they lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Philippopolis, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to retire in the utmoſt confuſion. However, they returned the ſpring following in ſuch numbers, that the emperor reſolved to march againſt them in perſon. Accordingly, leaving the imperial city, he ſet out for Adrianople, and from thence to a place called Lardea, where, contrary to the advice of his moſt experienced officers, he engaged the enemy; but, after a warm diſpute, which laſted almoſt from morning to night, was put to flight and utterly defeated. Incredible numbers of his men were put to the ſword or taken priſoners, he himſelf eſcaping with the utmoſt difficulty to Beroe. About the ſame time, the Turks, finding the main ſtrength of the empire was employed againſt the Scythians, broke with great violence into the Roman territories, and made themſelves maſters of ſeveral places of great importance in Aſia, and among the reſt of Clazomene, Phocæa, Mitylene, Methymna, and ſoon after of the iſland of Chios. This ſudden irruption obliged the emperor to ſend part of his forces into the eaſt, under the conduct of John Ducas, brother to the empreſs, while he himſelf led the reſt, reinforced with new levies, againſt the Scythians, by whom he was again overthrown with great loſs, being betrayed by one Neantzes, a Scythian, who had deſerted to him in the beginning of the war; but abandoning him in the heat of the battle, ſo diſheartened the Romans with his ſudden flight, that they began to give ground; and being preſſed by the enemy and overpowered with numbers, they retired in great diſorder, leaving the Scythians maſters of their camp and baggage. However, not long after, Alexius gained a conſiderable advantage over them; and the year following, 1084, having defeated them in a pitched battle and put them to flight, made ſuch a dreadful havock of the fugitives, that few of

The Scythian war.

[a] Ann. Comnen. l. v. c. 1—6. & l. vi. c. 1—5.

The emperor's army defeated by the Scythians.

Alexius gains a complete victory over them.

of them are ſaid to have eſcaped the general ſlaughter [b]. An end being put to the Scythian war by this victory, the emperor reſolved to march in perſon againſt the Turks, with whom John Ducas, his brother-in-law, had often fought with various ſucceſs. Tzachas, a leading man among the Turks, having made himſelf maſter of Smyrna, erected there a new principality, independent of the ſultan, haraſſing with frequent incurſions the neighbouring countries. He had, beſides ſeveral other places, reduced Mitylene, which John Ducas, purſuant to his inſtructions, cloſely beſieged by land, while Conſtantine Delaſſenus who commanded the fleet, inveſted it by ſea. But Tzachas, having committed the defence of the place to his brother, kept the field with a choſen body of troops, watching the motions of the Romans, intercepting their proviſions, and haraſſing them with frequent and ſudden onſets, which diverted them from purſuing the ſiege with due vigor. But John Ducas, having at length drawn Tzachas to an engagement, gave him a total overthrow; after which he ſent deputies to Ducas, with propoſals for a peace, which was concluded upon the following terms: That Tzachas ſhould be allowed to retire unmoleſted to Smyrna; that Mitylene ſhould be delivered up to the Romans; and that none of the inhabitants ſhould be injured in their perſons or eſtates, or be forced to attend Tzachas at his departure. Theſe articles were mutually agreed to, and hoſtages delivered on both ſides; but Tzachas having, with a manifeſt breach of the treaty, obliged ſeveral of the inhabitants to quit their habitations and follow him, Delaſſenus ſailed after him; and, ſoon coming up with him, ſunk moſt of his ſhips, put great numbers of his men to the ſword, and releaſed the captives, Tzachas himſelf having narrowly eſcaped falling into his hands by embarquing on a light veſſel, which carried him ſafe to Smyrna, where he ordered a new fleet to be equipped, and in the mean time marched with all the forces he could raiſe to Abydos, which he hoped to reduce, before it could be relieved by the emperor. But the ſultan, looking upon him as an enemy no leſs dangerous to himſelf than to the empire, marched againſt him in perſon at the head of a powerful army, while Delaſſenus, the Roman admiral, cut off his retreat by ſea. Tzachas, finding himſelf thus attacked by two powerful enemies at once, choſe to ſubmit to the ſultan, whoſe daughter he had married. The ſultan received him in a very obliging manner,

Alexius's war with the Turks.

Mitylene retaken by the Romans.

[b] Ann. Comn. l. vi. c. 13. & l. vii. c. 1——8.

Tzachas put to death by the ſultan.

manner, and invited him to an entertainment; but, in the height of his mirth, cauſed him to be murdered, and ſoon after concluded a peace with the emperor [c].

The Scythians renew the war.

In the year 1093, the Scythian war broke out anew, the barbarians being encouraged to invade the empire by an impoſtor, who, pretending to be Leo, the eldeſt ſon of the late emperor Romanus Diogenes, ſlain ſome years before in an engagement with the Turks, laid claim to the empire, and was received with great joy by the Scythians, who wanted only a pretence to renew the war. Alexius, having received timely advice of the deſign they had formed of falling with all their forces on the empire, viſited the borders in perſon; and having ſupplied the frontier towns with whatever was neceſſary for their defence, repaired to the city of Anchialus on the Euxine ſea. There he was informed, that the barbarians, having paſſed the Danube, and cauſed the impoſtor to be proclaimed emperor in ſeveral towns, which had ſubmitted to them, were advancing with long marches to Anchialus, in order to beſiege the place, and, by taking the emperor, put an end to the war at once. Upon this intelligence, Alexius, having left a ſufficient garriſon in the place, encamped with the reſt of his forces on a riſing ground at a ſmall diſtance from the city, and there fortified himſelf in ſuch manner, that the barbarians, after having viewed his camp and works for three days together, thought it adviſeable to draw off; and leaving Anchialus, which they could not inveſt without driving the emperor from his poſt, marched to Adrianople, the impoſtor perſuading them, that the place would be immediately delivered up to them by Nicephorus Bryennius, who commanded in it, and had, he affirmed, been highly obliged by his father Romanus Diogenes, when emperor. The credulous barbarians, believing all he ſaid, marched chearfully to Adrianople, but, contrary to their expectation, met there with ſo vigorous a reſiſtance, that, after they had continued ſeven weeks before it, they had ſome thoughts of abandoning the enterprize. But being encouraged by the pretended Leo to purſue the ſiege, the place was in the end reduced to the utmoſt extremity, and muſt have ſubmitted in a few days, had not an officer of the army, by name Alacaſeus, preſerved it by the following ſtratagem: In imitation of the celebrated Zopyrus, he diſfigured his face, mangled his whole body in a cruel manner, and flying in that condition condition to the impoſtor, told him, that he was the ſon of one, who had been inviolably attached to his father, on which account he had been thus inhumanly treated by Alexius, and was come to implore the protection of the lawful emperor, and conjure him, by the memory of both their fathers, to revenge their mutual injuries. The uſurper, giving credit to what he ſaid, and repoſing an entire confidence in him, followed him, attended by a choſen body of Scythians, to a ſtrong-hold in that neighbourhood, which, Alacaſeus pretended, the governor deſigned to betray to him. He was accordingly received, as had been agreed before-hand, into the place, and invited by the governor to a grand entertainment; at which the mock prince and his Scythians, who, without the leaſt apprehenſion of treachery, had drunk to exceſs, were ſeized and loaded with chains. Hereupon Alexius, informed of what had happened, marched with all poſſible expedition againſt the Scythians, now deſtitute of a leader; and falling upon them, before they had the leaſt intelligence of his approach, ſlew ſeven thouſand of them upon the ſpot, took three thouſand priſoners, and obliged the reſt to ſave themſelves by a precipitous flight. However, they returned the following year with a very numerous army; but, being overthrown in two ſucceſſive engagements, they ſent at length deputies to treat of a peace; which was concluded upon the emperor's own terms [d]. After this Alexius returned to Conſtantinople, loaded with booty; which he generouſly divided among thoſe, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves moſt in the war.

And beſiege Adrianople.

[c] Ann. Comnen. l. vii. c. 6, 7.

The Scythians defeated.

A peace concluded with them.

During his ſtay at Conſtantinople, he was informed, that the weſtern chriſtians were making great preparations for the recovery of the holy land, at that time poſſeſſed by the Turks and Saracens. As the fortunes of thoſe adventurers are inſeparably interwoven with the remaining part of this hiſtory, it might be juſtly deemed an unpardonable omiſſion, not to acquaint the reader with the motives that prompted them to engage in that mighty undertaking, commonly known by the name of the holy war, or the cruſade. About the year 1093, an hermit, by name Peter, a native of Amiens in Picardy, undertook a pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, to viſit the holy places there; and obſerving the miſerable condition of the chriſtians in Aſia, Syria, and Paleſtine, at that time moſtly poſſeſſed by the Turks, and the cruel uſage they met with from thoſe infidels, on account of their religion, he began to deliberate,

The holy war.

Peter the hermit his pilgrimage, and the effects of it.

[d] Ann. Commen. l. x. c. 2—4.

deliberate, firſt with himſelf, and afterwards with Simon, then patriarch of Jeruſalem, about the means of reſcuing them from the tyranny under which they groaned. As the eaſtern empire was in too weak a condition to give any hopes of redreſs, he reſolved to apply to the weſtern princes, and endeavour, by all poſſible means, to unite them in a league againſt the common enemy, for the relief of the unhappy chriſtians and the recovery of the holy land. Accordingly, having received preſſing letters from the patriarch and the grand maſter of the hoſpitalers, to that purpoſe, to the pope and all the chriſtian princes in the weſt, he took upon him to be meſſenger; and embarquing on the firſt ſhip he met, he arrived at Bari in Puglia; and proceeding from thence to Rome, he delivered the letters to pope Urban II. giving him at the ſame time a pathetic account of the unexpreſſible miſeries the chriſtians ſuffered under the Turkiſh yoke, of which he himſelf had been an eye-witneſs. Having received all the encouragement he could wiſh for from the pope, he applied to the other princes; and, travelling from kingdom to kingdom, inſpired both princes and people with the pious and commendable deſire of relieving the oppreſſed chriſtians, and reſcuing the holy land out of the hands of the infidels. The pope, informed of this general diſpoſition, ſummoned a council at Clermont in France, where three hundred and ten biſhops met, and likewiſe the embaſſadors of moſt chriſtian princes; to whom Peter the hermit made an eloquent ſpeech, repreſenting the ſufferings of the oppreſſed chriſtians, the deſolation of the holy places, the cruelty of the Turks, &c. in ſo lively and affecting a manner, that a religious war was unanimouſly reſolved on, all declaring, as if filled with one ſpirit, their conſent, by often repeating aloud, Deus vult, Deus vult, God will have it ſo, God will have it ſo. Upon the diſſolution of the council, the cruſade was publiſhed by the pope, and generally embraced throughout the weſt, multitudes flocking together from all parts, with red croſſes on their breaſts, the mark of their expedition, ready to recover the holy land, and redeem the chriſtians from the cruel yoke they groaned under, at the expence of their lives. They are ſuppoſed in all to have been no fewer than three hundred thouſand men, of whom the chief commanders were, Hugh brother to Philip I. king of France, Robert duke of Normandy, Robert earl of Flanders, Raymond of Toulouſe, Godfrey, of Bouillion, with his brothers Baldwin and Euſtace, Stephen de Valois earl of Chartres, Bohemond prince of Tarentum, and Peter the hermit. To the latter was given

The council of Clermont.

The cruſade publiſhed.

The principal commanders.

Peter the hermit begins the expedition.

given the command of forty thouſand men; which army he divided into two bodies, leading one himſelf, and committing the other to the conduct of Gautier, a native of France, ſurnamed, from his being a ſoldier of fortune, the Moneyleſs. Gautier began his march on the eighteenth of March 1096, and, paſſing through Germany, entered Hungary, where the inhabitants refuſing to ſupply him and his army with the neceſſary proviſions, he was forced to plunder the country. Hereupon the Hungarians, falling upon him on his march, killed great numbers of his men, and obliged the reſt to ſave themſelves among the woods and marſhes, where they lay concealed, and ſuffered unexpreſſible miſeries, till the prince of Bulgaria, touched with compaſſion, furniſhed them with guides, who conducted them to Conſtantinople, the place of their general rendezvous, where they waited the arrival of Peter, who did not join them till the firſt of Auguſt, being ſtrangely haraſſed on his march by the Hungarians, who ſlew above two thouſand of his men, took all their baggage and two thouſand waggons, with the money deſigned to pay the army. To thoſe hoſtilities Peter himſelf gave occaſion, by ſuffering his men to commit all ſorts of diſorders, under pretence of revenging the cruel treatment, which the army under Gautier had met with from the natives. Peter, having with much-ado reached Conſtantinople with the remains of his ſhattered army, was there received, in appearance, with great marks of friendſhip and kindneſs by the emperor Alexius, who nevertheleſs was in his heart greatly alarmed at the expedition; for though he believed the common people might act upon principles of religion, yet he could not perſuade himſelf, that princes would leave their dominions, and engage in ſo hazardous an undertaking upon the ſame motives. However, he ſupplied Peter's army with all manner of proviſions; who thereupon paſſed the ſtreights, and marching into Bithynia, encamped not far from the city of Nice. Not long after his departure, the emperor received advice of Godfrey's arrival at Philippopolis, with ten thouſand horſe and ſeventy thouſand foot; which gave him no ſmall jealouſy, the more, as Godfrey immediately diſpatched to him an officer, to demand the liberty of Hugh, brother to the king of France, who, in his paſſage from Bari to Dyrrhachium, being ſeparated by a ſtorm from the reſt of the fleet, had been ſeized by the governor of the above-mentioned city and ſent to Conſtantinople, where he was detained priſoner. As the emperor refuſed, under various pretences, to ſet his priſoner at liberty, Godfrey, who was already already advanced as far as Adrianople, began to act againſt him as an open enemy, laying waſte the country, and marching directly to Conſtantinople. Hereupon Alexius, not finding himſelf in a condition to oppoſe ſo powerful an enemy, complied at length with his demand, promiſing at the ſame time to ſupply his army with proviſions; which, however, he neglected to do, and by that neglect provoked Godfrey to ſuch a degree, that he laid waſte the whole neighbouring country to the very gates of Conſtantinople. Alexius, dreading he might fall upon the imperial city itſelf, ſent embaſſadors to treat of an accommodation, offering his own ſon as an hoſtage, and promiſing the provoked prince all poſſible ſatisfaction. Godfrey having received the embaſſadors in a moſt obliging manner, and put a ſtop to all hoſtilities, the emperor invited him and the other princes and chief officers of his army into the city, where they were received with great magnificence, and entertained in a friendly manner. After ſeveral conferences and warm diſputes, the following agreement was at length concluded between them and Alexius; that, during the expedition, the emperor ſhould aſſiſt them with with all his forces, ſupply them with arms, proviſions, and other neceſſaries, and treat them on all occaſions as his friends and allies. On the other hand, the princes were to reſtore to the empire ſuch provinces and cities as they ſhould recover out of the hands of the Turks and Saracens. Soon after, the other princes arrived by different ways at the head of powerful armies, and were all received by the emperor with the greateſt marks of eſteem and affection. After a ſhort ſtay at Conſtantinople, the forces paſſed the Boſphorus, and encamped near Chalcedon, with a deſign to advance from thence to Nice, and lay ſiege to that important city.

His unhappy conduct.

Godfrey marches in an hoſtile manner to Conſtantinople.

An agreement between the emperor and the princes of the cruſade.

WHILE Godfrey and the other princes were yet on their march, the army commanded by Peter the hermit, which had entered Bithynia, as we have obſerved above, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Nice, began to mutiny; and, depoſing Gautier, advanced Raymond, a German commander of great proweſs, in his room. After this, the Germans and Italians, ſeparating from the French, encamped apart. A ſtrong party of the Italians, having made themſelves maſters of a town called Xerigordus, were there ſurpriſed by the Turks and put to the ſword. The French, who lay encamped near Helenopolis and Cibolus, two villages on the gulf of Nicomedia, were, by the Turkiſh commander in thoſe parts, drawn into an ambuſcade, and moſtly either cut cut off, or taken priſoners; ſo that of the forty thouſand men commanded by Peter, ſcarce three thouſand were left, who with him took refuge in Cinite; which place they defended till the arrival of Godfrey and the other princes of the cruſade, with whom they marched to Nice; which city was inveſted by the chriſtian princes in the month of May 1097. As the place had been ſtrongly fortified by Solyman, then ſultan of the Turks, who had choſen it for the ſeat of his empire, and was defended by a numerous garriſon, the ſiege laſted ſeveral weeks; during which time, both the chriſtians and Turks gave many ſignal inſtances of their intrepidity and reſolution. Solyman, who had poſted himſelf with a numerous army among the neighbouring mountains, attempted twice to raiſe the ſiege; but was as often repulſed with much ſlaughter. However, the beſieged continued to defend the place with great courage and reſolution, till the emperor Alexius, who aſſiſted in perſon at the enterprize, having cauſed a great number of ſmall veſſels to be fitted out, cut off the communication, which, by means of the lake Aſcanius, the city maintained with the neighbouring country. The garriſon being thus deprived of the conſtant ſupplies they received both of men and proviſions, and at the ſame time privately ſolicited by the emperor with mighty promiſes to ſurrender the place, not to the weſtern princes, but to him, they ſubmitted at length, and, on the fifth of July, delivered up the city to his lieutenant, by name Butumites. Among the many captives taken on this occaſion, were Solyman's wife and two of his children, who were immediately ſent to Conſtantinople. After the reduction of Nice, the princes, taking their leave of the emperor, of whom they now entertained great diſtruſt, bent their march towards Syria, having firſt divided the army into two bodies, for the convenience of forage and ſubſiſtence. Bohemond, who marched the firſt, was ſuddenly attacked by Solyman, at the head of ſixty thouſand Turks, and would in all likelihood have been put to flight, had not Hugh come ſeaſonably to his relief with thirty thouſand men; who falling upon the enemy, cut forty thouſand of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to take ſhelter among the neighbouring mountains. This victory was attended with the ſurrender of Antioch in Piſidia, of Iconium in Cilicia, Heraclea, and ſeveral other places. The chriſtian princes, animated with this ſucceſs, bound themſelves by an oath not to return, till they had reſcued the holy city of Jeruſalem out of the hands of the infidels. Accordingly, having paſſed mount Taurus, they made themſelves maſters

The army commanded by Peter cut off.

Nice beſieged by the chriſtians.

And taken.

The Turks defeated.

of the cities of Mareſia and Artaſia; and marching from the latter, but fifteen miles diſtant from Antioch, they encamped before that famous metropolis on the twenty-firſt of October 1097. As the place was ſtrongly fortified, and garriſoned with ſeven thouſand horſe and twenty thouſand foot, the ſiege laſted to the third of June, when one Pyrrhus, who had in appearance embraced the Mohammedan ſuperſtition to ſave his eſtate, and was entruſted with the defence of a tower called the Two ſiſters, betrayed the city to Bohemond, whoſe men entering it in the night, opened the gates to the reſt of the army; who falling upon the Turks before they could put themſelves in a poſture of defence, cut them off almoſt to a man. Caſſianus the governor, with ſome others, found means to make his eſcape out of the place; but fell ſoon after into the hands of the Armenian chriſtians, by whom he was ſlain. While the chriſtians were engaged in the ſiege of Antioch, Corbenus, one of the ſultan of Perſia's generals, attacked Edeſſa with a mighty army; but Baldwin, to whom the place had ſubmitted ſome months before, gave him ſuch a warm reception, that he abandoned the enterprize, and marched to the relief of Antioch. Being informed on his march that the city was taken, he reſolved nevertheleſs to venture a battle, in hopes of recovering it; but received a total overthrow, having loſt, as we are told, an hundred thouſand, partly killed, and partly taken priſoners; whereas of the chriſtians only four thouſand two hundred were ſlain. This memorable battle was fought on the twenty-ſeventh of June 1098, and the next day the Turks, who ſtill kept the caſtle of Antioch, deſpairing of relief, ſubmitted and were made priſoners. The chriſtians, thus become maſters of Antioch, choſe with one conſent Bohemond prince of that metropolis, not thinking themſelves bound by the late treaty, ſince Alexius had, contrary to that agreement, under various pretences, declined lending them the leaſt aſſiſtance. However, they ſent Hugh, brother to Philip king of France and Baldwin earl of Heynault, to give the emperor an account of their ſucceſs, and preſs him to join them with all his forces, purſuant to the treaty; but the earl of Heynault was never afterwards ſeen or heard of, whence he was generally believed to have been taken priſoner and murdered by the emperor's orders. As for the other, he got ſafe to Conſtantinople; but, inſtead of returning to the princes with an account of his embaſſy, he departed from thence into France; whence ſome writers ſpeak of Antioch beſieged and taken.

The Turks defeated with great ſlaughter.

of him much to his diſadvantage, as if he had been bribed by the emperor to abandon the enterprize. The emperor had indeed at this time a juſt excuſe for not joining the weſtern princes; for Tangripermes, a Turkiſh pirate, having ſeized on the cities of Smyrna and Epheſus, and reduced the iſlands of Rhodes and Chios, infeſted the coaſts of the empire, committing every-where dreadful ravages. Againſt him the emperor ſent a conſiderable fleet and army; which arriving ſafe at Smyrna, beſieged that city by ſea and land, and having in the end reduced it, marched to Epheſus, which was likewiſe forced to ſubmit, Tangripermes having been defeated with great ſlaughter in that neighbourhood. The victory gained by the emperor's forces was followed by the ſurrender of Philadelphia, Laodicea, and other maritime cities of great importance. Alexius, elated with this ſucceſs, laid claim to Antioch, and ſent embaſſadors to Bohemond, requiring him to deliver up that city to its lawful owner. Bohemond was ſo offended at this demand, that, inſtead of complying with it, he, in his turn, claimed, as prince of Antioch, the city of Laodicea, and diſpatched a conſiderable body of forces, under the conduct of his nephew Tancred, to take it by force; which they did accordingly, reducing at the ſame time ſeveral other ſtrong-holds in Cilicia, belonging to the emperor. Hereupon Alexius, having cauſed a mighty fleet to be equipped with all poſſible expedition, reſolved to ſtop the paſſage of the ſupplies, which the weſtern princes, eſpecially the biſhop of Piſa, were preparing for the ſupport of the chriſtians in the eaſt, till ſuch time as they had reſtored to the empire the cities they had taken from the Turks. Of this fleet Taticius was appointed admiral, who, meeting that of the weſtern princes near Rhodes, attacked them, and gave them a total overthrow; but was himſelf overtaken, in his return to Conſtantinople, by a violent ſtorm, which deſtroyed the greater part of his fleet. After this, the emperor ordered Catacuzenus, one of his generals, to lay ſiege to Laodicea; which, notwithſtanding the ſupplies Bohemond with much difficulty threw into it, was in the end obliged to ſubmit. Hereupon the prince of Antioch, finding he had not ſufficient ſtrength at preſent to contend with the emperor, either by ſea or land, left a ſtrong garriſon in Antioch, and paſſed undiſcovered into Italy, with a deſign to levy new forces there and return early in the ſpring into the eaſt. Alexius, acquainted with his deſign, ordered his admiral, by name Contoſtephanus, to cruize on the coaſt of Italy, and prevent, by all means, Bohemond's fleet from paſſing into the eaſt;

A war between Alexius and Bohemond, prince of Antioch.

Laodicea taken by Alexius.

but Contoſtephanus, departing from his inſtructions, made a deſcent, and laid ſiege to Brunduſium; which, however, he was obliged to raiſe, his men being with great ſlaughter put to flight by the inhabitants. Among the priſoners taken on this occaſion were ſix Scythians, whom Bohemond carried to the pope, telling him, that, with the aſſiſtance of ſuch infidels and barbarians, Alexius endeavoured to ſtop the progreſs of the chriſtian princes in the eaſt; which inflamed both the pope and the people againſt him to ſuch a degree, that multitudes crowded daily to Bohemond, deſiring to be employed againſt a prince, whom they looked upon as an avowed enemy to the chriſtian name. Bohemond, having by this means ſoon raiſed a powerful army, paſſed over into Illyricum; and landing without oppoſition in the neighbourhood of Dyrrachium, ſat down before that important place, after having cauſed his fleet to be burnt in the ſight of the whole army, that, ſeeing there was no means of making their eſcape, they might fight the more courageouſly, and place their ſafety in victory alone. As the place was defended by a numerous garriſon and ſupplied with great plenty of proviſions, it made a vigorous defence, and held out, till Bohemond's army being reduced to the utmoſt extremity for want of neceſſaries, that haughty prince began to give ear to the propoſals that were made him for putting an end to the war. After ſeveral conferences between him and the emperor's miniſters, a peace was in the end concluded, upon terms equally honourable to both princes. The war being thus ended, Bohemond returned to Italy, according to Anna Comnena; but according to others, to Antioch, where, we are told, he died ſix months after [e]. Alexius, being diſengaged from this war, marched in perſon againſt the Turks, who, renewing their incurſions, had laid the country waſte to the very walls of Nice; and coming up with them in the neighbourhood of that city, gave them a total overthrow. However, the Turks returned the following year; but were, in ſeveral ſucceſſive battles, overcome and put to flight by the emperor's lieutenants, Alexius himſelf being prevented, by the gout and other diſtempers, that uſually attend old age, from heading his army in perſon. The Turks, diſheartened with the great loſſes they had ſuſtained, ſent to ſue for peace; which was readily granted them by the emperor, who thenceforth never appeared more in the field, but ſpent the remaining part of his life in ſtriving

Bohemond lays ſiege to Dyrrachium.

A peace concluded.

Alexius concludes a peace with the Turks.

[e] Ann. Comnen. l. ii. c. 6. & l. xi. c. 1, 2, 3. Glyc. annal. l. iii. Zonar in Alex.

striving to heal the diviſions, which at that time rent the Greek church. Being ſeized with a violent cold, he died in the year 1118, the thirty-ſeventh of his reign, and twenty-ſecond after the expedition of the weſtern princes for the recovery of the holy land [f]. There is a great diſagreement among authors touching the character of this prince, the Greek hiſtorians, eſpecially his daughter Anna Comnena, painting him as the beſt of princes, and thoſe who have written the hiſtory of the holy war, repreſenting him as the worſt. However, it is agreed on all hands, that he was a man of great addreſs and penetration, endowed with uncommon parts, and the beſt ſtateſman of his time. He was grateful, generous, and liberal, as appears from his behaviour to his brother and the reſt of his friends, who had been inſtrumental in his advancement to the throne; for on them he heaped ſuch wealth, as quite drained the exchequer; whence, to carry on the war with the Turks, he was forced to ſeize on the riches of the churches and monaſteries; which has prompted ſome eccleſiaſtic writers to paint him in the blackeſt colours. He ſeems to have been a ſtranger to all manner of cruelty; for though many conſpiracies were formed againſt him during the long courſe of his reign, yet we read of no other puniſhment inflicted even on the chief authors of them, beſides baniſhment, or the confiſcation of their eſtates. His behaviour to the weſtern princes, though altogether unbecoming one who profeſſed the ſame religion, may in ſome degree be excuſed, in regard of the jealouſy he entertained of them, eſpecially of Bohemond, his old enemy, which prompted him rather to oppoſe and weaken, than aſſiſt, them in an undertaking, which, he apprehended, might at laſt end in his own ruin, as well as in that of the common enemy. During his ſickneſs, he was earneſtly ſolicited, by the empreſs and his daughter Ann, to exclude his own ſon John from the ſucceſſion, and bequeath the empire to Bryennius, the husband of Ann; but the emperor, deaf to their ſolicitations, declared John his ſucceſſor, who was thereupon ſaluted emperor by the people, as ſoon as the death of Alexius was known, and a few days after, crowned in the great church by the patriarch. He had ſcarce taken poſſeſſion of the imperial throne, when ſome of his neareſt relations, at the inſtigation of Ann, conſpired againſt him, with a deſign to depoſe him, and place Bryennius in his room; but, the conſpiracy being ſeaſonably diſcovered, the conſpirators were immediately

His death and character.

Johannes Comnenus.

[f] Ann. Comn. l. xv. c. 10, 11, 12.

An inſtance of his good nature.

immediately ſeized, tried, and convicted. However, the good natured emperor did not ſuffer them to be otherwiſe puniſhed, than by confiſcating their eſtates, which he ſoon after reſtored to them, receiving anew into favour all thoſe, who, with his ſiſter Ann, had given life to the conſpiracy. After this, he removed from court ſuch as he had reaſon to ſuſpect, appointing none to ſucceed them but perſons of known probity and diſtinguiſhed characters [g]. In the ſecond year of his reign, the Turks, in defiance of the treaty lately concluded with his father, broke into Phrygia; but the emperor, marching againſt them in perſon, overthrew them in ſeveral engagements; and having recovered ſuch cities as they had taken in Cilicia, and among the reſt Laodicea, he laid ſiege to Sozopolis, a ſtrong town in Pamphylia, which he took by a ſtratagem, having enticed the Turks out by a pretended flight, and cut off their retreat into the city. The Turks, alarmed at the ſucceſs that attended his arms, renewed the peace, which they had concluded with his father Alexius. Hereupon the emperor returned in triumph to Conſtantinople, where he had not been long, when news was brought him, that the Scythians, having paſſed the Danube and broken into Thrace, were deſtroying all before them with fire and ſword. Againſt them the emperor led the flower of his army, and falling upon the barbarians before they could put themſelves in a poſture of defence, cut incredible numbers of them in pieces, took many priſoners, and obliged the reſt to ſave themſelves beyond the Danube. He then turned his victorious arms, firſt againſt the Servii, whom he eaſily overcame, and afterwards againſt the Hunns, who had invaded the empire, but were driven beyond the Danube with great ſlaughter. The emperor, croſſing that river after them, carried the war into their country; and having taken ſeveral of their ſtrong-holds, and forced them to conclude a peace upon his own terms, he returned the ſecond time in triumph to Conſtantinople [h]. While the emperor was thus employed againſt the barbarians, the Turks, without any regard to the late treaty, entered unexpectedly Galatia and Cilicia, and made themſelves maſters of ſeveral cities in thoſe two provinces. The emperor therefore, having allowed his men a few days to refreſh themſelves at Conſtantinople, led them afterwards into the eaſt, where he ſoon made himſelf maſter of all Armenia, driving every-where the

His wars with the Turks.

With the Scythians, the Servii and the Hunns.

He recovers Armenia.

[g] Nicet. l. i. c. 1. [h] Idem, c. 2—5.

the Turks before him. The caſtle of Baca, and the cities of Caſtamona, Anazarba, Serep, Capharda, Iſtria, and Sezer, made a vigorous reſiſtance; but were in the end obliged to ſubmit. However, having laid ſiege to Beroea in Syria, he was forced by the numerous garriſon to raiſe it, and drop that enterprize. On his return homewards, he was reconciled to his brother Iſaac, who, in the beginning of his reign, having taken ſome diſguſt, had fled to the Turks, and aſſiſted them with his advice in all their undertakings againſt the chriſtians. Soon after, John, Iſaac's ſon, deſerted to the enemy, and, renouncing the chriſtian religion, embraced the ſuperſtition of Mohammed. The emperor, having ſpent three years in the eaſt, and recovered from the Turks the ſeveral cities and ſtrong holds which they had lately taken, returned to Conſtantinople, where he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable. Having ſettled his domeſtic affairs, he reſolved to return once more into the eaſt; and accordingly began his march early in the ſpring of the year 1140, attended by his three ſons, Alexius, Andronicus, and Manuel, giving out, that he had nothing elſe in view but to ſecure his conqueſts in Armenia, and confirm the cities, that had lately ſubmitted to him, in their obedience; but his real deſign was to recover, if poſſible, the city of Antioch, held by the Latins, and reunite that ſtately metropolis to the empire. Heaven ſeemed to be offended at this undertaking; for ſoon after he had left Conſtantinople, his two eldeſt ſons, Alexius and Andronicus, died in the prime of their years, to the unexpreſſible grief of the afflicted father, who was ready to ſink under the weight of ſo unexpected a calamity. However, he purſued his march, and entering Syria, acquainted the inhabitants of Antioch with his arrival; who thereupon ſent ſome of the chief men in the city to meet him. But when he drew near, they refuſed to admit him within the gates, till he had ſolemnly ſworn he would attempt no innovation, but quietly depart, after a ſhort ſtay in the city. He had entertained hopes of gaining over the citizens, and by that means making himſelf maſter of the city; but finding them inviolably attached to the Latins, he retired in a great rage, ordering his ſoldiers, at their departure, to plunder the ſuburbs. From Antioch he bent his march to Cilicia, where, while he was one day hunting, he was accidentally wounded in the hand with a poiſoned arrow, which he carried in his quiver. Though the wound was ſlight, yet, as the proper remedies were not applied in due time, it cauſed ſuch a ſwelling in his arm, that the phyſicians were for cutting it off; but he peremptorily refuſing to ſubmit to the operation, the ſtrength of the poiſon prevailed to ſuch a degree, that he was in a ſhort time brought to the point of death; when, ſummoning the chief of the nobility to his chamber, he named in their preſence his youngeſt ſon Manuel to ſucceed him, as better qualified in every reſpect for that eminent ſtation, than his other ſon Iſaac. Hereupon Manuel was immediately proclaimed and acknowledged emperor by the nobility and the chief officers of the army, who bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath to obey no other. The emperor died ſoon after, on the eighth of April 1143, having reigned twenty-four years and eight months. It is obſervable of him, that he put none to death during the whole time of his reign; whence he was no leſs beloved by his ſubjects for his humanity and good nature, than feared by the enemies of the empire, on account of his courage, experience in war, and the ſucceſs that attended him in all his expeditions[i].

He forms a deſign of recovering Antioch from the Latins.

The emperor wounded with a poiſoned arrow.

He dies.

Manuel Comnenus.

THE emperor no ſooner expired, than Manuel diſpatched Axuchus, who had been prime miniſter to his father, to Conſtantinople, with orders to ſecure Iſaac; who was accordingly ſeized, before he had time to aſſert his right to the empire, and confined to a monaſtery. Soon after, the new emperor arrived; and being received with loud acclamations by the people, who hated Iſaac; he was crowned with great ſolemnity by the patriarch. Having ſettled his domeſtic affairs, and ſet his brother Iſaac at liberty, upon his promiſing to attempt no innovations during his abſence, he paſſed over into Aſia, at the head of a mighty army: and having recovered ſeveral cities in Phrygia, lately taken by the Turks, he ſat down before Iconium; but not being able to maſter that important place, he returned to Conſtantinople, leaving ſufficient garriſons in the frontier-towns to reſtrain the incurſions of the Turks. During his ſtay in the imperial city, he married Gertrude, ſiſter-in-law to Conrade, the German emperor; but ſlighting her, though endowed with every perfection becoming a perſon of her ſex and quality, he maintained a criminal converſation with his own niece Theodora; which greatly eſtranged from him the minds of his people. But nothing has rendered his name more odious to poſterity, than his treacherous behaviour to the weſtern princes; for having promiſed to ſupply the army of Conrade, who in the year

His war with the Turks.

His treacherous behaviour to the weſtern princes.

[i] Nicet. c. 7—12.

year 1146, undertook an expedition into the holy land, with forage and proviſions, inſtead of that, he cauſed the countries, through which they were to paſs, to be laid waſte, and the gates of the towns to be ſhut; nay, we are told, that the Greeks, inſpired by the emperor with an irreconcileable hatred to thoſe adventurers, mixed the flour they ſold them with quick-lime; which occaſioned a dreadful mortality in the chriſtian army. Beſides, the emperor privately acquainted Mamut, ſultan of Iconium in Aſia Minor, with the deſigns of Conrade and the other princes. Whereupon the ſultan alarming all the princes of his nation, a formidable army was raiſed in defence of their common intereſt, and ſent to protect their territories, before the chriſtian princes were in a condition to attack them. By this means the deſigns of the weſtern princes were defeated, and an army, which otherwiſe might have eaſily triumphed over all the eaſt, in a great meaſure deſtroyed [k]. Roger, king of Sicily, highly provoked at Manuel's treachery, took advantage of ſome diſturbances raiſed by the inhabitants of Corcyra, who thought themſelves oppreſſed by too heavy exactions, and made himſelf maſter of that iſland. From thence he ſailed to Corinth, which he likewiſe took and plundered, with Thebes, and moſt of the principal cities in Bœotia. Hereupon Manuel, having aſſembled all the forces of the empire and equipped a mighty fleet, proclaimed war againſt Roger and the Sicilians; which he began with the ſiege of Corcyra, now Corfu. The beſieged defended the place with incredible bravery; but being in the end quite tired out with repeated attacks, they ſurrendered upon honourable terms. In this ſiege the emperor, who commanded his troops in perſon, loſt an incredible number of men, and among the reſt Stephen, one of his chief officers. However, elated with his ſucceſs, he reſolved to carry the war into Sicily itſelf; but was overtaken by a violent ſtorm, in which ſeveral of his ſhips were loſt, and he himſelf driven, with moſt of the tranſports, to Aulon. Being informed, during his ſtay there, that the Servians had broken into the neighbouring provinces, he marched againſt them in perſon, committing the management of the Sicilian war to Michael Palæologus. Manuel gained great advantages over the Servians, though aſſiſted by the Hungarians, whom he likewiſe overcame in ſeveral battles; and carrying the war into their country, took and razed ſome of their chief towns, and then returned to Conſtantinople, loaded with

His wars with Roger king of Sicily.

[k] Idem in Manuel. l. i. c. 1—4.

with booty. As for Palæologus, he marched into Calabria, where he frequently defeated Roger's forces, and continued laying waſte the country, till, by the mediation of the pope, a peace was concluded between the two princes. The emperor, now diſengaged from this war, took a progreſs into the eaſt, being every-where received in a friendly manner, and entertained with ſhews and feſtivals, by the weſtern princes, notwithſtanding his unaccountable and treacherous behaviour towards them. On his return, he was attacked unexpectedly by the Turks, who killed ſeveral of his men, and took part of his baggage. To revenge this outrage, the emperor, after a ſhort ſtay at Conſtantinople, paſſed over into Aſia, at the head of a very numerous and powerful army; which ſtruck the ſultan with ſuch terror, that he ſent embaſſadors to ſue for peace, offering to conclude it upon ſuch terms, as the emperor himſelf ſhould judge proper. But Manuel adhering to the young and unexperienced officers, who, puſhed on with a falſe courage, declared with great warmth for war, the offers of the ſultan were rejected, and his embaſſadors diſmiſſed with this haughty anſwer, That the emperor would come and let him know his pleaſure at Iconium, which was the metropolis of the Turkiſh empire in Aſia Minor. Hereupon the ſultan, finding a war unavoidable, ſeized on the narrow paſſes of Zibrica, through which the emperor's army was to paſs, and falling upon them, as ſoon as they entered the ſtreights, made a dreadful havock of them with ſhowers of arrows from the mountains and broken cliffs. The Romans attempted to retire; but their retreat being cut off by a ſtrong detachment of Turks, poſted at the entrance of the ſtreights, they were forced to purſue their march, being galled the whole time by the enemy's arrows ſhowering down upon them from the eminences. In the mean time, night coming on, the Turks, who were well acquainted with the country, poſſeſſed themſelves of all the outlets; ſo that the Romans found themſelves, when light appeared, hemmed in on every ſide, without being able either to retire or advance. In this condition, while they looked upon themſelves as loſt, the ſultan, to the great ſurprize of the emperor and the whole army, ſent to Manuel one of his chief officers, by name Gabras, with propoſals for a peace; which he immediately ſigned, to the inexpreſſible joy of the whole army, who purſued their march unmoleſted to Chonas, where the emperor diſtributed what money he had with him among the ſoldiers, and then proceeded to Phila-

A peace concluded between the two princes.

Manuel reduced to great ſtreights by the Turks.

A peace concluded with the ſultan.

Philadelphia, in which city he continued, till his wounds were cured. One of the conditions of the peace was, that the fortifications of Dorylæum and Subleum in Aſia Minor ſhould be razed. This the emperor, now out of danger, refuſed to perform, alledging, that what had been extorted from him by force was not binding. The ſultan, highly provoked at this anſwer, ſent a body of twenty four thouſand choſen men, under the conduct of Atapacus, to lay waſte all Phrygia; which they did with the utmoſt barbarity, ſparing neither ſex nor age. But the emperor's forces, falling upon them as they were croſſing the Mæander on their way home, cut them all off to a man, and recovered the whole booty [k]. The Turks were ſo diſheartened with this overthrow, that they continued quiet the remaining part of Manuel's reign, who, having no wars to employ his thoughts, turned them to religious matters, and, by endeavouring to introduce and eſtabliſh heterodox opinions, raiſed great diſturbances and diviſions in the church, ſome of the prelates being prompted by their intereſt to embrace and maintain the doctrine he had broached, and others impugning it with great warmth. Among the latter was Euſtathius archbiſhop of Theſſalonica, famous for his learned comments on Homer. But the death of the emperor put an end to theſe diſputes. He was taken ill in March 1180, and died in the following September, having near completed the thirty-eighth year of his reign. Some time before his death, he took the monaſtic habit, hoping thereby to atone for the debaucheries, to which he abandoned himſelf in times of peace [l].

The Turks invade the empire anew; but 24,000 of them are cut off.

Manuel dies.

He was ſucceeded by his ſon Alexius Comnenus; but, he being only twelve years old, his mother took upon her the adminiſtration, and governing with an abſolute ſway, ſuffered the young prince to indulge himſelf in his pleaſures and diverſions, in order to indiſpoſe him for applying to the affairs of ſtate. The miniſters, whom the empreſs employed, made it their chief ſtudy to enrich themſelves at the expence of the public, the empreſs herſelf having nothing elſe in view but to fill her coffers. Public affairs being thus entirely neglected, while every one ſtudied his private intereſt, the Turks, who let ſlip no opportunity of enlarging their territories, breaking into the empire, made themſelves maſters of Sozopolis, and ſeveral other important places in Phrygia. This raiſed in the people a general diſlike to the preſent adminiſtration; which being obſerved by Andronicus, who was Alexius Comnenus.

Andronicus revolts.

[k] Nicet. l. vi. c. 1——9. [l] Idem, l. vi. c. 6, 7.

was couſin-german to the late emperor, and had long aſpired at the empire, he thought this the moſt proper time to attempt the obtaining of what he ſo ardently wiſhed for. Accordingly, as he was generally beloved on account of his inſinuating and popular behaviour, he left Oeneum, to which place he had been confined by the late emperor; and moving with his friends and dependents towards Conſtantinople, gave out, that he had nothing elſe in view but to reform the abuſes of the ſtate, to aſſert the imperial dignity, to redreſs the grievances of the people, and reſcue the young prince out of the hands of thoſe who, in a moſt ſhameful manner, abuſed his authority, to the oppreſſion of thoſe whom they were bound to protect. He was every-where received by the credulous people as their deliverer and defender; and ſuch multitudes flocked to him from all parts, that none dared to oppoſe him, till he came into Bithynia, where the governors of Nice and Nicomedia ſhut their gates againſt him, as a public enemy. However, he purſued his march to a caſtle called Charace, where he was met by a body of the imperial troops commanded by Andronicus Angelus, whom he put to flight; and, advancing with long marches towards Conſtantinople, encamped at a ſmall diſtance from Chalcedon, in ſight of the imperial city. The empreſs had committed the whole management of affairs to Alexius, then preſident of the council, with whom ſhe was thought to be more familiar than was conſiſtent with her honour. As Alexius hoped by her means to be advanced one day to the imperial dignity, he left nothing unattempted to defeat the deſigns of Andronicus; but being univerſally deteſted by the people, on account of his tyrannical and arbitrary government, the troops he had raiſed fled over to Andronicus, and the fleet, which was committed to the conduct of Contoſtephanus, followed their example. Hereupon the people, aſſembling in a tumultuous manner, with repeated acclamations declared Andronicus guardian of the young prince, ſet at liberty his two ſons, John and Manuel, whom Alexius had thrown into priſon, and ſeizing on Alexius himſelf, carried him in a mock triumph to the ſea-ſide, attended with the ſcoffs and curſes of the enraged multitude, and thence conveyed him in a ſmall boat to Andronicus, who, after having expoſed him to the inſults of the whole army, cauſed his eyes to be pulled out. Soon after, Andronicus, paſſing the ſtreights, went to wait on the emperor, who was then, with the empreſs his mother, at a royal ſeat in the country; and being immediately admitted to his preſence, fell on the ground, out of a pretended reſpect to his prince, repeating

And marches towards Conſtantinople.

The army and fleet revolt to him.

ſeveral

ſeveral texts of ſcripture, adapted to the preſent purpoſe. As for the empreſs, he ſaluted her with a coldneſs, which ſufficiently betrayed the averſion he bore her. Having ſtaid ſome days with the emperor, he made his entry into the city, attended with the ſhouts and acclamations of the people, and was by all, with one voice, declared and acknowledged the protector of the empire, during the minority of young Alexius. But, notwithſtanding the tyrannical conduct of Alexius the preſident, the citizens of Conſtantinople had ſoon occaſion to repent of the change, there being no kind of cruelty, which the protector did not practiſe upon the unhappy people, without diſtinction of ſex or condition. Some were deprived of their ſight, others baniſhed, and many inhumanly murdered, either out of ſome private grudge, or becauſe they ſeemed attached to the young prince. Among the reſt Mary, daughter to the late emperor, who had been very inſtrumental in the late revolution, and her huſband Manuel, Andronicus's own ſon, were poiſoned by the tyrant's orders. As for the empreſs, he cauſed her to be accuſed of treaſon, as if ſhe had by letters invited Bela, king of the Hungarians, her brother-in-law, to invade the empire. Upon this charge, altogether groundleſs, ſhe was tried, found guilty, no one daring to oppoſe the tyrant's pleaſure, and ſhortly after ſtrangled by Pterigionites the eunuch. Soon after her death the tyrant, pretending a great tenderneſs and unſhaken fidelity for the young prince, cauſed him to be ſolemnly crowned by the patriarch; but took care at the ſame time to enlarge in an eloquent ſpeech on the dangers that threatened the empire, and required, he ſaid, a perſon of wiſdom and experience to avert them. He had no ſooner done ſpeaking, than his friends crying out aloud, as had been agreed on beforehand, "Long live Alexius and Andronicus Roman emperors," the whole multitude ſaluted him with the title of emperor, and placed him, with the conſent and approbation of Alexius, on the imperial throne, the tyrant affecting the whole time an utter averſion to what he had ſo long coveted; nay, upon receiving, as was cuſtomary, the holy euchariſt at his coronation, lifting his eyes up to heaven, he ſolemnly ſwore by that venerable myſtery, that he took upon him the ſovereignty for no other end, but to protect the young emperor and ſupport his authority; but notwithſtanding his oath, as he had now both the emperor and the empire in his power, he reſolved a few days after to diſpatch his collegue, and take the whole authority into his own hands. Purſuant to this wicked reſolution, one Stephanus Hagiochriſtophorites,

He is received at Conſtantinople, and declared protector of the empire.

Made collegue to Alexius.

tes, with ſome others, entering, by the tyrant's orders, the unhappy prince's chamber in the night, ſtrangled him with a bow-ſtring. Such was the miſerable end of Alexius II. in the third year of his reign and fifteenth of his life [m].

Whom he cauſes to be murdered.

Andronicus.

ANDRONICUS, now ſole maſter of the empire, made it his chief ſtudy to eſtabliſh the power he had uſurped, raging without diſtinction againſt perſons of all ranks, whom he imagined in the leaſt affected to Manuel's family, or capable of revenging his death. No day paſſed without ſome cruel execution; inſomuch, that in a ſhort time the flower of the nobility was utterly cut off, the mercileſs tyrant complaining all the while of the ſeverity of the law, which did not allow him to ſhew pity to ſo many deſerving men. Some, however, found means to make their eſcape, and among the reſt Iſaac Comnenus, Manuel's near kinſman; who, taking refuge in Cyprus, made himſelf maſter of that iſland, and is ſaid to have exceeded even Andronicus himſelf in all manner of barbarities. Alexius Comnenus, brother to the late emperor Manuel, fled to Sicily; and having perſuaded William, king of that iſland, to make war upon Andronicus, he attended him to Dyrrhachium, which city the king ſoon reduced; and marching from thence into Macedon, laid waſte that province without oppoſition, and ſat down before Theſſalonica, where his fleet had been ordered to attend him. The city was taken by ſtorm, after a few days ſiege, through the indolence and cowardice of the governor, and with the utmoſt cruelty plundered by the Sicilians, who, without diſtinction of ſex or age, put all they met to the ſword, not ſparing even thoſe who had taken refuge in the churches. Andronicus, having aſſembled his troops, ordered them to march under the conduct of the beſt generals in whom he could confide againſt the enemy. But they were defeated and put to flight at the firſt onſet; which inſpired the Sicilians with ſuch courage, that they began to look upon themſelves as already maſters of the imperial city itſelf. In the mean time, the tyrant, finding the number of the malecontents encreaſed at home, in proportion to the ſucceſs of the enemy abroad, began to rage with more cruelty than ever, not ſparing even his own favourites, who had been hitherto the executioners of his tyranny againſt others. Among the many who were deſtined to ſlaughter was Iſaac Angelus, a perſon of great diſtinction, being deſcended from one of the moſt antient families in Conſtantinople. Hagiochriſtophorites, Andronicus's prime

His cruel and tyrannical conduct.

William, king of Sicily, invades his dominions.

[m] Nicet. in Alex, Comnen. c 3——16.

prime miniſter, was ordered to ſeize him; but Iſaac, having killed the aſſaſſin with his own hand, made his eſcape to a neighbouring church, whither he was followed by his uncle John Ducas, by his ſon Iſaac, and by ſeveral other perſons of the firſt quality. As Iſaac was generally beloved, on account of his popular and engaging behaviour, multitudes of people flocked from all parts of the city to ſee him in his aſylum. As Andronicus was then abſent from the city, Iſaac laid hold of that opportunity to ſtir up the populace againſt him; which he did ſo effectually, that, on a day appointed, they flocked in crowds to the church of St. Sophia, and there, with one voice, ſaluted Iſaac emperor, declaring at the ſame time Andronicus a public enemy. The tyrant, informed of what had happened in the city, and deſpairing of being able to appeaſe the enraged multitude or make head againſt them, fled to Meludium, a royal palace on the eaſt ſide of the Propontis, and from thence attempted to eſcape into Scythia; but being ſeveral times driven back by contrary winds, and purſued, as it were, by divine vengeance, he was in the end apprehended and preſented in chains to Iſaac; who, having cauſed his right-hand to be cut off and one of his eyes to be pulled out, delivered him up to the enraged populace, from whom he ſuffered indignities anſwerable to the injuries with which he had provoked them; for having led him, as it were, in triumph, through the moſt frequented ſtreets of the city on a camel, with his face towards the tail, amidſt the reproaches and inſults of the incenſed multitude, they hung him up by the feet between two pillars, ſtripped off his cloaths, cut off his private parts, and tormented him for three days together, he bearing the whole time with an invincible courage all the torments, the incenſed and relentleſs mob could inflict upon him, ſometimes repeating, Lord, have mercy upon me, and ſometimes addreſſing the multitude with theſe words, Why do you break a bruiſed reed? At length one, touched with compaſſion at the ſight of an object, which might have drawn tears from cruelty itſelf, by a mortal wound in his throat, put an end at the ſame time to his life and torments, after he had lived ſeventy-three years and reigned two [a]. He was the laſt emperor of the Comnenian family.

Iſaac Angelus takes refuge in the church.

Is proclaimed emperor.

Andronicus taken, and cruelly tormented by the populace.

Is murdered.

Iſaac Angelus

Iſaac, thus raiſed to the imperial dignity, gained, in the beginning of his reign, the affections of his ſubjects, by his lenity and moderation, not only recalling and reſtoring to their eſtates ſuch as had been baniſhed by Andronicus, but relieving ſeveral

[a] Nicet. in Andronic. l. i. c. 5——11.

ſeveral decayed families out of his private eſtate. When he though himſelf ſufficiently eſtabliſhed on the throne, he diſpatched the flower of the army, under the conduct of Branas, an officer of great experience, againſt the Sicilians; who, being ſurprized by him as they were roving about the country in queſt of plunder, were put to flight, and cut off almoſt to a man, either by the emperor's troops, or the natives, whom they had provoked with their barbarities. Their fleet, conſiſting of two hundred ſail, on their return home, being overtaken and diſperſed by a violent ſtorm, moſt of their ſhips were taken by the emperor's admiral, and great numbers of priſoners ſent to Conſtantinople, where moſt of them periſhed with famine, the emperor, who was naturally addicted to cruelty, not ſuffering them to be relieved even with bread and water. Having thus put an end to the Sicilian war, he reſolved to drive, if poſſible, Iſaac Comnenus, of whom we have ſpoken above, out of Cyprus, where he oppreſſed the inhabitants in a moſt tyrannical manner. In order to this, he equipped a mighty fleet, which he ſent under the command of John Contoſtephanus and Alexius Comnenus, to make a deſcent upon that iſland; which they did accordingly, landing without the leaſt oppoſition. But while the forces were aſhore, Margarites, a famous pirate, who had joined Iſaac Comnenus, falling upon the fleet, ſeized or burnt all the ſhips, while the tyrant, attacking the forces that were landed and could not retreat, cut them off all to a man. This misfortune encouraged the Mœſians, whom the emperor oppreſſed with heavy taxes, to revolt, and return to the protection of the Scythians; who, having raiſed a numerous army, over-ran the neighbouring provinces. Againſt them the emperor diſpatched his uncle John Ducas, who gained ſeveral advantages over the enemy, and would in all likelihood have put an end to the war, had he not been recalled by the jealous emperor. John, ſurnamed Cantacuzenus, being appointed to ſucceed him, was, through his raſhneſs and indiſcretion, often worſted by the enemy. Whereupon Branas Alexius, the greateſt commander of his age, was entruſted with the whole management of the war. Branas, ſeeing himſelf at the head of a powerful and well diſciplined army, after having gained ſome advantages over the enemy, returned on a ſudden to Adrianople, the place of his nativity; and having cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor there, led his troops without loſs of time to the imperial city, hoping to ſurpriſe the emperor, who had ſcarce received intelli-

He defeats the Sicilians.

Attempts in vain to recover Cyprus.

Branas revolts.

gence

gence of his revolt; but the citizens putting themſelves, upon his approach, in a poſture of defence, and haraſſing his troops with frequent ſallies, he reſolved to encamp at ſome diſtance from the city, and, by cutting off all communication with the neighbouring country, to reduce it by famine. The emperor, in the mean time, repoſing all his confidence in the virgin Mary, (whoſe image he cauſed to be placed on the walls) and in the prayers of the monks, continued inactive in his palace, till he was rouſed by Conrade, ſon to the marquis of Montferrat, who, happening to be then at Conſtantinople, encouraged him to draw together his troops, and march out againſt the enemy; which he did accordingly, being attended by Conrade, who commanded the main body of the imperial army. Branas received him with his men in battle-array; whereupon an engagement enſuing, the diſpute was maintained for a conſiderable time on both ſides with great obſtinacy; but in the end the emperor's forces, though a handful in compariſon of the enemy's, prevailing, Branas himſelf was killed on the ſpot, and moſt of his chief officers either ſlain in the purſuit or taken priſoners. This victory was chiefly owing to the bravery and conduct of Conrade, by whoſe hand Branas fell, while he was encouraging his men to return to the charge [o]. The rebellion being thus happily quelled, the jealous emperor reſolved to employ the whole ſtrength of the empire againſt the celebrated emperor of Germany, Frederic Barbaroſſa, who was marching, at the head of a mighty army, to the aſſiſtance of the princes of the cruſade. He had promiſed to grant Frederic a free paſſage through his dominions, and ſupply his army with all manner of proviſions; but being in the mean time gained over by Saladin, the Turkiſh ſultan, who promiſed to reſtore Paleſtine to him, inſtead of aſſiſting the German army, purſuant to his engagement, he no ſooner heard of their arrival on the borders, than he diſpatched his couſin Manuel, with a powerful army, to obſtruct their paſſage and intercept their proviſions, having firſt, without any regard to the law of nations, thrown into priſon the biſhop of Munſter, the earl of Naſſau, and count Walram, Frederic's embaſſadors. The Germans, juſtly provoked at the emperor's treachery and perfidiouſneſs, paſſed, in ſpite of the oppoſition they met with from the cowardly Greeks, into Thrace, and there ſeized on the corn, of which they found great plenty in the fields, before the inhabitants had time to remove it into the

And lays ſiege to Conſtantinople.

He is defeated and killed.

The emperor's treacherous conduct towards Frederic the German emperor.

[o] Idem. in Iſaac. Ang. l. i. c. 7—9. & l. ii. c. 1, 2.

fortified towns, purſuant to the orders they had received from court. As they approached Philippopolis, the inhabitants abandoned the place; and Frederic, taking poſſeſſion of it, halted there a few days to refreſh his troops. In the mean time, the emperor, highly incenſed againſt Manuel, whom he accuſed of cowardice, ſent him peremptory orders to engage the Germans; purſuant to which, the Greek general advanced within ſix miles of Philippopolis. But his whole army being ſhamefully put to flight by a party of Germans, whom Frederic had ſent out to ſcour the country and watch the enemy's motions, the cities of Nicopolis and Adrianople, with all the places between the Ægean and Euxine ſeas, opened their gates to the victorious army, without attempting to make the leaſt oppoſition. Hereupon the emperor, having ſet Frederic's embaſſadors at liberty, began to ſue for peace, offering to ſupply the Germans with proviſions and the neceſſary ſhips to tranſport them into Aſia, provided they delivered hoſtages to him for his ſecurity, and croſſed the ſtreights without delay. Frederic, now maſter of the whole country to the very gates of Conſtantinople, thought it became him to chaſtiſe the pride of the preſumptuous, but cowardly, Greeks, and therefore returned the following anſwer to the emperor's deputies; That he had conquered Thrace, and therefore would diſpoſe of it at his pleaſure; that he was determined to winter there, ſince the emperor had by his perfidiouſneſs retarded his march, till it was too late in the year to paſs the ſtreights; that he was reſolved to treat the emperor as an enemy, if he had not a ſufficient number of ſhips ready againſt Eaſter to tranſport his troops; and ſince he could not depend upon his faith, he commanded him to ſend without delay twenty-four of the principal lords and officers of his court, with eight hundred perſons of inferior quality, as hoſtages for the performance of what he required. To theſe ſhameful conditions the emperor readily ſubmitted, ſending immediately the hoſtages with rich preſents to Frederic, who, having wintered at Adrianople, removed early in the ſpring to Callipolis, where he found a great number of veſſels ready to tranſport his army into Aſia [p]. In the year 1192, the eighth of Iſaac's reign, an impoſtor, pretending to be the ſon of the emperor Manuel, laid claim to the empire; and, being encouraged by the ſultan of Iconium, raiſed in a ſhort time an army of eight thouſand men, made himſelf maſter of all the cities in the Meander,

Frederic defeats the emperor's forces.

Takes ſeveral places.

Obliges the emperor to ſubmit to diſhonourable terms.

[p] Nicet. ibid. l. ii. c. 4, 5.

der, in ſpite of the oppoſition he met with from Alexius, the emperor's brother, who was ſent againſt him, and would in all likelihood have in the end driven the emperor from the throne, multitudes flocking to him from all parts, had not a prieſt put an end to his conqueſts, by ſtabbing him with his own ſword, while he lay aſleep, after having drunk to exceſs [q]. The Scythians, encouraged by theſe domeſtic commotions, renewed their incurſions, and, over-running the neighbouring provinces, deſtroyed all with fire and ſword. Againſt them the emperor marched in perſon; but having paſſed the ſummer without daring to attack them, they fell upon him in his retreat, and cut the greateſt part of his army in pieces, the emperor himſelf having with much-ado made his eſcape. After this, the barbarians roved about the country without controul, plundering the cities, and carrying the inhabitants into captivity. The emperor diſpatched againſt them firſt Alexius Guido, and afterwards Batatzes Baſilius; but both theſe generals being defeated, and the latter killed upon the ſpot with the flower of his army, the emperor, having raiſed new forces, reſolved to march againſt them once more in perſon. Accordingly, he ſet out from Conſtantinople early in the ſpring, and arriving at Cypſella on the frontiers of the empire, he halted there, till the troops, that were marching from all parts, joined him. In the mean time, his brother Alexius Angelus, who had long aſpired at the empire, obſerving the general diſcontent that reigned among the ſoldiery, reſolved to lay hold of the preſent opportunity of attaining what he had ſo long wiſhed for. Accordingly, having imparted his deſign to ſome of the chief officers of the army, and found them ready to eſpouſe his intereſt and combine againſt Iſaac, while the emperor was one day diverting himſelf with the chace, the conſpirators, ſeizing Alexius, as had been agreed on before-hand, carried him to the imperial pavilion, and, with repeated acclamations, ſaluted him emperor, being therein followed by the whole army. Iſaac, judging it impoſſible to reclaim the revolted army to their duty, fled with great precipitation to Macra, where he was overtaken by thoſe whom his brother had ſent after him, and by his orders deprived of his ſight and thrown into priſon, after he had reigned nine years and eight months [r].

The emperor defeated by the Scythians

Alexius Angelus revolts.

Alexius Angelus, abandoned himſelf to the ſame vices, for which he pretended to have removed his brother, ſpending his time in riot and luxury, [q] Idem, l. iii. c. 1. [r] Idem ibid. l. iii. c. 9.

ury, while the Scythians on one hand, and the Turks on the other, made themſelves maſters of ſeveral important places, and laid waſte whole provinces. As he was an utter enemy to all application, he committed the whole management of affairs to his wife Euphroſyne and his favourites, who oppreſſed the people in a moſt tyrannical manner, ſelling the firſt employments of the ſtate to the higheſt bidder, without any regard to their birth or abilities, and uſing all other means, how unjuſt ſoever and diſhonourable, to fill their private coffers. In the year 1202, Alexius, reflecting on the great kindneſs his brother had ſhewn him during his reign, and thinking himſelf now firmly eſtabliſhed on the throne, ordered the unhappy Iſaac to be ſet at liberty, and called his ſon Alexius, at that time about twelve years old, to the court, treating him as his own child. But Iſaac, ſtill mindful of the indignity that had been offered him, and the injuſtice done both to himſelf and his ſon, began to entertain thoughts of recovering his former dignity, and aſſerting his undoubted right to the imperial crown. With this view he maintained a private correſpondence with the Latins, and by their means with his daughter Irene, wife to Philip emperor of Germany, earneſtly preſſing her to perſuade the emperor to undertake the protection of her unfortunate father and brother. Irene giving them hopes of a ſpeedy and powerful aſſiſtance, young Alexius made his eſcape from Conſtantinople; and embarquing in a ſhip belonging to a merchant of Piſa, riding then at the mouth of the Helleſpont, landed ſafe in Sicily, where he ſpent ſome days in private conferences with his ſiſter, who was then in that iſland, and from thence purſued his journey to Rome, to ſolicit the aſſiſtance of the pope, by whom he was kindly received and warmly recommended to Philip. That prince received young Alexius with the greateſt demonſtrations imaginable of kindneſs and eſteem, and was ſenſibly touched, as he had an entire affection for Irene, with the misfortunes of her family; but being then engaged in a troubleſome war with Otho, who diſputed the empire with him, he could not eſpouſe the young prince's cauſe. However, by means of his embaſſadors, he engaged the French and Venetians, who had then a powerful army in Dalmatia, ready to march againſt the Turks, to attempt the reſtoration of his brother-in-law, and employ their whole ſtrength againſt the uſurper. The treaty, after ſome warm diſputes, was concluded; in virtue of which the French and Venetians were to eſtabliſh Alexius on the imperial throne, and Alexius, upon his reſtoration, to pay two hundred thouſand marks in ſilver towards

His bad government.

Iſaac, the late emperor, ſet at liberty.

His ſon Alexius recurs to the weſtern princes.

towards the expences of the holy war, maintain ten thouſand men one year to be employed in the conqueſt of Egypt, and, during his life, five hundred knights well armed for the defence of ſuch places as they ſhould conquer in the holy land. The treaty being ratified with mutual oaths, the army embarqued and ſailed for Corfu, the place of the general rendezvous. As they appeared before Dyrrhachium, the inhabitants were no ſooner informed, that the young prince was on board the fleet, than they preſented him with the keys of the place, and ſwore allegiance to him. Encouraged with this happy preſage, they purſued their courſe to the iſland of Corfu, and from thence, after a ſhort ſtay, to the port of St. Stephen, on the Propontis, where they refreſhed themſelves, and then ſailed to Chalcedon, oppoſite to the imperial city, where they landed their troops. In the mean time, the emperor, having drawn together all his forces, encamped on the Boſphorus, over-againſt the confederates, who nevertheleſs paſſed the ſtreights, the emperor having but twenty galleys to oppoſe them, and landed in ſight of the emperor's army, who, at their approach, retired in great diſorder. The next day, the French made themſelves maſters of the caſtle of Galata, and the Venetians, being favoured by an eaſterly wind, ſailed up to the chain that locked up the mouth of the harbour; and having cut it with ſheers of ſteel, that opened and ſhut by means of an engine, they took or ſunk all the Greek veſſels in the haven. After this, the Venetians having battered the walls for ten days together by ſea and the French by land, a general aſſault was given on the ſeventeenth of July. The Greeks made a more vigorous oppoſition than was expected; and being aſſiſted both by the advantage of the place and their numbers, often repulſed the aggreſſors. But at length the celebrated Henry Dandalo, duke of Venice, though then above eighty years old, putting himſelf at the head of his countrymen, whom he encouraged more with his example than his words, broke in, maugre all oppoſition; and having ſeized on one of the towers, planted on the top of it the great ſtandard of St. Mark. The emperor, finding part of the enemy's troops was got into the town, ſallied out with a deſign to charge them in the rear, and by that means oblige them to draw off their men from the attack; but being repulſed with great ſlaughter, and the brave Dandalo having by this time made himſelf maſter of twenty-five towers on the ſide of the haven, the cowardly prince, abandoning his people, went privately on board a ſmall veſſel, kept ready for that purpoſe, and eſcaped with his treaſures and the imperial ornaments, Dyrrhachium ſubmits to Alexius.

Conſtantinople beſieged.

The uſurper makes his eſcape.

naments, to Zagora, a city of Thrace, at the foot of mount Hæmus. It was no ſooner known, that the tyrant had fled, than the people, crouding to the priſon, where Iſaac had been detained ever ſince the flight of his ſon Alexius, ſaluted him anew with the title of emperor, placed him upon the imperial throne, from which he had been driven about eight years before; and acquainting the confederates with the flight of the uſurper, and the re-eſtabliſhing of Iſaac, invited the young prince to ſhare the empire with his father. The confede ates were tranſported with joy at the news of ſo ſudden and unexpected a revolution; however, as they had been but too often deceived by the Greeks, they refuſed to acknowledge Iſaac, till he had ratified the treaty concluded with his ſon; which he had no ſooner done, though not without ſome reluctance, the articles appearing to him very hard, than the confederates owned him for emperor, and conducted the young prince in great triumph into the city, where he was aſſociated with his fath r in the empire, and crowned with extraordinary pomp and ſolemnity on the firſt of Auguſt 1203[a]. As the uſurper continued ſtill in Thrace, ſupported there by a ſtrong party; and Theodorus Laſcaris, his ſon-in-law, was at the head of a numerous body of troops on the other ſide of the Boſphorus, the two emperors earneſtly entreated the confederates to put off their expedition to the holy land, till they had completed the work, which they had ſo happily begun. To this they readily agreed; and marching againſt the tyrant, who had ſeized on Adrianople, drove him from thence, and obliged him to fly for refuge to the neighbouring barbarians. Theodorus Laſcaris no ſooner heard, that the confederates were preparing to croſs the ſtreights, in order to attack him, than he diſbanded his army, and withdrew to the territories of the Turks. The confederates, having thus eſtabliſhed the two princes on the throne, returned about the middle of winter to Conſtantinople, where they were received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable; and from thence paſſed early in the ſpring over into Aſia. The ſame year, 1203, happened a dreadful conflagration at Conſtantinople, occaſioned by ſome Latin ſoldiers, who having plundered a moſque, which the late emperor had ſuffered the Mohammedans to build in the imperial city, and being on that account attacked by the Turks, who were much ſuperior to them in number, ſet fire to ſome wooden houſes, the better to favour their eſcape. The flame, ſpreading in an inſtant from Iſaac reſtored.

A dreadful fire at Conſtantinople.

[a] Nicet. l. iii c. 2—12.

from ſtreet to ſtreet, reduced in a ſhort time great part of the city to aſhes, with the capacious ſtore-houſes, that had been built at a vaſt expence on the key [t]. The emperor Iſaac died ſoon after the departure of the Latins, leaving his ſon Alexius ſole maſter of the empire. The young prince, to diſcharge the large ſums he had promiſed to the French and Venetians, was obliged to lay heavy taxes on his ſubjects, which, with the great eſteem and friendſhip he ſhewed to his deliverers, raiſed a general diſcontent among the people, who were ſworn enemies to the Latins. This encouraged John Ducas, ſurnamed Murtzuphlus from his joined and thick eye-brows, to attempt the ſovereignty. As he was a perſon of great addreſs and uncommon parts, he not only ingratiated himſelf with the multitude, by exclaiming againſt the Latins, as the only cauſe of the preſent miſeries; but having found means to gain the young prince's confidence, he by degrees brought him to diſoblige the Latins, and even to treat them as enemies. As the hoſtilities were returned by the weſtern princes, Murtzuphlus diſpatched in the emperor's name one of his friends to the marquis of Montferrat, with propoſals for an accommodation, offering to deliver up to him the palace and fortreſs of Blachernæ, within the walls of Conſtantinople, provided he would come and deliver him from the enraged populace, who, he ſaid, had revolted and proclaimed another emperor. The marquis giving credit to the embaſſador, prepared to march to Conſtantinople: but, in the mean time, the treacherous Murtzuphlus, having ſtirred up the people by giving out, that Alexius had ſold the city to the Latins, who were in full march to take poſſeſſion of it, entered, in the height of the tumult, the prince's chamber, and ſtrangled him with his own hands. After this, he preſented himſelf to the people, acquainted them with what he had done to ſecure their liberties, and earneſtly entreated them to chuſe an emperor, who had courage enough to defend them againſt the Latins, who were ready to oppreſs and enſlave them. He had no ſooner ended his ſpeech, than thoſe who were privy to his wicked deſign, ſaluted him with the title of emperor, and were followed by the whole multitude, who, with loud acclamations, placed him on the imperial throne, as one capable of defeating the pretended deſigns of the Latins. The princes of the cruſade no ſooner heard of the death of Alexius and the promotion of the treacherous aſſaſſin, Murtzuphlus betrays the young prince.

And murders him.

The Latins reſolve to revenge his death.

[t] Idem l. iii. c. 12.

aſſaſſin, than they unanimouſly agreed to turn their arms againſt the uſurper, to revenge the murder of a prince, whom they had placed upon the throne; and ſince they had been ſo often betrayed, and retarded in their ſeveral expeditions to the holy land by the Greek emperors, to make themſelves maſters of Conſtantinople, and ſeize on the empire for themſelves. Purſuant to this reſolution, having muſtered all their forces in Aſia, they croſſed the ſtreights, and cloſely beſieged the imperial city both by ſea and land. The tyrant, who was a man of courage and great experience in war, made a vigorous defence. However, the Latins, after having battered the walls for ſeveral days together with an incredible number of engines, gave a general aſſault on the eighth of April, which laſted from break of day till three in the afternoon, when they were forced to retire, after having loſt ſome of their engines and a great number of men. It was nevertheleſs reſolved the ſame night in a council of war, that the attack ſhould be renewed, which was done accordingly on Monday the twelfth of April, when after a warm diſpute of ſeveral hours, the French planted their ſtandard on one of the towers; which the Venetians obſerving, they quickly made themſelves maſters of four other towers, where they likewiſe diſplayed their enſigns. In the mean time, three of the gates being broken down with the battering rams, and thoſe who had ſcaled the walls having killed the guards and opened the gates between the towers they had taken, the whole army entered, and drew up in battle-array within the walls. But the Greeks flying up and down in the greateſt confuſion, ſeveral parties were detached to ſcour the ſtreets, who put all they met to the ſword, without diſtinction of age or condition. Night put a ſtop to the dreadful ſlaughter, when the princes, ſounding the retreat, placed their men in the different quarters of the city, with orders to ſtand upon their guard, and fortify themſelves, not doubting but they ſhould be attacked early next morning. They were therefore greatly ſurpriſed, when, inſtead of an armed enemy, they ſaw by break of day proceſſions of ſuppliants advancing to them from every quarter of the city, with croſſes, banners, images of ſaints, relics, &c. to implore mercy. The princes touched with compaſſion, promiſed them their lives, but at the ſame time, ordering them to retire to their houſes, they gave up the city to be plundered by the ſoldiery for that day, ſtrictly enjoining them to abſtain from ſlaughter, to preſerve the honour of the women, and

They beſiege Conſtantinople.

Which is taken and plundered.

and to bring the whole booty into one place, that a juſt diſtribution might be made according to the rank and merit of each particular. The Greeks had, without all doubt, removed and concealed their moſt valuable effects during the night; the moſt eminent perſons had made their eſcape, and carried with them infinite treaſures; moſt of the ſoldiers had, in all likelihood, reſerved ſeveral things of great value for themſelves, as it commonly happens, notwithſtanding all prohibitions to the contrary; and yet the booty, without the ſtatues, pictures, and jewels, amounted to a ſum almoſt incredible. As for Murtzuphlus, he made his eſcape in the night, embarquing on a ſmall veſſel with Euphroſyne, the wife of the late uſurper Alexius Angelus, and her daughter Eudoxia, for whoſe ſake he had abandoned his lawful wife. This great revolution happened in the year 1204, of the chriſtian æra, eight hundred and ſeventy-four years after the removal of the imperial ſeat from Rome to Conſtantinople.

CHAP. XXXVI.

The Roman hiſtory, from the expulſion of the Greeks, to the taking of Conſtantinople by the Turks, and the utter deſtruction of the Roman empire.

THE Latins, now maſters of the imperial city, proceeded to the election of a new emperor; when Baldwin, earl of Flanders, a prince in every reſpect equal to that high truſt, was, after ſome deliberation, choſen, and crowned with extraordinary pomp and magnificence in the church of St. Sophia. To him was allotted the city of Conſtantinople and the country of Thrace, with a limited ſovereignty over the other provinces, which already were, or ſhould afterwards be, taken from the Greeks. To Boniface, marquis of Montferrat, they aſſigned Theſſaly, which was erected into a kingdom. The Venetians had for their ſhare the iſlands of the Archipelago, part of Peloponneſus, and ſeveral cities on the Helleſpont. But while the Latins were thus dividing Baldwin, earl of Flanders, choſen emperor of Conſtantinople.

Theodorus Laſcaris erects a new empire at Nice.

dividing their new acquiſitions, Theodorus Laſcaris, ſon-in-law to the tyrant Alexius Angelus, having, at the taking of Conſtantinople, made his eſcape into Bithynia, was there joyfully received by the inhabitants; and poſſeſſing himſelf not only of that country, but of Phrygia, Myſia, Ionia, and Lydia, from the Meander to the Euxine ſea, took upon him the title of emperor, and fixed his imperial ſeat in the famous city of Nice. At the ſame time, David and Alexius Comneni, grand-children to the late tyrant Andronicus, ſeizing on the more eaſtern countries of Pontus, Galatia, and Cappadocia, erected a new empire at Trapezus or Trapezond where their poſterity reigned, till their empire, as well as that of Conſtantinople, fell into the hands of Mohammed the Great, as we ſhall relate in a more proper place. Thus the Greek empire was no longer one, but divided into ſeveral empires, Baldwin reigning at Conſtantinople, the marquis of Montferrat in Theſſaly, Theodorus Laſcaris at Nice, the Comneni at Trapezond, and the Venetians in the iſlands, not to mention ſeveral other toparchies or principalities erected on the ruins of the Conſtantinopolitan empire. But to reſume the thread of our hiſtory, Baldwin, the new emperor of Conſtantinople, having with the aſſiſtance of the other princes, reduced all Thrace, except Adrianople, whither great numbers of Greeks had fled for ſhelter againſt the prevailing power of the Latins, reſolved to lay ſiege to that important place, aud accordingly ſat down before it with all his forces. The Greeks defended themſelves with great reſolution, and at the ſame time, by means of ſome of their nation, who had withdrawn into Bulgaria, prevailed upon John, king of that country, to eſpouſe their cauſe, who marching at the head of a powerful army, conſiſting partly of Bulgarians partly of Scythians, to the relief of the place, drew the emperor, by a pretended flight, into an ambuſcade, cut off moſt of his men, and took Baldwin himſelf priſoner. After this victory, the Bulgarians over-ran all Thrace, plundering the cities, laying waſte the country, and committing every-where unheard-of cruelties. As for the unhappy emperor Baldwin, he was ſent in chains to Ernoc, or Ternova, the capital of Bulgaria, where after his hands and feet had been cut off by the king's orders, he was carried into a deſert, and there left expoſed to the wild beaſts and birds of prey. In that miſerable condition he lived three days, and then expired. The Greek hiſtorians themſelves, who, we may well imagine, were no-

The Comneni at Trapezond.

Baldwin's army defeated by the Bulgarians. Baldwin taken and put to a cruel death.

ways

ways prejudiced in his favour, allow him to have been a prince endowed with every good quality becoming a perſon in his high ſtation [u].

In the mean time, Alexius Angelus, the late uſurper, hearing that Theodorus Laſcaris, his ſon-in-law, reigned in Aſia, left Greece, where he then lay concealed; and paſſing over into Aſia, went privately to the court of Jathatines ſultan of Iconium, his antient friend and ally; and laying before him the miſerable condition to which he was reduced, with tears in his eyes, implored his aſſiſtance for the recovery of his empire, eſpecially of that part of Aſia Minor, which was, with the utmoſt injuſtice, with-held from him by Theodorus Laſcaris. Jathatines, at this time ſultan of Iconium, was the younger ſon of ſultan Aladin, who, at his death, divided his kingdom between his two children Aratines and Jathatines. But, they quarrelling about the ſovereignty, the latter was driven out by the former, and forced to fly for refuge to Conſtantinople, where he was kindly received, and entertained in a manner ſuitable to his rank by Alexius, then emperor. Jathatines therefore eſpouſing, out of gratitude, the cauſe of his unfortunate friend, ſent embaſſadors to Laſcaris, requiring him in a threatening manner, to deliver up the country he unjuſtly poſſeſſed, to the lawful owner Alexius, his father-in-law. Before the return of the embaſſadors, the ſultan, attended by Alexius, advanced at the head of twenty thouſand men to Antioch on the Meander, and laid ſiege to that place; which Laſcaris no ſooner underſtood, than he marched with two thouſand men, the moſt he was able in that exigence to raiſe, to the relief of the beſieged city, being well appriſed, that if he ſuffered it to fall into the enemy's hands, as it ſtood on that river and was the boundary of his empire, it would open a way for them into the heart of his dominions. The ſultan at firſt could ſcarce give credit to thoſe who brought him intelligence of the approach of Laſcaris with ſo ſmall a force. However, he drew up his army in the beſt manner the narrowneſs of the place would allow of; which he had ſcarce done, when eight hundred Italians, of Laſcaris's army, charging the Turks with incredible reſolution, broke through the ſultan's army, diſordered his ranks, and put his men into the utmoſt confuſion. As the Greeks had not courage enough to follow them, they were ſeparated from the reſt of the army, and on their return ſurrounded by the Turkiſh cavalry, and all to a man cut in pieces. The Greeks, Alexius Angelus ſtirs up the Turks againſt Theodorus Laſcaris.

[u] Nicet. in Bald. c. 1—11.

Greeks, diſheartened at ſo great a loſs, were upon the point of turning their backs, when the ſultan, now, as he imagined, ſure of the victory, ſingling out the Greek emperor, and truſting to his own ſtrength, engaged him in perſon, and at the firſt blow ſtruck him off his horſe. But Laſcaris, quickly recovering himſelf, unhorſed the ſultan, and, before he could put himſelf in a poſture of defence, cut off his head; and fixing it upon the point of a ſpear, in ſight of the enemy's army, ſtruck ſuch terror into them, that they immediately betook themſelves to a precipitous and diſorderly flight, leaving the Greeks, who before were ready to fly, maſters of their camp and baggage. Alexius, the author of this war, was taken priſoner, and carried to Nice, where he was confined to a monaſtery, in which he ended his days ſome years after. [w]. This victory was followed by a peace, concluded with the Turks upon the Greek emperor's own terms, who being now at leiſure to ſecure his dominions againſt Henry, brother to the late emperor Baldwin and his ſucceſſor in the Conſtantinopolitan empire, a bloody war was continued for ſeveral years between theſe two princes, with various ſucceſs; but the Greeks being divided among themſelves, and ſeveral princes of the imperial family erecting, in different provinces, independent principalities, Laſcaris was in the end obliged to acknowledge the authority of Henry, and conclude a peace with him. After this, Henry turned his arms firſt againſt the Bulgarians, whom he drove out of Thrace, and afterwards againſt Michael Angelus, a Greek prince of the imperial family, who having ſeized on Ætolia and Epirus, during the confuſion that enſued upon the taking of Conſtantinople by the Latins, cauſed himſelf to be acknowledged deſpot or lord of the country. The emperor waged war with him and his brother Theodorus, a warlike prince, during the greater part of his reign; but was not able to recover the countries which he held. Henry, after having reigned ten years, nine months, and twenty days, with great glory and ſucceſs, died at Theſſalonica in the fortieth year of his age. He was ſucceeded by Peter, count of Auxerre, who had married his ſiſter, and ſignalized himſelf upon ſeveral occaſions. This prince, arriving at Rome on his way from France to Conſtantinople, was ſolemnly crowned there by pope Honorius III. on the ninth of April 1217. From Rome he proceeded to Venice, where he entered into an alliance with that republic againſt Theodorus, who

They are defeated, and the ſultan ſlain.

War between the Latin and Greek emperors.

Henry, the Latin emperor, ſucceeded by Peter.

[w] Idem ibid. c. ult.

who had ſucceeded his brother Michael in the principality of Ætolia and Epirus. Leaving Venice, he entered that prince's dominions, and laid ſiege to Dyrrhachium, which Theodorus had lately taken; but not being able to reduce it, he was forced to abandon the enterprize, and ſoon after to come to an agreement with Theodorus, who promiſed him a free paſſage through his dominions; but nevertheleſs fell upon him unexpectedly, cut moſt of his forces in pieces, and having taken the emperor himſelf priſoner, put him to death ſoon after [x]. Upon his death, the Latins named his eldeſt ſon Philip, count of Namur, to ſucceed him; but he declining that burden, Robert, the deceaſed emperor's ſecond ſon, was, with much ado, prevailed upon to ſubmit to it. In the third year of his reign died Theodorus Laſcaris, after having governed, for the ſpace of eighteen years, that part of the empire, which the Greeks ſtill retained in Aſia, and defended it with no leſs courage than ſucceſs againſt the Turks on one ſide, and the Latins on the other. He left behind him one ſon and three daughters; but the ſon being yet an infant, he bequeathed the empire to John Ducas, ſurnamed Vataces, who had married his eldeſt daughter Irene, and was by the dying emperor not undeſervedly judged more capable than his own brothers, Alexius and Iſaac, of defending, and even enlarging, the empire, which he had founded. John Ducas was crowned in the year 1222, by Manuel, patriarch of the Greeks, at Nice. Alexius and Angelus, the late emperor's brothers, thinking the empire belonged of right to them, withdrew to Conſtantinople, to implore the protection of the Latins againſt one, whom they looked upon as no other than an uſurper. Robert, the Latin emperor, readily eſpouſed their cauſe; and having raiſed a conſiderable army, committed it to their conduct. But John, having aſſembled in the mean time all his forces, met the two brothers at a place called Poemaneum; and having engaged them, gained a complete victory, the flower of the Latin army being cut off, and the two commanders taken priſoners. The Greek emperor, encouraged with this ſucceſs, built with incredible expedition a great number of galleys in the ſeveral ports of Aſia; and falling unexpectedly upon the iſlands in the Archipelago, reduced moſt of them, driving every-where the Latins before him. The fame of his exploits reaching Aſſan or Azen, king of Bulgaria, that prince, courting his friendſhip, propoſed a match between his daughter Helena and Theodore,

Who is treacherouſly put to death by Theodorus, prince of Epirus.

Robert, Latin emperor of Conſtantinople.

His troops defeated by John Ducas, the Greek emperor.

[x] Georg. Acrop. L. i. c. c.

Theodore, the emperor's ſon, which was readily embraced by Ducas, who well knew how advantageous to his affairs an alliance would prove with ſo powerful a prince. At the ſame time, the ſultan of Iconium, apprehending an irruption of the Tartars, who had already driven the Turks out of Perſia, ſent embaſſadors to Nice, to confirm and prolong the truce between the two crowns; which Ducas readily agreed to, and then employing his whole ſtrength againſt the Latins, made himſelf maſter of all the places held by them on the Boſphorus and the Helleſpont. While the Latins were thus diſtreſſed on the other ſide of the ſtreights by John Ducas, Theodorus, prince or deſpot of Epirus, invading Theſſaly and Thrace, made himſelf maſter of thoſe countries; and, aſſuming the title of emperor, cauſed himſelf to be crowned with great ſolemnity by Demetrius, patriarch of Bulgaria. He had lately concluded a peace with John, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Azen, in the kingdom of Bulgaria; but elated with his ſucceſs againſt the Latins, and deſirous of enlarging his dominions with new conqueſts, in defiance of the late treaty, he broke into Bulgaria. But John, whom he looked upon as no-ways a match for ſo renowned a conqueror, having raiſed a mighty army, engaged him: and having after a long and bloody diſpute, put his forces to flight, took the deſpot himſelf priſoner, and cauſed his eyes to be pulled out[y]. Not long after, that is, about the year 1228, died Robert, emperor of the Latins in Conſtantinople, in the ninth year of his reign. He died in Achaia, as he was returning from Rome, which city he had viſited, according to ſome writers, in order to be crowned there in a more ſolemn manner by the pope. He had married the daughter of Baldwin of Neville, though ſhe had ſome time before been bethrothed to a Burgundian lord, who, highly provoked at her forſaking him to marry the emperor, ſeized on her and her mother, during the prince's abſence; and having cauſed the ambitious mother to be thrown into the ſea, ordered the noſe, ears and lips of her beautiful daughter to be cut off. The ſenſe of this barbarous outrage ſunk ſo deep into the emperor's mind, that it was thought to have occaſioned his death. He was ſucceeded by Baldwin II. his brother, or, as ſome writers will have it, his ſon, who being but eight years old, John of Brienne, formerly king of Jeruſalem, and one of the greateſt captains of this time, was appointed regent and guardian of the empire during his minority. Some writers reckon

Who recovers ſeveral places from the Latins.

Robert dies.

Baldwin II.

John, earl of Brienne, regent of the empire.

[y] Idem. c. 3–9.

reckon him among the Latin emperors of Conſtantinople, and tell us, that it was agreed among the Latin princes, that he ſhould be hounoured with the title of emperor during his life, he being then near eighty years of age; and that upon his death the empire ſhould return to Baldwin, who was to marry Martha, or, as ſome ſtyle her, Mary, the daughter of John, by his ſecond wife Bevengaria, the daughter of Alphonſo, king of Caſtile. Be that as it will, it is certain, that John governed with an abſolute and uncontrouled power and was by all reſpected and obeyed as emperor. In the beginning of his adminiſtration, John Azen, king of Bulgaria, and John Ducas, the Greek emperor, entering into an alliance, fell with their united forces upon the territories of the Latins, and laid cloſe ſiege to Conſtantinople itſelf. But the regent, behaving with a courage and reſolution equal to his former reputation, ſallied out with no more than two hundred horſe and an handful of foot, put the enemy's army, though a hundred thouſand men ſtrong, to flight; and having obliged them to raiſe the ſiege, and purſued them with great ſlaughter, returned to the metropolis loaded with booty. However, the following year 1236, the confederate princes, depending upon their numbers, appeared anew before the imperial city; but were attended with no better ſucceſs, being a ſecond time defeated and put to flight. But the enemy receiving daily new ſupplies, and the Latin army being in time greatly weakened and diminiſhed, partly by ſickneſs, and partly by frequent battles and ſkirmiſhes, the regent was at length obliged to ſhut himſelf up in the imperial city, having no more men left alive than were neceſſary to defend the walls. The enemy, well appriſed of the ſtate of his affairs, returned once more, and renewed the ſiege; whereupon John, knowing he could not rely upon the Greeks, who abhorred a foreign yoke, and were entirely devoted to the families at Nice and Trapezond, ſent the young emperor Baldwin to ſolicit ſuccours in perſon from the weſtern princes. During his abſence, the Venetians, arriving with a powerful fleet at Conſtantinople, obliged the confederate forces of Azen and Vataces to raiſe the ſiege. But John of Brienne dying ſoon after, that is, in 1237, the ninth year of his adminiſtration, the loſs of ſo great a man would have proved fatal to the Latins, but for a miſunderſtanding that aroſe between the Greek emperor and king of Bulgaria, and was carried to ſuch an height, that the latter having by a ſtratagem recovered his daughter, whom he had married to the emperor's ſon, joined the Latins againſt him, and with them laid

He defeats the united forces of Azen and Ducas.

Conſtantinople beſieged.

The ſiege raiſed.

John of Brienne dies.

laid ſiege to the city of Chiorli. But, in the mean time, news being brought him of the death of his wife Ann, daughter to the king of Hungary, he dropped that enterprize and returned home, where he ſoon after married the daughter of Theodorus Angelus, the late deſpot of Epirus, whom he had taken priſoner a few years before and deprived of his ſight, as we have related above. This alliance produced a great change in the affairs of Theodorus; for Azen not only ſet him at liberty, but aſſiſted him in the recovery of his dominions, which had been uſurped by his brother Manuel. Being thus reſtored to his former power, he appointed his ſon to govern in his room, cauſing him to be acknowledged as emperor. This gave no ſmall umbrage to John Vataces, who pretended to be the ſole emperor of the Greeks; and therefore, upon the deate of Azen, which happened ſoon after, he paſſed over into Thrace; and entering into an alliance with the Scythians, who had lately ſettled in Macedon, he entered the mock-emperor's territories, ſtripped him of great part of his dominions, and obliged him to renounce the title of emperor, and content himſelf with that of deſpot. In 1239, the emperor Baldwin, returning from the weſt, arrived at Conſtantinople, and was there crowned by the patriarch in the church of St. Sophia. He concluded an alliance with the Comneni reigning at Trapezond, and, with their aſſiſtance, beſieged and took the city of Chiorli, which, however, was ſoon after retaken by Vataces, together with the iſland of Rhodes, ſurpriſed a few years before by the Genoeſe. Vataces, having thus recovered ſuch places as had been by the Latins diſmembered from his empire, and not only made himſelf maſter of the greater part of Aſia, but extended his conqueſt in Europe almoſt to the very gates of Conſtantinople, died, after a glorious reign of thirty-three years, being then in the ſixty-ſecond year of his age [y].

The deſpot of Epirus reſtored.

Vataces reduces ſeveral places in Thrace.

Vataces dies.

Theodorus Laſcaris.

VATACES was ſucceeded by his ſon Theodorus Laſcaris, who having renewed the antient alliance with the ſultan of Iconium, paſſed the Helleſpont at the head of a powerful army, and made war upon the king of Bulgaria and the deſpot of Epirus, who had invaded his dominions in Macedon and Thrace, with ſuch ſucceſs, that they were forced to ſue for peace, which he granted them upon his own terms. While [y] Acrop. in Vat. c. 12—21.

While he lay at Theſſalonica, he received letters from Nice, informing him, that Michael Palæologus, whom he had left governor of Aſia during his abſence, had ſecretly withdrawn to the Turks, under pretence, that his enemies at court, by miſrepreſenting his conduct, had rendered him ſuſpected to the emperor, whoſe diſpleaſure he feared. As Michael was an officer of great courage and experience in war, the ſultan of Iconium received him with uncommon demonſtrations of kindneſs and eſteem, and gave him the command of a body of Greeks in the Turkiſh pay, at the head of which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſoon after in a battle between the Turks and Tartars, and would have gained a complete victory, had not the ſudden revolt of a chief officer, who was nearly related to the ſultan, turned the fortune of the day. The Turkiſh army being almoſt entirely cut off, the victorious Tartars, who had already driven the Turks out of Perſia, and the more eaſtern provinces, ravaged without controul the countries belonging to them in Aſia, and reduced the ſultan to ſuch ſtreights, that he was forced to fly for refuge to the emperor Theodorus, who received him in a very obliging manner, and ſent him back with a body of choſen troops, under the command of Iſaac Ducas, an officer of great reputation, and the emperor's chief favourite. The ſultan, in his turn, delivered up to the emperor the city of Laodicea. In the mean time, Theodorus, unwilling to loſe a ſubject of ſuch extraordinary parts as Palæologus, wrote to him a moſt kind and obliging letter, inviting him home, and promiſing to receive him anew into favour, and reſtore him to his former honours and employments. With this invitation Palæologus readily complied, and was, upon his return, reinſtated in the emperor's favour, after having taken an oath of allegiance to Theodorus and his ſon. The emperor died ſoon after, having ſcarce reigned three years complete, leaving his ſon John, then about nine years old, to ſucceed him. Some time before his death, he took the monaſtic habit, diſtributed great ſums among the poor, and applied himſelf with exemplary piety to acts of devotion. On his death-bed, he appointed Arſenius, the patriarch, and George Muzalo guardians to the young prince. Muzalo was a perſon of a mean deſcent, but had, by his great fidelity and inviolable attachment to the emperor, deſerved to be raiſed to the higheſt employments in the ſtate, which he had ever diſcharged with wonderful integrity, and a character altogether unblemiſhed. However, the nobility, thinking the care and tuition of the young prince belonged of right to them,

Michael Palæologus withdrawsto the Turks.

He is recalled home.

The emperor dies.

John Laſcaris

them, began to complain of his conduct, and malign all his meaſures. Hereupon Muzalo, who ſincerely deſired to retire, and lead a private life, having aſſembled the nobility, offered to reſign the adminiſtration to ſuch as they thought the beſt qualified for the diſcharge of ſo great a truſt. But they all declining it, he obliged them to renew their allegiance to the emperor, and bind themſelves under a ſolemn oath to obey him, and, during his minority, thoſe whom the deceaſed emperor judged proper to entruſt with the care of his ſon and the government of the ſtate. But, notwithſtanding this oath, the leading men among the nobility, conſpiring againſt Muzalo, on the day appointed for the obſequies of the late emperor, repaired to the abby of Soſandra, where he was to be interred; and mixing with the croud, in the midſt of the ſervice, fell upon Muzalo with their drawn ſwords, and diſpatched him at the very altar, whither he had fled for refuge, with his two brothers Andronicus and Theodorus, men of diſtinguiſhed characters. Muzalo being thus removed, the conſpirators, without any regard to the patriarch, who was a man of learning, but an utter ſtranger to ſtate-affairs, declared Michael Palæologus guardian to the young prince, and protector of the empire. He ſignalized the beginning of his adminiſtration with a ſignal victory over Michael Angelus, deſpot of Epirus, who, taking advantage of the diſtractions of the ſtate, after the death of Vataces, had broken into Thrace and Macedon, at the head of a numerous army; but was obliged to retire into his own dominions by John Palæologus, the protector's brother, after having loſt, in a bloody engagement, the flower of his army. When news of this victory was brought to Magneſia, where Palæologus then reſided, he was, by the moſt powerful among the nobility and the populace, ſaluted with the title of emperor, which he did not reject. The patriarch threatened at firſt to cut off from the church both Palæologus and his adherents; but the protector binding himſelf, by a ſolemn oath, to reſign the empire to the young prince, as ſoon as he ſhould be of age, the credulous patriarch was prevailed upon to place the crown upon his head. Palæologus, thus raiſed to the empire, diſpatched his brother Conſtantine with a conſiderable army into Peloponneſus, which was then held partly by the deſpot of Epirus, and partly by the Latins, but ſoon recovered by Conſtantine. After this, Michael paſſed in perſon with a numerous army into Thrace, having nothing leſs in view than the reduction of Conſtantinople itſelf, the dominions of the Latins being now ſo diſmembered, that Muzalo the young prince's governor; murdered.

Michael Palæologus guardian to the young prince.

He is crowned.

that ſcarce any thing was left to the inactive and ſlothful Baldwin beſides the imperial city. However, Palæologus apprehending the difficulty and dangers of ſuch an extraordinary undertaking, reſolved to put it off to a more favourable opportunity, and in the mean time to make himſelf maſter of the caſtle of Pera, in order to diſtreſs the Latins more effectually. But, being in ſeveral ſucceſſive aſſaults repulſed with great loſs, he was obliged to give over the enterprize and retire. However, as he was maſter of the neighbouring country, before his departure, he diſpoſed his troops in ſuch manner, that the city being in ſome degree blocked up, the inhabitants were reduced to the utmoſt extremity. In the mean time, Alexius Angelus, deſpot of Epirus, attempting, in defiance of a late treaty with Palæologus, to recover the places he had loſt in Theſſaly and Greece, Alexius Strategopulus, a perſon deſcended of an illuſtrious family, and for his eminent ſervices diſtinguiſhed with the title of Cæſar, was ſent againſt him, with orders to try whether he could on his march ſurpriſe Conſtantinople. Alexius, having paſſed the ſtreights, encamped at a place called Rhegium, where he was informed by the natives, that a ſtrong body of the Latins had been ſent to the ſiege of Daphnuſa; that the garriſon was in great want of proviſions; and that it would be no difficult matter to ſurpriſe the city. Hereupon the Greek general reſolved at all events to attempt it; and being encouraged by ſome of the inhabitants, who, coming privately to his camp, offered themſelves to be his guides, he approached the walls in the dead of the night, which ſome of his men ſcaled without being obſerved; and killing the centries, whom they found aſleep, opened one of the gates to the reſt of the army, who ruſhing in, put all they met to the ſword; and at the ſame time, to create more terror, ſet fire to the city in four different places. The Latins, concluding from thence the enemy's forces to be far more numerous than they really were, did not ſo much as attempt either to drive them out, or to extinguiſh the flames; but, ſtruck with terror and amazement, ſuffered themſelves to be cut in pieces in the ſtreets or their houſes, which were ſoon filled with blood and ſlaughter. In this general confuſion, the emperor Baldwin, quitting the enſigns of majeſty, fled with Juſtinian, the Latin patriarch, and ſome of his intimate friends, to the ſea-ſide; and there embarquing on a ſmall veſſel, ſailed firſt to Euboea, and from thence to Venice, leaving the Greeks in poſſeſſion of the imperial city, after it had been held fifty-eight, or, as ſome will have it, ſixty, years, by the Latins. This happened

Attempts the reduction of Pera in vain.

Alexius Strategopulus ſurpriſes Conſtantinople, and expels the Latins.

pened in the year 1261, of the chriſtian æra, the ſecond of the reign of Michael Palæologus [y]. When news of the ſurpriſing, and altogether unexpected, ſucceſs of Alexius was firſt brought to Palæologus, reſiding then at Nymphæum, he gave no credit to it; but receiving ſoon after letters from Alexius himſelf, with a particular account of ſo memorable an event, tranſported with joy, he ordered public thanks to be returned in all the churches with great ſolemnity, appeared in public in his imperial robes, attended by the nobility in their beſt apparel, and ordered couriers to be immediately diſpatched with the agreeable tidings into all the provinces of the empire. Soon after, the emperor, having ſettled his affairs at Nice, ſet out for Conſtantinople with the empreſs, his ſon Andronicus, the ſenate, and the nobility, to take poſſeſſion of the imperial city, and fix his reſidence in the place, which, at firſt, had been deſtined for the ſeat of the weſtern empire. Having paſſed the ſtreights, he advanced to the Golden gate, and continued ſome days without the walls, while the citizens were buſied in making the neceſſary preparations to receive him with a magnificence ſuitable to the occaſion. On the day appointed, the Golden gate, which had been long ſhut up, was opened, and the emperor entering it amidſt the repeated acclamations of the multitude, marched on foot to the great palace, being preceded by the biſhop of Cyzicus, carrying the image of the virgin Mary, ſuppoſed to have been done by St. Luke, and followed by all the great officers, the nobility, and the chief citizens, in their moſt pompous apparel. Public thanks were again returned in the church of St. Sophia, at which the emperor aſſiſted in perſon, with the clergy, the ſenate, and the nobility. The exerciſes of piety were ſucceeded by all ſorts of diverſions, which laſted ſeveral days, the nobility, and chief citizens, ſtriving to excel each other in teſtifying their joy by banquets and public ſports, on ſuch an extraordinary occaſion. When the public rejoicings were over, the emperor carefully ſurveyed the imperial city, which allayed in great meaſure the ſenſe of his preſent good fortune; for he obſerved the ſtately palace of Blachernæ, with the other magnificent dwellings of the Roman emperors, lying in ruins; the many capacious buildings, that had been erected by his predeceſſors at an immenſe charge, deſtroyed by fire and other unavoidable accidents of war; ſeveral ſtreets quite abandoned by the inhabitants, and choaked up with the rubbiſh of the ruined

The emperor removes his court from Nice to Conſtantinople.

His entry and public rejoicings.

[y] Pachym. l. i. c. 1—22. & l. ii. c. 27.

ruined houſes, &c. Theſe objects gave the emperor no ſmall concern, and kindled in him a deſire of rebuilding the city, and reſtoring it to its former luſtre. In the mean time, looking upon Alexius as the reſtorer of his country, he cauſed him to be clad in magnificent robes, placed with his own hand a crown upon his head, ordered him to be conducted through the city, as it were in triumph, decreed that for a whole year his name ſhould in the public prayers be joined to his own, and, to perpetuate the memory of ſo great and glorious an action, he commanded his ſtatue to be erected on a ſtately pillar of marble before the church of the apoſtles. His next care was to repeople the city, many Greek families having withdrawn from it, while it was held by the Latins, to ſettle elſewhere, and the Latins now preparing to return to their reſpective countries. The former were recalled home; and the latter, in regard of the great trade they carried on, prevailed upon with many valuable privileges not to remove. The Genoeſe were allowed to live in one of the moſt beautiful quarters of the city, to be governed by their own laws and magiſtrates, and to trade without paying cuſtoms or taxes of any kind. Great privileges were likewiſe granted to the natives of Venice and Piſa, which encouraged them to lay aſide all thoughts of removing, and carry on a trade, which proved highly beneficial and advantageous to the ſtate. The emperor being ſoon after informed, that Baldwin had married his daughter to Charles, king of Sicily, and given him by way of dowry the city of Conſtantinople, which that warlike prince was making great preparations to recover, he ordered the Genoeſe, who were become very numerous, and might have done great miſchief, if the city had been attacked, to remove firſt to Heraclea, and afterwards to Galata, where they continued. As for the Piſans and Venetians, who were not ſo numerous and wealthy, they were allowed to continue in the city [z]. The emperor, having thus ſettled the ſtate, and gained the affections both of the natives and foreigners, began to think of ſecuring to himſelf and his poſterity the ſovereignty, which he only held as it were in truſt, and was to reſign to the young prince as ſoon as he came of age. Having therefore cauſed himſelf to be crowned anew in the imperial city, he ſoon after ordered the young prince to be deprived of his ſight, pretending, that no one but himſelf had any title to the city or empire of Conſtantinople, which he alone had recovered from the Latins.

The Latins encouraged to continue in the city.

Palæologus puts out the eyes of the young emperor, and cauſes himſelf to be acknowledged ſole emperor.

[z] Pachym. l. ii. c. 27—35.

tins. This treaſon and barbarity involved him in endleſs troubles and dangers. For Arſenius, the patriarch, immediately excommunicated him and all thoſe who had been anyways acceſſory to his crime, which occaſioned great diſturbances in the city. At the ſame time, Michael, deſpot of Epirus, and Conſtantine, king of Bulgaria, who had married the young emperor's ſiſters, breaking into Thrace, laid waſte that country, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. Palæologus marched againſt them in perſon; but as he was returning home without performing any thing worthy of notice, he was attacked unexpectedly by the Bulgarians, and had unavoidably fallen into their hands, had he not eſcaped by ſea on board a ſmall veſſel, which conveyed him ſafe to Conſtantinople. The troops he had with him were for the moſt part cut in pieces or taken priſoners; and the Bulgarians, being reinforced with twenty thouſand Tartars, roved about the country without controul, committing every-where unheard-of cruelties. The Venetians, obſerving the diſtracted ſtate of the empire, laid hold of that opportunity to recover the iſlands in the Archipelago, which Palæologus had ſeized after the reduction of Conſtantinople. The Venetians were joined by the king of Sicily and moſt of the weſtern princes, who combining againſt Palæologus, would, in all likelihood, have driven him from the throne, had he not engaged pope Urban IV. to eſpouſe his cauſe, by promiſing to ſubmit himſelf and his dominions to the Latin church, and by that means diverted the ſtorm that threatened him. The pope perſuaded Charles count of Anjou and king of Sicily, to conclude a peace with him; and Palæologus, on his ſide, did all that lay in his power to bring about an union between the two churches, acknowleding by his embaſſadors, or in perſon, as ſome will have it, the ſupremacy of the pope in the famous council of Lyons held in the year 1274. This occaſioned great diſturbances at Conſtantinople and throughout the empire, Joſeph the patriarch, and with him moſt of the clergy, openly inveighing againſt theſe innovations; which provoked Palæologus to ſuch a degree, that he cauſed ſuch as appeared moſt obſtinate to be impriſoned and cruelly racked, and baniſhed the reſt with the patriarch Joſeph, in whoſe room Veccus was choſen. However, not long after, Simon of Bire, a native of France, being, by the intereſt of Charles, king of Sicily, choſen pope, on which occaſion he took the name of Martin IV. he ſolemnly excommunicated Michael for having contributed to the famous maſſacre of the French

He is involved in great troubles.

The union of the Greek and Latin churches.

in

in Sicily, which happened on Eaſter-day, the thirtieth of March 1282, and is commonly known by the name of the Sicilian veſpers. At length the unhappy prince, oppreſſed with cares, was taken ill as he was marching againſt the Turks, who had broken into the eaſtern provinces; and, his diſtemper encreaſing daily, he was obliged to halt at a place called Allogium. There he received the embaſſadors of the Tartars, whom he had invited to his aſſiſtance, and ſoon after died, having lived fifty-eight years, and reigned twenty-four, wanting one month [a]. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Andronicus Palæologus, who, thinking he could not begin his reign by a more popular act than by reſtoring the ceremonies of the Greek church, and refuſing to acknowledge the ſupremacy of the pope, annulled whatever his father had done with reſpect to the union of the two churches. But ſuch as had received the Latin ceremonies defending them with great obſtinacy, and thoſe of the contrary faction, now countenanced by the emperor, returning the evil treatment they had met with in the late reign, the ſchiſm was revived, and ſuch animoſities raiſed in the ſtate, as threw the whole empire into a ferment. However, his endeavouring to reſtore the antient ceremonies diſobliged ſuch only as were adicted to the Latin church; but his conduct towards his brother Conſtantine eſtranged from him the minds of both parties. Conſtantine was the darling of the people; and being ſent by the late emperor his father into Aſia, to defend the frontiers of the empire, he had there in ſeveral battles overthrown the Turks. His great popularity, and the reputation he had gained by his victories, rendering him ſuſpected to the emperor, he was by his orders ſeized and thrown into priſon, with ſeveral other perſons of great diſtinction, amongſt whom was Michael Strategopulus, ſon to the celebrated Alexius, who had recovered Conſtantinople from the Latins. Upon the removal of theſe two brave officers, the Turks, under the conduct of the famous Othoman, made themſelves maſters of ſeveral places in Phrygia, Caria, and Bithynia, and among the reſt of the city of Nice. To put a ſtop to their conqueſts, the emperor diſpatched into Aſia Philanthropenus and Libadarius, two officers of great reputation and experience in war, appointing the latter governor of the cities of Ionia, and committing to the former the defence of the frontiers on the Meander. Philanthropenus gained ſeveral advantages over the Turks; but, elated with

The emperor dies.

Andronicus Palæologus.

Jealous of his brother Conſtantine.

[a] Idem l. vi. c. 30. & ultim.

Alexius Philanthropenus revolts;

his ſucceſs, he aſſumed the purple, and cauſing himſelf to be proclaimed emperor, marched againſt Libadarius, who had declared him a public enemy, and ſet a price upon his head. As the two armies were ready to engage, the Cretans, who ſerved under Philantropenus, and had been before-hand gained over by Libadarius, ſeizing their leader, delivered him up to his adverſary, who cauſed his eyes to be put out. In the mean time, the Turks, taking advantage of theſe inteſtine diſturbances, not only extended their dominions in Aſia, but conquered moſt of the iſlands in the Mediterranean; and, being maſters at ſea, infeſted the coaſts of the empire, to the utter ruin of trade and commerce. In this diſtracted ſtate of affairs, the emperor, diſtruſting his own ſubjects, took into his pay ten thouſand Maſſagetes or Alans, who, being driven out of their own country by the Tartars, had paſſed the Danube. Theſe being ſent over into Aſia, under the conduct of Michael, the emperor's eldeſt ſon, whom he had lately declared his collegue in the empire, the Turks, at their approach, retired to the mountains; whence ſoon after they came ſuddenly down, and falling upon the Maſſagetes, while they lay in their camp, without the leaſt apprehenſion of danger, put them to flight, in ſpite of all the efforts of the young emperor, who, on that occaſion diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a moſt eminent manner, but was in the end obliged to fly with the reſt, and take refuge in the ſtrong caſtle of Magneſia. The Maſſagetes, abandoning him, marched directly to the Helleſpont, ravaging the countries through which they paſſed, and thence croſſed over into Europe. The Turks, purſuing them, made themſelves maſters of all the ſtrong-holds to the ſea-ſide. As for Michael, having narrowly eſcaped falling into their hands, he got in the end ſafe to Conſtantinople. The emperor, notwithſtanding the ſhameful conduct of the Maſſagetes, repoſing ſtill greater truſt in ſtrangers than in his own ſubjects, of whom he was grown jealous ſince the rebellion of Philanthropenus, took into his ſervice a body of Catalans, under the command of one Ronzerius or Rouzerius, who had formerly ſerved in the wars between the kings of Sicily and Naples; and, having conferred extraordinary honours upon him, ſent him with his troops to the relief of Philadelphia, then cloſely beſieged by the Turks, whom, upon his arrival he obliged to abandon the enterprize and retire. Upon their retreat, he turned his arms againſt thoſe whom he was ſent to protect; and roving about the country, committed every-where unheard-

But is betrayed by his own men.

The emperor's forces defeated by the Turks.

The Catalans revolt.

heard-of cruelties, ſubjecting all to the rage and luſt of thoſe diſſolute vagabonds. Having plundered the few places that were left to the emperor in Aſia, he returned with his Catalans to Europe; and leaving the reſt at Callipolis, went with two hundred choſen men to demand of the young emperor Michael, lying then at Oreſtias in Thrace, the arrears which he pretended to be due to himſelf and his men. Michael, juſtly provoked at his late conduct in Aſia, and now incenſed againſt him on account of his inſolent carriage, ordered his guards to fall upon him, who accordingly cut him and moſt of his men in pieces. Thoſe, who eſcaped, flying to Callipolis, acquainted their countrymen with the death of their general, who thereupon, tranſported with rage, firſt put all the citizens to the ſword, and then, fortifying themſelves in the beſt manner they could, prepared for a vigorous defence. However, as they diſtruſted their own ſtrength, they ſent for aſſiſtance to the Turks dwelling over-againſt them in Aſia, who immediately conveyed over the ſtreights five hundred choſen men to reinforce them. Theſe were ſoon followed by others, who, joining the Catalans, laid waſte the neighbouring country; and having, with great expedition, equipped and manned eight galleys, plundered all the merchant-ſhips in the ſtreights, and would have greatly diſtreſſed the imperial city itſelf, had not their ſmall fleet been encountered and deſtroyed by the Genoeſe. On this occaſion the Turks came firſt into Europe; an event which we may deſervedly reckon one of the moſt fatal that ever happened to the empire. The young emperor Michael marched againſt the Catalans and Turks, with a conſiderable army, conſiſting of Greeks, Maſſagetes, and other auxiliaries; but the auxiliaries withdrawing, as ſoon as the ſignal for battle was given, and ſtanding at a ſmall diſtance as idle ſpectators, at whoſe inſtigation was never known, the Greeks were ſo diſcouraged, that the emperor could neither by threats or promiſes ſtop their flight. He performed in perſon all that could be expected from an experienced officer and valiant ſoldier; but not being able to encourage his men, either with his words or example, and his horſe being killed under him, he was forced to retire, and make his eſcape to Didymothicum, where his father lay encamped. After this victory, the Catalans and Turks over-ran all Thrace, deſtroying every thing with fire and ſword, till finding it impoſſible for them to ſubſiſt longer there, the Catalans reſolved to invade Theſſaly; but the Turks, deſirous of returning home with their booty,

Their leader is killed by the emperor's orders.

They ſeize on Callipolis.

The Turks firſt in Europe.

Thrace ravaged by the Catalans and Turks.

booty, ſeparated from them, being then thirteen thouſand horſe, and eight hundred foot; and bending their march through Macedon, acquainted the emperor, that they were ready peaceably to depart, provided he would allow them a ſafe paſſage through his dominions, and ſupply them with ſhips to tranſport them into Aſia. To this the emperor, willing to get rid of ſuch troubleſome gueſts, readily condeſcended, and accordingly ordered the neceſſary veſſels to be got ready with the utmoſt expedition. But the Greek officers, obſerving the immenſe booty with which they were loaded, began to contrive how they ſhould make themſelves maſters of it, and in the end reſolved to fall upon the Turks in the night; and by cutting them all off, revenge the injuries they had done to the ſubjects of the empire, and enrich themſelves with the booty. The matter was not managed with ſuch ſecrecy, but the Turks had timely intimation of it. Hereupon, having ſurprized a ſtrong caſtle in that neighbourhood, they prepared for a vigorous defence, and at the ſame time found means to acquaint their countrymen on the other ſide of the ſtreights with the danger that threatened them, who, enticed with the hopes of booty, haſtened to their aſſiſtance; and croſſing the Helleſpont, ravaged the adjacent country, making excurſions to the very gates of Conſtantinople. The emperor, awaked at length by the daily complaints of his people, reſolved to root them out; and accordingly marched againſt them with all his forces, the country-people flocking to him from all parts with their ſpades, mattocks, and other inſtruments of husbandry, in order to aſſiſt him in the reduction of the caſtle. The Turks were greatly alarmed at their approach, and began to look upon themſelves as inevitably loſt; but afterwards obſerving, that the Greeks, who had cloſely beſieged the place, confiding in their ſtrength and numbers, utterly neglected all diſcipline, they took courage, and ſallying out with no more than eight hundred choſen horſe, penetrated almoſt without oppoſition to the emperor's tent; which ſtruck the undiſciplined peaſants with ſuch terror, that they betook themſelves to a precipitate flight. Their example was followed by the reſt of the army, tho' the emperor, and ſome of the officers, made ſeveral bold ſtands, hoping thereby to ſtop the flight of the diſcouraged multitude; but the cowardly Greeks could not by any means be prevailed upon to ſtand before the enemy, who, after having made a dreadful ſlaughter of the fugitives, and taken ſome of the chief officers officers priſoners, made themſelves maſters of the emperor's camp, in which they found a large ſum, deſigned for the payment of the troops, ſeveral ſtandards, the imperial crown, enriched with precious ſtones of an ineſtimable value, and all the baggage of the army. After this unexpected victory, the Turks roved up and down Thrace for two years together, without controul; which brought unſpeakable calamities upon the inhabitants, confined within their walled towns, without daring to ſtir out to till their ground. At length Philes Palæologus, a perſon nearly related to the emperor, touched with the calamities of his country, deſired leave to march againſt the enemy, with ſuch officers and ſoldiers as the emperor ſhould think fit to appoint for that ſervice, not doubting, he ſaid, but, with the aſſiſtance of Heaven, he ſhould revenge the injuries done to his country, and return in triumph. As Philes was an utter ſtranger to the art of war, but remarkable for his piety and the integrity of his life, the emperor, looking upon him as one choſen by providence for the relief of his oppreſſed country, readily complied with his requeſt. Philes's firſt care was to eſtabliſh good diſcipline among his ſoldiers, exhorting them to live with temperance and ſobriety, encouraging them with frequent donatives, and promiſing to reward each of them at the end of the war according to his deſerts. Having thus modelled his ſmall army according to his deſire, he took the field, attended by the prayers and good wiſhes of the emperor and the whole people. Being informed, ſoon after his departure from Conſtantinople, that Chaleb, the Turkiſh commander, was ravaging the country about Bizia, with one thouſand foot and two hundred horſe, he marched immediately againſt him; and encamping the third day in a large plain near a little river called Xerogipſum, he received at midnight certain intelligence, that the enemy with their booty were at hand. Hereupon having drawn up his men in battle-array, and with a pathetic ſpeech, encouraged them to exert themſelves in the defence of their country, he waited the enemy's arrival, who began to appear at ſun-riſing. The Turks, not in the leaſt terrified with the ſurprize, having formed a ſtrong barricade with their waggons, and ſecured their priſoners, advanced in good order againſt the imperial troops, who received them with great reſolution and intrepidity. Philes, having firſt invoked the divine aſſiſtance, charged at the head of the right-wing the enemy's cavalry, who began to give way; but his horſe being killed under him, him, he was obliged to withdraw; which ſomewhat damped the courage of his men. However, he quickly appeared again at the head of the army; and falling with freſh vigour upon the enemy with the moſt reſolute of his men, put their horſe to flight; and then diſmounting, charged their foot at the head of his infantry with ſuch reſolution, that the Turks, no longer able to withſtand them, betook themſelves to a precipitous flight. Philes purſued them with great ſlaughter to the entrance into the Cherſoneſus, and there encamped, with a deſign to cut off their communication with the neighbouring country. The emperor, tranſported with joy at the news of this victory, diſpatched immediately five galleys, which were reinforced with eight more ſent by the Genoeſe of Peræ, to guard the ſtreights, and prevent their receiving any aſſiſtance out of Aſia. At the ſame time, Philes's army was ſtrengthened with two hundred choſen horſe, ſent him by Crales king of Servia, who had married the emperor's daughter. The Turks being thus ſhut up both by ſea and land, Philes, advancing with his forces to the caſtle they had ſeized, began to batter it with an incredible number of engines; which did great execution. The Turks, now deſpairing of relief, and weakened by daily ſkirmiſhes, reſolved to uſe an utmoſt effort, and attempt to break through the Greeks ſword in hand; but finding them, when they firſt ſallied out, upon their guard and ready to receive them, they returned to their caſtle; but not ſo diſcouraged as not to attempt a few days after to open themſelves a way through the Servians; which attempt proving equally unſucceſsful, they began utterly to deſpair. Having therefore caſt away their arms, and taken with them their gold and ſilver, of which they had great plenty, in the dead of the night they made towards the ſea-ſide with a deſign to ſurrender themſelves to the Genoeſe, who, they hoped, would ſhew them more mercy than the Greeks, as they had never injured nor provoked them; but the night proving dark, many of them, miſtaking the Greek for the Genoeſe galleys, fell into the hands of their moſt implacable enemies, by whom they were cut in pieces without compaſſion. The reſt fared not much better; for the Genoeſe killed ſuch as brought the moſt money with them, leſt in time they ſhould diſcover it to the Greeks, who would have claimed it. The poorer ſort they loaded with chains, ſending ſome of them to the emperor, and keeping the reſt for

The emperor's face is defaced by the Turks.

Who are overthrown by Philes Palæologus.

And are ſhut up in the Cherſone us.

They are all cut in pieces or taken.

for their own ſlaves [b]. Thus was Europe delivered for the preſent from the Turks; but the time is drawing near, when we ſhall ſee them, through the indolence of the emperors and cowardice of the Greeks, firmly eſtabliſhed on this ſide of the ſtreights, to the utter ruin of the empire.

THE unhappy emperor was ſoon after involved in far greater troubles: Michael, his eldeſt ſon and collegue in the empire, had two ſons, Andronicus and Manuel, of whom the former was greatly beloved by his grandfather Andronicus, though a youth of a moſt untractable temper, debauched, diſſolute, and abandoned to all manner of wickedneſs. Being greatly addicted to women, and ſuſpecting he had ſome rival in the affections of his favourite miſtreſs, he charged certain ruffians to watch her one night, and diſpatch the perſon that ſhould come to viſit her. It unluckily happened, that Manuel came that very night, with little or no attendance, to the houſe, in queſt of his brother. The aſſaſſins, not knowing him in the dark, miſtook him for the prince's rival, and falling upon him, gave him ſeveral mortal wounds, of which he died a few days after. When news of his death was brought to the emperor Michael his father, the good prince was ſo affected with it, that he died ſoon after of grief. The grandfather Andronicus, notwithſtanding his deep concern for the death of Manuel, ſtill continued to cheriſh and favour Andronicus, who, anſwering his kindneſs with the utmoſt ingratitude, contracted an intimate friendſhip with Syrgiannes, John Cantacuzenus, Theodorus Synadenus, and Alexius Apocaucus, all perſons diſaffected to the emperor, and ready to lay hold of the firſt opportunity that offered to raiſe diſturbances in the empire. As they were men of uncommon parts and great experience in affairs of ſtate, they ſoon gained an aſcendant over the young prince, and finding him a ſubject proper for their deſigns, they inſpired him with a thirſt after power, and an utter averſion to the aged emperor his grandfather. The court being thus rent into two oppoſite factions, that of the young prince grew daily more powerful. The emperor did all that lay in his power to reclaim him; but his endeavours proving, to his great grief, unſucceſsful, he reſolved in the end publicly to reprove him before the patriarch and the chief of the nobility.

Andronicus, the younger, a diſſolute prince.

The emperor endeavours in vain to reclaim him.

[b] Gregor. l. iii. c. 13——17. Cantacuzen. l. iii. Pachym. l. ix. c. 10, 11.

bility. The prince, receiving timely intimation of his grandfather's deſign, went, when ſent for, to the palace, attended by a great number of his followers and partizans, with arms under their garments, ready, if any violence was offered to the young prince, to ruſh upon the aged emperor with their drawn ſwords, and, diſpatching him, proclaim Andronicus emperor in his room. But the emperor, who was paſſionately fond of him, reproved the youth in ſo tender and affectionate a manner, that, burſting into tears, he fell at the grandfather's feet, and promiſed an entire ſubmiſſion for the future. The grandfather, on his ſide, embracing him with paternal affection, promiſed to appoint him his heir, and name him for his ſucceſſor in the empire. Thus they parted, thoroughly reconciled; but this reconciliation was ſhort-lived, for the prince, returning to his favourite counſellors and companions, ſoon fell from the reſolution he had taken, and began to entertain the ſame ambitious thoughts he had done before. Hereupon the emperor, perceiving he was become irreclaimable, reſolved to ſecure him, and by that means prevent the diſturbances, in which he foreſaw the ſtate would be otherwiſe unavoidably involved. This reſolution was communicated by the emperor to Geraſimus the patriarch, and by him ſcandalouſly betrayed to the prince, who thereupon fled with his accomplices and partizans the very night he was to have been apprehended, and eſcaped to Adrianople. The emperor, upon the firſt notice of his flight, cauſed him to be declared a public enemy, proſcribed all his adherents, and obliged the inhabitans of Conſtantinople, whoſe fidelity he ſuſpected, to renew their oath of allegiance. On the other hand, the prince, arriving at Adrianople, was there acknowledged for emperor by Syrgiannes, Cantacuzenus, and the other officers, who commanded the troops quartered in Thrace; ſo that, finding himſelf in a few days at the head of a conſiderable army, he detached a ſtrong body of horſe and foot to attempt, under the conduct of Syrgiannes, Conſtantinople itſelf, before the citizens could put themſelves in a poſture of defence. The emperor, alarmed at their approach, diſpatched Theoleptus, biſhop of Philadelphia, with other perſons of diſtinction, to the young prince, then encamped at Oreſtias, with propoſals for an accommodation; which, after a warm and long debate, was concluded on the following terms; that the empire ſhould be divided, and the prince have Thrace, from Chriſtopolis to Rhegium, and the ſuburbs of Conſtantinople, for his ſhare; that his followers ſhould enjoy, without

The young prince makes his eſcape.

And openly revolts.

The emperor obliged to divide the empire with him.

without moleſtation, the lands and honours he had conferred upon them; and that, on the other hand, the emperor ſhould retain Conſtantinople, with all the cities and iſlands in the eaſt, and in the weſt the whole country lying between Chriſtopolis and Dyrrhachium [c]. In the mean time, the Turks, taking advantage of theſe inteſtine broils, enlarged their dominions in Aſia, and reduced moſt places on the Meander, and among the reſt the ſtrong and important city of Pruſa in Bithynia. Othoman had ſome years before attempted to take it by ſtorm; but being repulſed with great loſs, he had built two ſtrong caſtles at a ſmall diſtance from the city, and left in them numerous garriſons, under the command of two of his beſt generals, Actemur and Balabanzuch, who, by cutting off all communication between the place and the neighbouring country, reduced the inhabitants and the garriſon to ſuch ſtreights, that great numbers of them dying for want of neceſſaries, the reſt, deſpairing of relief, were in the end obliged to capitulate, and ſubmit to Orchanes, the ſon of Othoman, who was then indiſpoſed, on the following terms; that the inhabitants and garriſon ſhould be allowed to retire unmoleſted whither they pleaſed, and to take with them all the effects they could carry on their backs. Theſe two articles were faithfully obſerved by Orchanes, who, entering Pruſa, took poſſeſſion of that important place in the year 1327, and, upon the death of his father Othoman, choſe it for the ſeat of the Turkiſh empire. To return to Andronicus: the agreement between him and his grandſon was but ſhort-lived; for Syrgiannes, who had firſt adviſed the young prince to revolt, not thinking his ſervices ſufficiently rewarded, wrote letters full of ſubmiſſion to the emperor, and, upon promiſe of impunity, withdrew privately from the army in Thrace, and repaired to Conſtantinople, where he incenſed the emperor againſt his grandſon to ſuch a degree, that the war was renewed on both ſides. Conſtantine, the emperor's ſon, was ſent with a conſiderable army to Theſſalonica, to take upon him there the government of Macedon, and to invade from thence the territories lately yielded to the prince, while Syrgiannes, at the head of a body of Turks, who had entered into the emperor's ſervice, reduced that part of Thrace, which lay next to Conſtantinople. Againſt Syrgiannes the prince diſpatched Synadenus, an officer of great reputation in war; but marched in perſon againſt his uncle Conſtantine, being highly provoked againſt him for having ſeized on his mother Xene, and ſent her priſoner

Pruſa taken by the Turks.

The emperor and his grandſon fall out anew.

And come to an open rupture.

[c] Greg. & Cantacuz. l. i. c. 1—23.

ſoner to Conſtantinople. Conſtantine gained ſeveral advantages over him; which reduced him to great ſtreights: but the prince having cauſed a report to be ſpread abroad, that his grandfather was dead, Conſtantine was ſo alarmed at that unexpected news, to which he gave entire credit, that he retired in the utmoſt conſternation to Theſſalonica. He had not been long in that city, when he was informed, that the emperor was alive; and ſoon after received letters from him, with orders to apprehend twenty-five of the chief citizens, ſuſpected of maintaining a private correſpondence with the prince, and ſend them in chains to Conſtantinople. The letters were delivered to Conſtantine with the utmoſt ſecrecy; but the citizens nevertheleſs, receiving timely intimation of the danger that threatened them, ſtirred up the populace; who, ſeizing on Conſtantine, delivered him up to his nephew, by whom he was kept cloſely confined as long as he lived. At the ſame time, the Turks under Syrgiannes, quitting the emperor's ſervice, retired home; which obliged that general to return in great haſte to Conſtantinople. Upon his retreat, Synadenus reduced ſeveral places in Thrace, and threatened with a ſiege the imperial city itſelf; which ſo alarmed the emperor, that he releaſed Xene, and ſent her to her ſon, then encamped at Rhegium, with propoſals for an accommodation; which were readily embraced by the prince, the emperor promiſing to take him for his collegue in the empire, and to cauſe him to be ſolemnly crowned, with his wife Ann of Savoy, whom he had lately married upon the death of Irene his firſt wife. The ceremony was accordingly performed in the church of St. Sophia with the utmoſt magnificence; but the prince, prompted by his ambition, and impatient of a collegue, reſolved ſoon after to remove his aged grandfather, that he might reign without controul. With this view he entered into an alliance with Michael prince of Bulgaria, his brother-in-law, who was to make a diverſion in Servia, if the prince of that country ſhould move, as it was ſuſpected he would do, to the aſſiſtance of the emperor. After this, the prince, withdrawing privately from Conſtantinople, ſeized on the public revenue in Thrace; of which the emperor receiving intelligence, refuſed to admit him on his return into the imperial city, ordering at the ſame time his lieutenants in Macedon and the neighbouring provinces to act againſt him, as a public enemy. The prince, in the mean time, by pretending a great readineſs to comply in any thing reaſonable with the emperor, gained the affections of the people to ſuch a degree, that they could ſcarce be reſtrained

The peace renewed.

They diſagree again.

reſtrained in Conſtantinople itſelf, from openly declaring in his favour. Hereupon the emperor, to eſtrange from him the minds of the multitude, having ſummoned the patriarch and the chief of the clergy, ordered them to declare him unworthy of the empire, and exclude him from the communion of the faithful. To this moſt of them conſented, and agreed that his name ſhould be omitted in the public prayers of the church; but the patriarch and ſome others, who privately favoured him, ſummoning the people together, pronounced ſentence of excommunication againſt ſuch as ſhould preſume to omit the name of the young prince in their public prayers; which provoked the emperor to ſuch a degree, that he cauſed the patriarch to be depoſed, and confined him to the monaſtery of Mangana. The prince, who was then at Rhegium, being informed of what had paſſed in the metropolis, approached it with thirteen hundred choſen men, and leaving his army at ſome diſtance, rode up, with Cantacuzenus and a guard of thirty ſoldiers, to one of the gates, deſiring to be admitted, and allowed to confer with his grandfather. The emperor, acquainted with his demand by Phocas Maroles, who commanded the guards on the walls, ſent him by the ſame officer orders to retire forthwith, without attempting to debauch his ſubjects, on pain of being treated as a public enemy; nay, ſome reviled him from the walls with moſt bitter language: upon which the young prince, after having ſolemnly declared, that he deſired nothing ſo much as to be reconciled to his grandfather, whom he charged with all the calamities that were to follow, retired to Selymbria, and from thence into Macedon, where he took, almoſt without oppoſition, ſeveral caſtles and ſtrong-holds; and then marched to Theſſalonica, being invited thither by his friends, who, at his approach, opened the gates to him, and joined him in reducing the citadel, which made a vigorous reſiſtance, but was in the end obliged to ſubmit, the prince having ſurpriſed and cut off a body of three hundred choſen men, ſent by the emperor to reinforce the garriſon. The emperor, alarmed at the progreſs of his grandſon's arms, applied to the king of Bulgaria for aſſiſtance, who immediately diſpatched a conſiderable body of forces to his relief; but the prince, having in the mean time defeated the emperor's army on the banks of the Melanes, advanced with long marches to Conſtantinople. However, three thouſand Bulgarian horſe reached the imperial city before him, to the great joy of the emperor, who nevertheleſs, diſtruſting foreign troops, from whom the empire had already ſuffered unſpeakable calamities, admitted only their com-

The prince ſeizes on ſeveral places in Macedon.

mander in chief and a ſmall number of officers into the city, aſſigning to the reſt quarters in the ſuburbs. As this gave the prince, who arrived ſoon after, an opportunity of conferring with them, he, by rich preſents to their generals, prevailed upon them to return to their own country. The Bulgarians being thus removed, the prince prepared for the ſiege of Conſtantinople; but in the mean time, two of the ſoldiers, who were appointed to guard the walls, coming to the prince in the dead of the night, offered to betray the city into his hands; and accordingly, being encouraged by him with the promiſe of a reward anſwerable to that important ſervice, they returned into the city undiſcovered; and the following night, while the reſt of the guard were intoxicated with wine, with which they had ſupplied them in great plenty, they drew up by ladders of ropes about eighteen men, who, breaking open that which was called the Roman gate, opened an entrance for the young prince and his whole army. When day appeared, the inhabitants were ſo far from making any oppoſition, that, on the contrary, with loud acclamations they ſaluted young Andronicus emperor. Gregoras, tho' greatly biaſſed in favour of the old emperor, and not a little prejudiced againſt young Andronicus, tells us, that the prince, aſcribing the ſucceſs that had attended his arms ever ſince the beginning of the war to Heaven, upon his entering the city, iſſued orders, forbidding on pain of death any of his officers or ſoldiers to offer the leaſt affront or injury to the emperor his grand-father. The ſame writer adds, that he went immediately to wait on the emperor in perſon, and was ſo affected with the ſpeech, which the unfortunate prince made him, that falling at his feet, he tenderly embraced, and, with words full of duty and reſpect, endeavoured to comfort the emperor in his greateſt diſtreſs. After this, he returned ſolemn thanks to Heaven, for having thus put an end to the war almoſt without bloodſhed; and then, repairing to the monaſtery of Mangana, he reconducted the patriarch in a kind of triumph to the church, and reſtored him to his former dignity [d]. Young Andronicus, now maſter of the imperial city, and univerſally acknowledged and obeyed as emperor, ſuffered his grandfather to continue in the palace, and wear the enſigns of majeſty; but would not allow him the leaſt ſhare in the adminiſtration, which he took entirely into his own hands, governing with an

The city of Conſtantinople betrayed to him.

His conduct towards the old emperor.

Who is deprived of all power.

[d] Gregor. l. iv. Cantacuzen l. i. c. 50——5. Onuph. & Genebr. in chron.

an abſolute ſway, without ſo much as conſulting the aged emperor in what related to public affairs. He allowed him yearly twenty-four thouſand pieces of gold for his maintenance, and the imperial palace for his habitation, while he himſelf reſided in that of the deſpot Demetrius. He granted a general pardon to all thoſe who had adhered to his grandfather, and even preferred ſome of his chief favourites to the firſt employments in the ſtate [e].

Andronicus III.

His wars with the Bulgarians.

In the very beginning of his reign, the king of Bulgaria, entering Thrace at the head of a numerous army, conſiſting partly of Bulgarians, and partly of Scythians, plundered ſeveral cities, and laid waſte the whole country. Andronicus, having with incredible expedition drawn together a conſiderable army, appeared unexpectedly at Byzium, in the neighbourhood of which city the king of Bulgaria lay encamped. His ſudden arrival ſtruck the enemy with ſuch terror, that the following night they decamped, and fled back into their own country, leaving behind them great part of the booty. Andronicus purſued them, and carrying the war into Bulgaria, ravaged the country far and near, deſtroying all with fire and ſword, till the king, not daring to venture an engagement, tho' at the head of a very powerful and numerous army, ſent embaſſadors to ſue for a peace; which, after ſeveral conferences, was concluded upon terms highly honourable to Andronicus. After this, the two princes had an interview on horſeback, when they confirmed the treaty, and renewed their antient friendſhip, which they agreed to cultivate by meeting yearly in ſuch places as ſhould be moſt convenient for both [f]. The emperor, having nothing to fear from that quarter, turned his arms againſt the Turks, who, taking the advantage of domeſtic quarrels among the Greek princes, had greatly enlarged their dominions in Aſia. Othoman, whom we may juſtly ſtyle the founder of the Turkiſh empire, being lately dead, the emperor laid hold of that opportunity to recover ſeveral places, which that warlike prince had reduced, and among the reſt the famous city of Nice, with a ſtrong caſtle on the Sangarius, which commanded the paſſes leading into Bithynia. This caſtle, however, was ſoon after retaken by Urchan or Orchanes, ſon and ſucceſſor of Othoman, who, having happily ſettled his affairs at home, raiſed a formidable army, and entering Bithynia as ſoon as the emperor had left that country, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places there, and at laſt ſat down before Nice. The emperor, who was then at Conſtantinople, leaving the imperial city, haſtened back into Aſia; and advancing as far as Philocrene, encamped there at a ſmall diſtance from the Turks; who, after having harraſſed his men with frequent ſkirmiſhes, and ſudden onſets, fell upon him at length with their whole army. Hereupon a battle enſued, in which both ſides behaved with great bravery and reſolution; but in the end, the emperor being wounded in the foot with an arrow and obliged to withdraw, his troops, no longer animated with his example, retired in the utmoſt confuſion to their camp. As the emperor had removed to Philocrene, to have his wound dreſſed there, a report was ſpread in the camp, that he was killed; which ſo diſheartened his men, that they betook themſelves to a precipitous flight, leaving their camp, arms, and baggage, to the enemy, who, after having purſued them for ſome time with great ſlaughter, ſeized on the rich booty which they had left, and amongſt other things, on all the emperor's plate and furniture. Andronicus, quite deſpirited at this misfortune, returned to Conſtantinople, while the Turks, having now no enemy to controul them, made themſelves maſters of all the maritime towns in Bithynia, and in the end of Nice itſelf, by the following ſtratagem: Andronicus, in leaving Aſia, had promiſed to reinforce the garriſon of Nice with a thouſand horſe; Orchanes, being informed of this, armed the like number of his own men after the Roman manner, and marching with them in perſon through by-ways into the road leading from Conſtantinople, diſpatched three hundred more, armed like Turks, to ravage the country within view of the city. As he approached the place, he pretended all on a ſudden to have diſcovered the enemy; and leading his men againſt the foragers, put them to flight, and recovered the booty. As this was done in the ſight of the citizens, who from the walls beheld the whole, the pretended Romans, were received with great joy by the inhabitants; but the gates were no ſooner opened, than they fell ſword in hand upon the guard, and being joined by the three hundred, who were returned from their pretended flight, they cut the garriſon in pieces, and made themſelves maſters of the city. After this, Orchanes, leading his men to the ſea-ſide, laid ſiege to Abydus; which was betrayed to him by the governor's daughter, while his two ſons, Solyman and Amurath, reduced ſeveral other important places in Aſia, and among the reſt the antient city of Nicomedia. As the emperor was at this time

He recovers Nice and other places from the Turks.

[e] Cantacuzen. l. ii. c. 1. [f] Idem, l. ii. c. 2, 3.

By whom he is in the end defeated.

The Turks recover Nice

And take Abydus and Nicomedia.

time ſeized with a dangerous malady, in which his life was deſpaired of, the court was in too great a confuſion to think of the proper meaſures for putting a ſtop to the conqueſts of the Turks in Aſia. Such as had been inſtrumental in the late revolution could not reflect, without dread and horror, on the condition to which they muſt inevitably be reduced, if the young emperor ſhould die, and his grandfather be reſtored to his power and authority. This conſideration prompted Cantacuzenus and ſome others, if Gregoras is to be credited, to reſolve on the old emperor's death; but this reſolution being generally diſapproved, they all agreed at laſt to confine him to a monaſtery, and force him to take the monaſtic habit, and exchange the name of Andronicus for that of Antony; which was done accordingly. Thus Gregoras [g]. But Cantacuzenus tells us, that the old emperor, apprehending a more ſevere uſage from his enemies, if his grandſon ſhould die, retired to a monaſtery of his own accord, and, taking the monaſtic habit, continued there unmoleſted to his death, which happened two years after, that is, in 1332, he being then in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age [h]. Young Andronicus intended, during his malady, to reſtore the crown to his grandfather; but, upon his recovery, he ſuffered him to continue in the monaſtery, retaining the whole power to himſelf. In the mean time, the Turks purſued their conqueſts in Aſia, and threatened Europe itſelf with an invaſion. As the emperor was no-ways in a condition to oppoſe ſo powerful and formidable an enemy, he was perſuaded by Cantacuzenus to conclude a diſhonourable peace with them, in virtue of which they were to hold all the places and countries they had conquered in Aſia, and ſuffer the Romans peaceably to enjoy what they had not yet wreſted from them. Not long after the inhabitants of Theſſaly revolting, the emperor marched againſt them in perſon; but while he was employed in reducing them, the Turks, who obſerved the peace no longer than it ſuited their intereſt, paſſed over into Europe; and having ravaged the ſea-coaſt, repaſſed the ſtreights with an immenſe booty, and a great number of captives. Andronicus died ſoon after, in the forty-fifth year of his age, the thirteenth of his reign, reckoning from the time he depoſed his grandfather, and 1341 ſt of the chriſtian æra. Cantacuzenus, in the hiſtory he has left us, endeavours to juſtify his conduct towards his grandfather. Tho' the old emperor deſigned, as that writer pretends, to have excluded him

Andronicus the elder confined to a monaſtery, where he dies.

Andronicus the younger dies.

[g] Greg. l. x. c. 10. [h] Cantacuz. l. iii. c. 43.

from the ſucceſſion, it was no more than the debauched life he then led well deſerved. Gregoras, on the other hand, lays the whole blame on young Andronicus, and will not allow that the old emperor gave his grandſon the leaſt provocation. All the diſorders in the ſtate were owing, according to him, to the unbounded ambition of the youth, and the evil counſels of Cantacuzenus and his favourites. But, after all, we cannot help concluding, that if the grandfather was to blame, the grandſon was altogether inexcuſeable. Andronicus the younger left two ſons, John and Manuel, of whom the eldeſt was, upon his father's death, declared emperor; but as he was then only nine years old, John Cantacuzenus was appointed his guardian, and protector of the empire, during his minority. Cantacuzenus governed with great equity and moderation, took particular care of the education of the young prince and his brother, provided, as far as the weak condition of the empire would allow him, for the ſecurity of the provinces; and in ſhort, omitted nothing that could be expected from a faithful, zealous, and diſintereſted miniſter. But as he had been declared guardian to the young prince againſt the will and approbation of John the patriarch, who thought that office belonged to him, and claimed a ſhare in the adminiſtration, the ambitious prelate did all that lay in his power to render him ſuſpected to the empreſs Anne, repreſenting him as one who had nothing leſs in view than the imperial dignity. As the patriarch was in great credit with the empreſs, Cantacuzenus, apprehending he might in the end gain the aſcendant over her to his utter ruin, was for reſigning his charge, and earneſtly preſſed the empreſs for leave to retire; but ſhe refuſing to comply with his requeſt, and aſſuring him, that ſhe was fully convinced of his integrity, and conſequently determined to ſhut her ears againſt the unjuſt calumnies and malicious informations of his enemies, he was prevailed upon to continue in the adminiſtration. However, the patriarch, and his faction at court, which was very powerful, by continually alarming the princeſs with the dangers ſhe was to apprehend from the protector, and miſconſtruing all his actions, prevailed upon her at length to take ſuch meaſures, as involved the empire in a civil war; for giving entire credit to the malicious inſinuations of the patriarch, who conjured her with tears in his eyes to provide for her own ſafety and that of her children, againſt the wicked deſigns of the protector, ſhe began to look upon him as an enemy

John Palæologus.

The patriarch an enemy to Cantacuzenus, the young prince's guardian.

my to herſelf and her family; and having cauſed ſome of his friends and relations to be apprehended, while he was abſent at Didymothicum, ſhe ſent him orders to reſign his office forthwith, and retire to a private life; which he refuſing to do, till he had an opportunity of juſtifying his conduct, and convincing the world of his innocency, the empreſs, at the inſtigation of the patriarch, declared him a public enemy and traitor. Cantacuzenus, now appriſed, that his enemies aimed at nothing leſs than his utter deſtruction, thought it high time to provide for his own ſafety. Being then at the head of a powerful army, which he had raiſed to oppoſe the Servians, who, upon the emperor's death, had broken into the empire, and having with him ſeveral perſons of the greateſt authority in the empire, who all adviſed him to aſſume the purple, as the only means of defeating the deſigns of his enemies, he hearkened to their advice, and ſuffered himſelf to be proclaimed emperor at Didymothicum in 1342, the ſecond year of his adminiſtration. When news of his revolt was brought to Conſtantinople, his mother and the reſt of his friends and relations in the city were immediately apprehended, and thrown into priſon, his eſtate was confiſcated, and troops levied to ſuppreſs the rebellion in its birth. Thus Cantacuzenus himſelf in his hiſtory [i]; and with him moſt other hiſtorians agree, laying the whole blame on the patriarch and his faction, who, in a manner, forced the perſecuted miniſter to take arms in his own defence. Having thus aſſumed the purple, he acquainted the nobility and ſoldiery in a long ſpeech with the motives that had prompted him to take that ſtep, which, he ſaid, the malice of his enemies had rendered neceſſary. He then gave leave to all thoſe, whoſe friends and relations were at Conſtantinople, to depart, leſt, by continuing with him, they ſhould occaſion the ruin of their innocent friends. The reſt of the army declaring themſelves ready to ſtand by him to the laſt, he advanced to Adrianople, the inhabitants of which city had ſeized on all thoſe whom they ſuſpected to favour him, and ſent them in chains to Conſtantinople. On his march he was informed, that a numerous body of Bulgarians were advancing to join the imperial troops, and fall upon him with their united forces. This obliged him to lay aſide the deſign he had formed againſt Adrianople, and retire to the ſea-ſide, that he might with more eaſe receive ſupplies from the Turks in Aſia, with whom he had entered into an alliance, Cantacuzenus declared a public enemy.

He aſſumes the purple.

[i] Cantacuz. l. ii. c. 1—27.

upon his firſt aſſuming the imperial dignity. Tho' they offered him large ſupplies, yet he did not think fit to accept them, till he had tried all poſſible means for bringing about an accommodation. With this view he wrote to the patriarch, exhorting him to peace and concord; but the meſſenger who brought the letters was ſeized, and thrown into priſon, Cantacuzenus was declared anew a public enemy, and ſuch of his relations, as had not the good luck to make their eſcape, were treated with the utmoſt cruelty. His mother was delivered up to Apocaucus, his moſt inveterate enemy, who treated her with the utmoſt barbarity, telling her ſometimes, that her ſon was taken priſoner; at others, that he was killed in an engagement, and his head was brought to Conſtantinople. Her concern and the cruel uſage ſhe met with, having thrown her into a violent fever, Apacaucus would ſuffer no phyſician to attend her, till the empreſs, hearing the danger ſhe was in, and pitying her condition, recommended her to her own phyſicians, who nevertheleſs were not admitted by the patriarch and Apocaucus to viſit her, till they had ſolemnly ſworn not to adminiſter any remedy to her that might relieve her. Being thus deſtitute of all help, and daily inſulted by her enemies, ſhe died ſoon after, to the great grief of the empreſs, who, being informed of the unſpeakable miſeries ſhe had undergone, and on that account highly provoked againſt the patriarch and Apocaucus, obliged them to ſend deputies to Cantacuzenus with overtures for an accommodation; but the deputies, who were their creatures, returning, told the empreſs, that Cantacuzenus would hearken to no terms; that he was obſtinately bent upon war, and determined not to lay down his arms, till he had accompliſhed the ruin of her two ſons and the whole imperial family. A war being therefore reſolved on, Andronicus and Thomas Palæologi were appointed to command the land-forces, which were to march into Thrace, of which country moſt cities had declared for Cantacuzenus. At the ſame time a fleet, conſiſting of ſixty galleys, was equipped, to prevent the Turks from ſupplying the enemy with men or proviſions. Of this fleet Apocaucus took upon himſelf the command; and having driven back the Turks, attempting to croſs the ſtreights and ſuccour their ally, reduced Cantacuzenus, who was at the ſame time warmly preſſed by the land-forces under the conduct of the two above-mentioned Palælogoli, to ſuch ſtreights, that he was forced to quit Thrace and take refuge in the dominions of Crales, prince of Mœſia, who received

His offers for a peace rejected.

His mother uſed with great cruelty.

received him with the greateſt demonſtrations of eſteem and affection, and ſent him back at the head of a powerful army, with which he gained ſeveral conſiderable advantages over the emperor's forces, and made himſelf maſter of the greater part of Thrace. Hereupon his enemies, finding they could not ſuppreſs him by force, had recourſe to treachery, and, with mighty promiſes, prevailed upon one Monomachus to try whether he could diſpatch him with poiſon. Accordingly Monomachus, repairing to his camp at Selymbria, the better to compaſs his wicked purpoſe, owned the errand on which he was come; but pretending to be touched with remorſe, he fell down at his feet, and delivered to him the poiſon, which he was to have adminiſtered. Cantacuzenus received him in a moſt obliging manner, loaded him with preſents, and taking him into his favour, repoſed ſo great a truſt in him, that the traitor would have ſoon found an opportunity of putting his deſign in execution, without incurring the leaſt ſuſpicion, had not Cantacuzenus been privately warned by his friends at Conſtantinople to be upon his guard. In the mean time Cantacuzenus, having made himſelf maſter of all Macedon and Thrace, approached the imperial city, with a deſign to reduce it, either by force or famine; but he had not been long before it, when ſeveral citizens, apprehending the calamities attending a long ſiege, reſolved to prevent them, by admitting him privately into the city. Accordingly, having firſt acquainted him with their deſign, they fell in the night upon the guards, and making themſelves maſters of one of the gates, admitted him and the whole army, ſaluting him, as he entered, with the title of emperor. They were joined by the generality of the people, who, flocking from all quarters of the city, attended him with loud ſhouts to the forum. As for the empreſs, ſhe continued in the palace, which ſhe ſeemed determined to defend to the laſt extremity, having a conſiderable body of troops at her devotion; but the young emperor earneſtly entreating her not to expoſe both herſelf and him to the fury of the incenſed multitude, ſhe was in the end prevailed upon to hearken to an accommodation; which was happily brought about upon the following terms; viz. that Cantacuzenus ſhould be declared collegue to the young prince, and have the ſole adminiſtration of affairs for the ſpace of ten years, Palæologus being then but fifteen; that afterwards they ſhould both reign with equal power and authority; and that an act of oblivion ſhould paſs on both ſides. This agreement being ſigned and ſworn to by Cantacuzenus, Palæologus, and the empreſs Ann, on

His enemies attempt to poiſon him.

His is received into Conſtantinople.

And crowned emperor.

on the eighth of February 1347, the new emperor was received the ſame day into the palace, and ſoon after crowned with the uſual ſolemnity by Iſidore, the new patriarch of Conſtantinople, John his predeceſſor being depoſed, and ſent into baniſhment. That the union between the two princes might be better ſettled and more laſting, Cantacuzenus gave his daughter Helena in marriage to young Palæologus, and cauſed her to be likewiſe crowned, and acknowledged empreſs by the nobility and people [k]. As Cantacuzenus had been powerfully aſſiſted by Orchanes the Turkiſh ſultan, who had even married his daughter, he could not help entertaining a friendly correſpondence with that prince; which gave great offence to the clergy and ſome zealous chriſtians, who, by exclaiming againſt ſo ſtrict an alliance and intimacy between a chriſtian and a Mohammedan prince, eſtranged by degrees the minds of the multitude from Cantacuzenus; which proved very prejudicial to his affairs. However, he governed the empire for the ſpace of ten years with ſuch equity and moderation, that even his moſt inveterate enemies could lay nothing to his charge. In the ſixth year of his adminiſtration, the Genoeſe of Galata, who were become very powerful, provoked at the emperor's refuſing them leave to enlarge their city, ſet fire to ſeveral buildings in the ſuburbs of Conſtantinople, ſeized on all the emperor's ſhips then riding in the harbour, and made open war on the empire, in which they gained ſeveral advantages at ſea, and made themſelves maſters of ſome iſlands in the Archipelago, which the emperor was obliged to yield to them. When Palæologus came to govern jointly with him, Crales king of the Servians, highly provoked againſt Cantacuzenus, for having obliged him to reſtore ſome cities, which he had ſeized during the late troubles, gained over with rich preſents ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, who, by inſinuating to the young emperor, that Cantacuzenus deſigned to confine him to a monaſtery, to uſurp the whole power, and tranſmit the ſovereignty to his poſterity, raiſed a diffidence between the two princes, which ſoon after broke out into an open war, Palæologus being on one hand aſſiſted by Crales king of Servia and Alexander prince of Bulgaria; and Cantacuzenus on the other hand by Orchanes the Turkiſh ſultan. In a battle which was fought in Thrace, the young emperor's army was utterly defeated, and he himſelf obliged to take refuge in Conſtantinople, all the other cities in Thrace having opened

He governs with great equity and moderation.

A war breaks out between the two princes.

[k] Cantacuzen. l. iii. c. 90.—100. & l. iv. c. 1. 2.

ed their gates to the conqueror. However, not long after, a peace was concluded between the two princes; which was no ſooner ſigned, than Cantacuzenus, deveſting himſelf, by a voluntary reſignation, of all his power, retired to the monaſtery of Mangana, and there took the monaſtic habit. But his ſon Matthew, whom he had ſome time before declared emperor, purſued the war, and ſeized on ſeveral cities in Thrace, and among the reſt on Adrianople. Againſt him Palæologus marched in perſon; and having utterly defeated his army, tho' reinforced before the battle with five thouſand Turks ſent by Orchanes, obliged him to quit the field, and take refuge in one of his ſtrong-holds; whence while he was making his eſcape at the approach of the emperor's army, he was ſeized by one Boienas, and delivered up to Palæologus, who, upon his renouncing all claim to the empire, reſtored him to his liberty [1].

Cantacuzenus reſigns, and takes the monaſtic habit.

During theſe civil commotions, the Turks, under the conduct of Solyman, the ſon, or, as others will have it, the brother of Orchanes, paſſed the Helleſpont, and having ſeized on a ſtrong caſtle called Coiridocuſtron, marched from thence againſt Gallipolis, which Solyman took, after having defeated the governor of the place, who came out with the garriſon to offer him battle. Thus the Turks, having reduced all Aſia, firſt ſettled in Europe, where they have continued ever ſince. This happened in the year 1357, Orchanes dying ſoon after, Amurath his ſon and ſucceſſor purſued the conqueſts, which Solyman had begun; and having made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſtrong-holds in Thrace, laid ſiege at length to Adrianople, which was forced to ſubmit, the emperor not being in a condition to make head againſt ſo powerful an enemy. Amurath, having in a ſhort time maſtered all Thrace, made Adrianople the ſeat of his empire in Europe, as the moſt proper place for the enlarging his dominions, and extending his conqueſts to Greece and the neighbouring provinces. In the mean time, Andronicus, the emperor's eldeſt ſon, having conſpired againſt his father, was by his orders deprived of his ſight, and kept under cloſe confinement. Ducas the hiſtorian tells us, that Andronicus and Cuntuzes, Amurath's younger ſon, having contracted an intimate friendſhip, conſpired the death of their fathers, binding themſelves by mutual oaths to live in amity and friendſhip, when the one ſhould be emperor, and the other ſultan. The ſame writer adds, that the conſpiracy being diſcovered

The Turks firſt ſettled in Europe.

They take Adrianople.

[1] Idem, c. 32—49.

diſcovered to Amurath, he ordered his own ſon's eyes to be pulled out, and required the emperor to inflict the ſame puniſhment on his ſon, threatening him with a war, if he refuſed to comply. The emperor, dreading the power of the ſultan, cauſed the eyes both of his ſon and grandſon, who was yet an infant, to be pulled out, declaring at the ſame time his ſecond ſon Manuel his collegue in the empire. Andronicus, however, after two years confinement, made his eſcape, being favoured therein by the Genoeſe of Galata, with whoſe aſſiſtance he made war upon his father; and being admitted into Conſtantinople, he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor; and having got his father and two brothers, Manuel and Theodorus, into his power, he confined them to the ſame priſon in which he had been detained; but they having likewiſe, after two years, made their eſcape, Andronicus, dreading the calamities of a civil war, while the Turks were ready to fall upon the few countries that were ſtill left to the empire, reſtored his father and brother to the throne, who thereupon gave him Selymbria, and ſeveral other places in that neighbourhood [m]. In the mean time Amurath, the Turkiſh ſultan being treacherouſly ſlain, his ſon Bajazet ſucceeded him in his dominions; and purſuing the conqueſts which had been ſo ſucceſsfully carried on by his predeceſſors in Europe, made himſelf maſter of Theſſaly, Macedon, Phocis, Peloponneſus, Myſia, and Bulgaria, driving out the deſpots, or petty princes, who held thoſe countries. Elated with his frequent victories, he began to look upon the Greek emperor, to whom nothing was now left but Conſtantinople and the neighbouring country, as his vaſſal, and accordingly ſent him an arrogant and haughty meſſage, requiring, or rather commanding, him to pay him a yearly tribute, and ſend him his ſon Manuel, to attend him in his military expeditions. With this diſhonourable demand the emperor was obliged to comply, being no-ways in a condition to oppoſe ſo powerful and formidable an enemy. The unhappy prince died ſoon after, that is, in 1392, the thirty-ſeventh of his reign, leaving no ſon behind him but Manuel, the other two, Andronicus and Theodore, being dead ſome time before. Manuel, who was then in Bajazet's court, hearing of his father's death, haſtened to Conſtantinople, without taking his leave of the ſultan, or acquainting him with the motives of his ſudden departure; which Bajazet highly reſenting, puniſhed the officers who had ſuffered him to

The emperor driven from the throne by his ſon, and reſtored.

Bajazet's conqueſts in Europe.

John Palæologus dies.

Manuel.

[m] Ducas, c. 12.

to eſcape with the utmoſt ſeverity; and paſſing with great expedition out of Bithynia, where he then was, into Thrace, deſtroyed with fire and ſword the country adjoining to Conſtantinople, and, after having reduced the neighbouring towns, inveſted the imperial city itſelf both by ſea and land. In this extremity Manuel had recourſe to the weſtern princes, who having raiſed an army 130,000 ſtrong, ſent it to his relief, under the conduct of Sigiſmund king of Hungary and John count of Nevers. The weſtern troops were at firſt attended with good ſucceſs; for entering the countries lately ſubdued by the ſultan, they recovered Widin, and ſeveral other places of great importance in Bulgaria, and inveſted Nicopolis. Hereupon Bajazet, raiſing the ſiege of Conſtantinople, marched, with all the forces he could aſſemble, to relieve the place. Upon his approach, Sigiſmund, leaving part of the army to purſue the ſiege, marched with the reſt to meet the enemy. Hereupon an engagement enſued, in which great numbers fell on both ſides, and the victory continued long doubtful. At length, the French cavalry having diſmounted to fight on foot, the reſt of the army obſerving the horſes without their riders, and concluding from thence they were all cut in pieces, began to give ground, and retire to their camp. This gave new courage and vigour to the enemy, who making an utmoſt effort, and charging the chriſtians in their retreat with incredible fury, broke their ranks, and obliged them to fly in great confuſion. The Turks purſued them to their camp, which they took with all their baggage, and an incredible number of priſoners, among whom was the conut of Nevers, and three hundred officers of diſtinction, who were all, except the count himſelf and five more, put to death in Bajazet's preſence, after having been inſulted by him in a moſt outrageous manner. As for Sigiſmund, he had the good luck to make his eſcape, and croſſing the Danube in a ſmall boat, to get ſafe to his own dominions. This memorable battle, in which 20,000 chriſtians were ſlain, and a far greater number taken priſoners, was fought in the ſecond year of Manuel's reign, and 1393d of the chriſtian æra [n]. After this victory, Bajazet returned to the ſiege of Conſtantinople; but finding the citizens determined to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity, he applied to John the ſon of Andronicus, to whom, as we have obſerved above, the emperor had yielded the town of Selymbria. With him he entered into a private agreement, in virtue of which Bajazet beſieges Conſtantinople.

Defeats an army of 130,000 chriſtians.

[n] Idem, c. 14.

which Bajazet was to place him upon the throne, to which he had a juſt claim, as being the ſon of Manuel's elder brother. On the other hand, John was to yield the city of Conſtantinople to Bajazet, and remove the imperial ſeat to Peloponneſus, which the ſultan promiſed to relinquiſh to him and his poſterity. This agreement being privately ſigned and ſworn to by both parties, Bajazet diſpatched deputies to the inhabitants of Conſtantinople, offering to withdraw his army, and abſtain from all hoſtilities, provided they would drive out Manuel, and place his nephew John on the throne, to which he had an unqueſtionable right. This politic propoſal rent the whole city into two factions, ſome favouring Manuel, and others declaring for his nephew. Of this the emperor being appriſed, and apprehenſive of the evils attending a civil diſcord at ſo critical a conjuncture, he acquainted his nephew, then in the Turkiſh camp, that, to deliver his ſubjects from the calamities under which they groaned, he was ready to reſign the ſovereignty to him, on condition he was allowed to depart with his wife and children, and to convey himſelf by ſea to whatever place he ſhould think fit. With this condition John readily complied, and Manuel, having received him into the city, and conducted him to the palace, embarqued on board a galley, and ſet ſail for Venice, where he landed, and from thence went to the ſeveral courts of the chriſtian princes, to ſollicit aid againſt the overgrown power of the Turks, now become formidable to all Europe. He was every-where received with the greateſt demonſtrations of eſteem, and promiſed large ſupplies, all Chriſtendom being alarmed at the late conqueſt of the infidels. In the mean time, John being crowned with the uſual ſolemnity, Bajazet took care to put him in mind of their agreement, and preſs him to a ſpeedy execution of the main article, which was to yield Conſtantinople to him, and retire to Peloponneſus or Morea; but the citizens refuſing, notwithſtanding the unſpeakable hardſhips they ſuffered, to comply with ſuch a ſcandalous treaty, Bajazet renewed the ſiege, and aſſaulted the city with more fury than ever. When he had already reduced it to the utmoſt extremity, news was brought him, that Tamerlane the victorious Tartar, after having ſubdued Perſia and the more eaſterly provinces, had turned his arms againſt him, and was preparing, with a numerous and formidable army, to break into Syria. Hereupon, alarmed at the danger that threatened him, he in great haſte raiſed the ſiege, and paſſing the Helleſpont, marched with the utmoſt expedition to Pruſa, which he had appointed the place of the general rendezvous, both Manuel reſigns the empire to his nephew John.

Conſtantinople beſieged by Bajazet;

both for his eaſtern and weſtern forces. From Pruſa he advanced, at the head of a very numerous and well-diſciplined army, to meet Tamerlane, who gave him a total overthrow in the plains of Angoria in Galatia, on the twenty-eighth of July 1401, cut moſt of his men in pieces, and having taken the ſultan himſelf priſoner, to puniſh his exceſſive pride, cruelty, and arrogance, ſhut him up in an iron cage, againſt which he is ſaid to have daſhed out his brains the year following, tho' ſome aſcribe his death to poiſon °, as we ſhall relate more at length elſewhere. Manuel was no ſooner informed of the overthrow and captivity of his inveterate enemy Bajazet, than he returned to Conſtantinople, where he was received with loud acclamations by the people, who being highly provoked againſt John for his ſervile compliance with the Turks, drove him from the throne, and reſtored Manuel, by whom he was baniſhed to the iſland of Leſbos. This great overthrow of the Turks had like to have occaſioned the total diſſolution of their empire, both in Europe and Aſia; for the five ſons of Bajazet, taking arms againſt each other, a civil war was kindled, and continued with great fury for ten years together. Iſa-Zelebis, Bajazet's third ſon, upon his father's death, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed ſultan; but was ſoon driven from the throne by his brother Solyman, as was Solyman by his brother Muſa. At length Mohammed, Bajazet's youngeſt ſon, having overcome all his competitors, was univerſally acknowledged ſultan, and the ſole monarch of the Turks. The emperor Manuel in the mean time, taking advantage of theſe inteſtine diviſions, and ſiding ſometimes with one of the competitors, and ſometimes with another, recovered ſeveral provinces, which Mohammed, whom he had aſſiſted againſt his brother Muſa, ſuffered him peaceably to enjoy till his death, which happened in 1424, the ſeventy-fifth year of his age, and thirty-ſeventh of his reign P. Some authors write, that he reſigned the empire to his ſon John Palæologus five years before his death, and retiring to a monaſtery, took the monaſtic habit, with the name of Antony. Be that as it will, he was ſucceeded by his ſon John, in whoſe reign Amurath II. the ſon and ſucceſſor of Mohammed, recovered all the provinces which had been ſeized after the death of Bajazet by the emperor and the other chriſtian princes. In the beginning of his reign he laid ſiege to Conſtantinople, being provoked againſt the emperor for eſpouſing the cauſe of an impoſtor, who, pretending to be Muſtapha the ſon of Bajazet,

Who is overcome and taken priſoner by Tamerlane.

Manuel reſtored.

Manuel dies.

John Palæologus.

Conſtantinople beſieged by Amurath II. who is forced to raiſe it.

° Ducas, c. 14. P Idem, c. 28.

jazet, was acknowledged for ſultan in all the provinces of the Turkiſh empire in Europe. The citizens defended themſelves with great bravery; but, being haraſſed with continual aſſaults, muſt have in the end ſubmitted, had not the emperor prevailed upon the prince of Caramania to countenance another Muſtapha, Amurath's younger brother, who, having revolted in Aſia, was, with the ſupplies ſent him by his new ally, enabled to lay ſiege to the city of Nice, which he ſoon reduced. This obliged Amurath to raiſe the ſiege of Conſtantinople, and march with all his forces againſt the uſurper, who was betrayed and delivered up to him by one Ilras, in whom he repoſed great confidence. Amurath, having got him into his power, cauſed him to be immediately ſtrangled with a bow-ſtring; and then turning his arms againſt the prince of Caramania, obliged him to ſue for peace; which the ſultan granted him upon what terms he thought proper to preſcribe. Having now no other enemies to contend with, he entered Macedon at the head of a powerful army, and having ravaged the country far and near, laid ſiege to Theſſalonica, which he took, and plundered with the utmoſt cruelty, as he did moſt of the cities of Ætolia, Phocis, and Bœotia. From Greece he marched into Servia, which country he ſoon reduced; and then breaking into the dominions of the king of Hungary, beſieged the ſtrong city of Belgrade, which made a vigorous defence, no fewer than fifteen thouſand Turks being ſlain by the chriſtians in one ſally; which obliged Amurath to drop the enterprize, and retire. In his retreat he was attacked by the celebrated John Hunniades, who cut great numbers of his men in pieces, and obliged the reſt to ſhelter themſelves under the walls of Sinderovia. Not long after he gained a ſtill more ſignal victory over the enemy in the plains of Tranſilvania, with the loſs of no more than three thouſand of his own men, whereas twenty thouſand Turks were killed on the ſpot, and almoſt an equal number in the purſuit. Amurath, who was then at Adrianople, ſent another army into Tranſilvania, far more numerous than the two former; but they were attended with no better ſucceſs, being cut off almoſt to a man by the brave Hungarian. He gained over the Turks ſeveral other no leſs remarkable victories, and recovered all Bulgaria and Servia; but was in the end overcome and put to flight by Amurath, in the memorable battle of Verna, fought in the year 1444, the chriſtians being diſheartened by the death of Uladiſlaus, king of Hungary, who, while he was attacking the enemy with more courage than prudence, was by them hemmed in on all Theſſalonica and ſeveral other places, taken by Amurath.

John Hunniades's ſucceſs againſt the Turks.

all ſides, and cut in pieces. However, Hunniades, having had the good luck to make his eſcape, and being appointed protector of the kingdom during the minority of Ladiſlaus, who was choſen king of Hungary in the room of Uladiſlaus, he raiſed a conſiderable army, and advancing to Coſſova, engaged Amurath, who lay encamped there. The battle laſted three days, both armies retiring to their reſpective camps when night approached, and renewing the fight early next morning. The two firſt days the chriſtians had the advantage; but the third day, being quite tired out and overpowered with numbers, Amurath charging them with freſh troops, they were, after a long and vigorous reſiſtance, put to flight and utterly routed. In this memorable battle, which was fought in 1448, thirty-four thouſand Turks were ſlain, and eight thouſand chriſtians, with the flower of the Hungarian nobility. As for Hunniades, he made his eſcape into Servia, and from thence returned into Hungary [q]. In the mean time, John Palæologus, the Greek emperor, fearing the victorious ſultan ſhould turn his arms againſt him, ſent embaſſadors to Adrianople, where Amurath then reſided, with orders to conclude a peace upon any terms. The ſultan received them with great arrogance, declaring he would march directly to Conſtantinople, unleſs the emperor yielded to him ſome ſtrong-holds, which he ſtill poſſeſſed on the Euxine ſea, and engage to pay him a yearly tribute of three hundred thouſand aſpers. To theſe ſhameful terms the unhappy prince was obliged to ſubmit, in order to enjoy the poor remains of the Roman empire, now reduced to the imperial city and the adjoining country. However, as he did not doubt but Amurath, as ſoon as he had put an end to the war, in which he was then engaged with George Caſtriot, ſurnamed Scanderbeg, prince of Epirus, would, under ſome pretence or other, attempt Conſtantinople itſelf, he applied to the weſtern princes; and the more effectually to engage them in his cauſe, he promiſed to do all that lay in his power to reconcile the Greek and Latin churches. Accordingly, hearing a council was to be held at Ferrara, he went thither in perſon, attended by Joſeph the patriarch, a great number of prelates and the flower of the Greek nobility, who were all received at Venice, where they landed, and afterwards at Ferrara, with great pomp and magnificence. From Ferrara the council was removed ſoon after, by reaſon of a plague which broke out there, to Florence, where the union was affected

He is in the end routed by the Turks.

The emperor ſubmits to pay a yearly tribute to the ſultan.

[q] Ducas, c. 30—34.

Union of the Greek and Latin churches.

between the two churches, and ſubſcribed to by the patriarch and the other prelates. The patriarch died ſoon after at Florence; but the emperor and the other prelates, returning by land at the pope's charge to Venice, were conveyed from thence on the galleys of the republic to Conſtantinople. Upon his return, he found the people highly diſſatisfied with his conduct, and that of the biſhops, ſome of whom had refuſed to ſubſcribe the decrees of the council, till the money was paid down, for which they had before-hand agreed to ſign them. The diſturbances which this union raiſed in the church, the death of the empreſs Deſpina, and the inſupportable arrogance with which the unhappy prince was treated by the ſultan, gave him ſuch concern, that, being already broken with age, he ſunk under the weight of his calamities and misfortunes in 1448, the twenty ſeventh of his reign, leaving the empire, now confined within the walls of Conſtantinople, to his brother Conſtantine[r]. Amurath the Turkiſh ſultan, did not long ſurvive him; but dying in the beginning of February 1450, was ſucceeded by his ſon Mohammed, who had no ſooner taken poſſeſſion of the throne, than he cauſed all his brothers to be ſtrangled, and ordered his father's lawful wife (for he is ſaid to have been the ſon of a concubine) to marry a ſlave, by name Iſaac. In the beginning of his reign, he entered into an alliance with Conſtantine, the Greek emperor, who, upon the firſt news of his father's death, had ſent embaſſadors to congratulate him upon his acceſſion to the throne. The embaſſadors were received very graciouſly, the new ſultan declaring, that he had nothing ſo much at heart as to live in peace and amity with the emperor and the other chriſtian princes. The embaſſadors of the Walachians, Lesbians, Bulgarians, Rhodians, Servians, &c. were likewiſe received in a moſt obliging manner; which encouraged them to celebrate with public rejoicings the acceſſion of Mohammed to the throne, whom they looked upon as a friend to the chriſtians, the more becauſe his mother was of that religion, being, according to the moſt credible writers, the deſpot or prince of Servia's daughter. But notwithſtanding the friendſhip and regard he pretended to have for the emperor, he had no ſooner put an end to the war with Ibrahim, king of Caramania, who, upon the news of his father's death, had invaded his dominions in Aſia, than he begun to entertain thoughts of making

John, the emperor, dies.

Conſtantine Palæologus.

Mohammed II.

[r] Idem, c. 33.

ing himſelf maſter of Conſtantinople, and aboliſhing the very name of the Roman empire. With this view he built on the Europe ſide of the Boſphorus a ſtrong caſtle, called by the Turks Genichicar, and by the Greeks Neocaſtrum, oppoſite to another in Aſia called Aſpocaſtron, which he cauſed to be repaired, placing in both ſtrong garriſons. Theſe two caſtles commanded the ſtreights, and the former, being but five miles from Conſtantinople, proved a curb upon that city, and kept it in a manner blocked up. Mohammed had no ſooner begun the work, than the emperor and the citizens of Conſtantinople, alarmed at the undertaking, diſpatched embaſſadors to the ſultan, with orders to do all that lay in their power to divert him ſtom it. But Mohammed was ſo far from granting them their requeſt, that tho' the emperor even offered to pay him an annual tribute, provided he put a ſtop to the work, he threatened, with the utmoſt arrogance, to cauſe ſuch as ſhould be ſent to him upon the like errand to be ſlead alive. He added, that nothing beyond the ditches of the city belonged to Conſtantine, and that he had an unqueſtionable right to build in his own dominions what caſtles and forts he pleaſed. When the fort in the neighbourhood of Conſtantinople was finiſhed, the garriſon left there by the ſultan began to ravage the country adjoining to the city, and making excurſions to the very gates, returned to their ſtrong-hold loaded with booty. This occaſioned ſeveral skirmiſhes between the chriſtians and Turks; in one of which a conſiderable number of the latter being killed, the ſultan, to revenge their death, ordered his men to fall upon the chriſtians, while they were reaping their corn in the open fields, and put them all to the ſword, which was done accordingly. Hereupon the emperor, having cauſed the gates of the city to be ſhut, ordered all the Turks within the walls to be arreſted, but ſet them at liberty the next day, ſending at the ſame time embaſſadors to Mohammed, with propoſals for concluding a laſting peace between the two crowns. As the ſultan ſeemed averſe to an accommodation, and was aſſembling his forces from all parts, Conſtantine, well appriſed of his deſign, in the firſt place took care to fill the public magazines, and ſupply the city with great plenty of all ſorts of proviſions; then by his embaſſadors to the weſtern princes, acquainted them with the deſigns of the ſultan, and the ſtorm that was gathering againſt the imperial city, the taking of which might prove fatal to all Chriſtendom. That they might the more readily aſſiſt him at ſo

He builds a fort on the Boſphorus.

Which occaſions a miſunderſtanding between him and the emperor.

Conſtantine has recourſe in vain to the chriſtian princes.

critical a conjuncture, he renewed the union of the two churches, and received with extraordinary demonſtrations of eſteem and reſpect the pope's legate, which gave great offence to the eccleſiaſtics zealouſly attached to the ceremonies of their anceſtors, and occaſioned a miſunderſtanding between the prince and his people. Neither did the emperor's zeal, in confirming the union, procure him the leaſt aſſiſtance from the Latins in the weſt, who, by a ſtrange infatuation, ſuffered the city, which they looked upon as the bulwark of Chriſtendom, to fall into the hands of the avowed enemy of the chriſtian name, who, they well knew, would not ſtop there, but extend his conqueſts to the neighbouring, and perhaps to the moſt diſtant, kingdoms. While Conſtantine was ſoliciting aid from the weſtern princes, Caracia, one of Mohammed's chief commanders, reduced ſeveral places on the Euxine ſea, which were ſtill held by the emperor, viz. Meſembria, Acheloun, Biſon, &c. then advancing towards the city, took by aſſault a ſtrong caſtle called St. Stephen's tower, and put the garriſon to the ſword. Other forts in that neighbourhood ſubmitted at the approach of the enemy; but Selymbria held out for ſome time, the inhabitants defending the place with incredible bravery and reſolution; but being in the end tired out with repeated aſſaults, the town was taken, and they all to a man cut in pieces. All the forts, caſtles, and ſtrong-holds in the neighbourhood of the imperial city being thus reduced, Caracia was ordered to ſcour the country during the winter, in order to prevent the inhabitants from receiving any ſupplies of men or proviſions; by which means the city was in a manner blocked up by land. But as the Greeks were ſtill maſters at ſea, their galleys ravaged the coaſts of Aſia, and returned with an immenſe booty, and an incredible number of captives, who were ſold for ſlaves in Conſtantinople [a].

All the forts in the neighbourhood of Conſtantinople taken by the Turks.

In the mean time, Mohammed, having drawn together from all parts an army of three hundred thouſand men, left Adrianople; and bending his march towards the imperial city, encamped before it on the ſixth of April 1453, covering with his numerous forces the adjoining plains. His Aſiatic troops were poſted on the right towards the Boſphorus; thoſe of Europe on the left towards the haven; and he himſelf, with fifteen thouſand janizaries, and other choſen troops, between both, over-againſt the gate named Karſias. On the other ſide of the haven, Zoganus, one of his chief officers,

Conſtantinople beſieged.

Diſpoſition of the Turkiſh army.

[a] Ducas, c. 37.

officers, encamped with a conſiderable body of troops, in order to cut off all communication between the city and country on that ſide. At the ſame time Pantologes, the Turkiſh admiral, appeared before the haven with a fleet of near three hundred ſail; but the emperor had taken care to ſecure the haven, in which were three large ſhips, twenty ſmall ones, and a good number of galleys, by means of a chain drawn croſs the entrance from the city to Pera. Mohammed having thus aſſigned to each part of his army their ſeveral quarters, and ſurrounded the city both by ſea and land, he began the ſiege by planting batteries as near the city as he could, and raiſing mounts in ſeveral places as high as the walls themſelves; whence the beſieged were inceſſantly galled with ſhowers of arrows. He had in his camp a piece of ordnance of a prodigious ſize, which carried, according to Ducas, a ball of an hundred pound weight, made of hard black ſtone brought from the Euxine ſea. It had been caſt by an Hungarian engineer, who, not meeting with the encouragement he expected from the emperor, had fled over to Mohammed, while he was buſied in building the above-mentioned forts[t]. With this vaſt piece, the enemy made ſeveral breaches in the walls, which, however, were with great expedition repaired by the beſieged, who behaved with incredible bravery and reſolution, being encouraged by the example of the emperor, and directed by John Juſtiniani, a Genoeſe adventurer, who arriving before the ſiege, with two large ſhips and a conſiderable number of voluntiers on board, had been by the emperor, on account of his extraordinary ſkill in military affairs, appointed commander in chief of all his forces; and beſides, for his farther encouragement, promiſed the ſovereignty of the iſland of Leſbos, provided he obliged the enemy to raiſe the ſiege. That brave commander, animated with the hopes of ſo great a reward, performed exploits, ſays our hiſtorian, tho' no-ways biaſſed in favour of the Latins, worthy of the moſt renowned heroes of antiquity. Not ſatisfied with repulſing the enemy in their frequent aſſaults, he often ſallied out againſt them at the head of his voluntiers, overturned their machines, deſtroyed their works, and made ſuch a dreadful havock of their beſt troops, that his name ſoon became formidable. But Mohammed, to carry on the ſiege with more vigour, ordered new levies to be made throughout his extenſive dominions; which reinforcements

John Juſtiniani commander in chief of the emperor's forces.

Mohammed's army reinforced.

[t] Idem, c. 35.

forcements arriving daily from all parts, his army was ſoon encreaſed to the number of near four hundred thouſand men, while the garriſon conſiſted only of nine thouſand regular troops, viz. ſix thouſand Greeks, and three thouſand Genoeſe and Venetians. As the enemy continued battering the walls night and day without intermiſſion, great part of them, with the tower called Baclatina, near the Roman gate, was beaten down; but while the Turks were buſied in filling up the ditch, in order to give the aſſault, the breach was repaired, and a new wall built. This threw the tyrant into a rage hardly to be expreſſed, which was greatly heightened, when he beheld from the ſhore his whole fleet worſted by five ſhips, four of which belonged to the Genoeſe of Galata, and one to the emperor: the latter was fraught with corn from Peloponneſus, and the others with all manner of proviſions from the iſland of Chios, where they had paſſed the winter. When they firſt appeared, Mohammed ordered his admiral to take them, if poſſible, or at leaſt to prevent their entering the harbour and joining the reſt of the fleet. Hereupon the whole Turkiſh navy, weighing anchor, ſailed out to meet them, covering the ſtreights, as they were in all three hundred ſail, from ſhore to ſhore. The above-mentioned ſhips purſued their courſe; and ſailing into the midſt of the enemy's fleet, ſunk ſome of their galleys, diſabled others, and made ſuch a dreadful havock among them, that Mohammed, who beheld the whole from the ſhore, could not forbear ruſhing with his horſe into the ſea, as if he intended to ſwim to his fleet, and encourage them with his preſence. But being ſoon appriſed of the danger, he turned back, and filling the air with loud outcries, and dreadful curſes, he tore his hair, and upbraiding his men with cowardice, uttered ſuch menaces againſt the admiral, and his other officers, as ſtruck all with terror who heard him. But notwithſtanding his impotent rage, and the loud ſhouts of the whole Turkiſh army, encouraging their mariners to behave more manfully, the five ſhips opened themſelves a way through the midſt of the enemy's fleet, and, to the unexpreſſible joy of the chriſtians, got ſafe into the harbour [t]. The Turks attempted ſeveral times to force the haven, in order to attack the city on that ſide; but all their efforts proving unſucceſsful, Mohammed formed, and, to the great terror and amazement of the beſieged, put in execution, one of the boldeſt deſigns we find mentioned in hiſtory. For, not being able to remove the chain

The Turkiſh fleet worſted by five ſhips of the chriſtians.

[t] Ducas, c. 38.

chain drawn croſs the entrance into the harbour, and the ſhips within it making a dreadful fire on the Turkiſh fleet as often as they drew near in order to break it, he commanded a large road to be levelled from the Boſphorus behind Pera to the haven of Conſtantinople, and then, by means of certain engines, the contrivance of a renegado, conveyed eighty gal- leys over land for the ſpace of eight miles into the haven, of which he was no ſooner maſter, the ſhips riding there being either taken or ſunk, than he cauſed a bridge, a work no leſs wonderful and ſurpriſing, to be built over it with incredible labour and expedition. By means of this bridge, which reached from the camp of Zoganus at Pera to the walls of Conſtantinople, the city was laid open to an aſſault on that ſide too. And now the place being inveſted, and battered night and day with incredible fury on all ſides, the emperor, well appriſed he could not with his ſmall garriſon hold out much longer againſt ſuch a mighty fleet and ſo numerous an army, ſent deputies to Mohammed, offering to acknowledge himſelf his vaſſal, by paying him yearly what tribute he ſhould think proper to impoſe upon him, provided he raiſed the ſiege and withdrew. The tyrant anſwered, that he was determined at all events to become maſter of the city; but if the emperor delivered it up forthwith, he would yield to him Peloponneſus, and other provinces to his brothers, which they ſhould peaceably enjoy as his friends and allies, whereas, if he held out to the laſt extremity, and ſuffered it to be taken by aſſault, he would put him and the whole nobility to the ſword, abandon the city to be plundered by his ſoldiers, and carry all the inhabitants, ſtripped of their wealth and effects, into captivity. The city was already reduced to great ſtreights; but the emperor being determined to periſh withit, rather than give it up upon any terms whatſoever, the ſiege was carried on with great vigor till the twenty-fifth of May, when a report being ſpread in the Turkiſh camp, that a mighty army was advancing full march to the relief of the city under the conduct of the celebrated John Hunniades, the common ſoldiers, ſeized with a panic, began to mutiny, and preſs Mohammed in a tumultuous manner to break up the ſiege; nay, they openly threatened him with death, if he did not immediately abandon the enterprize, and retire from before the city, which they deſpaired of being able to reduce before the arrival of the ſuppoſed ſuccours. Mohammed, tho' hitherto an utter ſtranger to fear, alarmed at the menaces of the incenſed and ungovernable ſoldiery, was upon the point of yielding to the ſtorm, and raiſing the ſiege, agreeable to Mohammed conveys eighty galleys over land into the haven.

The emperor rejects the conditions offered him.

A mutiny in the Turkiſh camp.

the advice of the grand viſier Haly who favoured underhand the chriſtians. But Zagan, a Turkiſh officer of great intrepidity, and an irreconcileable enemy to the chriſtian name, having confirmed the ſultan in his former reſolution, adviſed him to give, without loſs of time, a general aſſault; to which, he ſaid, the ſoldiery, however mutinous, would not be averſe, provided he ſolemnly promiſed to abandon the city to be plundered by them. As this advice beſt ſuited the humour of Mohammed, he readily embraced it, and cauſed a proclamation to be publiſhed throughout the camp, declaring, that he gave up to his ſoldiers all the wealth of that opulent city, requiring nothing for his ſhare but the empty houſes. The deſire of plunder, and the proſpect of an immenſe booty, ſoon got the better of the fear, which had ſeized the army: they all demanded with one voice to be led immediately to the aſſault. Hereupon the emperor was ſummoned for the laſt time to deliver up the city, with a promiſe of his life and liberty. To this ſummons the brave emperor anſwered, that he was unalterably determined either to defend the city, or fall with it. With this anſwer the meſſenger returned, and on the evening of the ſame day, which was Trinity ſunday, the twenty-ſeventh of May, the Turkiſh camp and fleet appeared illuminated with an incredible number of lights ſet up by the ſultan's orders on every tent and veſſel to admoniſh the whole army, that a ſolemn faſt was to be obſerved the next day, to implore the protection of heaven. Conſtantine, concluding from thence, as he had been privately informed beforehand by his friend Haly, that on the Tueſday following he ſhould be attacked by ſea and land, made the neceſſary preparations for ſuſtaining the aſſault, his life, liberty, reputation, and whatever elſe was dear to him lying at ſtake. He ordered in the firſt place a general proceſſion, after which, in a pathetic and eloquent ſpeech, he encouraged the nobility and citizens to exert themſelves in the defence of the empire and the chriſtian religion. He then retired to the church of St. Sophia, attended by the cardinal Iſidore and ſeveral other prelates, who had conformed to the ceremonies of the Latins; and there, after aſſiſting with exemplary piety at divine ſervice, he received the holy euchariſt. Zygomola, a modern writer, tells us, that Conſtantine, having firſt cauſed the empreſs and his children to receive the ſacrament, ordered immediately after their heads to be ſtruck off, to prevent their falling alive into the enemy's hands. But this we look upon as one of the many fables that are to be found in moſt of the modern Greek writers, it being manifeſt

Mohammed prepares for a general ſtorm.

Conſtantine makes the neceſſary preparations for ſuſtaining the aſſault.

feſt from Ducas and other contemporary writers, that Theodora, Conſtantine's firſt wife, and Catharina Cataluſa, his ſecond, died long before, without his having children by them; and that the king of Georgia's daughter, who not long before had been bethrothed to him, died before ſhe came to Conſtantinople, or was married to him. From the church Conſtantine repaired to the great palace, and there, after taking leave of his miniſters, as if he were never to ſee them again, he ordered every man to his poſt, and, putting on his armour, marched in perſon at the head of a choſen body to the gate Karſia, where a conſiderable breach had been made by the piece of ordnance, which we have mentioned above. Here the emperor and Juſtiniani his lieutenant-general, with 300 Genoeſe and a ſelect body of Greeks, lay all night on their arms, hearing a great noiſe in the Turkiſh camp, and expecting every moment to be attacked. Accordingly, at three in the morning, the attack was begun by ſuch troops as they ſultan leaſt valued, and therefore, deſigning them for ſlaughter, had ordered them to march the firſt, with no other view but to tire the chriſtians, who, tho' few in number, made a dreadful havock of that diſorderly multitude. After the carnage had laſted ſome hours, the janiſaries, and other freſh troops, advanced in good order, and renewed the attack with incredible vigor and fury. The chriſtians, ſummoning all their courage and reſolution, twice repulſed the enemy, but in the end being quite ſpent, and freſh troops pouring every moment in upon them, they were no longer able to ſtand their ground; ſo that the enemy in ſeveral places broke into the city. In the mean time, Juſtinian having received two wounds, one in the thigh and the other in the hand, he was ſo diſheartened at the ſight of his blood, that, abandoning his poſt, he cauſed himſelf to be conveyed to Galata, where he died ſoon after, not of his wounds, but of grief, in reflecting on his cowardly and ignominious conduct. The Genoeſe and Greeks, who ſerved under him, diſmayed at the ſudden retreat of their general, quitted their poſts, and fled in the utmoſt confuſion. However, the emperor, attended by Theophilus Palæologus, Francis Comnenus, Demetrius Cantacuzenus, John of Dalmatia, and a few more of the moſt reſolute among the nobility, ſtill kept his poſt, ſtriving, with an unparallelled courage and intrepidity, to oppoſe the inundation of the barbarians, who, like a violent ſtorm now broke in on all ſides. Being in the end overpowered with numbers, and ſeeing all his friends lying dead on the ground around him, What! he cried

The Turks begin the attack.

Juſtinian is wounded, and retires.

The emperor's gallant behaviour.

cried aloud, is there no chriſtian left alive to ſtrike off my head? He had ſcarce uttered theſe words, when one of the enemy, not knowing him, gave him a deep cut croſs the face with his ſabre: at the ſame time, another coming behind him, with a blow on the back part of his head, laid him dead on the ground. Thus died, in the forty-ninth year of his age and tenth of his reign, Conſtantine XV. courageouſly defending that city which Conſtantine I. had founded. Some writers relate his death differently, and tell us, that being overpowered with numbers, and no longer able to ſtand his ground, he fled with the reſt, and was ſtifled and preſſed to death in the crowd. But we have followed Ducas and Phranzes, of whom the latter was chancellor to Conſtantine, and in the city when it was taken; the former was in the neighbourhood during the whole time of the ſiege, and, a few days after the city was taken, learnt both of the Turks and chriſtians the particulars which he relates concerning that unhappy prince's death. Ducas adds, that Mohammed, admiring his courage, commanded all the funeral honours to be paid him, that were due to an emperor [u]. The emperor being thus ſlain, the few chriſtians, who were left alive, betook themſelves to flight, and the Turks, meeting with no further oppoſition, entered the city, and ſcouring the ſtreets, filled that once ſtately metropolis with blood and horror. They gave no quarter, but put all they met to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition. But of the unſpeakable miſeries the inhabitants ſuffered, during the three days which Mohammed had allowed his ſoldiers to plunder the city, the reader will find a minute and affecting account in Ducas and other contemporary writers. Many thouſands took refuge in the church of St. Sophia, but they were all maſſacred without pity in their aſylum by the enraged barbarians, who, prompted by their natural cruelty, the deſire of revenge, and the love of booty, ſpared no place nor perſon. Moſt of the nobility were by the ſultan's orders cut off, and the reſt reſerved for purpoſes more grievous than death itſelf. However, many of the inhabitants, amongſt whom were ſome men of great learning, found means to make their eſcape, while the Turks were buſied in plundering the city. Theſe embarquing on five ſhips then in the harbour, arrived ſafe in Italy, where, with the ſtudy of the Greek tongue, they revived the liberal ſciences, which had been long neglected in the weſt. When the three days were expired, Mohammed

He is killed.

And the town taken and plundered.

[u] Ducas, c. 39.

Mohammed commanded the ſoldiers, on pain of death, to forbear all further hoſtilities, and they put an end to the moſt cruel pillage and maſſacre mentioned in hiſtory. The next day, he made his public and triumphal entry into the city; and chuſing it for the ſeat of his empire, he ſolemnly promiſed to take under his protection ſuch of the inhabitants as ſhould continue in it, or, being fled, ſhould return to their antient habitations, and even to allow them the free exerciſe of the chriſtian religion. The death of the laſt Roman emperor, the loſs of Conſtantinople, and the final diſſolution of the Conſtantinopolitan Roman empire, happened on the twenty-ninth of May in the year of the Greeks 6961, of the Hegira 857, and of the chriſtian æra, according to the moſt probable opinion, 1453.

The total diſſolution of the Conſtantinopolitan Roman empire.

THE downfal of a ſtate, once ſo mighty and powerful, was not ſudden or unexpected, but brought on by degrees, and after a viſible decay of ſeveral ages. To what cauſes that was owing, we have, on proper occaſions, pointed out in the courſe of the preſent hiſtory; and therefore, not to treſpaſs on the reader's patience with tedious repetitions, we ſhall only beg leave to remind him here, that we have all along confined ourſelves to the immediate cauſes of ſo great a revolution, ſuch as human policy may account for; not daring to pry into the decrees of Providence, nor aſcribe, as ſome have done, the calamities, that befal a nation, to the ſins of thoſe on whom they are inflicted.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXXVII.

The hiſtory of the Carthaginians, to the deſtruction of Carthage by the Romans.

SECT. I.

A deſcription of Carthage, and ſome account of the origin of that city.

WERE the materials afforded us by the antients for writing the hiſtory of Carthage, in any manner proportioned to the power and opulence of that famous republic, few nations would make a greater figure in this work; but ſuch has been the infelicity of this ſtate, that notwithſtanding the immenſe riches, the extended commerce, the conſummate policy and military genius of its inhabitants, rendered it formidable to all its neighbours, and even enabled it to contend with Rome for the empire of the world, yet we have but very ſhort and ſcanty memorials left us of the great tranſactions in which it was concerned. Scarce a fragment of any of its own hiſtorians has reached us: the principal actions in which it bore a part, that have eſcaped oblivion, have either been tranſmitted to poſterity by its enemies, or ſuch as were favourably diſpoſed towards them, and conſequently many things omitted, which might have contributed towards giving us a juſter idea of it. And yet, notwithſtanding this, by collecting all the remarkable paſſages relating to it, ſcattered in the Greek and Roman authors; by comparing theſe together, and connecting them in a proper manner; and laſtly, by making ſome obſervations of our own, in order to illuſtrate and explain them; we doubt not but to ſupply the defects of all former hiſtorians, and give the moſt complete, as well as the moſt entertaining, hiſtory of the Carthaginians, that has yet been offered to the public.

Carthage when built.

CARTHAGE, the metropolis of Africa Propria for ſeveral centuries, was, according to Velleius [a], built ſixty-five years before

[a] Vell. Paterc. hiſt. Rom. l. i.

before Rome, tho' Trogus [b] and Juſtin will have it to be ſeventy-two years older than that miſtreſs of the world. Livy [c] ſeems to place its foundation twenty-years higher than theſe; and Solinus [d] exceeds him twenty-ſeven years. Timæus [e] of Sicily intimates, that Carthage and Rome were founded at the ſame time, viz. thirty-eight years before the firſt olympiad. Laſtly, from Menander [f] the Epheſian, as cited by Joſephus (A), and the Tyrian annals, it appears to have preceded the Roman æra an hundred and forty years. We ſhall not take upon us to determine which of theſe is in the right, nor whether any of them deſerves abſolute credit; but only obſerve, that as Carthage [g] conſiſted of different parts, which were ſuppoſed to have been built at different times, it is no wonder, that the antients ſhould hand down ſuch a variety of accounts, nor that the moderns ſhould diſagree ſo much amongſt themſelves in this affair. It is not very material to our preſent purpoſe, whether we can hit upon the preciſe year of this city's foundation, or not; and therefore

[b] Juſt. hiſt. l. xviii. [c] Liv. hiſt. l. li. epit. [d] Solin. c. 29. [e] Timæus Sicul. apud. Dionyſ. Halicarnaſ. l. i. [f] Menan. Epheſ. apud. Joſeph. l. i. cont. Apion. [g] Petav. de doct. temp. l. ix. c. 69. & Bochart. de col. Phœn. l. i. c. 24.

(A) Joſephus, in his computation from Menander Epheſius (1), ſeems inconſiſtent with himſelf, or at leaſt very inaccurate; but Petavius (2) has endeavoured to correct him, and makes him to fix Dido's arrival in Africa an hundred and forty years before the foundation of Rome. Solinus (3) tallies very well with this account; for he tells us, that Carthage, at its final deſtruction by Scipio Africanus, had ſtood ſeven hundred and thirty-ſeven years. As therefore this deſtruction happened in the year of Rome ſix hundred and ſix, or ſix hundred and ſeven, it is evident, that, according to this author, Carthage was built an hundred and thirty, or an hundred and thirty-one years before Rome; and if, with Sir Iſaac Newton (4) and Salmaſius, we ſuppoſe Solinus intended the encœnia or dedication of the city for its beginning, and that it was nine years in building, Dido's arrival in Africa, will be found to have happened an hundred and thirty-nine, or an hundred and forty years before the commencement of the Roman æra; which agreeing ſo well with Petavius, from whom it differs but two years, a trifle in a point of ſo remote antiquity, we may juſtly look upon it as coming pretty near the truth.

(1) Menand. Epheſ. apud Joſeph. l. i. cont. Apion. (2) Dion Petav. de doct. temp. l. ix. c. 69. (3) Solin. c. 27. (4) Salmaſ. in Solin. c. 27. Newt. chronol. p. 65

therefore we ſhall not be over ſolicitous about it. However, it may not be amiſs to refer our curious readers to Petavius [h], who has been very particular on this ſubject. That learned man, after conſidering the jarring opinions of the antients with great attention, endeavours to rectify their miſtakes, and at laſt, with an appearance of exactneſs, fixes the time of Dido's beginning to build Carthage an hundred thirty-ſeven years [i] before the foundation of Rome, if, with Varro, we place this in the third year of the ſixth olympiad, or an hundred forty-two, if, with archbiſhop Uſher, we prefer the account of Fabius Pictor [k] (B), who will have it to be near the beginning of the eighth olympiad, and, for aught we know to the contrary, comes as near the truth as any other chronologer whatſoever.

The Carthaginians deſcended from the Phœnicians.

BUT whatever diſagreement may be found amongſt hiſtorians and chronologers as to the exact year of the foundation of Carthage, yet it is agreed on all hands, that the Phœnicians were its founders. The Greek poet Nonnus [l], from ſome authors, whoſe works are now loſt, aſſures us, that Cadmus made a very ſucceſsful expedition into theſe parts. Euſebius [m] and Procopius are poſitive, that the Canaanites who fled from Joſhua retired hither; and St. Auſtin [n] would have it believed, that the Carthaginians were deſcended from theſe Canaanites. Philiſtus [o] of Syracuſe, a writer of good authority, who lived about three hundred and fifty years before

[h] Petav. ubi ſupra. & de doct. temp. l. xiii. p. 370. edit. Antwerp. 1703. & l. xii. [i] Petav. ration. tempor. l. ii. c. 13. [k] Onuph. Panvin. in ant. urb. imag. Uſſ. an. p. 87. [l] Nonn. in Dionyſ. l. xiii. [m] Euſeb. in chron. l. i. p 11. Procop. de bell. Vand l. ii. c. 10. [n] Auguſt in expoſit. epiſt. ad Rom. ſub. init. [o] Philiſt. Syracuſan. apud Euſeb. in chron. ad ann. 804.

(B) This Fabius Pictor was the moſt antient of the Roman hiſtorians (5), and a writer of very good authority. He is followed herein by Onuphrius Panvinius (6), as well as archbiſhop Uſher. Several arguments might be offered in ſupport of his authority, particularly with regard to the point under conſideration; but we chuſe to refer our readers to archbiſhop Uſher (7), Voſſius, &c. as not having room to recite them here.

(5) Liv. l. i ii. &c Dio. Hal l. i. Uſſer. an. p. 60, ad. ann. Jul. per. 3966. Voſſ de hiſt. Græc. l. iv. c. 13. &c. (6) Onuph. Panvin antiq. urb. imag. apud. Grævium in theſaur ant. Rom. tom. 3. p. 315 Petav. de doct. temp. l. ix. c. 51. (7) Uſſer an. ubi ſupra. Voſſ. de hiſt. Græc. & Petav. ubi ſupra.

fore Chriſt, relates, that the firſt traces of Carthage were owing to Zorus and Charchedon, two Tyrians or Phœnicians, thirty years before the deſtruction of Troy, according to Euſebius. Appian [p], who undoubtedly received his notion from Philiſtus, attributes this event to Zorus and Charcedon, the two ſaid Phœnicians, fifty years before that period; and from him Scaliger [q] corrects Euſebius's numbers. In confirmation of which opinion, Virgil [r] ſeems to hint, that Dido was rather the finiſher than founder of this city, by giving us to underſtand, that the ground on which it ſtood was, before her time, occupied by people who dwelt in huts or cottages, or, in other words, that a town ſtood upon it. What likewiſe renders the account of Philiſtus and Appian not a little probable is, that the Greeks always called this city Charchedon, for which no reaſon ſo proper can be aſſigned, as that the perſon who firſt ſettled with a colony on this ſpot of ground, was called by that name. Beſides, ſomething muſt have determined Dido to chuſe this particular place for her Tyrians before any other [s]. Now, no more likely motive can be conceived, than that it had been inhabited for ſome time by the Phœnicians, who were her countrymen, and from whom therefore ſhe had reaſon to expect the kindeſt and moſt friendly reception. Add to this, that both the coaſt of Africa, and the coaſt of Spain [t] oppoſite to it were known in very early ages to the Tyrians; ſince it is remarked by Velleius [u], that they built the cities of Cadiz in Spain, and Utica in Africa, a little above eighty years after the Trojan war; and Strabo declares, that the Phœnicians were poſſeſſed of the beſt parts of Spain and Africa a conſiderable time before the age of Homer; all which conſiderations ſtrongly ſupport the firſt Phœnician ſettlement mentioned by Philiſtus and Appian. But as nothing can be laid down with certainty concerning the tranſactions of thoſe very remote times, except what is deducible from the inſpired writings of the old teſtament, and as nothing is leſs to be depended upon, than the relations we have of the origin of many antient cities, we leave it to our readers to believe as much or as little of this as they pleaſe.

However,

[p] Appian. in Libyc. ſub init. [q] Joſ. Scalig. animadverſ. in Euſeb chron. ad ann. 804. [r] Virg. Æn. i. & Serv. in loc. Vide etiam. Car. Ruæi. not. in Virg. Æn. iv. ſub init. [s] Procop. ubi ſupra. [t] Strabo. l. iii. p. 104. edit. Caſaub. 1587. [u] Vell. Paterc. l. i. c. 2.

Eliſa either founded or enlarged the city of Carthage.

HOWEVER, if moſt of the events, mentioned by profane hiſtorians as happening before the deſtruction of Troy, may ſeem liable to diſpute to ſome perſons of a critical exactneſs, it cannot well be denied, as being the concurrent voice of antiquity, that Eliſa [w], called alſo Dido, ſiſter of Pygmalion king of Tyre, flying with her brother Barca, in the ſeventh year of the reign of that prince, from Tyre, fixed her reſidence at Carthage, and either founded, or much enlarged, this noble city. Were there any beginnings of a town there before, yet it could not have been a place of very great conſideration till her arrival. The wealth of her huſband [x] Sichæus, and the Tyrians ſhe brought with her, who, at that time, were the [y] moſt polite and ingenious people in the world, enabled her to enlarge and beautify the place, if ſhe did not lay the foundations of it; to wall it round, and build a ſtrong citadel in it; to lay the baſis of a moſt flouriſhing and extenſive commerce, for which the Tyrian nation was ſo renowned; and to introduce a form of government, which ſeemed, in Ariſtotle's [z] opinion, by his deſcanting ſo largely upon it, to have been one of the moſt perfect that ever was known in the world, at leaſt, in his time. Dido's arrival in Africa, as we have obſerved, was an hundred thirty-ſeven years before the building of Rome, according to the Varronian account; an hundred forty-two, according to Fabius Pictor, an hundred and fourteen before the firſt olympiad; eight hundred ninety-two, or eight hundred and ninety, before the birth of Chriſt, and near three hundred after the deſtruction of Troy, unleſs, with Sir Iſaac Newton [a], we will ſuppoſe the antient chronologers to have anticipated that deſtruction near three hundred years. Virgil indeed ſeems to have allowed this ſuppoſition; for notwithſtanding what has been advanced by ſeveral learned men [b] to excuſe him on that head, had he been of the common opinion, the monſtrous anachroniſm he makes, by bringing Æneas and Dido together as contemporaries, would have been utterly inexcuable. We ſhall hereafter give a full and ample account of the occaſion and manner of Dido's flight from Tyre, of her putting into the iſland of Cyprus, and ſteering afterwards her courſe courſe for the coaſts of Africa, where ſhe happily arrived; ſo that it will be entirely unneceſſary, even ſo much as to touch upon theſe particulars in this place [c].

[w] Juſt. l. xviii Virgil. Æn. i. & Serv. in loc. Cedren in hiſt. compend. p. 140. edit Pariſ. 1647. Univerſ. hiſt. vol. ii. p. 381, 382, &c. [x] Virg. Juſt &c. ubi ſupra [y] Newt. chron. p. 13. Boch. phal & de col Phœn paſſim. 1. Kings, c. v. &c. [z] Ariſt de rep l. ii. c 11. [a] Newt chron. p. 32, 65, &c. [b] Ludovic. de la Cerda Car. Ruæus Macrob. alique.

Name whence derived.

How this city came to be called Carthage, authors are not fully agreed. Solinus [d] tells us, that its true name was Carthada, which, in the Carthaginian language, ſignified the New City; and herein he is followed by Salmaſius [e], Schindler [f], Bochart [g], and others, who deduce it from the two Oriental words, Charta Hadatta, which are of the ſame import. But, beſides that it is too far fetched and unnatural, theſe very authors themſelves ſupply us with arguments to overthrow this etymon; for Schindler [h] derives Carthago from the Oriental word Charta, a city; and the other two [i] allow, that the city was founded long before Dido came into Africa, and that ſhe only built that part of it called Byrſa, or the citadel. Dr. Hyde [k] derives it either from Chadre Hanacha, i. e. The chamber of reſt, or place of repoſe, or from Card Haneca, the New City, as before, becauſe Plautus in his Pœnulus intimates, that it was called by the natives Chaedreanech; but theſe derivations likewiſe are too forced and unſatisfactory, and are beſides overthrown by Bochart [l]. Servius [m] therefore ſeems to come nearer the truth, when he ſays, that, according to the Carthaginians themſelves, who muſt be ſuppoſed to be the beſt acquainted with their own origin, it received its name from Charta, a town not far from Tyre, to which Dido bore a near relation; and this town is called by Cedrenus [n] Chartica, or Chartaca, i. e. Charta Aca, or Charta Aco, the city of Aca [o] or Aco, a celebrated ſea-port of Phœnice (C), near Tyre and Sidon, in the territory of the [c] Univerſ. hiſt. vol. ii. p. 380, 381. [d] Solin. c. 27. [e] Salmaſ. in Solin. p. 322. [f] Schind. pentaglot. p 1654. [g] Bochart de col. Phœn. l i. c. 24, &c. [h] Schind. ubi ſupra. [i] Salmaſ. & Bochart. ubi ſupra. [k] Hyde in not. ad Peritſol. p. 44. [l] Bochart. Chan, l. i. c. 1. [m] Serv. in Virgil. Æn. i. ver. 37. & Æn. in ver. 75. [n] Cedren, hiſt. compend p. 140. edit. Par. 1647. [o] Schind. pentaglot. p. 1313. Strab. l. xvi. p. 521. Diodor. Sic. l. xix. c 93. Corn. Vep. Datam. c. 5. Plin. l. v. c. 19. Steph. Byz. de urb. Hieronym. in Am. i, ii. & LXX. in Jud. i.

(C) The place was, according to Cedrenus, a maritime city or ſea-port, as will appear from a peruſal of the paſſage referred to; which is an additional argument in favour of our notion. We find the tribe of Aſher [p], tho' poſſeſſed by the [q] Tyrians or Phœnicians. In ſupport of Servius and Cedrenus's authority, it may be obſerved, that the Sidonians, Tyrians and Canaanites inhabiting that part of Phœnice, frequently prefixed the word kiriath, cariath, or charta, i. e. city, to the proper names of towns, as Kiriath [r], or, according to St. Jerom, Cariath-Arba, Cariath-Baal, Cariath-Sanna, Cariath-Sepher, &c. tho' ſometimes they ſtyled them ſimply Cariath [s], or Charta, city, and, for the moſt part in writing, uſed their proper names [t] alone; ſo that is no wonder the town under conſideration, ſhould be known by the names Charta, Aca, Aco, Chartica, Chartaca, Cartaco, &c. ſince this was perfectly agreeable to the genius of its inhabitants. Farther, tho' Dido's city was conſtantly called by the Latin writers Carthago, yet its true name amongſt the antient Romans, who undoubtedly received it from the Carthaginians themſelves, was Cartaco [u], as is evident from the columna roſtrata (D) of Duilius. This, together with what has been [w] obſerved in the ſecond volume of this hiſtory, ſeems to render the authority above mentioned inconteſtable.

That

[p] Jud. i. ver. 31. [q] Ibid. [r] Jud. i. ver. 10. Joſh. xviii. ver. 14. xv. ver 15, 49. [s] Jerem. xlviii. ver. 24, 41. Am. xi. ver. 2 [t] Joſh. xv. ver. 9, 60, &c. [u] Vide Pet. Ciacconium in column. roſtrat. Duil. apud Joan. Geor. Græv. in theſaur. antiquit. Roman. tom. iv. p. 1810. [w] Univerſ. hiſt. vol. ii p. 380, 381.

find likewiſe a city, called Kartah, given to the Levites in this country, taken out of the tribe of Zebulun.

(D) We have before given an Engliſh tranſlation (8) of the old Latin inſcription upon the baſis of the columna roſtrata of Duilius; but as it is a moſt curious and valuable monument of antiquity, we believe our learned and inquiſitive readers would think us guilty of a great omiſſion, were not the original itſelf inſerted ſomewhere in this work; eſpecially as many fine concluſions relating to the Latin language may be drawn from it; and the ſurpriſing manner in which that language was poliſhed and refined in leſs than two centuries, may be from thence diſcovered. In order therefore to render our hiſtory as complete as poſſible, and evince the point at preſent in view, we ſhall here preſent our readers with the inſcription itſelf, and the chaſms of it, as ſupplied by Lipſius and Ciacconius, together with a verſion of it into the Latin of the Auguſtan age:

C.

(8) Univerſ. hiſt. vol. xii. p. 115. in not.

C. BILIOS. M. F. COS. ADVORSOM. CARTACINIENSEIS. EN. SICELIAD REM. CERENS. ECEST. ANO S. COCNATOS. POPLI. ROMANI. ARTISUMAD OBSEDEONED. REMET. LECION. EIS. CARTACINIENSEIS. OMNEIS. MAXIMOSQUE. MACISTRATOS. LUCAES. BOVEBOS RELICTEIS. NOVEM. CASTREIS. EXFOCIONT. MACELLAM. MOENITAM. URBEM. PUCNANDOD. CEPET. ENQUE. EODEM. MACESTRATOD. PROSPERE REM. NAVEBOS. MARID. CONSOL. PRIMOS. CESET. RESMECOSQUE CLASESQUE. NAVALES. PRIMOS. ORNAVET. PARAVETQUE. DIEBOS LX CUMQUE EIS NAVEBUS. CLASEIS. POENICAS. OMNIS. PARATASQUE. SUMAS. COPIAS. CARTACINIENSIS. PRESENTED. MAXUMOD. DICTATORED. OLOROM. IN. ALTOD. MARID. PUCNANDOD. VICET XXXQUE. NAVEIS. CEPET. CUM. SOCIEIS. SEPTEMRESMOMQUE. DUCIS QUINRESMOSQUE. TRIRESMOSQUE. NAVEIS. XX. DEPRESET

AUROM. CAPTOM. NUMEI ϕϕϕ OCC

ARCENTOM. CAPTOM. PRÆDA NUMEI. ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ C

CRAVE. CAPTOM. AES. ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ

ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ

ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ ↀↀↀIↃↃↃ PONDOD

TRIOMPOQUE. NAVALED. PRÆDAD. POPLOM. ROMANOM. DONAVET CAPTIVOS. CARTACINIENSEIS. INCENVOS. DUXET. ANTE. CUROM PRIMOSQUE. CONSOL. DE. SICELEIS. CLASEQUE. CARTACINIENSEOM TRIOMPAVET. EAROM. REROM. ERCO. S. P. Q. R. EI. HANCE. COLUMNAM. P.

THAT it was uſual in thoſe early ages to denominate ſom cities from others, as well as from their founders, is a truth well known to all perſons moderately verſed in the knowledge of antiquity; and the city of Thebes in Bœotia (E), ſo called

Caius Duilius Marci filius Conſul adverſus Carthaginienſes in Sicilia rem gerens, Egeſtanos (ſocios atque) cognatos populi Romani artiſſima obſidione exemit. Legiones (enim) omnes Carthaginienſium (qui Egeſtam obſidebant, & Amilcar) maximus (eorum) magiſtratus (feſtinandi ſtudio) elephantis relictis novem, caſtris effugerunt. Macellam (deinde) munitam (validamque) urbem pugnando cepit. Atque in eodem magiſtratu proſpere rem navibus mari conſul primus geſſit: remiges claſſeſque navales primus ornavit atque paravit diebus ſexaginta, & cum his navibus claſſes Punicas omnes, paratas (ornatas) que ſummas copias Carthaginienſium, præſente (Annibale) maximo dictatore illorum, in alto mari pugnando ſuperavit; triginta que naves cum ſociis (hoc eſt cum ipſis hominibus) cepit, & ſeptiremem prætoriam, quinqueremes (præterea) ac triremes naves xx depreſſit.
Aurum captum in præda nummi III. M. DCC.
Argentum captum in præda nummi C. M.
Æs grave captum vicies ſemel centena millia pondo, atque in triumpho navali prædam (omnem in ærariam) Popul. Rom. intulit.
captivos (etiam) Carthaginienſes ingenuos (hoc eſt, nobiles aliquot) ante currum duxit:
primuſque Conſul, de Siculis, & claſſe Carthaginienſium triumphavit. Earum rerum ergo
S. P. Q. R. ei hancce columnam poſuit. vel triumphavit. Earum rerum ergo Marti donum dedit atque dicavit (9).

Hence it is apparent, that, when this naval trophy was erected, the Carthaginians were called by the Romans CARTACINIENSES, and conſequently the name of their city, then in uſe amongſt the Romans, was CARTACO.

(E) It is plain from ſcripture (9), that there was a town of this name likewiſe in Phœnice, or the land of Canaan, not far from led from Thebes in Egypt; Piſa in Italy, from Piſa in Peloponneſus; Salamis in Cyprus, from Salamis in Attica, to omit ſeveral others that might be mentioned, are ſufficient inſtances of it.

(9) Vide Petr. Ciaccon. Tolet. in column. roſt. Duil. apud Grav. in theſaur. antiq. Rom. tom. iv. p. 1810. (9) Jud. c. ix ver. 50, 53.

SALMASIUS [x] will have the Greek name Charchedon to be derived from Solinus's Carthada; becauſe the Sicilians now-and-then uſed the Greek letter chi for theta. But ſure nothing can be more weak than this; beſides, were it much more plauſible, it could not be admitted, becauſe it claſhes with the authority of Philiſtus (F), Appian, Euſebius, and St. Jerom. Herodotus, Menander Epheſius, Polybius, &c. the moſt antient Greek authors, mentioning the Carthaginians, likewiſe diſprove it, becauſe they were not Sicilians.

THE Carthaginians were called by the Greeks, ſometimes Libyans, on account of the country they poſſeſſed, and ſometimes Phœnicians, on account of the country from whence they were originally deſcended. The Romans alſo ſtyled them Pœni, or Phœnicians, for the ſame reaſon; and every thing belonging to them, or their city, Punic or Pœnic, i. e. Phœnician, or belonging to the Phœnicians.

Caccabe the Punic name of Carthage.

WE muſt not omit obſerving, that, according to Stephanus [y] and Euſtathius, this city was antiently named, in Punic, Caccabe, from a horſe's head, which was found by the Tyrians, whilſt they were digging for the foundations of Byrſa. This was looked upon as a happy omen, portending the martial diſpoſition of the inhabitants, and the future greatneſs of the city. Our readers will find the whole ſtory in Virgil [z] and Juſtin, and to theſe authors we refer them. In the mean time, we ſhall only remark, that the learned Bochart [a] has ſhewn the word Caccabe to have ſignified, in from Shechem; ſo that whether we look upon Cadmus as a Phœnician or an Egyptian, it can ſcarce be doubted, but that Thebes in Bœotia was ſo denominated from ſome more antient city.

[x] Salmaſ. ubi ſupra [y] Steph. Byz. de urb. Euſtath. in Dionyſ. Afr. [z] Virg. Æn. i. Juſt. l. xviii Serv. & Ludovic: de la Cerda in Æn. i. Coel. Rhodigin. l. xviii. c. 38. [a] Bochart. de col. Phœn. l. i. c. 24.

(F) All theſe authors are clearly of opinion, that Carthage was built a conſiderable time before Dido came into Africa; and therefore, if their authority be of any weight, it is highly improbable, that from the citadel Byrſa only, the addition ſhe made to the old city, the place was called Carthada, or the New city; and if this be allowed, it muſt likewiſe be admitted, that Salmaſius endeavours abſurdly to reduce Carchedon from Carthada.

the Phœnician language, the head of the animal above-mentioned; and that, upon account of this event, the Carthaginians [b] had frequently upon the reverses of their coins, either a horse's head, or the body of a horse dimidiated, or a horse entire, with Victory upon him. Most of these coins have likewise a Punic inscription upon their said reverses, with several other symbols; as is evident from Agostini, Paruta, and others, as well as from the cabinets of the curious.

In order to avoid all future digressions on this head, we shall here give a faithful and particular account of the situation, dimensions, different parts, and power of the city of Carthage, according to the condition it was in at the beginning of the third Punic war, extracted from Polybius [c], Strabo, Diodorus, Appian, and other antient authors of the best reputation and authority.

Description of Carthage.

Carthage stood at the bottom of a gulf, upon a peninsula three hundred and sixty stadia, or forty-five miles, in circumference, the isthmus joining this peninsula to the continent of Africa, being twenty-five stadia, or three miles and a furlong, in breadth. On the west side there projected from it a long tract of land, in shape resembling a tongue, half a stadium broad; which shooting out into the sea, separated it from a lake or morass, and was strongly fortified on all sides by rocks, and a single wall. In the middle of the city stood the fortress or citadel, erected by Dido, called Byrsa, having on the top of it a temple sacred to Æsculapius, seated on a very high hill, upon rocks, and to which the ascent was by sixty steps. This temple was rich, beautiful, and of a considerable extent; so that when Byrsa was taken by Scipio, towards the close of the last siege of Carthage, nine hundred Roman deserters fortified themselves there. At last Asdrubal's wife setting fire to it, entirely consumed it, together with herself, her children, and the said nine hundred deserters, to avoide falling into the hands of Scipio. On the south side, towards the continent, where Byrsa had its situation, the city was surrounded with a triple wall, thirty cubits high, abstracted from the parapets and towers, with which it was flanked all round at equal distances, each interval being fourscore fathoms, or four hundred and eighty foot. Every tower had its foundations sunk thirty foot deep, and was four stories high, tho' the walls were but two; they were arched, and in the lower part, corresponding in depth depth with the foundations above-mentioned, were ſtalls large enough to hold three hundred elephants, with their fodder &c. Over theſe were ſtables for four thouſand horſes, and lofts for their food. There likewiſe was room enough to lodge twenty thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe. Such a number of forces and beaſts of war were contained within the walls, without in the leaſt incommoding the inhabitants. The walls were weak and low in one part only, and that was an angle, which, from the firſt building of the city, had been neglected, beginning at the long tract of land advancing into the ſea towards the weſtern continent, before taken notice of, and extending as far as the harbours, which were on the ſame ſide. Of theſe there were two, which were diſpoſed in ſuch a manner, as to have a communication with one another, and had one common entrance, ſeventy foot broad, and ſhut up with chains. The firſt was appropriated to the merchants, and included in it a vaſt number of places of refreſhment, and all kinds of accommodations for the ſeamen. The ſecond, or inner port, was, as well as the iſland called Cothon in the midſt of it, lined with large kays, in which were diſtinct receptacles for ſecuring and ſheltering from the weather two hundred and twenty ſhips, it being deſigned chiefly for ſhips of war. Over theſe were magazines or ſtore-houſes, wherein was lodged whatever is neceſſary for the arming and equipping of fleets. The entrance into each of theſe receptacles was adorned with two marble pillars of the Ionic order; ſo that both the harbour and the iſland repreſented on each ſide two magnificent galleries. Upon the iſland was the admiral's palace, from whence orders were given, and proclamations iſſued out; and as it ſtood oppoſite to the mouth of the harbour, he could from thence diſcover whatever was doing at ſea, tho' no one there could ſee what was tranſacting in the inward part of the harbour; nay, the merchants themſelves, when they entered into their port, had no proſpect of the men of war, being ſeparated from them by a double wall, and each port having its particular gate that led to the city, without paſſing through the other.

[b] Ant. August. dial. vi. ant. [c] Polyb. l. i. c. 73. Strab. l. xvii. p. 572. Appian. in Libyc. p. 129. Diodor. Sic. bibl. hist. l. iii. p. 178. Oros. l. iv. c. 22. p. 277.

Of how many parts the city conſiſted.

HENCE it is apparent, that the city conſiſted of three parts, Byrſa, Megara (G) or Magaria, and Cothon. Byrſa, accor-

(G) The true name of the exterior part of Carthage, (or that which was, properly ſpeaking, the town) was Megara or Megaria, not Magalia, as we formerly imagined. Appian, Iſidore, and Servius put this point beyond diſpute (10).

(10) Appian. & Serv. ubi ſupra. Iſidor. in orig. l. xiii. c. 12. Vide etiam Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 24.

ding to Servius [d], was twenty-two ſtadia, or near thre Engliſh miles, in circumference; tho' Eutropius ſays, it di not much exceed two thouſand paces, which is not quite tw Engliſh miles. It was not ſo preciſely in the middle of th city, but that it inclined to the ſouth, or iſthmus that joine Carthage to the continent, as is obſerved by Appian [e]. The word Byrſa is only a Greek corruption of the true Punic or Phœnician name Burſa, Borſa, or Botſra, (for it may be pronounced all theſe ways) i. e. a fortreſs or citadel, as has been demonſtrated by Scaliger [f], Bochart, and others, verſed in the oriental languages, and may be inferred from Strabo, Virgil, and Appian, the fable of the ox's hide having long ſince been exploded by the learned. This was juſtly looked upon as the interior part of Carthage, ſurrounded by the Megara [g], or Magaria, i. e. the houſes, or town, (for that the word imports in the Phœnician tongue) its exterior part, according to Servius; ſo that together they formed a kind of double town. Strabo calls the ſmall iſland in the midſt of the ſecond harbour, Cothon [h]; tho' Appian applies this name likewiſe to that port or harbour [i] itſelf, which, if this writer is to be credited, was environed by a ſtrong wall, and had one of its parts round, but the other quadrangular. The word Cothon is of oriental extraction, and ſignifies a port not formed by nature [l], but the effect of labour and art; ſo that this ſeems to have been not a proper, but a common, name among the Carthaginians, who undoubtedly pronounced it Kathum or Kathom; but the Greeks, adopting it into their own language, gave it a Greek termination, and expreſſing the Phœnician A by their great O, (which may eaſily be conceived) thence came the name Cothon. The Carthaginians were ſo extremely active and indefatigable, that when Scipio [m] had blocked up the old port, or Cothon, they, in a very ſhort time, built a new one, the traces of which, ſcarce an hundred yards ſquare, are ſtill to be ſeen [n]. This Cothon was perhaps perhaps the ſame that was called the Mandracium [o] in the time of Procopius.

[d] Serv in Æn. i. ver. 320. Eutrop. & Bochart. ubi ſupra. [e] Appian. & Bochart. ubi ſupra. [f] Scalig. in not ad Feſt. Bochart. ubiſupra. Salmaſ in Solin. &c. [g] Serv. in Æni & iv. [h] Strab. l. xvii. p. 572. [i] Appian. in Libyc. p 129. &c. [l] Feſt in voc cothones. Serv. in Æn. i Bochart. ubi ſupra. Buxtorf, in voc קמם &c [m] Liv. l. li. epit. [n] Shaw's geographical obſervations relating to the kingdom of Tunis, p. 150, 151.

THE number of inhabitants this city contained, at the beginning of the third Punic war, was ſeven hundred thouſand; a prodigious number, conſidering the many terrible blows the Carthaginians had received from the Romans during the courſe of the firſt and ſecond Punic wars, as well as from their own mercenaries in the interval betwixt theſe wars, and the deſtructive broils they had been engaged in with Maſiniſſa. The forces they could bring into the field, as well as their power by ſea, when they had a mind to exert themſelves in an extraordinary manner, were very formidable, as appears from the army commanded by Hamilcar in his expedition againſt Gelon the tyrant of Syracuſe, which conſiſted of three hundred thouſand men; and the fleet, forwarding the operations of the land forces, which was compoſed of more than two thouſand ſhips of war, and above three thouſand tranſports. Their riches were likewiſe immenſe, as may be collected from what Scipio carried off at the final deſtruction of the town, after it had been thoroughly plundered, and, as was imagined, entirely exhauſted and conſumed, viz. near a million and an half ſterling. All which may ſerve to give us ſome faint idea of what Carthage was, when in the height of its grandeur and magnificence. Number of inhabitants.

As to the extent of the city, Livy informs us, that it was twenty-three [p] miles round; and if what is related of it above be true, this is not improbable. Pliny [q] intimates, that Carthage, when in the hands of the Phœnicians, was much larger than when it was a Roman colony; and Suidas affirms, that it was the greateſt and moſt powerful city in the world. The dominion of the ſea, which it enjoyed for ſix hundred years, almoſt without interruption, together with the genius of its citizens for commerce, aggrandized it in a moſt prodigious manner; to which if we add its excellent form of government, which will be explained more fully hereafter, its extenſive trade, the mines of Spain, &c. thoſe inexhauſtible ſources of wealth; it can be no matter of wonder, that the Carthaginians ſhould have arrived at ſuch an exalted pitch of power. One particular edifice, hitherto omitted in our deſcription of Carthage, it may not be improper to take notice of, viz. the temple of Apollo [r], ſtanding near the Cothon, The extent of Carthage.

[o] Procop. l. i c. 20. [p] Liv. l. li. epit [q] Plin. l. v. c. 4. [r] Appian. ubi ſupra.

thon, wherein was a ſtatue of that deity of maſſive gold, and whoſe inſide was all covered with plates of the ſame metal, weighing a thouſand talents [s]. But this was involved in the common deſtruction of the city, being pillaged and deſtroyed by a party of Scipio's men, when the Cothon and adjacent part of the city were taken by that general.

Preſent remains of antient Carthage.

IT has been [t] obſerved by a curious and learned modern traveller, who was himſelf upon the ſpot, that the greateſt part of Carthage was built upon three hills, ſomewhat inferior in elevation to thoſe upon which Rome was erected. All the remains of this once famous city are, according to this traveller, the area of a ſpacious room upon one of thoſe hills, over-looking the ſouth-eaſt ſhore, with ſeveral ſmaller ones hard by it; the common ſewers, which time hath not in the leaſt injured or impaired; and the ciſterns, which have very little ſubmitted to the general ruins of the city. The harbour is now ſtopped up, and, by the north-eaſt winds with the (H) Mejerdah, made almoſt as far diſtant from the ſea as Utica, tho' it is ſtill called El-Merſa, or the port, lying to the north and north-weſt of the city, and formeth, with the lake of Tunis, the peninſula on which Carthage ſtood.

Vaſt extent of the Carthaginian dominions.

STRABO [u] obſerves, that the Carthaginians poſſeſſed three hundred cities in Africa before the beginning of the third Punic war; which may eaſily be believed, if we conſider, that the dominions of this ſtate in Africa before that war, extended from the weſtern confines of Cyrenaica [w], to the pillars of Hercules, or ſtreights of Gibraltar (I), a tract of land near fifteen

[s] Idem, ibid. [t] Shaw ubi ſupra. [u] Strab. l. xvii. [w] Scylax Caryand. Vide & Bochart. ubi ſupra, &c.

(H) This river, the Bagrada of the antients, will be deſcribed in the next chapter.

(I) The diſtance betwixt the Philænorum Aræ and pillars of Hercules, according to Polybius (11), was ſixteen thouſand ſtadia, or about two thouſand miles. But from Dr. Shaw's moſt accurate obſervations, it appears to have been one thouſand four hundred and twenty geographical miles, ſixty of which make a degree of a great circle. The particulars of this computation may be ſeen in the following table:

From

(11) Polyb. l. iii.

fifteen hundred miles in length. When it was arrived at its laſt period of perfection, the beſt part of Spain, even as far as the Pyrenees, of Sicily, and all the iſlands in the Mediterranean to the weſt of this latter, were ſubject to it. How it came to make ſuch large acquiſitions, and by what ſteps it grew ſo formidable, as to diſpute the empire of the world with Rome itſelf, will appear in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

	Miles.
From Tingi, or Tangier, to the river Malva, or Mulloöiah	200
To the eaſtern part of the river Chinalaph, or Shelliff	220
To the river Ampſaga, or city of Cirta	165
To Laribus by Theveſte, or Tiffeſh	130
To Carthage	70
To Kairwan, olim Vicus Auguſti	75
To Tacape in the Leſſer Syrtis	110
To Tripolis	135
To Leptis Magna, or Libda, in the Greater Syrtis	115
To the bottom of the Greater Syrtis, now called the gulf of Seedra, where the Philænorum Aræ are ſuppoſed to have been ſituated	200
In all	1420

Hence it is evident, that Polybius makes this tract to have been of a greater extent than it really was, tho' conſidering the largeneſs of the geographical miles above-mentioned, that author does not ſo much exceed the truth, as may at firſt ſight be imagined.

SECT. II.

A deſcription of Africa Propria, or the territory of Carthage.

HAVING given our readers the beſt account of the origin and foundation of Carthage that can be drawn from antiquity, as likewiſe a ſmall ſketch of its power, wealth, magnitude, &c. which we ſhall expatiate more largely upon hereafter; before we proceed directly to the hiſtory of the Carthaginians, or deſcribe the religion, government, Africa Propria.

government, genius, commerce, manners, arts, sciences, &c. of that people, it will be proper to give a description of the country wherein they were seated, and which was looked upon as the natural territory of their city; for with regard to the other dominions they, at certain intervals, possessed, or got a footing in, they were sometimes of a larger, and sometimes of a narrower, extent; sometimes in their own hands, and sometimes in those of other states, according as success or misfortune attended them in the management of their affairs.

Its limits. MELA [a] and Ptolemy will have Africa Propria to have contained all the countries situate between the river Ampsaga and the borders of Cyrenaica, which, Pliny [b] tells us, were inhabited by twenty-six different nations; but this gives it too great an extent, as making it to include Numidia and the Regio Syrtica, which are countries distinct from the proper territory of Carthage. Its true limits seem [c] to have been the river Tusca on the west, or side of Numidia; the Mediterranean or African sea on the north; the frontiers of the Garamantes and deserts of Libya Interior on the south; and the Mediterranean, with the Lesser Syrtis, on the east. It [d] was divided into two provinces, the Regio Zeugitana, and Byzacium, with which the kingdom of Tunis [e], under its division into the summer and winter circuits, at present nearly corresponds. According to Dio [f], this region was likewise called the old province, and Numidia the new one. Byzacium [g], or at least the sea coast of that province, seems to be the Emporia of Livy and Polybius.

Division.

PTOLEMY [h] has placed Carthage, and all the neighbouring cities, four degrees too southerly, which is not to be wondered at, considering the inaccuracy of that geographer in ascertaining the latitudes of places. If we admit the position of Africa Propria to have been nearly the same with that of the kingdom of Tunis, as there is great reason to believe [i], it must have taken up almost four degrees of north latitude, viz.

[a] Pomp. Mela, l. i. c. 7. Ptol. l. iv. c. 3. Vide etiam Cellar. geogr. ant. l. iv. c. 4. [b] Plin. l. v. c. 4. [c] Idem, ibid. Herodot. l. iv. Scylax Caryand in peripl. edit. Oxon. 1698. Ptol. geogr. l. iv. & Cellar. geogr. ant. l. iv. c. 4. [d] Plin. ubi supra. Strab. l. ii. [e] Shaw's geographical description of the kingdom of Tunis, chap. 1, 2 &c. [f] Dio, l. xliii. p. 246. [g] Liv. l. xxxiv. Polyb. l. i. & Cellar. ubi supra. [h] Ptol. geog. l. iv. Shaw ubi sup. [i] Shaw, ibid.

viz. from 33° 30′ N. to 37° 12′ N. and of longitude above three degrees, ſince Sbekkah, the moſt advanced city of the kingdom of Tunis to the weſtward, is in 8°, and Clybea, the fartheſt to the eaſt, in 11° 20′ E. longitude from London. The ſpot of ground on which Carthage ſtood is, according to the lateſt obſervations [k], about 10° 40′ eaſt of London, and in north latitude 36° 40′.

ZEUGITANA, or the Regio Zeugitana, was ſeparated from Numidia by the river Tuſca, and extended as far as Adrumetum, which Pliny [l] makes to be the firſt city of Byzacium. The ſummer circuit of the kingdom of Tunis [m], including the fruitful country about Keff and Bai-jah, and ſeveral other diſtricts, anſwers at preſent to this province, which was the Regio Carthaginienſium of Strabo [n], and the Africa Propria of Pliny and Solinus [o]. We ſhall not pretend here to give a minute and particular deſcription of all the cities it contained, as being incongruous with our preſent deſign; but only touch upon ſome of the principal of them, which have been taken the moſt notice of by thoſe writers who have treated of the Roman and Carthaginian affairs. Zeugitana.

THE firſt place in Zeugitana worthy our notice, ſince Carthage has been already deſcribed, is Utica. In rank and dignity this city was next to Carthage itſelf, and even ſuperior to it in point of antiquity. Ariſtotle [p] ſays it was built, according to the Phœnician hiſtorians, two hundred and eighty-ſeven years before Carthage. Vellius [q], as has been above related, makes the Tyrians to have founded it a little more than eighty years after the deſtruction of Troy. Juſtin [r] intimates, that the Tyrians were ſettled there a conſiderable time before Dido came into Africa; nay, that this ſettlement commenced upon their firſt arrival in that country: and with theſe two laſt authors Mela and Stephanus [s] agree. From this great antiquity, Bochart [t] thinks the Phœnicians gave it the name Atica, the antient, i. e. city, rather, in our opinion, Etuca [u] or Ituca, i. e. the city of long ſtanding, or the great city, the ſtrong city, &c. which appellation it might have gone by amongſt the Tyrians, even in Dido's time; and this notion receives a good degree of probability from Scylax and Polybius, the moſt antient authors mentioning it, who Utica.

[k] Ibid. [l] Plin. ubi ſup & Cellar. ibid [m] Shaw, ubi ſup. [n] Strab. l. xvii. [o] Plin. ubi ſup. & Solin. c. 27. [p] Ariſtot de mirabil. [q] Vell. Paterc. ubi ſup. [r] Juſt l. xviii. [s] Steph. de urb. & Mela, c. 7. [t] Bochart. de col. Phœn. l. i. c. 24. [u] Part. Pahul. Vid. Schind. pentag.

who call it Ituce, or Ityce, to whom the other Greek authors, ſpeaking of it, except Dio, who uſes the Latin name, may be added. The gulph, on which both this city and Carthage ſtood, was formed by two promontories, viz. the promontory of Mercury and that of Apollo, under the laſt of which Utica was ſeated. Appian [w] ſays it was ſixty ſtadia, or ſeven miles and an half to the weſtward of Carthage; but, according to the itinerary, theſe two cities were twenty-ſeven Roman miles diſtant from each other [x]. Utica had a large and commodious harbour, and was famous on many accounts in the Roman hiſtory, but on none more than the death of the younger Cato, who was from thence called Cato Uticenſis, or Cato of Utica. After Carthage was razed by the Romans, it had a grant made it of all the country lying between Carthage and Hippo, and was for a conſiderable time the metropolis of Africa. An ingenious modern traveller [y] ſuppoſes this place to have ſtood where Boo-ſhatter does at preſent; the traces of buildings of great extent and magnificence ſtill viſible there, and the diſtance from Carthage perfectly agreeing with that of the itinerary, beſides other circumſtances, giving good grounds for ſuch a ſuppoſition.

Tunes.

THE next town in the neighbourhood of Carthage, but in a contrary direction to the former, is Tunes, or Tuneta, the Tunis of the moderns. This town is undoubtedly of great antiquity, being taken particular notice of by Polybius [z], Diodorus, Livy, and others; nay, that it was of Phœnician original, the name itſelf ſufficiently implies: for we find in that part of the Lower Egypt, almoſt contiguous to the borders of Arabia Petræa and Phœnice, a town called Tanes [a], from whence the Tanitic nome and Tanitic mouth of the Nile took their name. And 'tis well known, that this part of Egypt [b] was over-run by the Phœnicians, either in the time of Joſhua, or much earlier; and that theſe ſame Phœnicians afterwards ſettled in Africa Propria, Numidia, and Mauritania. In confirmation of which ſentiment, we find find a river in Numidia [c], not far from the Ampſaga, called Tanas; from whence we may infer, ſince nothing is more common in the oriental languages, than a permutation of vowels, that Tunes is a Phœnician name, and that the city itſelf is of Phœnician extraction. That it was a town of ſome note in very early ages, is evident from Livy [d], Diodorus, and Strabo, who tell us, that there was a hot bath, and a famous quarry, not far from it; that it was fortified both by nature and art, and ſurrounded with a wall. It was ſeated on or near the mouth of the river Catada, fifteen Roman miles eaſt of Carthage. The city is more famous now, than it was even amongſt the antients, being the capital of a powerful kingdom. The greateſt part of it is ſituate upon a riſing ground, along the weſtern banks of the lake, which goes by the ſame name [e], and in a full proſpect (as the antients have deſcribed it) of the Guletta, Carthage, and the iſland Zowa-moore. Tunis ſome time ſince was noted for its corſairs, but of late the inhabitants have applied themſelves wholly to trade, and are now become the moſt civilized and polite people in Barbary (A).

[w] Appian. in Libyc. [x] Auct. itin. int. Carth. & Utic. [y] Shaw ubi ſup. [z] Polyb. l. i. Liv. l. xxx Diodor. Sic. l xiv. Strab. l. xvii. &c. [a] Herod. Strab. Plin. Ptol. aliiq; Vide etiam Cellar. geog. ant. p. 785, 799. ed. Lipſiæ 1732. [b] D. Auguſt. in expoſit. epiſt. ad 3 Rom. ſub init. Procop. de bell. Vand. l. ii. c. 10. Euſeb chron. l. i p. 11 Gemar Hieroſol. ad Tit. Shebith, cap. 6. Manetho apud Joſeph. cont. Apion. l. i. Nonnus in Dionyſiac. l. xiii. Newton's chronol. p. 198—202. Marſham's can. chron. Bp. Cumberland's treatiſe on Sanchoniatho's Phœn. hiſt. Univ. Hiſt. Vol. ii.

Maxula. MAXULA, or, according to Ptolemy, Mazula [f], is an antient town of the ſtate of Carthage, and, if Pliny [g] may be credited, pretty near the city, in a direction contrary to the promontory of Apollo and Utica. We find on the weſtern banks of the Tigris a city in Arabic [h], named Moſul, or Mozul; which word is not remote from the Mazula of Ptolemy. 'Tis likewiſe evident from the authority of Scylax, who mentions it, that Mazula was of ſome repute in his time, and therefore of great antiquity; from which conſiderations we may conclude it not improbable, as there is a very great affinity betwixt the Arabic and Phœnician languages,

[c] Sal. in Jugurth. c. 95. Cellar. geog. ant. p. 913. [d] Liv. Diodor. & Strab. ubi ſup. & alibi. [e] Shaw ubi ſup. p. 155. [f] Ptol. geog. l. iv. [g] Plin. l. v. c. 4. [h] Val. Shind. pentaglot. Cellar. geog. ant. p. 623.

(A) Somewhere near this place Adis or Adda is to be looked for, where Regulus gave the Carthaginians a memorable defeat, and forced their camp. It appears from Polybius (1), that this was a town of ſome importance; but the antients being ſilent as to any farther particulars relating to it, ſave only that it was ſituated amongſt rocks and hills, we ſhall think it ſufficient juſt to have mentioned it.

(1) Polyb. l. i.

languages, that this town was built by the Phœnicians. It ſtood on the eaſtern ſide of the Catada, now the Miliana; and, if the conjecture of the ingenious gentleman [i] above-mentioned be true, viz. that Mo-raiſah, two leagues to the north-eaſt of Solyman, be the Maxula, or Mazula, of the antients, this town was about eight leagues, or twenty-four Engliſh miles, ſouth-eaſt of Tunes (B).

Carpis. CARPIS, a city of this diſtrict, placed by Ptolemy [k] one third of a degree more northerly than Carthage. Pliny calls it Carpi. Our learned traveller [l] ſuppoſes the ſpot which this town occupied, to be that which Gurbos, or Hammam-Gurbos, at preſent ſtands upon; and that the hot bath near it is the Aquæ Calidæ of Livy. Though the poſition Ptolemy aſſigns his Carpis does not agree with that of the modern Gurbos, this laſt lying above a league more ſoutherly than Carthage, yet we doubt not but the gentleman is in the right, this geographer being very inaccurate in his determination of the latitudes of places.

Miſua. MISUA [m], or Niſua, a town taken notice of by Pliny and Ptolemy, between Carpis and Clypea. The ruins [n] of this place are ſtill to be been at the ſanctuary of Seedy Doud, in the kingdom of Tunis, five leagues to the E. N. E. of the promontory of Hercules.

Aquilaria. THE next place that occurs is the Aquilaria of Cæſar [o], where Curio landed his troops from Sicily. Cæſar tells us, it was a very convenient ſtation in the ſummer ſeaſon, and in the neighbourhood of two promontories. Of theſe, in all probability, that of Mercury (called by the Moors the Raſ-adder

[i] Shaw ubi ſup. p. 57. [k] Plin. & Ptol. ubi ſup. [l] Shaw ubi ſup. p. 57. [m] Plin. & Ptol. ubi ſup. [n] Shaw ubi ſup. [o] Cæſ lib. ii. civ. bell. c. 23.

(B) We find the Muſulani, a people ſeated in the weſtern part of Numidia, not far from the Ampſaga, taken notice of by Tacitus (2); and a town and promontory of Ethiopia, famous for the cinamon they produced, near the confines of Nubia and Libya interior, named Moſylon or Moſulum, remembered by Pliny (3). Now as a Phœnician colony came very early into Numidia, and the Nubians and Ethiopians were the deſcendants of the Egyptians and Arabians, as will hereafter be proved, poſſibly ſome light may from thence be thrown upon what we have advanced concerning the origin of this town.

(2) Tacit. ann. ii. c. 52. & l. iv. c 24 (3) Plin. l. v. c. 4. & l. vi. c. 29.

adder, and by the Franks cape Bon) was one; ſince this is about a league to the northward of Lowah-reah, ſuppoſed to be the antient Aquilaria. Many fragments [p] of antiquities are ſtill extant here, but among them nothing remarkable.

CLYPEA [q], a city built upon the ſmall promontory Taphitis, five leagues ſouth-eaſt of the promontory of Mercury, which being in the figure of a ſhield or hemiſphere, gave occaſion to the name. It is called by Livy, Mela, and Pliny, Clupea; by Polybius, Appian, and Agathemerus, Aſpis; but by Solinus and the itinerary, Clypea. A mile [r] diſtant from the ground where the old city ſtood, is a collection of huts or cottages, called by the inhabitants Clypea. Ptolemy is guilty of a great miſtake, when he makes Aſpis and Clypea two different cities. Clypea.

CURUBIS, Curobis, and Curabis, a town, according to the itinerary, thirty-two Roman miles diſtant from the former; but, according to the more accurate obſervations of the moderns [s], ſeven leagues, or twenty-one miles, ſouth-weſt and by weſt of it. It is ſtyled by Pliny [t] the free city Curubis, and ſeems to have been a conſiderable place in former times; though the ruins of a large aqueduct, and of the ciſterns which received the water, are the only antiquities it can boaſt of at preſent, if the modern Gurba anſwers to it, as both the name and ſituation ſufficiently intimate. Curubis.

CANTHELE, a Phœnician city, not far from Curubis, according to Hecatæus [u]. This town ſeems to have received its appellation from the pagan deity Saturn; ſince, according to Sanchoniatho [w] and Damaſcius, the word el in the Phœnician tongue had a particular relation to that deity. In confirmation of which 'tis obſerved by Ponticus, in his life of St. Cyprian, that there was a town in that place called by the Romans, vicus Saturni, the ſtreet or town of Saturn. This was not a place of figure, at leaſt ſo low as the claſſic times, ſo that we take notice of it here purely on account of its antiquity. Canthole.

NEAPOLIS, a famous and antient empory of the Carthaginians in the ſouth-eaſt part of Zeugitana, five leagues to the Neapolis.

[p] Shaw ubi ſup. p. 158. [q] Strab. lib. xvii. p. 573.
[r] Shaw ubi ſup. [s] Shaw ibid. [t] Plin. ubi ſup. [u] Hecatæus perieget. apud Steph. de urb. [w] Sanchioniatho apud Euſeb. in præp. evang. l. i. c. 10. & Damaſcius apud Photium in bibliothec. 242.

the north-eaſt of Curubis. Thucydides [x] ſays, that the paſſage from hence to Sicily was very ſhort, as being performed in two days and a night. Scylax places it not far from the leſſer Syrtis, and about a day and a half's journey from the promontory of Mercury. Nabal, a thriving and induſtrious modern town, is a furlong to the weſtward of the antient Neapolis, which appears to have been a large city. Pliny ſtyles this place, as well as Curubis, a free city. Here is a great number of inſcriptions upon ſtones of ſix foot in length, and three in breath; but they are either ſo unfortunately defaced, or filled with rubbiſh and mortar, that it is a difficult thing to copy them. Strabo and Hirtius agree with Scylax in fixing it pretty near the promontory of Mercury. Nabal [y] ſtands upon the gulph of Hamonet in N. lat. 36° 8′ two leagues from a little opulent town of the ſame name.

Nepheris. To theſe may be added Nepheris, a fortreſs lying a little to the eaſtward of Carthage. It was a place of good conſideration, being built upon a rock, and ſtrongly fenced by nature on all ſides. Aſdrubal, with his whole army, was cut off near it by Scipio, who, after a ſiege of two and twenty days, reduced the town; and this greatly contributed to the conqueſt of Carthage. Strabo, Appian, and the epitomizer of Livy, take particular notice of it.

Hippo. THE only city remaining in this province that merits any attention is Hippo, towards the north-weſt borders of it, a ſort of frontier town on the ſide of Numidia. From the navigable lake Hipponitis, on which it was built, and which ſerved it as a natural fortification, it was denominated Hippo Diarrhytus, and Hippo Zarytus; tho', from the promontory near it the antients ſometimes gave it the denomination of Acra, Hippuacra, and Hippagreta. Scylax calls it ſimply Hippo, notwithſtanding it generally went by the names above-mentioned in the time of Polybius, Diodorus, Pliny, and Appian; and this in order to diſtinguiſh it from Hippo Regius in Numidia. Appian * tells us, that it was a great city, had a port, a citadel, and repoſitories for naval ſtores. The modern name is Bizerta, which is a corruption of the Hippo Zarytus of the antients. It is pleaſantly ſituated upon a canal †, eight miles to the ſouth and by weſt of cape Blanco, betwixt an extenſive lake and the ſea. It is at preſent about a mile in circuit, defended by ſeveral caſtles and batteries, the principal of which are towards the ſea. The origin gin of it was Phœnician, as has been fully proved by Bochart [z], who derives the name of Hippo from the Syriac or Phœnician Ubbo, or Uppo, a gulph, which perfectly well answers to the situation of the place. To which by way of corroboration it may be observed, that the gulph, on which it was seated, seems, in contradistinction to the city Hippo or Hippon, to be called Hippos by Ptolemy, when he takes notice of the promontory of Hippos, or of the gulph close by it; and if so, this was only the Syriac or Phœnician Ubbo (gulph) with a Greek termination superadded. This gulph is formed by the Promontorium Candidum and Promontorium Apollinis of the antients, the Ras el abeadh and Ras Zibeeb of the present Tunisceens.

[x] Thucyd. l. vii. [y] Shaw ubi ſup. *Appian. in Libyc.
† Shaw ubi ſup.

As for the inland towns of Zeugitana, Ulizibirra, Mediccara, Tucma, Cerbica, Sasura, Cilma, Vepillium, Vina, Valli, Cigisa, Musti, Membressa, Cilio, and others equally obscure, enumerated by Ptolemy, the itinerary, and Peutinger's table; they were for the most part, if not entirely, modern in comparison of the Carthaginian times, and never considerable in any other. We shall therefore conclude what we have to say of this province with observing, that there seem to be some traces of Zeugis or Zeugitana in the present name of the city of Zowan or Zagwan, a small flourishing town built upon the north-east extremity of a conspicuous mountain of the same name, in the summer circuit of the kingdom of Tunis. This will appear extremely probable from what has been advanced by Solinus, compared with the observations of the learned traveller [a] so often cited. The Zygantes of Herodotus seem likewise to have been placed in the neighbourhood of Zagwan, which is an additional argument in support of this notion.

Byzacium. BYZACIUM, according to Pliny [b], was inhabited by the Libyphœnicians, that is, by a mixture of Aborigines, or native Africans, and Carthaginians. The same author tells us, it was about two hundred and fifty Roman miles in circumference, and of so great fertility, that the earth made a return of an hundred fold. The limits of this province seem impossible to be precisely defined, because the antients have passed over the interior part of it bordering upon Libya in a very slight manner, and greatly mistaken the course, magnitude and source of the river Triton; only in general it may be proper to remark, that it is supposed not to have differed much much in extent and ſituation from the preſent winter circuit of the Tuniſeens. We have neither room nor opportunity to be very particular in our account of the towns it formerly contained, and therefore hope that a brief deſcription of ſome of the principal of them will ſuffice.

[z] Bochart. de col. Phœn. l. i c. 24.
[a] Shaw ubi sup c. 3.
[b] Plin. ubi sup.

Adrumetum. ADRUMETUM, or Hadrumetum, the capital of Byzacium, was a city of great antiquity, and of great note in the antient world. It had a variety of names, being called by Strabo and Stephanus, Adryme or Adrume, as alſo Adrymetus; by Plutarch and Ptolemy, Adrumetus or Adrumettus; by Appian, Adrymettus; and by Cæſar, Hirtius, and Pliny, Adrumetum; by Mela, Hadrumetum, or according to Voſſius, Hadrumentum; and laſtly, in Peutinger's table, we find it named Hadrito. The city was large and ſpacious, built upon an hemiſpherical promontory, like Clypea, at the diſtance of two leagues to the ſouth-eaſt of the moraſs, the boundary, as hath been ſuppoſed, betwixt the Zeugitana and this province. According to the itinerary, it was eighteen Roman miles from Leptis Minor, though Peutinger's table makes the diſtance greater. Adjacent to this city was a cothon, being either a port or little iſland, in imitation of that of Carthage ſo called. The city, according to the judgment that can be formed from the preſent ſituation, was ſomething more than a mile in circuit; and from the remaining ruins[c], ſeems rather to have been a place of importance than extent. That it was founded by the Phœnicians, is evident from Salluſt[d] and others; as likewiſe from the name itſelf, which Bochart, with a great appearance of truth, derives from two Syriac or Phœnician words, importing, the land or country returning an hundred fold, i. e. of corn or grain. The extraordinary fertility, not only of the province in general, but of Adrumetum, the metropolis of it, in particular, is confirmed by an inſcription in Smetius[e], which gives a ſanction to Bochart's authority, and ſufficiently convinces us of the truth of what we find related concerning it by the Latin authors; though at this day[f] it is but a barren and uncultivated tract, being partly of a dry ſandy nature, and partly incommoded with moraſſes and ſhibkahs (C) diſperſed over it, eſpecially in the winter ſeaſon.

[c] Shaw ubi ſup. [d] Salluſt. in Jugurth. Bochart. ubi ſup.
[e] Smetius in inſcript. vol. & Vet. Inſcript. apud Gruter. p. 362.
[f] Shaw ubi ſup. p 186.

(C) The word ſhibkah ſignifies in the Arabic language a ſaltiſh plat of ground; and denotes a ſpot generally overflowed in the winter, ſeaſon. If the Herkla of the Tuniſeens, the Heraclea of the lower empire, be Adrumetum, as we ſee no reaſon to doubt, it muſt have been in N. lat. 35° 50′, though Ptolemy places it in N. lat. 32° 40′.

RUSPINA, a town of Byzacium, betwixt Adrumetum and Leptis Minor, where Cæſar encamped in his wars with Scipio [g]. The village of Sahaleel, a little above ſix leagues from Herkla, and a full mile from the ſea, has the faireſt pre- Ruſpina. tenſions to Ruſpina; ſince we are aſſured by Hirtius [h], that the port of Ruſpina was not at a much greater diſtance from the town.

LEPTIS Minor, one of Pliny's free cities, eighteen Roman miles from Adrumetum, of Phœnician extraction. It had the epithet Minor commonly annexed to it, in order to diſtinguiſh it from Leptis Major, a city of the Regio Syrtica, which was built either by the Sidonians, as Salluſt ſeems to intimate [i], or the Tyrians, according to Pliny [k]. Bochart [l] deduces the name Leptis from the Phœnician labt or lapt, denoting a port or ſtation for veſſels. Strabo and Stephanus ſay, that Lepethis, a city of Cyprus, was famous for its commodious ſtation, and the ſame is ſaid of Leptis Minor by Lucan [m]. The city paid every day a talent to the Carthaginians by way of tribute; and all authors agree, that the circumjacent country was exceeding fruitful, which has induced Bochart to drive Emporia (its name in Livy and Polybius) from two Oriental words, importing "the fruitful "mother." The place is at preſent called Lempta; but there is nothing left beſides a ſmall part of the caſtle, with a Leptis Minor.

[g] Ibid. p. 190. [h] Hirt. bell. Afric. ſec. 9. [i] Salluſt in Jugurth. c. 22. & 80. [k] Plin. l. v. c. 19. [l] Bochart ubi ſup. [m] Lucan. bell. civ. l. ix. v. 951.

ter, but dry all the ſummer (4). There are great numbers of theſe in the kingdom of Tunis and Algiers, which appear like ſo many extenſive lakes, and produce a conſiderable quantity of ſalt. In the ſummer they may be taken for bowling greens prepared for the turf. Some of them have a hard and ſolid bottom, without the leaſt mixture of gritty mould, retaining the ſalt that lieth cryſtalized upon them after rain; but others are of a more oozy abſorbent nature, ſeldom preſerving any ſaline incruſtations upon the ſurface. The earth of them all is very pungent to the tongue, and, by a proper ſolution, would yield, no doubt, a copious portion of ſalt.

(4) Shaw in phyſ. and miſcel. obſerv. p. 230.

low ſhelf of rocks, that probably made the northern mound of the Cothon.

Agar. AGAR [n], a town taken notice of by Hirtius, a few miles to the weſtward of Leptis. The ſituation of this place is very rocky, and here is a great quantity of ſtones and ruins. The village, at preſent taking up the ſpot of ground on which Agar ſtood, is called [o] by the Arabs, Boo-Hadjar, i. e. "the father of a ſtone;" which agrees in ſignification pretty well with the old name, and anſwers to the circumſtances above-mentioned.

Thapſus. THAPSUS, a maritime town of this province, ſeated, according to Dio [p], upon a ſort of iſthmus, betwixt the ſea and a lake. Peutinger's table makes it eight miles diſtant from Leptis to the ſouth. The inhabitants of Thapſus were famous for their fidelity to Scipio, in his wars with Cæſar; but notwithſtanding the ſtrength of the place, they were obliged to ſubmit to the latter, after he had defeated the former. Demaſs, the antient Thapſus, is ſituated upon a low neck of land, three miles to the E. by S. of To-bulba, within half a league of which is the lake taken notice of by Hirtius. Here is ſtill remaining [q], in defiance of time and the ſea, a great part of the Cothon, built in frames; the compoſition whereof is made up of ſmall pebbles and mortar, which are ſo well cemented and knit together, that a ſolid rock could not be more hard and durable. The walls of Tlemſan very much reſemble the remaining part of this cothon.

Acholla. ACHOLLA or Acilla, another free city, called by Appian [r], Cholla. If the ſite Ptolemy aſſigns this city be allowed, Elalia, ſix miles to the northward of She-ah, the antient Ruſpæ, upon the borders of a fertile plain, undoubtedly anſwers to it.

Turris Hannibalis. TURRIS Hannibalis *, the tower of Hannibal, was a fort, tower, or country ſeat, belonging to Hannibal, betwixt Thapſus and Acilla, according to Livy. To this place Hannibal fled from Carthage, for fear of the Romans; and immediately, upon his arrival, embarking in a veſſel that waited for him, paſſed over to the iſland Cercina. Either El-Medea, five miles to the ſouth of Demaſs, or Salecto [s], five miles to the S. by W. of El-Medea, in all probability, occupies cupies the ſpace on which this fort, tower, or country ſeat, was erected.

[n] Hirt. bell. Afric. ſec. 68. 79. [o] Shaw ubi ſup. p. 191. [p] Dio, l. xliii. p. 245. [q] Shaw ubi ſup. [r] Appian in Libyc. * Liv. l. xxxiii. Juſt. l. xxxi. [s] Shaw ubi ſup. p. 192.

THENA or Thenæ, a town on the coaſt of the leſſer Syrtis mentioned by Strabo [t], known at this time among the Tuniſeens by the name Thainee. It was built upon a low and rocky piece of ground, near two miles in circuit. The adjacent country is dry and barren, without either fountain or rivulet to refreſh it. Thena.

BETWIXT Thenæ and the mouth of the Triton, or the place where it diſcharges itſelf into the ſea, Ptolemy places his Macodama, with which perhaps Maha-reſs [u], four leagues to the weſt of Thainee, correſponds. 'Tis a village famous for nothing, but ſeveral ciſterns, with large areas to receive the rain-water. Macodama.

UZITA, a town of ſome note near Tiſdrus and Leptis Minor, mentioned by Hirtius, Ptolemy, and Dio. Bochart [w] derives the name from zaith or zait, an olive, or place where olives are produced; and, according to Hirtius, the neighbourhood of this city was famous for its production of olives, ſince Cæſar exacted yearly from the inhabitants of Leptis a vaſt quantity of oil by way of mulct or tribute. This gives great weight to Bochart's opinion, and proves the city to be Phœnician. Uzita.

THALA [x], a city of great extent, taken notice of by Salluſt, ſituated, like Capſa, in the midſt of mountains and deſerts, though there were ſome fountains without the city. All which particulars agree with the ſituation of the modern Ferre-anah, in the ſouth-weſt part of this province. Thala.

TWELVE leagues to the S. E. by E. of this place is Gafſa, the Capſa of the antients, and one of the ſtrong caſtles of Jugurtha [y]. It is built upon a riſing ground, incloſed, almoſt in every direction, with mountains; and hath the like melancholy ſituation with Ferre-anah, only with this difference, that the landſkip here is ſomewhat more gay and verdant by the proſpect we have from it of the palm, olive, piſtachio, and other fruit-trees. In the eaſtern languages the word ſignifies ſtreightly environed, and ſo the place is on every ſide by ſolitudes and deſerts; which is a good proof that it was originally Phœnician [z]. There ſeem to have Capſa.

[t] Strab. l. xvii. p. 572, 574. [u] Shaw ubi ſup. p. 195.
[w] Bochart, ubi ſup. [x] Salluſt. in Jugurth. [y] Idem ibid.
[z] Vid. Bochart. ubi ſup. & Cellar. in Geog. ant. p. 875, 913.

been two more cities of this name, the one in Numidia, the other in Libya Interior.

SUFFETULA, Turzo, Sarſura, Tiſdra, or Tiſdrus, Caraga, Orbita, and other obſcure towns of Byzacium, of which we know nothing but the bare names, either entirely depend upon the faith of Ptolemy, were always inconſiderable in themſelves, or built below the claſſic period of time; and therefore, as they cannot have the leaſt tendency to illuſtrate any part of the Carthaginian hiſtory, or ſupply us with the leaſt hint or circumſtance relative thereto, we ſhall paſs them over in ſilence, and conclude our geographical remarks upon this country with a conciſe deſcription of the moſt celebrated lakes, rivers, and other principal curioſities of it, and a brief enumeration of the African nations, who in the remoteſt times poſſeſſed it.

Lakes.

THE chief lakes of this region taken notice of by the antients (beſides the lake Hipponitis above-mentioned, and the Palus Siſara joined to it, of no great repute) were the Palus Tritonis or Tritonitis, the Palus Pallas, and the Palus Libya; all which, according to Ptolemy, had a communication with one another, by means of the river Triton, which ran thro' them into the ſea. But herein that geographer was greatly deceived. The ſource of the Triton is nearer the ſea than theſe lakes, which are now known to be different parts or branches of the ſame lake, whoſe modern name is, the Shibkah El Lowdeah [a], or lake of marks, ſo called from a number of trunks of palm-trees, that are placed at proper diſtances, to direct the caravans in their marches over it. This lake extends itſelf near twenty leagues from eaſt to weſt, and is interſperſed with ſeveral dry ſpots, which appear like iſlands in it. To the eaſtward eſpecially, in the ſame meridian with Telemeen, there is one, which, though uninhabited, is very large, and well ſtocked with date trees. This ſeems to be the Cherſoneſus of Diodorus [b], and the Phla of Herodotus [c]; and the date trees in it, according to a tradition of the Arabs, ſprung originally from the ſtones of thoſe dates which the Egyptians brought with them for proviſions, many ages ſince [d], when they invaded this part of Africa, and halted here. The Punic name perhaps was Tarit [e], Terit, or Trit, i. e. paſturage, paſturage, or paſture-ground; for, if we may believe Scylax and Herodotus [h], it ſerved as a boundary to the Libyan Nomades, who abounded with flocks and herds, and whoſe country muſt of conſequence have been of ſuch a nature as the word tarit imports the ground bordering upon the lake and river Triton to have been. Scylax makes the lake to have been in his time about a thouſand ſtadia in circumference, which agrees tolerably well with the beſt modern deſcription we find given of it. Feſtus [i] tells us, that the goddeſs Minerva firſt appeared in the neighbourhood of this place.

[a] Shaw ubi ſup. p. 211, 212. [b] Diodor. Sic. l. iii. p. 130. [c] Herodot. l. iv. [d] Shaw. ubi. ſup. [e] Bochart. ubi ſup.

Rivers. THE moſt famous river of Africa Propria was the Bagrada [k], Bagadras, or Bragada, for it went by all thoſe names. On the banks of which, Regulus, in the firſt Punic war, by the help of his battering engines, killed a ſerpent [l] of a monſtrous ſize, being an hundred and twenty foot in length, whoſe ſkin and jaw-bones were preſerved at Rome till the Numantine war. The Bagrada. Ptolemy [m] derives this river from mount Mampſarus where he fixes its ſource, making it bend its courſe almoſt directly from north to ſouth; and herein he is followed by the late geographers: but this is a miſtake [n], its ſtream flowing in a direction almoſt from weſt to eaſt. At this day it is called the Me-jerdah [o], whoſe firſt and moſt diſtant branches are the ſmall rivers Hameeſe and Myſki-anah, in the diſtrict of the Hen-neiſha; which, with the concurrent ſtreams of the Wed el Boule, Scilliana, and ſome other rivulets of the Frig-eah, render it as large as the Iſis and Cherwell united. By running through a rich and fertile country, it becomes ſo well ſaturated with ſoil, that it is of the ſame complection with the Nile, and appears to have no leſs the property of making encroachments upon the ſea. Utica ſtood upon the weſtern bank of the Bagrada, and Carthage on the other ſide, but at ſome diſtance from it. Bochart will have the Phœnicians to have pronounced the name Bragda [p] or Bractha, i. e. a pond, and produces ſeveral authorities, which give a great air of probability to his opinion.

The Catada. THE Catada of Ptolemy, now the Miliana, is famous for nothing but having Tunis ſeated upon the mouth of it; nor the Triton, now the Gabbs, but on account of the lake of of the ſame name already deſcribed. However, it may not be improper to obſerve, that it has its ſource [q] only about three or four leagues to the S. S. W. of Gabbs, and becomes at once a conſiderable ſtream, near as big as the Cherwell.

[h] Scylax Caryand. in peripl. & Herodot l. iv. [i] Feſtus Pompeius, & Diodor. Sic. l. iii. p. 142. [k] Plin. l. v. c. 4. Strab. l. xvii. Appian. l. ii. bell. civil. p. 748. Silius Italicus, Lucan. &c. [l] Gellius, l. vi. c. 3. Plin. hiſt. nat. l. viii. c. 14. Liv. epit. p. xviii. Val. Max. 1, 8, 19. [m] Ptol. Geog. l. iv. [n] Shaw ubi ſup. l. 147. [o] Ibid. p. 146. [p] Bochart. ubi ſup.

AMONG the principal curioſities of this country are to be ranked the Hammam Leef (D), a noted hot bath [r], very much reſorted to by the citizens of Tunis; the hot bath, with ſome ruins, at the creek of Gurbes [s], the Aquæ Calidæ of Livy; the ſalt lake near To-bulba, the Stagnum Salinarum of Hirtius; the Jibbel Had-deffa, an entire mountain [t] of ſalt, ſituated near the eaſtern extremity of the lake of marks, whoſe ſalt is as hard and ſolid as ſtone, and of a reddiſh or purple colour; the lead oars at Jibbel Rif-faſs [u], near Hammam Leef, which are very rich. To which many others might be added, did we not chuſe to reſerve them for a more proper place (E).

THE

[q] Shaw ubi ſup. p. 197. [r] Ibid. p. 157. [s] Ibid. [t] Idem ibid. p. 229. [u] Idem ibid. p. 237.

(D) Theſe hammams, or baths, are ſo called from the Hebrew or Chaldee verb חמם hammam incaluit, their waters being hot, though not all in the ſame degree; perhaps the words hummums, which we have adopted into our language, of the ſame import, is to be deduced from the ſame original

(E) We ſhall beg leave in this note juſt to mention the principal iſlands on the coaſt of Africa Propria, taken notice of by the antients, which are the following:

1. Coſſyria or Coſyrius, a ſmall iſland in the African ſea, which ſome authors refer to Sicily; but Strabo makes it part of the proper territory of Carthage. According to Ptolemy, it had a city of the ſame name, which, by reaſon of its vicinity to Carthage, was doubtleſs a place of ſome repute. Scylax tells us it was a day's ſail only from the promontory Lilybæum in Sicily; and Strabo places it in the middle of the African ſea, at an equal diſtance from Lilybæum and Clypea, a city of Africa Propria. From ſome antique coins, exhibited by Paruta and Lucas Holſtenius, it appears, that Coſſyra was the name moſt frequently uſed. According to Strabo, this iſland was an hundred and fifty ſtadia in circumference (5).

2. The Tarichiæ of Strabo were certain minute iſlands very near the coaſt of Africa Propria, almoſt oppoſite to Leptis Minor.

(5) Ptol. l. iv. c. 3. Scyl. Caryand. Strab. l. vi. Parut. apud Theſaur. ant. & hiſt. Sic. vol. viii. Luc. Holſten. in not. ad Steph. Byzant.

THE moſt antient inhabitants of this country were, according to Herodotus [w], the Auſes, ſituated to the weſt of the river Triton, whoſe capital city was doubtleſs Auza or Auzate, ſaid by Menander Epheſius to be built by Eth-baal or Ithobal, king of Tyre; the Maxyes, a Libyan nation; the Machlyes, another Libyan nation near the lake Tritonis; the Zaueces; and the Zygantes, who took a particular delight in bees, and making of honey. Theſe were, in all likelihood, a mixture of old Libyans or Africans and Phœnicians, a more diſtinct account of whom may be expected from us when we come to treat of the different nations of Libya. Antient inhabitants.

As

[w] Herodot. l. iv.

nor. They are at preſent called the Jowries, and lie over-againſt Lempta and Tho-bulba. Cæſar ſeems to have looked upon them as poſts of ſome importance, which is all that we have at preſent to ſay of them (6).

3 Lopaduſa, oppoſite to Thapſus above mentioned, and ſix miles long, if we will believe Pliny. The ſame author affirms it to have been fifty miles diſtant from Cercina and Cercinitis, two ſmall iſlands belonging to the Regio Syrtica (7),

4. Æthuſa or Æguſa, another little iſland mentioned by Pliny and Ptolemy, lying a little to the weſtward of the former (8).

5. The Laruneſiæ, two ſmall iſlands, according to the Palatine MS. of Ptolemy, that lay above Ruſpina (9).

6. The Inſula Dracontia of Ptolemy, to the north of Hippo Diarrhytus. Two little flat contiguous iſlands called the Cani, not far from cape Blanco, ſeem at this day to bid fair for the ſame ſituation that Ptolemy aſſigns his Inſula Dracontia (10).

7. Galata, a little iſland above Tabraca, three hundred ſtadia from the continent of Africa (11).

8. Ægimurus, a ſmall iſland in the gulph of Carthage, about thirty miles from that capital. Pliny aſſures us, that there were two rocks near this iſland called the Araæ Ægimuri or Ægimori, which, according to Servius, were the remains of an iſland, ſome ages before his time abſorpt by the ſea. This author likewiſe informs us, that they were called Araæ, becauſe on them the Romans and Carthaginians concluded a treaty, and made them the limits of their reſpective dominions. The modern Zowa-moor, between cape Zibeeb and cape Bon or Raſaddar, the Zimbra of our ſea charts is undoubtedly the Ægimurus of the antients (12).

(6) Strab. l. xvii. Hirt. de bel. Africa §. 20. (7) Strab. l. xvii. Plin l. v. c. 7. (8) Plin. l. iii c. 8. Ptol. l. iv. c. 3. (9) Cellar. geogr. ant. l iv. c. 4. (10) Ptol. ubi ſup (11) Cellar. ex itinerario maritimo, ubi ſup. (12) Strab. l. xxii. P 573. Liv. l. xxx. c. 24. Plin. l. v. c. 7 Virg. Æn. i ver. 108. Serv. in loc. Steph. Byzant. &c,

As for the climate, modern ſtate, and natural hiſtory of Africa Propria, both with regard to its animal, vegetable, and ſubterraneous productions, we ſhall defer what we have to ſay on each of thoſe heads, till, according to the method already propoſed to ourſelves, we come to write the hiſtory of the ſtates of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli.

SECT. III.

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, language, cuſtoms, arts, learning, and trade, of the Carthaginians.

The Carthaginians originally Canaanites or Phœnicians.

THE Carthaginians being originally Phœnicians [a], were the deſcendents of the old Canaanites [b], and therefore could trace up their antiquity as high as Canaan, the ſon of Ham, the acknowledged progenitor of that people. All the Greek and Roman [c] writers, that make any mention of their affairs, are clear in this point, without the leaſt variation. And that they themſelves were of the ſame opinion, is evident from a tradition prevailing amongſt their poſterity ſo late as St. Auſtin's [d] days; from the authority of Servius and Procopius [e]; and from the ſtrong [f] attachment they always ſhewed to the cuſtoms and manners of that nation, from which theſe authors deduce them. One of the Punic names of Carthage, according to Plautus [g], was Chaedreanech, or Chadre-Anak, which Bochart [h] with great reaſon imagines to allude to their Canaanitiſh extraction; for Anak and his family, upon account of their extraordinary ſize of body, and diſtinguiſhed valour, being eſteemed both by ſacred and profane writers as the moſt famous of the Canaanites or Phœnicians, from him the whole nation, or at leaſt that part of it bordering upon the ſea-coaſt near the place of his reſidence, might probably receive a new denomination (A). This is to be underſtood of the moſt early Phœnician

[a] Univ. hiſt. vol. ii. p. 381, 382. & Vol xiv. p. 558. [b] Univ. hiſt. vol. ii p. 181, &c. [c] Philiſtus Syracuſanus apud Euſebium in chron. ad an. 804. Appian. in Libyc. ſub init. Vell. Paterc. hiſt. Rom. Juſtin. l. xviii. &c. [d] Auguſt. in expoſit. epiſt. ad Rom ſub init. [e] Servius in Æn. i. v. 37. & Æn. iv. v. 75. Procop de bell. Vandal. l. ii. c. 10. [f] Herodot, Polyb Liv. Diodor. Sic. Q. Curt. Juſtin. Tertul. Minut. Fel. &c. paſſim. [g] Plaut. in Pœn. [h] Boch. Chan. l. i. c. 1.

(A) To what has been already obſerved (1) of the Anakims may

(1) Univerſ. hiſt. Vol. ii. p. 205.

Phœnician colonies ſettled in Africa, and many of their deſcendents; for it is to be naturally ſuppoſed, that ſome of theſe may be added, that profane authors themſelves, as well as ſcripture, ſeem to have had ſome knowledge of them. Pauſanias (2) tells us, that in the iſland Aſteria near Miletus, the body of the hero Aſterius, from whom the iſland received its name, was buried; that he was the ſon of Anax, or Anak, who was the ſon of the Earth; that his body was ten cubits long; and that the whole territory of the Mileſians was antiently called Anactoria, from his father Anax, or Anak. Euſtathius (3) and the epitomizer of Stephanus agree with Pauſanias, in relation to the antient name of Miletus, with its diſtrict; and add, that this Anax was the ſon of Heaven and Earth. We are aſſured by ſcripture (4), that the Anakims, when driven out of their own country by Joſhua, fled to Gaza, Gath, and Aſhdod, and there ſettled themſelves. and it is likewiſe probable (5) from the Phœnician hiſtory, that Gath, the metropolis of theſe Anakims, was ſubject to the kings or judges of Tyre, as early as the days of Pygmalion; ſince it had revolted from the Tyrians ſome time before the reign of Hezekiah king of Judah. From whence we may conclude, that ſome of this family might even attend Dido into Africa, though it is at the ſame time very likely, that many of them, after their chiefs had been cut off by David (6), might likewiſe retire to their countrymen, who had fixed their abode in Africa ever ſince the days of Joſhua (7). We muſt not omit, that the Dioſcuri (8), who were Phœnician gods, i. e. deified Phœnicians of great diſtinction, were called Anakes, or Anakims, by the Greeks, on account, no doubt, of their ſuperior ſtature and majeſty. The word anax or anak (9) was a term of great honour amongſt the moſt antient Greeks, being applied only to their kings and heroes. It has been imagined by ſome, that this is a common name, anſwering to the Latin Torquatus (10), and that the great men in the eaſt were in the earlieſt times ſo called, on account of the rich collar or chain that they uſually wore about their necks. Benjamin of Tudela (11) aſſerts, that he ſaw a human rib hanging up in a palace at Damaſcus, which was nine Spaniſh palms long, and two broad; and that from an inſcription upon the tomb-ſtone, it appeared, that one of the Anakims was buried there, whoſe name was Abchamaz, and who was ſaid to have reigned over the whole world, i. e. over a good part of the eaſt, theſe mixed with the Aborigines, or native Africans, whom they found there upon their arrival, and with them, or at leaſt a conſiderable body of them, formed one people. And for this reaſon it is, that the inhabitants of Byzacium, eſpecially of the maritime parts of it, were ſometimes called by the Greeks and Romans, Libyphœnicians, as conſiſting of both nations (B). But a fuller account of the name, as well as a more particular deſcription, of the people with whom the Phœnicians were incorporated, will be found in a proper place.

(2) Pauſan. in Attic & Achaiac. (3) Euſtath. in Hom. iliad. A, p. 16 & Steph. epit. ſub. voc. Μίλητος. (4) Joſ. xi. 22. (5) Univerſ. hiſt. vol. ii. p. 382. (6) 2 Sam. xxi. 16--22. 1 Chron. xx. 4—8, (7) Univerſ. hiſt. vol ii. p. 205. (8) Cic de nat. deor. l iii. (9) Hom. iliad. A, & alibi paſſim. (10) Bochart. ubi ſupra & Val. Schind. pentaglot. ſub voc. ענק (11) Benj. Tudel. itiner. p. 56.

Dr. Hyde, in his notes upon Peritſol [i], is of another opinion; but, in order to ſupport it, he has recourſe to hypotheſes only, and thoſe ſuch as have but a ſlender foundation. On eaſt, or all the countries in that neighbourhood. But whether this inſcription ought to be looked upon as genuine, or of a late date in compariſon of the age of the Anakims, and founded only upon ſome Oriental tradition, is what we ſhall not take upon us to determine

[i] Hyde. in Peritſ. p. 44.

(B) The Byzacium of Pliny (12) ſeems to be the Byzacia of Polybius, if we will give credit to Salmaſius's emendation of a paſſage in Stephanus where he quotes the twelfth book of that hiſtorian A ſtrong preſumption in favour of this is, that both Pliny and Polybius's provinces have the ſame extent, the ſame ſituation, and their names are pretty much alike (13). Byzacium, according to the Greek and Roman authors, conſiſted of two parts, the maritime or exterior, and the mediterranean or interior (14), both which were inhabited by the Libyphœnicians. Bochart derives the name from the oriental word biza (15), a teat, and thinks it was ſo denominated from its ſurpriſing fertility, of which that was a ſymbol amongſt moſt nations. So Virgil, Terra antiqua potens armis, atq; ubere glebæ. Æn. I.

——Et fertilis ubere campus. Georg. l. ii, ——βῶλαξ ἀρούρης. Il. I.

Which, according to the ſcholiaſt, ſignifies a moſt fertile and beautiful part of the country. The Mamma of Procopius (16) in this province, a word of the ſame import with Biza, greatly ſtrengthens this derivation.

(12) Vide Salmaſ. in Steph. ſub voc. Βύζακις. (13) Conf. Steph. ubi ſupra. Plin. l. v. c. 4. & Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 1. (14) Cellar. geog. ant. l. iv. c. 4 Bochart, ubi ſupra. (15) Bochart. ubi ſupra. (16) Procop. de bell. Van. l. ii.

On the contrary, Bochart [k] proves what he advances by unquestionable authorities, the only solid arguments in points of this nature, of which he produces such a train, as will not easily be overborn.

Some [l] authors have imagined, that the Libyphœnicians, or, as Strabo and most of the other Greek writers call them, the Libophœnicians, were a nation distinct both from the Africans, or Libyans, and Carthaginians, and inhabited a different tract. It is certain the true or Asiatic Phœnicians and Syrians, bordering upon their respective frontiers, were called Syrophœnicians, upon account of their intermixing one with another, and by way of contradistinction from the people inhabiting the opposite parts of those two regions, who were known by their proper names, Syrians and Phœnicians. In conformity to our notion of the people we are here discoursing of, Livy [m] styles them mistum Punicum Afris genus; and Diodorus [n] speaks of them to the same effect. Libyphœnicians.

The first government settled at Carthage [o] was probably monarchial; but this seems to have been but of short continuance, as expiring with Dido herself, or rather in her lifetime, when it was changed into a republic. As to the particular form of this republic, authors differ. Aristotle tells us, that it was partly aristocratical [p], and partly (as he terms it) political, i. e. democratical (C). According to Polybius [q], monarchy, The form of government at Carthage.

[k] Bochart ubi supra. [l] Vide Bochart. Chan. l. i. c 25. [m] Liv. l. xxxi. [n] Diodor. Sic. l. xx, [o] Ubbo Emmius de stat & rep Carthag sub init. Christ. Hendreich. in Carthag. l. ii. sect. 1. c. 15. p. 307. Just. l. i. aliique mult. [p] Arist. de rep. l. ii. c. 11. Ubbo Emm ubi supra. [q] Polyb. l. vi.

(C) Πολιτεία (polity or policy) taken in a general sense (17), signified, according to Aristotle, any form of government, where the laws had their due force and efficacy. In a more confined sense it was among the antient Greeks before Aristotle's time, frequently synonymous to δημοκρατία (18), (democracy) as may be proved from Æschines, and others. But when Aristotle comes to distinguish more subtilly (19), he tells us, that there were two mixed forms of government, each of which was a composition of oligarchy and democracy. That which participated most of oligarchy, was called aristocracy; but that which inclined most to democracy, went by the name of polity or policy. Both of these, in some respects (20), prevailed in the state of Carthage, as we shall monarchy, ariſtocracy, and democracy, all centered in it. And laſtly, Iſocrates [r] makes the civil government to have been oligarchical, and the military monarchical. In the forming of it, the Carthaginians undoubtedly borrowed many things from their anceſtors the Tyrians, who, for ſeveral ages, made a great figure in the world, and were in high eſteem on account of their wiſdom, riches, and power. Ariſtotle [s] intimates, that the Cretan, Lacedæmonian, and Carthaginian republics were the moſt perfect and beſt modelled of any in the world; and that theſe in many particulars agreed; tho' in ſeveral reſpects, he gives the preference to the Carthaginian. The conſummate wiſdom of thoſe maxims and inſtitutions, upon which this laſt was formed, appeared to him from hence, that notwithſtanding the great ſway the people bore in Carthage [t], there had been no inſtance, from the foundation of the city to his time, of any popular commotions capable of diſturbing the public tranquillity, nor of any tyrant, who had been able, at the expence of liberty, to introduce oppreſſion. This was a plain proof, that the three principal powers, of which the conſtitution of Carthage was compoſed, were of ſuch a nature, as to counterpoiſe one another, and, by their mutual harmony, to preſerve and promote the public felicity (D). Theſe were the ſuffetes, the ſenate, and the people, who, whilſt they kept within their proper bounds, where a check upon one another, and jointly concurred to render their republic of all others the moſt flouriſhing; but when, as Polybius obſerves, but an unaccountable fluctuation of power, the people got the aſcendant over the ſenate, prudence was baniſhed their counſels, nothing but cabals and factions took place; and, in conſequence of this, ſhall ſee hereafter, when we come to conſider the defects of it; for which reaſon Ariſtotle tells us, it was compoſed of both. In ſhort, polity or policy regarded men as rich and poor (21), ariſtocracy as rich, poor, and virtuous; both which conſiderations had their influence in the Carthaginian commonwealth.

(17) Aristot. de rep l. iv. (18) Idem ibid c 3. (19) Idem ibid. c. 7, 8, &c. Æschin. in Ctesiph. (20) Aristot. ibid. l. ii, c. 11.

[r] Iſocrat. in Nicocl. [s] Ariſtot. ubi ſupra. [t] Idem ibid.

(D) The legiſlator of the Carthaginians was undoubtedly a perſon of great political wiſdom; yet Ariſtotle himſelf finds ſome defects in his inſtitutions (22), and notwithſtanding the beautiful draught he has exhibited of this republic, intimates, that the uninterrupted tranquillity it enjoyed, was, in ſome meaſure owing to chance (23).

(21) Idem, l. iv. c. 8. (22) Idem, l. ii. c. 11. (23) Idem ibid. ſub. fin.

this, ſuch precipitate ſteps were taken, as firſt rendered this formidable ſtate weak and contemptible, and ſoon after completed its deſtruction.

In order to give our readers ſome idea of the Carthaginian government, though the antients afford us little light on this head, we ſhall give a brief account of the three principal powers above-mentioned.

The ſuffetes.

The ſuffetes [u] were two in number, of equal power and dignity, and the chief magiſtrates of Carthage [w]. They anſwered to the two kings of Lacedæmon, as well as to the Roman conſuls; for which reaſon we find them ſtyed in different authors both kings and conſuls [x]. However, theſe did not in all things correſpond; for the Spartan kings were perpetual, had an hereditary right of ſucceſſion [y], and the ſtate was ſupplied with them from two families only [z]; whereas the Carthaginian ſuffetes were annually elected out of all the nobleſt families, and were always ſuch perſons as moſt attracted the public regard by their virtue and great talents, as well as their wealth, which enabled them to ſupport their high ſtation with a becoming grandeur and dignity; for which reaſon Ariſtotle prefers the ſupreme magiſtrates of Carthage to thoſe of Lacedæmon (E). As for the Roman conſuls, they had not only a chief hand in the adminiſtration of civil, but likewiſe in the conducting of military, affairs; whereas it is very probable, that the ſuffetes were, generally ſpeaking, confined to the former (F). Their province was to [u] Chriſt. Hendreic. ubi ſupra. p. 311. Corn. Nep. in Annib. Ariſt. ubi ſupra. & l. vi. c. 49. & alibi paſſim. Diod, Sic. l. xiv. &c. [w] Ariſt. ubi ſupra. Liv. l xxx. [x] Corn. Nep. ubi ſupra. Juſt. l xxxi Calid. apud Feſtum. &c. Hendreich. & Ubbo Emm. ubi ſupra. [y] Ariſt. de rep. l. ii c. 11 [z] Corn. Nep. ubi ſupra. Liv. l. xxx. Zonar. tom. ii. Ariſt. ubi ſupra.

(E) He prefers the ſuffetes to the Lacedæmonian kings, not becauſe the Carthaginians had ſome regard to wealth in their election of them (for this he abſolutely condemns, as will be elſewhere obſerved; but becauſe they choſe them out of all the beſt families in Carthage, and eſteemed great abilities in them as an eſſential qualification; which was contrary to the practice of the Lacedæmonians (24).

(F) This appears not only from Livy, Polybius, and other antient authors, but likewiſe from the judicious obſervations of Ubbo Emmius (25). However, it muſt be allowed, that we have to assemble the senate, in which they presided [a], to propose subjects for deliberation there, to tell the voices, and to preside likewise in all emergent and decisive debates. It does not appear by whose suffrages the suffetes were elected, but most likely [b] either by those of the centumvirate, or the people. According to some authors, they had the power of life and death [c], and of punishing all crimes whatsoever. Their concurrence in [d] all points with the senate was necessary, in order to prevent any debate from coming before the people. It is remarkable, that most, if not all, the cities of note in the Carthaginian dominions [e], had their suffetes or chief magistrates, as well as the metropolis.

(24) Idem ibid. ſub init. (25) Ubbo Emm. de ſtat. & repub. Carthag. apud. Gronov. ant. Græc. vol. iv. p. 1504,

The senate. THE senate was a most august assembly, composed of persons venerable for their age and experience, as well as illustrious [f] on account of their birth, their riches, and, above all, their merit. They arrived at this honour by election, as we are informed by Aristotle [g], when he makes a comparison betwixt the Spartan and Carthaginian senates; but who were their electors, is not known. Their number likewise we are ignorant of, tho' from Justin [h] we may infer, that it greatly exceeded that of either the Spartan or Roman senators; for, according to this author, an hundred were selected from it, and appointed as judges to enquire into the conduct of their generals; and if this number was thought requisite to inspect into this single article, how many must have been deemed necessary to superintend, and, in concert with the suffetes, manage every branch of the administration? Besides, it is natural to suppose, that there was a great affinity betwixt the customs and manners of the Sicilians and those of the Carthaginians, since these last may be justly looked have several instances of the suffetes commanding Carthaginian armies. Hannibal, who commanded the auxiliaries sent to the relief of the Ægestans, or Segestans; Himilco, who was general in the second expedition against Dionysius; and Mago, under whose conduct many thousand men were transported to Sicily and Italy, set this point beyond dispute (26).

[a] Liv. ubi supra, & l. xxxiv. Polyb. l. iii. [b] Ubbo Emm. & Hendr. ubi supra. [c] Liv. l. xxxiii Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 24. [d] Ubbo Emm. & Arist. ubi supra. Polyb l. xv. [e] Liv. l. xxviii. Selden. de diis Syris in prolegom. c. 2. & Boch. Chan. ubi supra. [f] Ubbo Emm. Hendr. & Arist. ubi supra. [g] Arist. ubi supra. [h] Justin. l. xix.

(26) Diod. Sic. l. xiii. xiv. xv. &c. Hendr. ubi supra, p. 315.

looked upon as ſome of the antient inhabitants of Sicily [i]. Now, in the time of Agathocles, the ſenate of Syracuſe conſiſted of ſix hundred of the [k] principal citizens; no wonder then, if that of Carthage was equal, if not much more numerous. In this grand [l] council, every thing relating to peace and war, to negotiations and alliances, to trade and navigation; in ſhort, to all affairs of conſequence, whether foreign or domeſtic, were debated, and for the moſt part determined [m]; ſo that the whole machine of government was animated and kept in motion by it; life and ſpirit were from thence diffuſed over all the public deliberations. When the votes [n] of the ſenate were unanimous, they had the force of laws, and from hence there lay no appeal; but when there was either a diviſion or a diſagreement with the ſuffetes, the affair in [o] queſtion was referred to the people, who, in ſuch a caſe, had the liberty of offering their ſentiments freely, and even of contradicting the other parts of the legiſlature; and not only ſo, but what was thus offered paſſed into a law, the people, in all emergencies of this nature, being the dernier reſort of power. However, as Ariſtotle [p] obſerves, this was a flaw in the conſtitution, and was at laſt attended with fatal effects; for during the ſecond and third Punic wars, the populace at Carthage prevailed over the ſenate, whilſt the ſenatorial authority at Rome was in its full bloom and vigor; and this, if we may give credit to Polybius [q], was the principal cauſe of the riſe of the one, and fall of the other. We muſt not [r] omit, that none but perſons of the moſt diſtinguiſhed merit were ever elected ſenators, nor that their office and dignity were perpetual (G).

[i] Univerſ. hiſt. vol. vii. p. 161. [k] Ibid. p. 300. [l] Ubbo Emm. ubi ſupra. Polyb l. iii. c. 15. Appian. in Libyc. Diod. Sic. l xiv. [m] Ubbo Emm ubi ſupra. Liv. & Polyb. paſſ. [n] Ubb. Emm. & Ariſt. ubi ſupra. [o] Hendr. ubi ſupra, p. 323 Polyb. l xv. [p] Ariſt ubi ſupra. [q] Polyb. l. vi. [r] Ariſt. ubi ſupra. Ub. Emm. Hendr. Polyb. Liv. Juſt. &c. paſſ.

(G) According to Livy (27), there was a council formed of ſuch ſenators, as were the moſt venerable and eminent for their wiſdom, who were called ſeniores, ſeniorum principes, or ſimply, as Juſtin (28) intimates, principes. This council was in the higheſt repute at Carthage, on account of the vaſt influence it had over

(27) Liv. l. xxx. (28) Juſt. l. xi. c. 31.

Power of the people at Carthage.

WHAT ſway the people had in Carthage, whilſt the different parts of which the conſtitution was framed were duly proportioned to one another, and each of them enjoyed its natural ſhare of power, does not appear from any antient author, tho' it can ſcarce be doubted, but ſo accurate a writer as Polybius muſt have taken notice of it ſomewhere in his writings. It is [s] likely they had a vote at the election of magiſtrates, at the enacting of laws, particularly thoſe in which they were more immediately concerned; and, in ſhort, in every thing that bore any relation to them. In Ariſtotle's days, the commonwealth ſeems to have deviated from its original perfection, having too ſtrong a tendency to popular government, which was cenſured as [t] a defect in it by that philoſopher. However, the ſenate ſtill kept up a good degree of authority, and the power of the people was far from being uncontrolable; but in Hannibal's time [u], about an hundred years after, there was reaſon to apprehend a total ſubverſion of the conſtitution, the ſenate had little regard or attention paid to it; the people arrogated to themſelves almoſt the whole power, and of courſe every thing, which might have promoted the public welfare, was obſtructed by a few ambitious and implacable demagogues. From this period the moſt famous and potent ſtate of Carthage began to decline, and, in the courſe of a few years, loſt not only its liberty, but its very being.

HAVING

[s] Ub. Emm. & Hendr. ubi ſupra. [t] Ariſt. ubi ſupra. [u] Polyb. l. vi.

over the ſenate (29). Recourſe was therefore had to it in all caſes of an extraordinary nature It is not improbable, that this council was Ariſtotle's centumvirate, as being inveſted with great authority, and conſiſting of a pretty large number of members. Livy tells us (30) that thirty of theſe were deputed to wait upon Scipio, and ſue to him in the moſt ſubmiſſive terms for a peace with Rome. Polybius likewiſe makes a diſtinction between theſe and the other ſenators; for he ſays, that among the priſoners taken at New Carthage by Scipio, there were two [ἐκ τῆς γερουσίας] belonging to the aſſembly of old men and fifteen [ἐκ τῆς συγκλήτου] of the ſenate (31) In other authors, the ſenate, or at leaſt this moſt venerable part of it, went by appellations equivalent to the optimates and patres conſcripti of the Romans (32).

(29) Liv. ubi ſupra (30) Idem ibid. Vide & Q. Curt. l. iv. c 3. edit. Amſt. 1677. (31) Polyb. l. x. (32) Appian. in Libyc. Diod. Sic. l. xx.

Eſtabliſhments, civil officers, &c. at Carthage.

HAVING thus laid down a general sketch or plan of the Carthaginian government, we ſhall mention ſome of their principal eſtabliſhments, civil officers, &c. as taken notice of by the antients, who, it muſt be owned, have been extremely deficient in all their memoirs relating to this republic; for which reaſon the loſs of thoſe excellent pieces of Polybius, that, through the injuries of time, have not reached us, is the more to be regretted.

The centumvirate and quinquevirate.

THE centumvirate or tribunal of the hundred, conſiſted of an hundred and four perſons, not ſimply of an hundred, as the name ſeems to imply, receiving its denomination from the greater number [w]. According to Ariſtotle, who is the only author that has given us any deſcription of it [x], the power it enjoyed was very extenſive, tho' confined chiefly to things of a judicial nature [y]. Out of this tribunal were ſelected five judges, whoſe juriſdiction was ſuperior to that of the reſt, to whom we may, with propriety enough, give the name of quinquevirs, or the quinquevirate. They had the power not only of filling up all vacancies in their own body, but likewiſe of chuſing thoſe perſons who compoſed the tribunal of the hundred [z]; were, under the ſuffetes, at the head of this tribunal; and had, in a great meaſure, the lives, fortunes, reputations, &c. of all the citizens depending upon them. Ariſtotle [a] informs us, that the Carthaginian centumvirate, anſwered in ſeveral reſpects to the ephori at Sparta; but, with ſubmiſſion to this philoſopher, we think the quinquevirate ſhould be ſubſtituted in its room, as having a better title to the compariſon: for [b] with regard to the ephori, firſt, they were the moſt deſpotic magiſtrates in Sparta, their authority being, in a manner, boundleſs, and the lives, fortunes, &c. of all the Lacedæmonians almoſt entirely depending upon their will and pleaſure; which may be [c] ſaid of the quinquevirate in Carthage, with more reaſon than of the centumvirate. Secondly, the centumvirate was perpetual [d]; but whether the quinquevirate was ſo or not, is uncertain. Now, the ephori were elected annually [e]. Thirdly, the ephori were five in number [f], and ſo were the quinquevirs. Fourthly, an univerſal adminiſtration of juſtice, with regard to individuals, was the province of the quinquevirate at Carthage [g], as it was of the ephori at Lacedæmon; whereas the inſtitution of the centumvirate was intended only at firſt as a curb to the authority of their generals [h], by calling them to an account for their conduct on their return from the campaign, tho' afterwards it extended to many branches of civil affairs. From which conſiderations it is probable that the council of five in Carthage, rather than the tribunal of the hundred, reſembled the Lacedæmonian ephori. The great authority annexed to the quinquevirate, gave the Carthaginian ſtate [i] the appearance of an oligarchy, tho' as the members of this council diſcharged the duties of their function without any ſalary or reward, and were elected freely by ſuffrages, not by lot (H), it had likewiſe the reſemblance of an ariſtocracy [k]. Ubbo Emmius [l] thinks, that the ſuffetes preſided in this council, and the centumvirate, as well as in the ſenate, being the chief magiſtrates concerned in the adminiſtration of juſtice. If ſo, their office was, in all probability, perpetual, till the time of Hannibal [m], by whoſe influence a law paſſed, whereby it was enacted, that all the judges ſhould be choſen annually; with a clauſe, that none ſhould continue in office beyond that term. This laſt obſervation will point out to us the reaſon why the ſupreme magiſtrates at Carthage were called ſuffetes, and enable us to trace up that inſtitution to its firſt ſource (I).

[w] Juſtin. l. xix. Ariſt. ubi ſupra. [x] Idem ibid. [y] Idem ibid. [z] Idem ibid. [a] Idem ibid. [b] Univ. hiſt. vol. vi. p 411. [c] Ariſt. ubi ſupra. Vide etiam Ub. Emm. & Hendr. ubi ſupra. [d] Ariſt. ubi ſupra Liv. l. xxxiii. Vide etiam Rollin. in hiſt. anc. des Carthag. ſect. 3. [e] Univerſ. hiſt. vol. vi p. 411. [f] Univerſ. hiſt. & Ariſt. ubi ſupra.

THE

[g] Univerſ. hiſt. Ub. Emm. & Ariſtot. ubi ſupra. [h] Juſtin. Ub. Emm. & Hendr. ubi ſupra. [i] Ariſt. ubi ſupra. [k] Idem ibid. [l] Ub. Emm. ubi ſupra. [m] Liv. l. xxxiii.

(H) The Carthaginian republic, in this reſpect, followed the Lacedæmonian, in which the ſenate, ephori, &c. were elected by ſuffrages or votes (33). On the contrary, at Athens the ſenate, prytanes, &c. were all choſen by lot. This laſt method of electing was peculiar to the democratical form of government, as the former was to the ariſtocratical. The manner in which the Athenians choſe their magiſtrates and rulers by lot, has been already deſcribed in the former part of this hiſtory (34); and the Lacedæmonian election of civil officers has been fully handled by Cragius. It may not be improper here to repeat, that Solon was the Athenian legiſlator, and Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian.

(I) Scaliger, in his notes upon Feſtus, derives this word from the (33) Ariſtot. de repub. & Nic. Cragius de rep. Lacedæm. l. ii. c. 1. (34) Univerſ. hiſt. vol. vi. p. 136, 137. Car. Sigon. de rep. Athen. l. ii. c. 3. & Nic. Crag. ubi ſupra.

THE principal, if not only, civil officers eſtabliſhed at Carthage (beſides the ſuffetes) that have been remembered Civil officers at Carthage.

the verb צפה tzaphah, "he looked from on high, or, he "overlooked others;" and ſo makes it agree in ſignification with the Greek ἔφορος, ἐπόπτης, ἐπίσκοπος, &c. (35). But this, notwithſtanding it has ſome appearance of truth, is not ſo eaſy and grammatical as Bochart's etymon. That learned man, after the great Selden, will have ſuffetes to be the ſame word with שופטים ſophetim, or ſofetim, judges, magiſtrates, &c. which notion is abſolutely confirmed, not only by what we have advanced, but likewiſe by Paulus, Calidius, and Feſtus (36). If this be allowed, it cannot well be denied, that the Carthaginian ſuffetes reſembled very much the old judges of the Iſraelites, who governed that nation from the death of Joſhua to the election of Saul, the firſt king of Iſrael. We ſay this cannot well be denied; for theſe old judges were called in Hebrew ſophetim, or ſofetim, for which reaſon the Hebrews always ſtyled the book of judges ſophetim; and this very government flouriſhed in the neighbourhood of Tyre, the mother of Carthage. We may therefore reaſonably preſume, that the Carthaginians borrowed their ſuffetes either from Tyre, or immediately from the Iſraelites themſelves, by whom ſome of their anceſtors the Canaanites were at firſt expelled their country in the time of Joſhua, and others in the time of David, after they had, for a conſiderable period, been contiguous to them. If the Carthaginians derived this inſtitution from the Tyrians, theſe laſt probably received it from the Iſraelites their neighbours. However this may be, it is certain ſuch magiſtrates as theſe were in Tyre after the deſtruction of the old city by Nebuchadnezzar; for Joſephus, in his treatiſe againſt Apion, has given us a ſeries of them (37). It ought to be obſerved, that but one perſon was inveſted with the ſupreme authority amongſt the Hebrews during the government of the ſophetim, which was likewiſe the cuſtom at Tyre; and therefore it is natural to ſuppoſe, that it was ſo originally at Carthage alſo (38). The Romans had very inadequate ideas of the Carthaginian government in general, and of their magiſtrates in particular; and therefore we cannot abſolutely depend upon their accounts of them. Yet even from ſome of theſe it ſeems not improbable, that one of the ſuffetes, even towards the decline of Carthage, had a greater ſhare of power than the other; which is a ſort of proof, that at firſt the power of the ſuffetes was lodged in a ſingle hand. Juſtin calls Hanno the prince, or principal perſon by the antients, were the prætor, the quæſtor, and the cenſor.

(35) Scalig. in Feſt. ſub. voc. ſufes. (36) Seld. de diis Syris, in prolegom. c. 2. Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 24. Paulus & Calid. apud Feſt. ſub. voc. ſufes. (37) Joſeph. cont. Apion. l. ii. (38) Jud. ii. 18, 19, & iii, iv, vii, &c. Joſeph. ubi ſupra.

The prætor. THE great Hannibal, who, by reaſon of his glorious atchievements, as well as noble extraction, was the moſt illuſtrious of the Carthaginians, had the prætorſhip[n] conferred ſon of Carthage. Cornelius Nepos gives Hannibal the name of prætor; Livy and Gellius of dictator. 'Tis plain Hannibal was by far the greateſt man in the city, becauſe he over-ruled all the other magiſtrates, when he limited the power of the whole bench of judges. Feſtus ſays the ſufes (or, according to the Carthaginian pronunciation, ſufet, as appears from the genitive caſe ſufetis) was the ſupreme magiſtrate of Carthag. And laſtly, from ſome inſcriptions in Gruter, it is clear, that ſeveral cities in Africa had each of them a ſufes (39). The old Archontic government, that took place at Athens after the death of Codrus, ſeems likewiſe to have been of this form. We find ſome little variation in the Carthaginian word ſuffetes from the Hebrew ſophetim, which is owing partly to the Latin termination, and partly to the affinity betwixt the Punic language and the Syriac. That ES is a Latin plural termination, needs no proof; and that the Punic language was near akin to the Syriac, though it borrowed moſt of its words from the Hebrew, is evident, not only from the nature of the thing, but likewiſe from the authority of St. Jerom, St. Auguſtin, (40), and Priſcian. What therefore the Hebrews wrote ſophetim, the Carthaginians in all probability, wrote ſuphetin, or emphatically ſuphete (שופטין) א or E being the emphatical maſculine plural termination in Syriac, as ין or IN was the abſolute one. The Hebrew vaucholem, or O, anſwered to the Syriac and Punic V (41); and though the MSS of Livy and Nepos have ſuffetes with a double F, yet, from the authority of Feſtus, Calidius, and the above-mentioned inſcriptions, they ought to be corrected, the true reading being undoubtedly ſufetes with a ſingle F. We have been a little more prolix than uſual in this note, becauſe we take the ſubject of it to be of a very curious nature, and ſuch a one as may lead us to farther diſcoveries both in ſacred and profane hiſtory.

[n] Idem ibid. & Ub. Emm. ubi ſup.

(39) Juſtin. l. xxi. Corn. Nep. in Hannib. Liv. l. xxiii. & lxxxiii. A Gell. l. x. c. 52. Feſt. ſub. voc. ſufes. Gruter. p. 470. inſcript. 1, 2. edit. Græv. Amſt. 1707. (40) D. Hieron. com. ad. Jerem. v. D Aug. l. iii. cont. lit. Petil. Donat. & Priſcian. l. v. (41) Vide Boch. Chan. l. i. c. 24. & Joſ. Scalig. in Feſt. ſub. voc. ſufes.

red upon him in the fifth year after the concluſion of the ſecond Punic war; from whence it is evident, that this muſt have been one of the firſt employments in the ſtate. The perſon inveſted with this high dignity had a vaſt influence, not only in paſſing, but likewiſe in repealing of laws, as may be inferred from Hannibal's impeaching the whole bench of judges, and carrying his point againſt them, during his continuance [o] in this office. He moreover [p] received the tribute paid by the different nations under the Carthaginian power; collected the yearly taxes and ſubſidies levied upon the citizens, and had the care of every thing relating to the public revenues. It is remarkable, that a tranſition [q] from the office of ſuffetes (after it became annual) to the prætorſhiy, was not uncommon in Carthage; of which Hannibal and Mago, not to [r] mention other inſtances that might be produced, ſupply us with abundant proof. Whether there were more prætors than one in this republic, or whether any branches of buſineſs, beſides thoſe above-mentioned, pertained to the office, are points that, for want of ſufficient light from antiquity, cannot be determined.

THE quæſtor [s] was an officer belonging to the bench of judges, who, tho' ſubordinate to them, had a very conſiderable degree of power. He [t] likewiſe collected and managed the public money, under the prætor; which induced Livy to give him the name of quæſtor. This officer, in his double capacity, ſeems to have anſwered to the old Roman quæſtors, who [u] were introduced under the regal government, as well as thoſe who were appointed in the time of the commonwealth. He was ſometimes at leaſt, if not of courſe, admitted into the bench of judges, at the expiration of his office. This, and the other particulars, we learn from Livy and Polybius; but as to any thing further, either concerning him or his function, we are entirely in the dark. The quæſtor.

WE find another civil officer eſtabliſhed at Carthage, whoſe buſineſs it was to inſpect into the manners of the citizens; on which account he is ſtyled by Cornelius Nepos [w], the præfect of manners, or the cenſor. Hamilcar [x], the father of Hannibal, tho' the firſt man in the republic, could not eſcape this inſpection; for the cenſor took The cenſor.

from

[o] Liv. ubi ſup. [p] Idem ibid. Ub. Emm. & Hendr. ubi ſup. [q] Hendr, ubi ſup. [r] Liv. Polyb. Diodor. Sic. &c. [s] Liv. l. xxxiii. [t] Idem, l. xxiii. [u] Vide Univerſ. hiſt. vol. xi. p. 394. in not. [w] Corn. Nep. in vit. Hamilc. [x] Idem. ibid.

from him a beautiful youth, named Asdrubal, on a report that he was more familiar with this youth than was consistent with modesty; from whence we may conclude, that the power of this magistrate extended to every subject of the state, even those of the greatest figure and distinction.

The Carthaginian laws.

As for the Carthaginian laws, our readers must not expect any regular system of them. The utmost we can pretend to is, to give them a few fragments, or rather traces of an inconsiderable part of these laws. They have all long since been buried in oblivion; nor have even the titles of any of them, but what we here produce, escaped the general wreck of time.

Children of the best families sacrificed to Saturn.

1. THERE was a law of very long standing amongst the Carthaginians [y], by which they were enjoined to sacrifice to Saturn only children nobly born. This, not being complied with for a certain period, grew into disuse, the children of slaves and foreigners being substituted in the room of the others. But when Agathocles [z] reduced Carthage almost to the last extremity, it was revived, the inhabitants imputing all their misfortunes to the anger of Saturn, who, as they imagined, was offended at the non-observance of this law. However, to attone for this crime, two hundred children of the best families in the city were offered up to that deity.

Ceres and Proserpina admitted into the number of the Carthaginian deities.

2. BY another law, Ceres and Proserpina were admitted into the number of Carthaginian deities [a]. Magnificent statues were erected in their honour; priests were selected from amongst the most distinguished families of the city for their service; and sacrifices, after the Greek manner, were offered up to them. This happened during the consternation the people of Carthage were thrown into by the African insurrection, and the ill success that attended them in their war with Dionysius the tyrant of Syracuse. It was done in order to appease the anger of those goddesses, whose farther resentment they feared, because Himilco, the Carthaginian general in Sicily, had plundered their temples in the suburb of Acradina.

Greek language forbidden in Carthage.

3. ABOUT this time likewise a law was enacted at Carthage [b], by which all the inhabitants were prohibited learning either to write or speak the Greek language. It was hoped hoped by this means to prevent for the future all treaſonable correſpondence with the enemy. The law was occaſioned by a Carthaginian traitor [c], who, writing in Greek to Dionyſius, had given him intelligence of the motions of the army, and particularly of its departure from the city (K). But this law was afterwards either repealed, or totally neglected; for we find, that the [d] great Hannibal himſelf underſtood this language ſo well, that he compoſed in it an hiſtory of the actions of Manlius Vulſo during the time of his proconſulſhip in Aſia [e], having been taught it by Soſilus the Lacedæmonian (L).

[y] Diodor. Sic. l. xx. Plut. de superstit. & de ser. vindic. deor. Herodot. l vii. [z] Diodor. Sic. ubi sup. Pescen. Fest. apud Lactant. inst. l. i. c. 1. [a] Diod. Sic. l. xiv. [b] Just. l. xx.

The centumvirate inſtituted to reſtrain the power of the Carthaginian generals.

4. It has been lately hinted, that a council was formed at Carthage [f], conſiſting of an hundred perſons taken out of the ſenate, whoſe province it was to enquire into the conduct of their generals at the end of the campaign. Now, it cannot be ſuppoſed, that this could any otherwiſe have been effected, than by a law paſſed for that purpoſe. The ends propoſed by this law were, to reduce the exorbitant power of Mago's family within proper bounds, which, by ingroſſing all the beſt employments, was become too overgrown for the ſtate; and to ſecure the republic againſt the great

[c] Idem ibid [d] Corn Nep. in vit. Hannib. [e] Idem ibid. & Plut. in Scip. [f] Juſt. l. xix.

(K) This traitor's name was Suniator, Suniates, or Suniatus, a profeſſed enemy to Hanno the Carthaginian general, and who, in order to hurt him, did not ſcruple an attempt to ſacrifice his country. He was a citizen of the firſt rank, and wrote to Dionyſius in Greek, giving him advice of the military preparations making againſt him, as well as the incapacity of Hanno for the poſt he was in; but his letter being intercepted, he received the puniſhment due to his crime (42).

(L) This Soſilus, with Philenius or Silenus, another Lacedæmonian, attended Hannibal in all his expeditions. That general ſpoke Greek with a tolerable fluency, and is ſaid to have written other books in this language, beſides the work here mentioned. Soſilus and Silenus undertook to write the hiſtory of their hero; but whether or no they executed that deſign, is not known. If they did, we are never the better for it; ſince not a fragment of either of their pieces has come to us (43).

(42) Juſtin. l. xx. Ubb. Emm. ubi ſup. apud. Gronov. p. 511.
(43) Vide Corn. Nep. in vit. Hannib. edit. Lugd. Bat. 1734. p. 604. not. 6. Cic de divin. l. xxiv. Liv. l. xxvi. Voſſ. de hiſt. Græc. l. iii. p. 413.

great authority of its generals in all ſucceeding ages, who, whilſt in the field, were quite deſpotic. It is generally believed, that this council was the ſame with the centumvirate, or [g] tribunal of the hundred, which has been already deſcribed.

5. A ſort of ſumptuary law was made by the Carthaginian ſenate, to reſtrain all kinds of exceſſes at marriages. This was occaſioned by a deſign of Hanno, the principal perſon in the city, to make himſelf maſter of the commonwealth upon the day of his daughter's marriage. In order to this, his intention was to keep open houſe for the populace that day, and to regale the ſenate in a moſt magnificent manner. All the members of this laſt were to have been taken off by poiſon at this entertainment, which would have enabled him to ſeize upon the government without oppoſition. Hanno, upon account of his great wealth and power, had ſuch an influence in the city, that the ſenate, upon the diſcovery of this plot, did not think proper to puniſh him for it; but contented themſelves with paſſing the law here mentioned [h].

Defects in the Carthaginian conſtitution.

BEFORE we conclude our account of the political ſtate of Carthage, it may not be amiſs to take notice of a few defects in that conſtitution, as Ariſtotle himſelf has pointed them out to us (M). FIRST,

[g] Idem ibid. & Ub. Emm. ubi ſup. [h] Juſtin. l. xxi.

(M) Since we follow Ariſtotle here in reciting the defects of this ſtate, it will be but juſt, by way of contraſt, to touch upon two things, which may be conſidered as excellencies in it.

1. The Carthaginians had public meals or entertainments, which ſeem to have been appointed at firſt in imitation of the Lacedæmonian phiditia, and in order to ſerve the ſame ends (44). The phiditia were one of the moſt uſeful inſtitutions of Lycurgus, which, 'tis imagined, he received from Crete, becauſe they went at firſt by the Cretan name Andria. They were intended to repreſs all kinds of luxury; to form the minds of the Lacedæmonian youth, by inſpiring them with virtuous ſentiments; and to excite a noble emulation amongſt them. At theſe meals young people were inſtructed by their ſeniors in the art of converſation, heard the moſt uſeful topics frequently diſcuſſed, and had always before them ſhining examples of wiſdom and virtue. But it is ſufficient juſt to have hinted this here, ſince an ample account of the inſtitution itſelf has been given in its proper place (45). 2. The

(44) Ariſtot. de repub. l. ii. c. 11. (45) Univerſ hiſt. vol. vi. p 386, 387. Vide etiam Joan. Meurſ. miſcel. Laconic. l. i. Plut. in Lycurg. Strab. l. x. Ariſt. ubi ſupra, c. 9, 10. Porphyr de abſt. l. iv. Macrob. ſat. l. vii. c. 3. & Dicæarch. apud Athen. deipnoſoph. l. iv.

FIRST, The [i] philoſopher looked upon it as an imperfection in this commonwealth, that when the members of the ſenate were not unanimous in their voices, the power of deciding thereby devolved on the people; for this he intimates to be contrary to the maxims of all well regulated ſtates, as tending too much to popular government.

SECONDLY, He will have it, that the quinquevirate, or, as he terms it, the pentarchy, enjoyed a degree of power inconſiſtent with the nature of a true ariſtocracy, which either originally was, or at leaſt was intended to have been, a principal ingredient in the Carthaginian conſtitution.

THIRDLY, He reckons it an evil, that merit and a conſpicuous birth, without riches, were not ſufficient qualifications for a man to fill the firſt poſts; for this in his opinion, does not only oftentimes exclude perſons of the moſt exalted merit from having any ſhare in the government, but likewiſe opens a door to avarice, and all kinds of corruption, which, in the end, muſt ruin any ſtate. The experience of after-ages ſhewed this reflection of his not to have been ill-grounded; for the Barcan faction, by the omnipotence of money, carried their point on all occaſions for a conſiderable time; others after them did the like, which at laſt proved the republic's deſtruction.

FOURTHLY, He will by no means allow, that the ſame perſon ſhould aſſume to himſelf ſeveral employments; than which no practice was more common at Carthage. The reaſons he aſſigns for this are, that a man poſſeſſed of but one office, is much more capable of acquitting himſelf well in the execution of it; that public affairs are managed with more ſpirit and expedition, when the different branches of buſineſs are lodged in different hands; that different employments frequently claſh with one another;

[i] Ariſtot. ubi ſupra.

2. The Carthaginians had a laudable cuſtom amongſt them, of ſending colonies from time to time into different parts of their dominions (46). This procured a decent ſettlement for ſeveral citizens, for whom there was no room in the ſtate; provided for the neceſſities of the poor; and carried off great numbers of people, who were always prepared for innovations. All which ſalutary precautions muſt not a little contribute to the preſervation of the public tranquillity.

(46) Ariſtot. ubi ſupra c. 11. ſub. fin.

another; and laſtly, that the welfare of every ſtate is highly promoted by an equal diſtribution of its places amongſt its members. All which reaſons are indiſputably juſt, eſpecially the laſt; ſince nothing more ſtrongly excites an emulation amongſt men of merit, than an impartial diſpoſal of the preferments in a ſtate amongſt them, nor more effectually prevents all thoſe inconveniences which muſt be the neceſſary conſequence of one man's monopolizing the whole adminiſtration.

FIFTHLY, He blames the Carthaginian conſtitution in general, for not having a ſufficient proviſion made in it againſt all popular commotions, or acts of violence, that at any time might happen. Should a majority of the citizens at any time have taken it into their heads to revolt, or be angry with their governors, the laws (N), according to him, could not have afforded a ſufficient relief on ſuch an occaſion. This conſtitution, indeed, as we have already obſerved from him, was at firſt excellently calculated to prevent or avoid all inteſtine diſorders; but it was not ſo well contrived, at leaſt in his time, to allay any heats that might break out in it. He therefore ſeems juſtly to conclude, that the tranquillity and repoſe of the ſubjects of Carthage were not then ſettled upon a ſolid foundation.

THE

(N) In this reſpect it ſeems to have been the ſame form of government as that introduced by Phaleas Chalcedonius, which has induced a learned man to believe, that he was the legiſlator of the Carthaginians (47). When he lived, Ariſtotle (48), who mentions both him and his republic, informs us not; but he muſt have been much later than the firſt formation of the Carthaginian republic, for Chalcedon itſelf was built near three hundred years after Carthage. However, there ſeems to be ſome foundation for the above-mentioned conjecture, as will appear from comparing Hendreich with Ariſtotle (49). It is therefore probable, that the firſt commonwealth ſettled at Carthage, which took place immediately after the abolition of monarchy, was of a different form from that which exiſted in Ariſtotle's time. This, in all likelihood, nearly reſembled (if it was not exactly upon the ſame model) the antient Tyrian or Hebrew republic, wherein one ſupreme magiſtrate preſided. What we have advanced in a former note (50) will ſtrengthen this ſuppoſition, and likewiſe itſelf receive additional force from it.

(47) Hendr. in Carthag. p. 329. Vid etiam Reineccii hiſt. Jul. in Carthag t. ii. p. 460 (48) Ariſt. de rep l. ii c. 7. (49) Hendr. ubi ſup. Ariſt. ubi. ſup. & c. 2. (50) Vid. not. (I)

THE Carthaginians being deſcended from the Tyrians, their religious worſhip muſt of courſe have agreed in all points at firſt with that of the Phœnicians, which has been already in ſome meaſure deſcribed [k]. In proceſs of time, by their intercourſe with the Greeks, eſpecially thoſe of Sicily, they came to take a liking to the ſuperſtition of that nation, adopted ſeveral new deities before to them unknown [l], and intermixed ſome of the Greek religious ceremonies with the Tyrian [m]. But in this they copied after their anceſtors the Phœnicians, who gradually imbibed many ſuperſtitious notions prevailing among the greateſt ſtates [n], by reaſon of their vicinity to, and correſpondence with, them; and afterwards, upon their ſubjection to thoſe ſtates, had great alterations made in the whole ſyſtem of their religion. The Carthaginians likewiſe, by reaſon of their extended commerce, muſt have been in ſome ſort acquainted with the different kinds of ſuperſtition eſtabliſhed in moſt nations, with which doubtleſs they tinctured their own; ſo that from hence, as well as from other conſiderations, it may appear, that the religion of Carthage, was a very groſs and multifarious idolatry. Religion of the Carthaginians.

THE knowledge we have of the Carthaginian manner of worſhip, as well as the objects of that worſhip, is derived from the Greek and Roman writers, who have affixed the names of their own gods [o] to thoſe of the Carthaginians. This has rendered their accounts and obſervations on this head more imperfect and leſs valuable; for though we are well aſſured, that the Egyptian, Phœnician, Greek, Roman, and Carthaginian deities did in the main agree, yet we are as well aſſured, that each of thoſe nations had not only ſome particular modes of worſhip, but likewiſe ſome particular deities peculiar to itſelf. 'Tis impoſſible therefore to come to an exact knowledge of the Carthaginian gods from what is delivered of them by the Greek and Roman authors. All that we can do is, to conſider their different attributes, and the circumſtances attending that adoration their votaries paid them, as given us by the aforeſaid authors. By comparing theſe with what we find related in holy writ of the idols of the Canaanites and neighbouring nations, as well as the religious cuſtoms and manners of thoſe nations, we may, perhaps, give our readers a tolerable account of the religion of the Carthaginians.

DIODORUS

[k] Univ. hiſt. vol. ii. p. 340, 341. &c. [l] Diodor. Sic. l. xiv. xx. &c. [m] Idem ibid. [n] Univ. hiſt. vol. ii. ubi ſup. [o] Herod. Polyb. Diod. Sic. Liv. Quint. Curt. aliiq; mult.

Saturn the principal deity at Carthage.

DIODORUS SICULUS tells us, that the Carthaginians, in a particular manner, adored Chronus [p]; who, according to Quintus Curtius [q], and an infinity of other authors, was the Saturn of the Latins. The ſacrifices offered up to him were children of the moſt diſtinguiſhed families, as has been above obſerved. Upon the ſignal defeat of the Carthaginian army by Agathocles, three hundred citizens voluntarily ſacrificed themſelves, in order to render him more propitious to their country. Diodorus farther ſays, that they had a brazen ſtatue or coloſſus of him, the hands of which were extended in act to receive, and bent downwards in ſuch a manner, as that the child laid thereon immediately dropped into a hollow, where was a fiery furnace [r].

THE ſame author adds, that this inhuman practice [s] ſeemed to him to confirm a tradition handed down to the Greeks from very early antiquity, viz. that Chronus devoured his own children. But in this we cannot agree with him; for it can ſcarce be doubted, but that the fable itſelf owes its origin to this moſt execrable ſuperſtition, eſpecially as the knowledge of it could not be hid from the antient Greeks, who received both their religion and theology from the Egyptians and Phœnicians (O).

BUT though the Carthaginian god, to whom human victims were ſo agreeable, had the name of Chronus given him by Diodorus, yet we cannot certainly infer from hence, that he was the ſame deity; becauſe his Punic name is unknown, and [p] Diodor. Sic. l. xx. & alibi paſſ. [q] Q. Curt. l. iv. c. 3. Peſcennius Feſtus apud. Lactant. divin. inſtit. i. c. 21. aliiq; mult. [r] Diodor. Sic. ubi ſup. [s] Idem ibid.

(O) Biſhop Cumberland proves from ſeveral authors, that human ſacrifices were offered to Cabiri (51), and Sanchoniatho aſſerts (52), that Chronus or Saturn ſacrificed his ſon to the manes of his father, whom he had before inhumanly murdered. From which ſource the learned biſhop derives the unnatural practice here mentioned, which prevailed for many ages over a great part both of the eaſtern and weſtern world. But the fragment of Sanchoniatho, preſerved by Philo Byblius and Euſebius, notwithſtanding all the learned biſhop's endeavours, as well as thoſe of M. Fourmont, to render it intelligible, is ſo dark and intricate eſpecially in this particular, that we cannot entirely depend upon it.

(51) Cumberland. in append. de Cabir. (52) Idem ibid. & in Sanchoniath. p. 134—157.

and therefore 'tis impoſſible to determine whether it was of the ſame import with Chronus, or no. However, we ſhall endeavour to ſupply this defect, by offering ſome reaſons, which if they will not abſolutely evince the point in view, will yet render it highly probable.

1. In the firſt place, the Carthaginian cuſtom of giving up their offspring as an expiatory ſacrifice to this god, bears a great analogy to the Greek tradition concerning Chronus, viz. that he devoured his own children. This ſeems to have been a great inducement to Diodorus himſelf to conclude, that he and Chronus were the ſame [t].

2. Both the oblations offered to this Carthaginian deity, and the manner of offering them, as likewiſe the brazen ſtatue mentioned by Diodorus, plainly enough ſhew, that he was Moloch [u] or Milchom, the famous idol of the Ammonites, Canaanites, and neighbouring nations. The deſcription already given of this falſe divinity, in conjunction with ſcripture, will remove all doubts as to this point. Now that Moloch or Milchom was the Chronus of Diodorus, ſeems clear from the following conſiderations (P).

Chronus

[t] Idem ibid. [u] Univ. hiſt. vol. ii. p. 118, 119, &c. Lev. xviii. 21. xx. 2, 3, 4. 2 Kings xxiii. 10. Pſal. cvi. 37, &c. Vid. etiam Grot. in Levit. Voſſ. de idololat. Le Clerc com. in Levit. Saurin's diſcourſe, and Calmet's diſſertation on that ſubject.

(P) Nothing can be more evident, than that Moloch, Milcom, Baal, Bel, Chronus, &c. are all words of the ſame ſignification. They denote a king or prince. Chronus, in particular, does ſo. The word קרן keren or kren properly imports a horn, which was an emblem of power and dominion amongſt the eaſtern nations. From thence undoubtedly our Engliſh word crown is to be deduced, or at leaſt the Latin corona, if it ſhould be thought more proper to derive the Engliſh word from this. It might likewiſe, for aught we know to the contrary, antiently have ſignified a crown, ſince all the eaſtern princes were, from the earlieſt antiquity, adorned with that enſign of royalty; and Tertullian (53) tells us, that Chronus was the firſt who wore it. Eupolemus, as preſerved to us by Alexander Polyhiſtor in Euſebius, Theophilus Antiochenus, and Damaſcius, compared with ſcripture, render it inconteſtably clear, that Chronus, Moloch, and Baal, were the ſame perſon (54). We ſhall beg leave here to conſider a difficult (53) Tertul de corona. (54) Apud. Euſeb de præp. Evang. l. ix. Theoph. Antiochen. ad Autolyc. l. iii. Damaſcius in vit. Iſidor. Jer vii. 31. & xix. 5. Iſai. xxxvi. 19. & xxxvii. 12. & alibi paſſ.

CHRONUS [w] had, for a conſiderable period, even amongſt the old inhabitants of Latium, human victims offered up to him, as Moloch had in Paleſtine.

THE

[w] Macrob. Saturn. l. i. c. 7. Ovid. in faſt. Lactant. de falſ. relig. l. i. Seld. de diis Syr. ſyntag. 1. c. 6. Dan. Claſenius. in theol. gent. l. iii. c. 4. Scherlog. antiq. bibl. de Moloch. Geus. de victim. human. p. m. 64. Ravanell. biblioth. ſacr. Buxtorf. lex. p. m. 1068. Fag. annot in targ. Onkel. Lev. xviii. 21. B. Salom. Glaſſ. phil. ſ. p. m. 1716 Athanaſ. Kirch. in Oedip. Ægypt. l. i. ſ. 4, c. 15. p. 328. & in prod. Copt. c. 5. p. 147.

a difficult paſſage of ſcripture, which is not at all foreign to our preſent ſubject (55). In the original it is; ונשאתם את סכות מלככם ואת כיון כוכב אלהיכם אשר עשיתם לכם צלמיכם which, being rendered exactly according to the letter, is; But ye have borne the tabernacle of your (god) Moloch, and (ye have likewiſe borne) Chiun your likeneſſes, the ſtar of your god, which ye made to yourſelves (56). St. Luke's (or rather the Septuagint) verſion of this into Greek, is: Καὶ ἀνελάβετε τὴν σκηνὴν τοῦ Μολὸχ, καὶ τὸ ἄστρον τοῦ Θεοῦ ὑμῶν Ῥεμφὰν, τοὺς τύπους οὓς ἐποιήσατε προσκυνεῖν αὐτοῖς. Which ought to be thus rendered; Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch and Remphan the ſtar of your god, (i. e. Moloch) figures which ye made, to worſhip them. Our readers will obſerve, that this is different from the common Engliſh tranſlation, which has it; Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the ſtar of your god Remphan, figures which ye made, to worſhip them. Now ſurely no one can heſitate a moment in determining which of theſe is the moſt eligible. The firſt, in agreement with the original Hebrew, makes St. Luke to declare, that Remphan is the name of the ſtar, not of the god. The ſecond in contradiction to the Hebrew, will have him to aſſert, that Remphan or Chiun is the name of the god, not of the ſtar; which is itſelf a ſufficient reaſon for our rejection of it. Beſides, the common tranſlation inſinuates, that Moloch and Remphan, or Chiun, were different deities: whereas, according to ours, they were the ſame; ſince it makes Chiun and Remphan the names of that ſtar, which the Arabians and Egyptians appropriated to the falſe deity, called by the Ammonites, Canaanites, &c. by way of eminence, Moloch. And how conſonant this is to the general voice of antiquity, may be ſeen from the plan we are now upon. The ſun, moon, and ſtars were the firſt objects of falſe worſhip; afterwards the deification of dead men took place (57). The Egyptians and Arabians adhered to the (55) Amos. v. 26 (56) Act. vii. 43. (57) Herod. Diod. Sic. Plato, Chron. Alex. Plut. Maimonides, Hyde, Prideaux, aliq; multi.

THE Cretans [x], in antient times, ſacrificed children to Chronus, as the Canaanites and Phœnicians did to Moloch.

[x] Iſtrus in collect. ſacrific. & Dan. Clāſenius ubi ſup.

the former ſpecies of falſe worſhip longer than the Canaanites and Phœnicians. However, all thoſe nations agreed in this, that, from very early antiquity, they formed a mixed kind of idolatry, made up of the worſhip of the ſtars and dead men. In conſequence of which they aſſigned a planet to each of the chief of their deified worthies, thinking this the greateſt honour they could do them. The higheſt and moſt remote of the planets is known to be Saturn, whom the old Egyptians called either Remphan, Raphan, Ramphan, Rephan, Rompha or Repha; but the Arabians, Civan or Ciwan, (from whence the Hebrew Chiun) as the Turks, Arabs, and Perſians do at this day. The Ammonites, Idumæans, and Canaanites, though they had a knowledge of this planet, and conſidered him as conjoined with a deified prince, yet they adored this prince under a bodily repreſentation; whereas the Arabians and Egyptians paid divine honours to the ſtar, with which they imagined him conjoined. Hence it came to paſs, that the former addreſſed themſelves to an image or ſtatue, and the latter to a ſtar, tho' they all of them intentionally pointed at the ſame object. Now the Iſraelites had learned the Egyptian idolatry during their abode in Egypt, and that of the Arabians whilſt they were in Arabia Petræa, or at leaſt its neighbourhood, where they worſhipped the falſe god at preſent under conſideration; and as at the ſame time they were upon the borders of the Canaanites, with whom doubtleſs they had ſome kind of intercourſe, 'tis natural to ſuppoſe, that they were likewiſe initiated in their form of ſuperſtition. This will account for their having with them the Canaanitiſh image of Moloch, in a ſmall portable temple, or tabernacle, carried either on mens ſhoulders, or by oxen; and a ſtar painted on the inſide of this tabernacle, or upon the idol itſelf, in compliance with the Egyptian and Arabian cuſtom. Kircher tells us, that the name of Saturn amongſt the modern Coptes is Rephan; from whence Bochart infers, that the Septuagint rendered Chiun by Rephan, becauſe they made their verſion in Egypt, where this word denoted the ſame planet that Chiun did in Arabia and Phœnice (58). The ſame author likewiſe informs us, that Moloch ſignified in the old Egyptian language Mars (59). But as Moloch was a Phœnician, not an Egyptian, word; as he proves his aſſertion only from a modern Copto-Arabic vocabulary MS. purchaſed at Alexandria by Sig. Pietro (58) Athan. Kircher in prod. Copt c. 5. p 140 & in Oedip. Ægyptiac. tom. i. §. 4. v. 15. Boch. phal. l. i. c. 15. (59) Idem ibid.

MOLOCH[y] was the principal god of the country in which his worſhip prevailed, as appears from his name, which implies [y] Univ. hiſt. vol. ii. p. 118.

Pietro della Valle in the year 1615, and by affirming, that the Egyptian Mars, Oſiris, Typhon, the Perſian Mithras, &c. were the ſame deity, which is a palpable abſurdity, we think little regard in this laſt point is to be paid to him. Some will have the god of the Syrians, called by the Septuagint and the Maſorets, Rimmon, according to the Syriac form, Remvan, to have been the Remphan of St. Luke, as well as the Rephan of the Septuagint (60). Now Saturn is the higheſt of the planets, as the name ſeems to import, and therefore might be Rimmon or Remvan. This god was moreover, without diſpute, the Moloch and Baal of the Ammonites, Canaanites, &c. the Bel of the Babylonians, the Chronus of the Greeks, &c. and a deity very well known in the countries where both the Septuagint and St. Luke wrote. Biſhop Cumberland imagines Saturn to have been called Rephas or Rephan, becauſe he was of an healthful conſtitution, long life, large ſtature, and great ſtrength, all which the Hebrew word רפא includes in the idea it conveys to us (61). He farther obſerves, that all his deſcendents, who reſembled him herein, were denominated Rephaim; which the Septuagint in ſome meaſure confirm, by rendering Rephaim, γίγαντες, giants, alluding to the ſuperiority of ſtrength and conſtitution they enjoyed. We muſt not omit remarking, that, in conformity to our tranſlation of the Greek paſſage in the Septuagint and St. Stephen's ſpeech, the Syriac verſion in Amos, v. 26 makes Moloch and Chiun to be the ſame; nor that Jonathan's targum expreſly calls Chiun a ſtar. Some critics have derived Chiun and Rephan or Remphan from two Oriental roots implying the ſame thing, i. e. the great principle of life and exiſtence; which is not very different from the notion of Saturn to be found in the verſes of Orpheus. Others have believed, that כיון before the time of the Maſorites was read Chivan, and that the foot of the initial letter caph being defaced, it appeared to the LXX. elders like reſh, who therefore pronounced it Rephan (62). But this is too bold a criticiſm, eſpecially as St. Luke has ſo cloſely followed the aforeſaid elders, and as Diodorus Siculus mentions a moſt opulent king of Egypt named Remphis, who flouriſhed in very early times (63). This laſt is a full proof, that Remphis or Rempha was an Egyptian proper name of very high antiquity; if not, that this king was the (60) Vid. ſynopſ. Criticor. in Am. v. 26. & Act. vii. 43. ut & Dan. Claſen. in theol. gent. l iii. c. 4. (61) Cumberland on Sanchoniath. rem. 2. (62) Synopſ. criticor. ubi ſup. (63) Diod. Sic. l. i.

plies ſovereignty in it, from his having ſuch particular notice taken of him in ſcripture, and from the intimation given in holy writ, that he was the great god of the Ammonites. Now Chronus [z] was the chief object of adoration in Italy, Crete, Cyprus, Rhodes, and all other countries where divine honours were paid him (Q).

[z] Voſſius de idololat. Ovid. Macrob. Iſtr. Porphyr. Seld. Claſen. &c. ubi ſup.

the Egyptian Saturn, or at leaſt was worſhipped under the form of the planet ſo called. It likewiſe proves, that St. Luke's Rempha or Remphan is preferable to the Repha or Rephan of the LXX. as alſo, that the modern Copts have borrowed their Rephan from the latter, ſince they have not the true Egyptian name, but one that is a corruption of it, taken from ſome corrupted copy, which can be no other than one of the LXX. whoſe original reading, we doubt not, was Rempha or Remphan. Neither is it at all improbable, that the ſame people have taken the name Moloch (a Phœnician or Hebrew word) from the ſame paſſage of this verſion, and, through ignorance, applied it to the planet Mars. What gives great weight to this conjecture is, that the notion itſelf is entirely repugnant to the whole ſtream of antiquity; and that Vettius Valens Antiochenus and Julius Firmicus poſitively declare, that the Egyptian or Coptic names of the planet Mars were Artes and Pyrois (64).

(Q) A ſtrong argument in favour of what is here advanced may likewiſe be drawn from the general homage paid to Saturn, as the principal of the gods in moſt countries. He ſeems to have been known to the Gauls, Scythians, Celtes, Africans, and even the moſt barbarous nations. Human ſacrifices were offered up to him where-ever his worſhip took place, tho' this did not continue long amongſt the Greeks and Romans, whoſe natural ſentiments of humanity and compaſſion ſoon became too ſtrong to permit them to tolerate ſo infernal a practice. The ſolemnities obſerved at the offering up of human victims to the Carthaginian god (whoſe name we may reaſonably ſuppoſe was either Baal or Moloch, or both) anſwered pretty nearly to thoſe obſerved by the Canaanites on the like dire occaſion, as we learn from Plutarch *. This is a further preſumption, that the Phœnician Moloch and this deity were the ſame. 'Tis an ingenious conjecture of Banier (65), that the Ammonites worſhipped the ſeven planets in the idol of Moloch jointly, as well as Saturn, his proper ſtar, and the ſun ſingly.

(64) Vettius Valens Antioch. apud Seld. de diis Syr. ſyntag. 1. & Jul. Firmic. ibidem. * Plutarch. de ſuperſtit. Seld. ubi ſup. & Scalig. in epiſt. ad Caſaub (65) Vid Fourmont. ref. erit. t. i. p. 357. & Banier in mythol. l. vii. c. 6.

LASTLY, to omit many other arguments that might be produced, both Moloch and Chronus were indiſputably the great Baal, Bel [a] or Belus of the Sidonians, Babylonians, and Aſſyrians, and conſequently the ſame individual deity.

3. BAAL [b], Belus, Bal or Bel, (for he was known by all theſe names) was the great god of the Carthaginians. As it is therefore apparent from ſcripture [c], that he was delighted with human ſacrifices, and as he was the Chronus [d] of the Greeks, 'tis evident from hence, that the Carthaginian divinity Diodorus had in view muſt have been really Chronus.

4. FROM ſeveral traces to be found in the proper names of Carthage, we may diſcover, that the deity under conſideration was known there by the two appellations Baal and Moloch, as in the eaſt. Hanni-bal, Aſdru-bal, Maher-bal, &c. point out Baal or Bal; as Hi-milce, Hi-milco, Ha-milcar, Melicus [e], Malchus [f], &c. do Moloch or Milcom. Theſe therefore being different names of the ſame deity, who was the Chronus of the Greeks, it muſt be allowed, that Chronus or Saturn was not only worſhipped, but likewiſe looked upon as the principal god, at Carthage (R).

THE

[a] Jer. xix. 5. & alibi. Seld. de diis. Syr. ubi ſup. Voſſius ubi ſup. l. ii. c. 5. Vid. etiam. Lud. Viv. ad D. Auguſt. de civ. Dei l. vii. c. 9. Cumberland on Sanchoniath. p. 152. Suid. ſub voc. Βεέλ. [b] Author. ſupra laudat. & Serv. in Æn. i. Iſidor. origin l. viii. &c. [c] Jer. xix. 5. & alibi. [d] Vid. author. ſupra laudat. & Cumberland on Sanchoniath. Seld. de diis Syr. &c. Vid. & ipſum Sanchoniath. apud Euſeb. de præp. Evang. l. i. c. 10, &c. [e] Sil. Italic. l. 3. [f] Gronov. theſaur. ant. Græc. tom. ii.

(R) It is believed by ſome, that Saturn or Baal was the ſun, Baaltis or Aſtarte the moon, and that theſe were the only deities of the eaſtern nations. But this we cannot allow; for notwithſtanding the ſun and moon were two of the moſt noted objects of falſe worſhip, and poſſibly the firſt, yet we think it undeniable, that the Orientals had other falſe gods, in very antient times. From ſcripture we learn, that the nations bordering upon GOD's people worſhipped the ſun, moon, and other planets, in very early ages (66). Philip's treaty with the Carthaginians, a copy of which is preſerved to us by Polybius (67), renders it indiſputable that this people had other deities beſides the two luminaries above mentioned, ſome of which were planets diſtinct from them. But we ſhall endeavour to trace up this planetary worſhip to its firſt

(66) 2 Kings xxiii. 5. (67) Polyb. l. vii.

THE goddeſs Cœleſtis or Urania was held in the higheſt veneration by the Carthaginians. The prophet Jeremiah [g] calls

The goddeſs Cœleſtis worſhipped at Carthage.

[g] Jer. vii. 18. xliv. 17. & alibi.

firſt ſource, or as near it as poſſible. God created the world, or this ſyſtem, in ſix days, and reſted the ſeventh (68). This was the foundation of the Antediluvian as well as the Hebrew week; and ſeems to be the reaſon that the number ſeven was ſo remarkable both amongſt the Antediluvains and the Hebrews. Vengeance ſeven-fold was denounced againſt any perſon that ſhould ſlay Cain (69); Noah was commanded to take unto him the clean beaſts by ſevens (70); the fowls of the air alſo by ſevens (71); God foretold to him the beginning of the deluge (72) ſeven days before it happened; the ſame patriarch ſent a dove out of the ark a ſecond time to explore ſeven days after the firſt (73), and a third time ſeven days after this; Abimelech received ſeven ewe-lambs of Abraham, as a teſtimony that a well belonged to him (74); Jacob ſerved Laban for Rachael ſeven years (75); Pharaoh in his dream ſaw ſeven fat and ſeven lean kine come out of the river, portending (76) ſo many years of plenty and famine; Elijah ſent his ſervant ſeven times towards the ſea, to diſcover the cloud that was forming itſelf for rain (77); his ſucceſſor Eliſha ordered Naaman the Syrian to waſh himſelf ſeven times in the river Jordan, in order to be cured of his leproſy (78), &c. Now 'tis obſervable, that there is a ſurpriſing analogy betwixt the days of the original week, and the ſyſtem then created. The ſix primary planets, for the moon is the ſatellite of the earth, move round the ſun, which is fixed, or at reſt, and together they are in number ſeven, this anſwers exactly to the ſix days of work or motion, and one of reſt, in all ſeven, of which the original week did conſiſt. Thus the Moſaic account of the creation is a ſymbolical deſcription of the world or ſyſtem created; and ſuch deſcriptions as theſe were perfectly agreeable to the genius of the Orientals, eſpecially the Egyptians, in the firſt ages, and particularly in that wherein Moſes lived, as might be proved by an induction of particulars, were it in any manner neceſſary. Hence we have the greateſt reaſon to imagine, that the Antidiluvian as well as the Poſtdiluvian patriarchs, the firſt Egyptians, Chaldeans, &c. famed for their knowledge in aſtronomy and aſtrology, knew the number of the planets, and had names for them. Moſes likewiſe, being learned in all the wiſdom of the Egyptians, (68) Gen. i. ii. &c. (69) Gen. iv. 15. (70) Gen. vii 2. (71) Gen. vii. 3. (72) Gen. vii. 4. (73) Gen. vii. 10, 12. (74) Gen. xxi. 28, 29, 30. (75) Gen. xxix. 18, 27. (76) Gen. xli. 2, 3. (77) 1 Kings xviii. 43. (78) 2 Kings v. 10, 14.

calls her Baaleth ſhemain the queen of heaven, i. e. Juno Olympia; Megaſthenes [h], in Euſebius, Beltis or queen Beltis;

[h] Megaſthenes & Abydenus apud Euſeb. in chron.

Egyptians, had undoubtedly a great ſhare of knowledge in the celeſtial ſciences (79). That the Egyptians had magicians and wiſe men, or aſtrologers, amongſt them a conſiderable, if not a long, time before Joſeph's arrival in Egypt, appears from ſcripture, ſince it was a common practice in that country then to conſult ſuch perſons (80) upon any extraordinary occaſion; and the number ſeven ſeems likewiſe to have been ſymbolical; from whence we may infer, that none of the planets were unknown to them, even from the firſt formation of their monarchy. The Chaldees or Chaldeans, Syrians, &c. agreed with the family of Abraham or Heber in the moſt early ages, in their computation of time by weeks, or periods of ſeven days (81), as well as in ſhewing regard to the number ſeven; they were likewiſe famed for their early application to the ſtudy of the celeſtial ſciences, which is a good proof that they muſt have been acquainted with the ſeven planets, even from the beginning. According to Iamblichus and Syncellus, Pythagoras was taken priſoner by Cambyſes in Egypt, in the firſt year of the ſixty-fourth olympiad, i. e. about five hundred and twenty four years before the birth of Chriſt. Now the learned are univerſally agreed, that this philoſopher brought with him home from Egypt that antient ſyſtem of the world which bears his name (82), and is generally believed to be the true one, and that he received this from the pillars of the firſt Hermes, who was almoſt as antient as the beginning of the Egyptian monarchy, and a moſt celebrated adept in the knowledge of the heavenly bodies. We muſt therefore allow it probable, that theſe bodies, and the true ſyſtem of the world, were known even from the firſt origin of things. In order to ſupport farther what is here advanced, it may not be improper to obſerve, that from the moſt early antiquity the planets were imagined to bear a near relation to the days of the week, ſince the cuſtom of calling the latter by the names of the former is ſo antient, that the beginning of it cannot be diſcovered. 'Tis undoubtedly as antient as the diviſion of the day into twenty-four hours, ſince the great regard paid to the planets, from a notion of their influence over all terreſtrial bodies, was the cauſe of that diviſion, as that diviſion was of the order in which they ſucceeded one another in their government of the days of the week (83), which does (79) Acts vii. 22. (80) Gen. xli. 8. (81) Gen. xxix. 27. (82) Univerſ. hiſt. vol. i. p. 589, &c. (83) vol. iii. 468, p. note (L).

Beltis; Sanchoniatho [i], in Philo Byblius, Dione and Baaltis; Heſychius [k], Belthes. According to this laſt author, the [i] Sanchoniath. & Philo Bybl. apud Euſeb. de præp. evang. l. i. [k] Heſych ſub voc. Βήλθης.

does not agree with their ſituation in our ſyſtem. The caſe therefore ſeems to have been thus: There was a great analogy between the days of the firſt, or original, week, and the ſeven principal parts of the ſyſtem then created; the former ſeem to have been a ſymbolical deſcription of the latter. This occaſioned the number ſeven, common to both of them, to be taken great notice of by all the firſt inhabitants of the world. The knowledge of the planets, which was coeval with Adam, at firſt afforded many pleaſing ſpeculations to mankind; but afterwards became a ſnare to them, and inſenſibly led them on to the worſhip of theſe heavenly bodies. After this took place, the ſame, if not a greater, regard was paid to the number ſeven, out of the high veneration the planets were held in amongſt them. They allotted every particular hour, every particular day of the week, to the government of ſome one of them; and, in conſequence of this, gave the name of the planet governing to the day governed. This we take to be the origin of the cuſtom of denominating the days of the week after the planets, and conſequently believe, that it was coeval, or nearly ſo, with the firſt origin of idolatry. Alexander Aphrodiſienſis affirms, that the number ſeven is perfect in its own nature, becauſe God governs the earth by the ſeven planets (84); Pythagoras, according to Apuleius, revered it in an extraordinary manner (85), looking upon it as a number ſacred to religion, and pointing (86) out particularly to the ſeven planets; Apuleius judged it neceſſary, before he addreſſed himſelf to the moſt powerful god, to be immerſed ſeven times in ſalt water (87), in conformity, no doubt, to the Pythagorean, i. e. the moſt antient Chaldean, Egyptian, &c. ſuperſtition; Ariſtotle inſinuates, that ſeven is the number (88) of which the world, i. e. this ſyſtem, is compoſed; Photius, Macrobius (89), and others, likewiſe declare, that ſeven is a religious number. From which teſtimonies, as well as an infinite number more that might be produced, (84) Alexander Aphrodiſ. in Ariſtot. probl. l. ii. (85) Apul. Mileſ. 11. (86) Vid. Joan. Meurſ. Denar. Pythagor. c. 9. (87) Apul. ubi ſup. (88) Ariſtot maj. metaphyſ. c. 7. & Alex. Aphrodiſ. in loc. (89) Photius in excerpt. e Nicom. Macrob. in ſomn. Scip. l. i. c. 6. Etymolog. magn. &c. Vide etiam Procl. in Timæ. l. iii. Plutarch. ſympoſ. l. viii. c. 1. & l. ix. c. 4. Diog. Laert. in Platon. l. iii. & Joſ. Laurent. de ſiſt. & tintinnab. c. 3. apud Gronov. theſ. ant. Græc. c. viii. p. 1467.

the word was applied both to Juno and Venus; and indeed in the Phœnician theology, we ſcarce find any diſtinction betwixt theſe two deities. St. Auguſtin ſays, that Carthage was the place where Venus had eſtabliſhed her reign [l]; and Virgil informs us, that Juno preferred that ſpot to all others, even to Samos itſelf [m]. As therefore both the Greeks and Romans had, generally ſpeaking, one ſingle chief divinity to preſide over every particular city, country, and diſtrict, this double one muſt have been owing to the Phœnician or Punic word above-mentioned, which included both of the aforeſaid goddeſſes. Aſtereth and Aſtarte were ſynonymous to Urania and Baaltis, and denoted the moon as well as Venus and Juno, who was invoked in great calamities, particularly in droughts to obtain rain [n]. The antient Greeks frequently confound produced, it is abundantly evident, that the eſteem the antient pagan world ſhewed for the number ſeven was owing originally to the planets, and that theſe were adored from very remote antiquity.

[l] D. Auguſt. in pſal. xcviii. [m] Virg. Æn. i. [n] Tertul. apolog. c 23.

As infinite power cannot be confined in its productions to any particular part of duration, and as the manner of every one of the divine operations muſt be calculated to ſerve ſome wiſe end, we may preſume, that there was ſome final cauſe why the world, or this ſyſtem, was created in preciſely ſix days, which, in conjunction with a ſeventh, formed the firſt period of time. Now it will not be eaſy to aſſign a more rational one than we have hinted above, viz. that this was done with a deſign to point out to the firſt inhabitants of the earth the principal parts of which the ſyſtem then created did conſiſt; as likewiſe to remind them in a particular manner every ſeventh day, that theſe ſeven heavenly bodies were created by God, entirely dependent upon him, and therefore ought not to be eſteemed as objects of adoration. The great propenſity of mankind in after-ages, particularly the Hebrews, God's own people, to this ſpecies of falſe worſhip, adds no ſmall weight to our hypotheſis. That the primitive week, long before the law was in being, conſiſted of ſeven days, is clear from ſcripture (90); as likewiſe, that every one of thoſe days, in the ſymbolical language of the moſt early ages ſtood for a year (91). We could purſue this point much farther, would the ſubject we are upon permit; but as it will not, we hope to be able to give our readers a full diſcuſſion of it in ſome future part of this work; and in the mean time ſhall content ourſelves with having ſuggeſted a few remarkable hints in this place.

(90) Gen. xxix. 27. (91) Ibid.

confound Juno, Venus, and Diana, or the moon; which is to be attributed to the Egyptians and Phœnicians, from whom they received their ſyſtem of religion, who ſeem in the moſt antient times to have had but one name for them all. In ſuch a perplexed point as this, we ſhall expatiate no farther, ſince it would be both fruitleſs and unneceſſary; beſides, it would carry us from our ſubject. Our readers will find as diſtinct and particular an account of the goddeſs or goddeſſes here mentioned, as they can with reaſon expect, in the ſecond volume of this hiſtory [o]. To that part therefore, we refer them (S).

Many deities went antiently by the name of Belus.

BESIDES the firſt Belus already taken notice of, there were ſeveral others of a later date in great repute amongſt the Phœnicians, particularly thoſe of Tyre, and of courſe amongſt the Carthaginians. Jupiter, Mars, Bacchus, Apollo, or the ſun, &c. were all of them ſo ſtyled, according to the moſt celebrated authors who have treated of this ſubject. That Jupiter was worſhipped by this people under the denomination of Belus or Baal, is notorious from Polybius, Menander Epheſius, and Dius [p]. To him they addreſſed their oaths, and placed him, as there is reaſon to believe, for the moſt part, at the head of their treaties For which reaſon ſome have not ſcrupled to affirm, that he was the Baal Berith of Phœnice [r]; but we are rather inclined to ſuppoſe, with biſhop Cumberland, that this deity was Chronus [s]. Mars, according to the chronicon Alexandrinum, compared with Homer and Heſtiæus, an antient author cited by Euſebius [t], was dignified with the title of Belus by the Perſians, Aſſyrians, and doubtleſs by the Carthaginians alſo, ſince he was a favourite divinity in their ſtate [u], eſpecially amongſt their generals. Bacchus was called Belus by the Poet Nonnus [w], and

[o] Univerſ. hiſt. vol. ii. p. 340, &c. [p] Polyb. l. vii. & alibi paſ. Menander Epheſius & Dius apud Joſeph. antiq. L. viii. c. 2. [r] M. Banier. in mythol. vol. i. [r] Cumberland. on Sanchoniath. p. 152. [t] Homer. paſ. Heſtiæus apud Euſeb. de præp. evang. l. ix. & apud Joſeph antiq. l. i. c. 6. Vid. etiam Selden. de diis. Syr. ſyntag. 2. [u] Polyb. ubi ſup. & alibi paſ. Sil. Italic. l. i. [w] Nonnus in Dionyſiac. apud Seld. de diis Syr. ſynt. 2.

(S) Urania, Baaltis, Aſtarte, &c. is by ſome taken to be the Iſis (92) of the Egyptians; as Baal, Belus, &c. their Oſiris. The Carthaginian (92) Biſhop Cumberland on Sanchoniath. & in orig. gent. ant. See alſo the firſt vol. of this hiſt. p. 549, &c. and vol. ii. p. 340, &c.

and no wonder, ſince he is often taken to be the ſame with Jupiter (T). The nation we are diſcourſing of had, in all probability, ſome knowledge of him [x]. Apollo, or the ſun, went [x] Compare Nonnus, Seld. & Bochart. with Sir Iſacc Newton in his chronol. p. 23, 24, 97, 98, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, &c.

Carthaginian Juno, according to Virgil (93), had armour and a chariot, though of what form he tells us not. Servius ſays (94) ſhe had a buckler as well as a chariot, and was invoked by the name of Juno Curulis. Plutarch ſeems to give her a ſpear, ſince he calls her Juno Curitis, curis in the Sabine language ſignifying that weapon. Some are of opinion, that her chariot was a ſmall portable tabernacle, in which her image was carried either from place to place, or in proceſſion. 'Tis certain ſuch tabernacles as theſe were in uſe amongſt the Carthaginians. As for the etymon of Aſhtaroth, Aſhtoreth, or Aſtarte, we muſt refer our readers to the Phœnician hiſtory (95). According to Scaliger (96), Juno was repreſented at Carthage ſitting upon a lion, with thunder in her right hand, and a ſcepter in her left. No wonder ſhe ſhould have been ſo much revered by the Carthaginians, ſince ſhe was in a particular manner the goddeſs of the Sidonians, their anceſtors (97).

(T) In a former part of this work we obſerved, that Pezron derived Jupiter from the Celtic Jou, young, becauſe the deity ſo called was ſuppoſed to have been the youngeſt ſon of Saturn (98). But the regard we bear to truth obliges us now to declare, that we diſſent from that learned man in this particular, as well as in all the points depending upon it. We are fully ſatisfied, that this name is formed of the word pater, father, in conjunction with the Tetragrammaton or Jehovah, as will moſt evidently appear from the following obſervations.

1. There can ſcarce an inſtance be found in all antiquity of any prince's receiving his true and proper name from ſo ſlight a circumſtance as that mentioned by Pezron. That Jupiter therefore, who was ſo potent a prince, or rather ſo celebrated a deity; that he who was ſo frequently ſtyled by the moſt antient writers

(93) Virg. Æn. i. (94) Serv. in Æn. i. (95) Univerſ. hiſt. vol. ii. p. 340, &c.. (96) Joſ. Scalig. de emend. comp. (97) Univ. hiſt ubi ſup. Vid. etiam Apul. metam. vi. Cyprian. in lib. de idol. Solin. c. 30. Tertul. apol. c. 24. Sil. Ital. l. i. Herodian. l. v. Voſſ. theol. gent. l. ii. c. 21. Auguſt. in Judic. c. 7. Voſſ. ubi ſup. c. 25, 26, &c. Franciſc. Florid. Sabin. in lect. ſubſc. l. ii. c. 7. & Herodot. l. iv. (98) Univ. hiſt. vol. v. p. 428.

went frequently either by this name simply, or by others, in which this made one part of the composition [y]. Though sometimes writers the father of gods and men, should be so called, because he was his father's youngest son, is utterly improbable (99). We may therefore, after the best writers, venture to assert, that the antient Latins either took Jupiter to be a term equivalent to Baal, Deus, &c. i.e. God, Lord, &c. as Neptune was the sea Jupiter, Pluto the infernal Jupiter, &c. or by it understood the great governor of the universe himself, as the wisest of them most certainly did (100). In either of which cases it can satisfactorily be derived from no other source than the Tetragrammaton.

[y] Selden. ubi sup.

2. Diodorus Siculus, a very good author, where he does not too closely copy after Ctesias, as he cannot in the point before us, calls the God of Moses, the legislator of the Jews, Iao (1). This is a clear proof, that the God of Moses, or Jehovah, was known to the Greeks by the name Iao, which was their pronunciation, though a corrupt one, of the Tetragrammaton. Add to this pater or father, a word which both the Greeks and Latins affixed to Zeus and Jovis (2), and it becomes Iao-pater, which is evidently the Jupiter of the Latins. As therefore the Iao of Diodorus cannot be derived from the Celtic word Jou, so neither can Iao-pater, Iao-piter or Jupiter as Pezron thinks; being made up of pater and Iao, that is, of pater and the Tetragrammaton.

3. We are told by Macrobius (3), that the oracle of Apollo Clarius affirmed Iao to be the greatest of the gods, or rather the supreme God. Now this oracle was of a very high antiquity, as we learn from Strabo (4), who makes Mopsus, a famous soothsayer in the time of the Trojan war, to have lived within the verge of it. Nay, it may be collected from Macrobius (5), that it was superior in point of antiquity to Orpheus himself, which will carry us a vast way back into the mythic period of time. Æschylus also intimates, that there was a Zeus (6), or Jupiter Clarius, which must undoubtedly have been the great God Iao above-mentioned. Since therefore Zeus and Iao are terms synonymous, as we have before proved Iao and Jupiter to be; this is a further argument, that these all must have had the same original, and consequently that Jupiter is not of Celtic extraction.

4. In

(99) Hesiod. thegon. Hom. in Iliad. pas. (100) Virg. Hor. Senec. aliiq. (1) Diod. Sic. bibliothec. hist. l. i. c. 7. (2) Homer. & Hesiod. ubi. sup. & Aul. Gell. l. v. c. 12. (3) Macrob. Saturn. l. i. cap. 18. (4) Strab. l. xiii. (5) Macrob. ubi sup. (6) Æschylus in supplic.

ſometimes the people of Carthage repoſed great confidence in him, yet we find their anceſtors, the Tyrians, in a caſe of

4. In a fragment of Philo Byblius taken from Sanchoniatho, and handed down to us by Euſebius (7), mention is made of the God Ievo, and of his prieſt Jerombalus, which can have no manner of relation to the Celtic Iou, becauſe Sanchoniatho was a Phœnician. Irenæus, Clemens of Alexandria, Euſebius, and Epiphanius, alſo evince, that the Tetragrammaton of Jehovah was written in Greek Iaou or Iau (8). Druſius moreover remarks from Porphyry, that Ievo of Sanchoniatho was Iao or Jehovah (9). From all which authors it appears, that the Greeks, in all probability, received this great name from the Phœnicians. As therefore the Phœnician Ievo, the Greek Zeus, the Latin Jupiter, were all the ſame with Iao, that is, the Tetragrammaton, it can by no means be admitted, that the name Jupiter is to be deduced from the Celtic.

But it is urged in defence of this notion, that Thurſday, or the Day of Jove, is called in the remains of the Celtic language Diz-Jov. (10). Be it ſo; yet this will not come up to the point. For Diz-Jov is ſo very near the Latin Dies Jovis, that every one will be apt to believe the former to have been taken from the latter, and not the latter from the former. And why may not this be the caſe? If the Romans made it a maxim to propagate their language where-ever they came, and even tinctured with it the languages of moſt countries they obliged to ſubmit to their arms, why ſhould it appear incredible, that ſeveral, nay many, Roman terms ſhould have been tranſplanted into the old Britiſh and Armorican tongues, ſince the Romans were maſters of the countries where they were uſed for ſeveral centuries, and ſome of their emperors were either born, reſided, or died in theſe parts of their dominions? This is by no means improbable; eſpecially as the word Jou in Diz-Jou bears not the leaſt reſemblance to the name of that day in the Hibernian dialect of the Celtic (11), which was unknown to the Romans. The argument therefore would have been but of little force, even ſuppoſing the oppoſite opinion had been ſupported by no reaſons at all; but as the reverſe is true, as moreover we find not the leaſt intimation of any divinity going by the name Jou in any of thoſe authors who have treated of the Druidical religion, which prevailed amongſt the Celtes, it ſcarce deſerves to be mentioned. But to proceed:

5. According

(7) Sanchoniatho apud. Euſeb. de præp. evang, l i. (8) Iren. l. i Epiphan. hæreſ. 26. Euſeb. de præp. evang. l iv. Clem. Alexandr. ſtrom 5. (9) Druſius in lib. de Tetragram. Vid. & Theodoret. quæſt. 15. in Exod (10) Pezron ant nat. Celt. c. 12. (11) Lhuydin primar. Britan. & Hibern. ling. harmonci, p. 54.

of extremity, were dubious of him; for being apprehenſive, that he intended to forſake them, and go over to Alexander, then

5. According to Plato, the Greek name Zeus imported properly the ſame thing that Jehovah did, i. e. the Being of Beings, the principal of life and exiſtence (12). This is a farther proof, nay a moſt ſtrong preſumption, that theſe two names were originally applied to the ſame being.

6. Gellius affirms, that the antient Latin name of Jupiter was Jovis (13), which, ſuppoſing it to be a Latin termination, as it really is, comes very near the Tetragrammaton. This will appear to be exactly true from what follows.

7. The old Etruſcans (14), who were the deſcendents of the moſt antient Pelaſgi, Phœnicians, and Lydians (15), called Jupiter Juve or Jove. All the earlieſt literary monuments of this nation now remaining have their letters drawn from the right-hand to the left, after the Oriental manner (16), which is a convincing evidence of their high antiquity. Every thing conſidered, we look upon this as a deciſive argument in favour of our opinion; and not only ſo, but are fully perſuaded, that the true pronunciation of the Tetragrammaton is hereby diſcovered. The Maſoretical pronunciation indeed differs ſomething from it; but undoubtedly the Etruſcan Juve or Jove is many centuries older than the very being of the Maſorets. Beſides, as the Phœnician U anſwered to the Hebrew O, and the Maſoretical ſcheva is a vowel of a moſt rapid pronunciation, we may take for granted, that Juve or Jove, and Jehovah, are the ſame.

8. Seneca aſſures us, that the Etruſcan Juve or Jove was the cauſe of cauſes, the great governor and director of the world, the principle of life and motion, and, in ſhort, the Deity himſelf (17); and that the Etruſcans themſelves conſidered him in all theſe views. After this, what can be offered further in ſupport of what we advance? or indeed, what can be required of us further to offer?

But notwithſtanding Jupiter was the ſame with the Etruſcan Juve or Jehovah, and even at firſt, as the word (18) itſelf implies, the name of the ſupreme God in moſt nations; yet we pretend (12) Conf. Hieron. Column. & G. J. Voſſi. not. in Enn. p. 289. ed. Heſſelii. Amſt. 1707, cum Plat. in Cratylo. (13) Aul. Gell. l. v. c. 12. (14) Vid. ſuite de l'extrait de l'hiſtoire diplomatique de M. Maffei, in bibliotheque Italique, tom. troiſiem art. 1. à Geneve, 1728. (15) Tab. Eugubin. 5. l. 5. & alib. Vid. & tab. Eugubin. 6. apud Dempſt. de Etrur. regal. tom. i. (16) Vid. moniment. & inſcript. Etruſc. apud Dempſt. de Etrur. regal. & P. Bonarotæ additament. ed. Florent. 1726. (17) Senec. natural quæſt. l. ii. c. 45, 46. (18) Shuckford's connect. of the ſacr. and prof. hiſt. b. ix.

then vigorouſly puſhing on the ſiege of their city, they faſtened his ſtatue with golden chains to the altar of Hercules [z], Neptune pretend not to deny that there was a king of Crete, who being, by reaſon of his heroic actions, deified after his death, received this name as a title the moſt illuſtrious of any that could be conferred upon him. This notion and what we have advanced are by no means incompatible. But ſtill we muſt inſiſt, that it ought to be conſidered as a title only, and not as his proper name, of which we are entirely ignorant. 'Tis evident to all perſons who have made any reſearches into antiquity, that the neighbouring idolatrous nations did not only imitate the Hebrews in thoſe rites which were originally of divine inſtitution, but likewiſe gave ſeveral appellations to their fictitious deities, which the Hebrews, and even they themſelves, whilſt they remained in the true religion, appropriated to the true God. Of this El, Baal, Adonai, and even Jehovah itſelf, are pregnant inſtances. One of their falſe gods the Greeks called Zeus, and the Latins Jupiter, whoſe worſhip was eſtabliſhed at Carthage by Dido herſelf, as Juſtin relates (19); for which end ſhe carried one of his prieſts with her from Cyprus to Africa. Under what form the Carthaginians exhibited Saturn and Jupiter to public adoration, is no-where ſaid; but the manner in which Baal was repreſented in the eaſt, has been already touched upon (20).

[z] Q. Curt. l. 4. c. 3.

Mars, called by the Sabines Mamers, was the god of war, and, according to Voſſius (21), of Oriental extraction. Sir Iſaac Newton ſays mavors (22) or ma-fors was a Phrygian word, ſignifying valiant. It appears from Silius, that the Carthaginians (23) addreſſed their oaths to Mars as well as to Jupiter. Hannibal ſacrificed to this god with great ſolemnity, before he ſet out upon the Italian expedition (24); from whence we may infer, that he was greatly reverenced by the Carthaginian generals.

Bacchus was undoubtedly in Africa, and, without queſtion, known in Carthage; but as he was more famous in Libya, we ſhall defer what we have to ſay of him, till we come to the hiſtory of that country.

Bochart ſeems to think, that Apollo was originally an African deity (25). He takes him to have been the Phut of Moſes, known among the Greeks by the name Pythius. The Carthaginians, when they took the city of Gela in Sicily, found a ſtatue of Apollo of an extraordinary ſize (26), which they ſent to their mother city Tyre;

(19) Juſtin. l. xviii. (20) Univ. hiſt. vol. ii. p. 343, not (E). (21) Voſſius in theol. gent. (22) Sir Iſaac Newton. chronol. p. 23. (23) Sil. Italic. l. i. (24) Idem ibid. (25) Boch. Phal. l. i. c. 2. (26) Univ. hiſt. vol. ii. 390.

Neptune was likewiſe one of the Dii majorum gentium, or gods of the firſt claſs, of the Carthaginians [a]. It cannot well

[a] Polyb. l. vii. Diod. Sic. l. xiii.

Tyre; and this was the ſtatue which the Tyrians faſtened with golden chains to the altar of Hercules, when they were under an apprehenſion, that he was going over to Alexander, then beſieging their city. Beſides this, there was another at Carthage of an immenſe value, taken by Scipio at the concluſion of the laſt ſiege, and, as Plutarch (27) intimates, ſent to Rome. The temple of Apollo, as deſcribed by Appian, was the richeſt and moſt ſuperb edifice at Carthage, of which we have given an account above. It was placed in the forum. Valerius Maximus relates, that the hand of one who came to ſtrip him of his golden garments was found amongſt the pieces of gold cut off from him, which he mentions as an inſtance of his reſenting ſacrilege in a high manner (28). If we conſider him as the ſun, he was the Oſiris of the Egyptians, and the Mithras of the Perſians (29), and conſequently the great god of all the eaſt. The Apollo Libycus (30) will be fully conſidered in a proper place.

Neptune ſome take to have been Japhet, the king of the iſles (31), as they think appears not only from the office antiquity aſſigned him, but likewiſe from his name. He preſided over earthquakes, plagues, and inundations (32), and, in order to render him propitious, the Carthaginians threw victims into the ſea as offerings to him. Of this we have a remarkable inſtance during Hannibal's ſiege of Agrigentum (33), when a number of prieſts were in this manner offered. The antients attributed to him every thing that related to the management of horſes; and from the rock out of which the firſt horſe is ſuppoſed to have ſprung, he had the denomination of Scyphius given him (34) ſcyph in Punic ſignifying a rock or ſtone. Bochart makes his name Poſidon to be a Punic term, importing broad or expanded (35). His name Neptune ſhall be accounted for, when we come to viſit Libya; for, according to Herodotus, he was originally a Libyan (36).

Our readers will not be ſurpriſed, that we have paſſed over in ſilence the Carthaginian images or repreſentations of theſe four laſt deities, ſince we are entirely in the dark as to the manner in which they were figured at Carthage. Poſſibly in the main the Carthaginians, (27) Plutarch. in Flamin. (28) Val. Max. (29) Strab. Suid. Heſych. Univ. hiſt. vol. i. p. 549 & vol. v. p. 45. (30) Vid. Lucium. Ampelium apud Bochart, ubi ſup. (31) Boch. Phal. l. i. c. 1. (32) Diod. Sic. l. xv. c. 6. (33) Idem l. xiii. c. 12. (34) Pind. ſcholiaſt in Pyth. od. 4. (35) Bochart. ubi ſupra. (36) Herodot in Euterp.

well be doubted, but that he was the Baal of Sidon, called Thalassius, or the Sea Baal, taken notice of in a former part of this history *.

Baal, at first a name of the true God.

THE word Baal, in itself an appellative, at first served to denote the true God, amongst those who adhered to the true religion; though afterwards, when it became common amongst the idolatrous nations, and they, as well as his own people, applied it to their respective idols, he rejected it [b]. The false god to whom they first appropriated it, was Chronus or Saturn, as intimated above. In process of time it became a title, or mark of distinction, prefixed to the names of many others. Hence the Baal-Peor, Baal-Zebub, Baal-Moloch, &c. of the Syrians and Phœnicians [c]. The term imported god or lord amongst the Orientals, as zeus did amongst the Greeks [d]. The plural Baalim in scripture signifies gods, lords, masters, sovereigns, &c. correspondent to the sense of Bel in the Chaldee tongue. According to Servius [e], who is followed by Vossius herein, Bal in the Punic language had two significations; it either specified Saturn, or was equivalent to the Latin deus, or god. Xenophon [f] insinuates, that, in the earliest times, every head of one of the most illustrious families in all countries was called Chronus or Saturn; every first-born son or daughter of such families Jupiter or Juno; and the most valiant of their offspring Hercules. Theodoret seems to apply this to the Phœnicians in particular [g]; adding, that such noble personages were deified, on account of some signal service they did to their country. As we have made Baal, and Zeus or Jupiter, words of the same import in different languages, we may say of the former what Varro in Tertullian says of the latter, viz. that the number of those so styled amounted to three hundred. Notwithstanding which, some will have it, that there were originally but two gods of the Phœnicians, and consequently of the Carthaginians, or, what is the same thing, that all the other

* Univ. hist. vol. ii. p. 342 [b] Seld. de diis Syr. c. 1. sub init. & Hos. ii. 16, 17. [c] Seld ubi supra. [d] Idem ibid. [e] Serv. in Æn. 1. Voss. theol gent. l. ii. c. 4. [f] Xenoph. in æquiv. [g] Theodoret. de Græc. affect. l. iii.

Carthaginians might agree with the Greeks and Romans in this particular; and if so, no piece so proper can be recommended to the perusal of the curious, as that of Albricus upon this subject (37).

(37) Albric de deor. imag. Bas. 1570.

other deities were reſolvable into thoſe two, viz. Baal [h] and Aſhtoreth, or Belus and Aſtarte.

BAALSAMEN, or, as the Hebrews would have written it, Baal-ſhemaim, i. e. the lord of heaven, ſeems to have been the ſun, as Beliſama, or the queen of heaven, abovementioned, the moon. According to St. Auſtin, he had religious honours paid him by the Carthaginians [i]. It is probable they had no repreſentation of him at all, becauſe they could not forbear beholding him daily in all his glory. Damaſcius calls him El, Bolathes, &c. and makes him to have been the ſame with Saturn [k]. The ſun worſhipped at Carthage.

THE Carthaginians introduced Ceres and Proſerpina as Greek deities, when ill ſucceſs attended their arms in the war with Dionyſius of Syracuſe. This Diodorus tells us [l]. But Virgil aſſerts, that Dido herſelf ſacrificed to Ceres [m]. The poet here, we think, ought to give way to the hiſtorian; for it is much more probable, that the Carthaginians ſhould receive a Greek or Roman deity from the Greeks or Romans, than from the Phœnicians. The ſtatues of theſe two goddeſſes ſtood in the temple of Dido, who was likewiſe deified by thoſe idolaters, together with her ſiſter Anna. We find on the reverſes of ſeveral Carthaginian coins an ear or ears of corn, either in alluſion to the goddeſs Ceres, or as a ſymbol of the fruitfulneſs of the country. As likewiſe Ceres and Proſerpina.

As the Carthaginians were a people who ſupported themſelves chiefly by commerce, it cannot be ſuppoſed that they neglected the worſhip of the god of genius, induſtry, and traffic. Mercury the antients allotted this province to; and accordingly we find the Carthaginians paid divine honours to him under the name of Aſumes or Aioumes [n] (U). And Mercury.

[h] Seld. de diis Syr. ſynt. 2. c. 2. p. 145. Shuckford in his connect. b. v. [i] Auguſt. in Jud. quæſt. 16. [k] Damaſc. in vit. Iſidor. [l] Diod. Sic. l xiv. c. 7. [m] Virg. Æn. 4. ver. 58. [n] Plin. nat. hiſt. l. xxv. c. 5. & Bochart. ex auctario. Dioſcorid. Chan. l. ii. c. 15.

(U) Mercury was the miniſter of the gods, and preſided over the roads or highways, as well as traffic and commerce (38). The old Etruſcans named him Camillus, Camillus, or Cadmilus, i. e. a ſervant or miniſter of the gods (39); and the Carthaginians, Aſumes or Haſſumes, which imports a ſervant (40). Bo-

(38) Voſſ. Theol. gent. l. ii. c. 32, (39) Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 12, 33. & alib.

Divine honours paid alſo there to Hercules.

NOTHING is more celebrated in antient hiſtory than the Tyrian Hercules, whoſe worſhip was brought to Carthage by Dido, and diffuſed itſelf afterwards over all the coaſts of Africa, and as far as Gades or Cadiz, where he had a magnificent temple. The reaſon of his name Melcartus has been already aſſigned [o]. The Tyrians and Carthaginians ſuppoſed him to preſide over gold, ſilver, and all ſorts of treaſures; on which account he was held in high veneration in the iſland of Thaſus [p], where a Phœnician colony being planted diſcovered ſome gold mines. The Thaſians adored him with the ſame ſolemnity as the people of Tyre, and had a brazen ſtatue of him ten cubits high, with a club in the right hand, and a bow in the left; in which manner they undoubtedly repreſented him both at Tyre and Carthage [q]. The Pelaſgi [r], originally Phœnicians, vowed him the tenths of every thing they had [s], on account of a great ſcarcity of grain they once laboured under. The Carthaginians for a conſiderable time never failed ſending to Tyre the firſt fruits of their revenues, nor the tithe of the ſpoils taken from their enemies, as offerings to Hercules, the protector of Tyre and Carthage [t]. Public diverſions were inſtituted in honour of him at Tyre, which they celebrated every four years [u]. At Carthage, no doubt, the ſame cuſtom prevailed, as likewiſe that of offering [w] annually

[o] Univerſ. hiſt. vol. ii p. 347. not (P). [p] Vide Wolfang. Lazium. in Græc. ant. l. i. c. 2. [q] Idem ibid. & Burchard Niderſt. Melita vetus & nov. l ii. c. 6. [r] Strab. Herodot. Dionyſ. Halicarn. Epiphan. Boch. Salmaſ. Grot. & Univerſ. hiſt. vol. v. p. 605. not. (D). [s] Dion. Halicarn. l. i. [t] Polyb. in excerpt. legat. [u] Macab & Theodoret. lib. ſemeſt. ſerm. iii. c. 2. [w] Plin. l xxxvi. c. 6.

(40). Bochart thinks he was Canaan, becauſe that word properly denotes a merchant, and in ſome reſpect anſwers to the name Mercury (41); which conjecture he farther confirms by obſerving, that, in conformity to Mercury's office, Noah predicted, that Canaan ſhould ſerve his brethren (42). His pileus and caduceus being winged, ſeem to allude to the ſails of ſhips, and remotely to the long voyages the Phœnicians made, and the fartheſt parts of the world they were acquainted with, as doth likewiſe his government of the highways above-mentioned. Bochart and Voſſius ſet this in a very clear light (43).

(40) Idem ibid. l. ii. c. 15. (41) Boch. Phal. l. i. (42) Gen. ix. 25, 26. Vide etiam. Var. Plut. in num. Feſt. & vet. auth. apud. Phavorin. &c. (43) Voſſ. & Bochart. ubi ſupra. Vide Iſai. xviii.

annually human victims up to him. Varro mentions forty-five heroes who bore this appellation; but the oldest of them seems to have been the Tyrian or Carthaginian Hercules (W).

IOLAUS comes next to Hercules, as being either related to him, or one that introduced some of his relations into the Iolaus.

(W) We cannot help being of opinion, that the Phœnician or Tyrian Hercules was the same with the Egyptian. It appears from Philostratus (44), that the Egyptian Hercules, as well as the Theban, i. e. the Phœnician, were worshipped in the same temple at Gadira or Gades; that there were no statues erected to either of them there; that the temple was adorned with the twelve labours of Hercules finely wrought; which must naturally have pointed at both of them; that the golden olive of Pygmalion king of Tyre (a Phœnician) bearing smaragdine fruit, of wonderous workmanship, was kept in this temple. Bishop Cumberland proves (45), that the Phœnician Hercules was a Phœnician king in Egypt; that he found out the purple dye, which is of Phœnician extraction; and that he built the temple on the island near the Streights, to which he gave the Phœnician name Gadira. Lastly, Sir Isaac Newton makes it evident (46), that the Hercules called Melcartus, who was king of Carteia, had the temple of Gades consecrated to him, as Philostratus intimates the Egyptian Hercules had (47): and that this Hercules was a Phœnician. From whence it may rationally be supposed, that the Phœnician Hercules and that of Egypt were the same.

The word itself is to be sought for from the east; undoubtedly ערקל vercol or ercol, signifying swift and sinewy, or strong, was the original. This Hercules was likewise upon the coast of Africa, and, according to Orosius, built Capsa there (48). Bishop Cumberland imagines him to have been called Assis or Aziz, i. e. the strong, as well as Ercol or Hercules (49). Africanus and Eusebius give him the name of Archles (50). It is probable he was elected king or general of the Phœnicians, on account of the great glory he had acquired (51). Some believe, that he, in a manner, traversed the then known world; but the relations given us of his atchievements are so interlarded with fable, that we know not well what to make of them.

(44) Philost. in vit. Apollon. Tyan. l. v. c. 1. p. 211. (45) Cumberland on Sanchoniath. p, 159, 160. in orig. p 113, 114, &c. Vide Palaphatum Egyptium apud chron. Alex. & Maneth. apud Euseb. in chronic. p. 352. (46) Newton's chronol p. 111, 112, 113, 114, &c. (47) Philostrat. ubi supra. (48) Oros. l. v. c. 15. Flor. l. iii. c. 1. Sallust. in Jugurth. (49) Cumberland. in orig. p. 113. & Maneth. apud Joseph. cont. Apion. (50) African. & Euseb. in chronic. Herodot. in Euterp. &c. (51) Newton's chronol. p. 111.

iſland of Sardinia [x]. The natives of that iſland, at his arrival, were Tyrrhenians or Etruſcans [y]. Thoſe people inhabiting the mountainous parts of Sardinia, received from him the appellation of Iolaenſes; and even the moſt fruitful provinces had the name of campi Iolei, the Iolean or Iolaan fields [z]. Hercules and Iolaus, according to Voſſius [a], had jointly divine honours paid them here, either becauſe he was Hercules's near relation, or aſſiſted him in deſtroying the Hydra, which he did by drying up the gore with a red hot iron, when any of the heads was cut off, to prevent others from ſprouting out in its room. Ovid [b] pretends, that, at the interceſſion of Hercules, Hebe reſtored him to his youth, when he was grown extremely decrepit. As the Carthaginians had this iſland in poſſeſſion a conſiderable time, it is ſuppoſed they borrowed him from the Sardi; for that he was one of their principal deities, we are given to underſtand by Polybius [c]. The rites and ceremonies obſerved at his public worſhip are fully deſcribed by Voſſius out of Pauſanias [d].

Dea Syria.

HENDREICH intimates, that the Dea Syria, or Syrian goddeſs, was a deity of the Carthaginians [e]; but who ſhe was, authors are not agreed. By the deſcription of her temple already given [f], and the ſtatue in it, ſhe muſt either have been Juno, or a group of all the goddeſſes; which laſt opinion ſeems moſt probable. The curious may find further ſatisfaction on this head, by conſulting Tertullian and Lipſius, as well as the firſt volume of this hiſtory [g].

Æſculapius.

THE people of Carthage likewiſe addreſſed themſelves to Æſculapius, whom Servius calls Pœnigena, becauſe he ſuppoſes his mother to have been a Carthaginian [h]. The place more particularly ſacred to him was Byrſa, or rather the top or that fortreſs, famous for his ſpacious temple there ſituated [i]. We have already obſerved, that Aſdrubal's wife, at the final deſtruction of Carthage, burnt this edifice, together with herſelf, her family, and nine hundred Roman deſerters. Conſiderable quantities of vervain, an herb ſacred to him, were preſerved in this place. The beſt authors take him to have been originally a Meſſenian, or an Egyptian; yet, according to Voſſius, the Carthaginians received him immediately from the [x] Strab. l. v. [y] Idem ibid. [z] Diod. Sic. & Strab. ubi ſupra. [a] Voſſ. theol. gent. l. i. c. 40. [b] Ovid. met. ix. [c] Polyb. l. vii. [d] Voſſ. ubi ſupra. [e] Hendr. l. ii. ſect. 1. c. 4. [f] Univerſ. hiſt. vol. ii. p. 289, 290, &c. [g] Tertul. apol. c. 24. Lipſ. elect. l. ii. c. 21. epiſt. quæſt. l. ii. c. 22. & Univerſ. hiſt. ubi ſupra. [h] Serv. in Æn. 7. [i] Appian. in Libyc.

the Tyrians, to whom either the Syro-Macedonians or Egyptians [k] communicated him. Alexander took Tyre in the firſt year of the hundred and twelfth olympiad; and Carthage was finally deſtroyed by Scipio in the third year of the hundred and fifty-eighth; in the interval betwixt which two periods the worſhip of Æſculapius paſſed from the Syro-Macedonians or Egyptians to the Tyrians, and from them to the Carthaginians. Toſorthrus, or Seſorthrus, a king of Memphis, and the ſecond of the third dynaſty of Manetho, for his great ſkill in the art of phyſic, is generally allowed to have been the firſt Æſculapius. He preceded many ages the Meſſenian [l].

Herebus. HEREBUS, another Carthaginian deity mentioned by Silius and Polybius, ſeems to have been Pluto, or Dis. We know nothing farther of him, than that he was invoked as the god of hell, and repreſented under an human ſhape, with long looſe hair. Voſſius and Hendreich both take notice of him [m].

Triton. TRITON, the ſea god, had a place amongſt the deities of Carthage, as we learn from the treaty concluded betwixt Philip the ſon of Demetrius king of Macedon, and the Carthaginians [n]. Some authors have told us, that he was ſo called from Τριτὼ a Greek word, ſignifying a wave [o]. It appears from Virgil, that the province of Triton and Cymothoë was to releaſe or heave off veſſels run aground, and to clear them from the rocks. The antient mythologiſts make the nymph Cymothoë to have been the daughter of Nereus and Doris; but Triton the ſon of Neptune and Amphitrite [p].

Mopſus. MOPSUS, a famous augur or ſoothſayer, after his death, became a ſort of oracle [q] at Carthage. The memory of this deified ſage has been tranſmitted down to poſterity by Luctatius Placidus and Apuleius [r]. Strabo takes notice of one Mopſus the ſon of Manto the daughter [s] of Tireſias. But, according to Voſſius, this was the ſon of Ampycus an Argonaut, mentioned by Apollonius and Valerius Flaccus [t]. All that can be added concerning him is, that temples were erected to him by this nation, from whence reſponſes were given, as from ſo many oracles.

[k] Voſſ. ubi ſupra, l. i. c. 32. [l] Univerſ. hiſt. vol. i. p. 581. [m] Sil. Ital. l. i. Polyb. l. vii. Voſſ. theol. gent. l. ii. c. 60. & Hendr. ubi ſup. [n] Polyb. l. vii. [o] Hend. ubi ſupra. [p] Virg. Æn. 1. ver. 148. [q] Apul. de deo. Socrat & Hendr. ubi ſupra. [r] Luct. Plac. in Stat. Thebaid. iii. Apul. ubi ſup. Vide etiam Senec. in Med. chor. & Cæl Rhodigin. l. xxix. c. 15. lect. ant. [s] Strab. l. xiii. [t] Voſſ. theol. gent. l. i. c. 32. Valer. Flac. & Apollon. in Argonaut.

Rivers, meads, waters, &c. gods.

RIVERS, meads, waters, &c. or rather the supposed genii of all these inanimate parts of the creation, were [u] esteemed as objects of adoration. This humour likewise prevailed amongst the Greeks, Romans, and most other nations, from very antient times. No one has handled this subject better than Vossius [w], whose writings our learned readers will peruse with great pleasure. Some maintain, that the worship of the elements was prior to all others in the pagan world; but we must beg leave to dissent from their opinion.

As likewise fire.

SCALIGER [x] the elder acquaints us, that the old Africans paid a religious homage to fire, which was perhaps likewise the custom at Carthage. This sentiment he seems to have taken from Leo Africanus [y], an author whom we shall have occasion to consult hereafter.

As also the air and winds.

WITH this [z] the air and winds also shared divine honours, which was probably derived from the Assyrians. The air to this nation appeared to be superior to the other elements, and to have them, as it were, under its government and direction [a]; for which reason it was honoured with adoration. We read in Sanchoniatho [b], that Usous consecrated two rude stones or pillars to fire and wind; to which we may add, that the worship of the air and winds was not unknown to the Greeks and Persians [c].

Anna Perenna worshipped at Carthage.

THE Carthaginians sometimes swore by the Manes of Dido, as Silius relates [d]. Anna her sister passed for a goddess, under the name of Anna Perenna [e], according to some. It is imagined, tho' with no great appearance of truth, that she fled with Æneas, and was drowned by Lavinia in the river Numicus [f]; from whence she was called Nympha Numicia. It is certain the Romans, as well as the Carthaginians [g], paid her divine honours. Ceres and Proserpina were ranked with Dido [h], as being all in the same temple. Ceres was either cœlestis, i. e. the moon [i], or subcœlestis, i. e. the fruitful earth. She answered to the Egyptian Isis. These two last are amply treated of by various authors [k].

THE

[u] Sil. Ital. l. i. Voss. ubi supra, c. 67. [w] Voss. ibid. p. 67, 74. [x] Jul Cæs. Scalig. exercit. 258. [y] Joan. Leo. African. de prisc. Afr. fid. & relig. l. i. [z] Jul. Firmic. profan. relig: lib. [a] Hendr. ubi supra. [b] Sanchoniath. apud Eusеb. præp. evang. l. i. [c] Hendr. ubi supra. [d] Sil. Ital. l. i. [e] Hendr. ubi supra [f] Ovid. fast. l. iii. Sil. Ital. l. viii. Voss. theol gent. l. i. c. 12. & instit. orat. l. i. c. 6. sect. 8. Vide etiam Volater. l. xxiiii. [g] Ovid. ubi supra. [h] Sil. Ital. l. i. [i] Voss. ubi sup. l. ii. c. 59. [k] Lipsius de cruc. l. i. c. 5. Pompon. Sabin. in Æn. 4. Varro apud Voss. ubi sup. P. Nannius. in misc. l. vii. c. 10. aliique multi.

THE honour that Dido herſelf received from the people of Carthage after her death, ſhe, according to Ovid [l], had in her life-time conferred upon her huſband Sichæus [m]. And Sichæus during Dido's life time.

TELLUS, or the Earth, was worſhipped by the Carthaginians, as appears from the treaty of peace with Philip, mentioned by Polybius. For a further account of this deity, our readers may have recourſe to Voſſius [n]. And Tellus.

"HAMILCAR [o], ſays Herodotus, by his father's ſide a "Carthaginian, but by his mother's a Syracuſan, was, by "reaſon of his virtue and ſuperior abilities, elected king of "the Carthaginians. The ſame day that the battle of Sa-"lamis was fought, being defeated by Gelon and (his father-"in-law) Theron near Himera, he vaniſhed, and could never "after be found, tho' Gelon cauſed the ſtricteſt ſearch to be "made for him. The Carthaginians, who have his image "in high veneration, ſay, that during the engagement be-"tween the barbarians and the Greeks, which continued "from morning till evening without intermiſſion, Hamilcar "ſtaid in the camp ſacrificing, and throwing entire victims "upon a flaming pile; but that ſeeing his troops put to the "rout, he himſelf ruſhed into the fire, and, being conſumed, "was never more ſeen. Whether he diſappeared in the "manner as related by the Phœnicians, or as the Carthagi-"nians aſſert, it is certain, that they offer ſacrifices to him, "and have erected monuments to his memory in all the ci-"ties they have founded, tho' the moſt memorable are in "Carthage." So far Herodotus. It is not unlikely that the Carthaginians adopted other favourite generals into the number of their gods; nay, we are aſſured by Silius, that, notwithſtanding the infamous treatment he met with from his countrymen at laſt, Hannibal was adored in his life-time [p]. Theſe deities ſeem to have been of the ſame kind with the dii indigetes of the Latins. As likewiſe Hamilcar.

THE Carthaginians alſo ranked among the gods the two Philæni. Theſe brothers, having been ſent by their countrymen to accommodate ſome differences with the Cyreneans, and, in conjunction with the commiſſaries appointed by that people, to ſettle the limits of their reſpective dominions, by fraud extended their own frontiers, to the prejudice of the others. The Cyreneans, incenſed at this, would not cede the tract demanded, unleſs the Philæni would ſuffer themſelves to be buried alive in the place which they had pitched upon And the Philæni.

[l] Ovid, heroid. 7. [m] Polyb. l. vii. [n] Voſſ. ubi ſup. c. 9, 51, &c. [o] Herodot. l. ii. [p] Sil. Ital. l. xvii. & Barthius in adverſ. p. 801, upon for their boundary. To this they instantly agreed, and had afterwards two altars erected there to their memory; which served as a land-mark or limit to the Carthaginian territories on the side of Cyrenaica for many succeeding ages. Sallust, Mela, and Valerius Maximus, give all the particulars of this story [q].

Abaddires and Eucaddires Carthaginian divinities.

St. Austin tells us, that some of the Carthaginian divinities had the name of Abaddires [r], and their priests that of Eucaddires. The class in all probability, was derived from the stone which Jacob anointed with oil, after it had served him for a pillow the night he had his vision; for in the morning he called the name of the place where he lay Bethel. Now, it is no wonder this should have been esteemed as sacred, since God himself says he was "the God of Bethel, "the place where Jacob anointed the pillar [s]". From Bethel came the Bætylus of Damascius, which we find called Abaddir by Priscian [t]. This Abaddir is the Phœnician Aban-Dir, i. e. the spherical stone, exactly answering to the description of the Bætylus [u] given us by Damascius, and others. The case seems to have been this: The Canaanites of the neighbourhood first worshipped the individual stone itself, upon which Jacob had poured oil; afterwards they consecrated others of that form, and worshipped them; which false worship was perpetuated even to the time of St. Austin [w]. Abaddir may likewise be understood to mean Ab-Addir, i. e. the magnificent father, a title given to the true God himself; but afterwards applied to those, who by nature were no gods [x]. That Addir was an epithet joined to the names of false gods in the east, may in some measure, appear from Addir-Dag, the magnificent fish, i. e. Adergatis, Atergatis, &c. [y]. Abaddires therefore was an appellation belonging to some Punic deities, as Eucaddires, i. e. Enucaddires, persons initiated in the sacred mysteries of the Addires dires or Abaddires [z], was a term appropriated to their prieſts (X).

[q] Sallust. Jugurth. c. 79. Pomp. Mela, l. i. c. 7. Valer. Max. l. v. c. 6. Vide Polyb. l iii. Strab. l. iii. Plin. l v. c. 4. Solin. c. 20. & Cellar. geog. ant. l. iv. c. 3. [r] August. epist. Max. Madaur. 44. [s] Gen. xxxi. 13. [t] Priscian. grammat. Hesych. in voc. Damasc apud Phot. p. 1047, 1062, 1063, &c. [u] Damasc. ubi. sup. & Bochart. Chan. l ii. c. 2. [w] August. ubi. sup. [x] Psal. viii. 1, 9. & lxxvi. 5. & xciii. 4. Isai. xxxiii. 21. 1 Sam. iv. 8. Drus. in loc. Vide Bochart. ubi supra. [y] Idem. ibid.

Portable temples in uſe amongſt the Carthaginians.

We muſt not omit, that the Carthaginians carried about with them ſome ſmall images repreſenting certain gods, in covered chariots. Euſtathius [a] calls theſe ναὸς ξευγηφορεμένους, portable temples, or temples carried by oxen. They were a ſort of oracles, and their reſponſes were underſtood by the motions impreſſed upon the vehicle. This was likewiſe an Egyptian and Libyan cuſtom. The antient Germans alſo had ſomething like it, as we learn from Tacitus [b]. Philo Byblius relates, that Agrotes [c], or at leaſt his image, was carried about in proceſſion in this manner. The tabernacle of Moloch above mentioned, we take to have been a machine of this kind.

The Genius of Carthage.

It is remarkable, that, in the treaty of Philip ſo often cited, mention is made of the Dæmon or Genius of Carthage [d]. Who [z] Idem ibid [a] Euſtath in Iliad. A. Serv. ad. Æn. vi. [b] Tacit. de fid mor. & pop. Germ. [c] Phil. Bybl. apud Euſeb. de præp evang. l. i. [d] Polyb. l. vii.

(X) The Batyli were ſtones that were believed to be animated, and were conſulted by ſome fanatics as oracles. Theſe ſtones were round, and of ſuch a ſize, that ſome of them might be carried about by their votaries, either by hanging at the neck, or in ſome other way (52).

Iſidorus tells us, they were of different ſorts; and that ſome of them were conſecrated to Saturn, others to Jupiter, others to the Sun, &c. (53).

Their origin was very antient, if any credit may be given to Sanchoniatho, who makes Ouranus the inventor of them. Bochart proves, that Philo Byblius has wrongly tranſlated Sanchoniatho's words animated ſtones; and that it ought to have been anointed ſtones (54).

The antient Greeks and Latins, who have taken any notice of the Bœtyli, hardly afford any other notion of them, but as the ſtone which Saturn ſwallowed in the place of Jupiter (55). The ſcholiaſt upon Heſiod relates, upon the authority of Agathocles, a Babyloniſh author, that Rhea had taken that ſtone from the iſland of Proconeſa; and Stephanus adds, that Saturn ſwallowed it upon mount Thaumaſius. M. Falconet has publiſhed a diſſertation upon this ſubject, which, together with what M. Fourmont has offered, will, according to the abbe Banier, abundantly ſatisfy the curious (56).

(52) Banier in mythol. l. i. c. 1. (53) Damaſc. in vit. Iſidor. apud Photium. (54) Sanchoniath. apud. Euſeb. præp. evang. l. i. Chan. l. ii. c. 2. Banier ubi ſup. (55) Idem ibid. (56) Idem ibid.

Who this might be, we ſhall not take upon us to determine; but only in general obſerve, that the pagan world looked upon theſe Dæmons as intelligences of a middle nature betwixt the gods and men, as beings who had, in a great meaſure, the adminiſtration of the world committed to them. Hence it is no wonder they ſhould have received religious honours; for when once mankind were poſſeſſed with the opinion, that they were the miniſters of the gods, and truſted with the diſpenſation of their favours, as well as the infliction of their puniſhment, it is natural to ſuppoſe, that they would be deſirous of making their addreſſes to them. We hope to give our readers a full and particular account of theſe inferior deities, when we come to the Arabic hiſtory.

The Cabiri adored there.

So full an account has already been given of the Cabiri, that there is neither room nor occaſion to be prolix here. To what has been already ſaid we ſhall, however, add, that the Pelaſgi introduced the worſhip of theſe gods into Samothrace, Greece, and all other countries where they ſeated themſelves; that men and all animals, without diſtinction, nay, even all kinds of inanimate ſacrifices, were offered up to them; that they had at firſt no proper names, but were worſhipped under the general denomination of gods; that the word Cabiri either ſignified certain anonymous divinities, or their prieſts, known by the name Corybantes; that from an antient inſcription mentioned by Aſtorius, it is manifeſt the Cabiri were likewiſe called Dioſcuri; that the Phœnicians firſt paid them divine honours, afterwards the Egyptians, who built them a magnificent temple at Memphis in the earlieſt ages, which continued to the time of Achilles Tatius; that the Syrians, Egyptians, Greeks, Cypriots, Phrygians, Etruſcans, Latins, Carthaginians, and almoſt all the antient pagans, had the moſt profound reverence for the Cabiric or Samothracian myſteries; that the vulgar believed all initiated into theſe myſteries could not fail of being happy, both here and hereafter; that, according to Sanchoniatho, the Dii Cabiri were eight in number, being the ſons of Sydik; that the inhabitants of Samothrace, ſacrificed dogs to Hecate in the cave Zerinthus, ſacred to the Cabiri; that the Pelaſgi, Samothraciars, &c. celebrated the Cabiric myſteries in the night-time, with great indecency; and that this was the principal motive with the antients not to tranſmit them down in writing to poſterity. Biſhop Cumberland, the abbé Banier, and Aſtorius, have, in a manner, exhauſted this ſubject. A catalogue of the authors who have ſupplied them them with materials, our readers [e] will find here inſerted, to whom they may have recourſe at their leiſure (Y).

THE Anaces, Anactes, or Dioſcuri, are by ſome thought to have been the ſame with the Cabiri, by others different from

And the Anaces or Anactes.

[e] Cumberland in append. de Cabir. Herodot. in Euterp. Dionyſ. Halicar. l. i. Lucian. de dea Syr. Pauſan. in Bœotic. Heliac. & alib. Achilles Tatius apud Cumberland. in append. de Cabir. Sanchoniath apud Euſeb ubi ſupra. Damaſc. apud Phot. Pherecyd. Syr. Nonnus, & Herodot. paſſ. Aceſilaus Arg. apud Strabon. l. x. Var. de ling. Lat. l. iv. Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 12. & alib paſſ. Tertul. de ſpect. Orpheus. in Hym. Curet Seld. de diis Syr. ſynt. ii. c. 4. Horn. hiſt. Phil. l. ii. c 4. Schol. vet. in Apollon. Arg. l i. Dionyſiod. apud. eund. Strab. l. x. & alib Diod. Sic. l. v. & alib. Plut. in Alexandr. & alib. Suid. &c. Macrob. Plat Dion. Chryſoſt. Procl. Clem. Alexand. Lycophr. Stephan. Heſych. Cic. Lactant. Arnob Firmic. Meurſ. aliiq; paſſ. Vide Joan. Aſtol. diſſert. de Cabir. Banier. in mythol. l. vii. c. 8, &c.

(Y) Reland, who has favoured the learned world with a diſſertation upon the Cabiri, concludes, that they were the gods of the dead; that Ceres was the earth which received them; Pluto and Proſerpina the infernal regions where they came to dwell; and Camillus or Mercury the god who conducted them thither (57).

The myſterious names Axieros, Axiokerſa, Axiokerſos, and Caſmilos, Bochart has happily interpreted, and proved, that, in the Phœnician language, they denote Ceres, Proſerpina, Pluto, and Mercury. Princes, and perſons of the firſt diſtinction, were ambitious of being initiated into the awful myſteries of theſe great gods, upon account of the high reputation they were in. Voſſius thinks, that we are to underſtand by the name Cabiri only the miniſters of the gods, as the Curetes and Dactyli of Crete, and the Corybantes of Phrygia; but this, as running counter to all antiquity, can by no means be admitted (58).

Arnobius aſſerts, that, in the celebration of thoſe myſteries, they ſlew one of the initiated, and is followed therein by Firmicus; but this ſeems rather to refer to an accident that once happened, than to prove, that ſuch a practice was authorized by cuſtom (59).

The prieſts of the Cabiri, according to Heſychius were called Coes, a word manifeſtly derived from the Hebrew cohen, i. e. a prieſt; a further proof this, that the old obſolete language uſed by the prieſts in their ceremonies, was the Hebrew or Phœnian (60).

(57) Reland. in differ. miſcel. (58) Boch, Chan. l. i. c 12. Diodor. Sicul l v Apollon. Arg. Plut. in Alexand. Suid. &c. (59) Arnob. l. v. Jul. Firmic. de cor. prof. rel. (60) Heſych. in voce Κόης.

from them. However this may be, they were undoubtedly deſcended from the Anakims of Moſes. It can ſcarce be queſtioned but Inachus himſelf was of this race, as his name plainly imports [f]. Some believe, that the word Anactes was a title given to thoſe princes of Inachus's line, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their heroic actions; which evidently alludes to the name of that family, ſo eminent in ſcripture for its gigantic ſtature [g]; and we own ourſelves inclinable to fall in with this ſentiment. Pauſanias, Pliny, Philoſtratus, and Julius Pollux, not to mention many other authors that occur, render it probable, that [h] in antient times were not wanting inſtances of perſons of a monſtrous ſize of body. However, many of theſe relations, particularly thoſe of Phlegon, Abydenus, Solinus and others [i], muſt be allowed to be fabulous (Z).

To

[f] Cumberland. in append. de Cabir. & Banier. ubi ſupra. [g] Voſſ. Bochart. & Banier. ubi ſup. [h] Pauſan. in At. Plin. l. vii. c. 16. Philoſt. Heroic. Jul. Pol. in Onomaſt. [i] Phleg. Tral. de mir. c. 14. Abyden. & Eupolem. apud Euſeb. Solin. Beros. Plut. &c.

(Z) Voſſius is of opinion, that the name of the gods Anactes was originally from Phœnice; but he thinks it had been brought into the weſt by Cadmus, or by the Canaanites, whom Joſhua, by his conqueſts, had obliged to quit Phœnice, and who had retired into Greece. He farther thinks, that the Spartans, who called themſelves allies of Iſrael, as we learn from Joſephus, were a colony of the Canaanites, who were moſtly deſcended from Abraham by Hagar and Keturah; and this is the reaſon why the moſt famous of the Greek Anactes were Caſtor and Pollux, natives of Sparta, the Lacedæmonians having given them that name to honour the memory of Anek's deſcendents, of whom they had heard ſo many wonderful ſtories. We ſhall only add, that it was a common thing with the Greeks to call thoſe perſons the ſons of the Earth, who were ſo antient, that they had but a very imperfect account of their original; for this reaſon they called Anax or Anak the ſon of the Earth, as we have obſerved above from Pauſanias.

Pauſanias inſinuates, that the Dioſcuri were to be diſtinguiſhed from the Cabiri; but that the Anactes, were the ſame with them (61). His words are to this effect: "With regard to the Anactes, men are divided in their ſentiments about "them; ſome will have them to be the ſame with the Dioſcuri; "others with the Curetes; but the moſt intelligent perſons take "them to be the Cabiri." Suidas intimates, that the word was applied

(61) Pauſan in Phocic.

And Pataici or Patæci.

To what has been obſerved of the Pataici, or Patæci, in the ſecond volume of this hiſtory, we ſhall only ſubjoin, that the ſtatues of theſe gods, of the Cabiri, and of the Egyptian Vulcan, had a great reſemblance to one another; that therefore, ſince Vulcan was eſteemed the moſt antient of the gods, the Patæci muſt have been of great antiquity; that in after-ages, the Penates had the ſame reſpect paid them by the Romans, as theſe received from their votaries the Phœnicians and Carthaginians; and laſtly, that the word, according to Scaliger, is to be deduced from the Hebrew patach, he engraved, or, as Bochart will have it, from batach, he confided in; either of which etymologies very well quadrates with the uſe the Phœnicians, and after them the Greeks, made of the gods Patæci [k].

The Palici.

As the Palici were Sicilian deities [l], of eaſtern extraction, it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that they owed their origin in Sicily to the Carthaginians, who got a footing in that iſland in very antient times, and therefore may juſtly be looked upon as ſome of its moſt antient inhabitants. This we ſay, is probable; but as there is not the expreſs teſtimony of any good author to ſupport it, we ſhall drop all further particulars concerning them; and conclude here what we have to ſay of the gods of the Carthaginians.

The cuſtom of ſacrificing men remained in Africa till the time of Tiberius.

THE barbarous cuſtom of offering up human ſacrifices did not expire with the city of Carthage, but continued amongſt the Africans, even till the time of Tiberius. That prince, tho' none of the moſt humane and compaſſionate, was ſo ſhocked at the unnatural practice of offering up children to Saturn, that in his proconſulſhip, according to Tertullian [m], he ordered the prieſts concerned in that horrid impiety applied both to kings and gods (62). Pindar, Cicero, and Tzetzes all take particular notice of them (63).

[k] Æſchylus, Callias Polemon, & Xenagoras apud Macrob. Saturn. l. v. c 19. Sil. Italic. Diodor Sic. l. ii Ovid. metam. l. v. Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 28. [l] Bochart. ubi ſupra. [m] Tertul. apolog. c. 9.

The account publiſhed by Sir Hans Sloane in the philoſophical tranſactions, of the foſſil teeth and the bones of elephants, which falls in with this ſubject, is very well worth the peruſal of our curious readers (64).

(62) Suid. in voc Ἄνακες. (63) Cic. de nat deor. l iii. Pind. Pyth. ii epod ult. Tzetzes in Lycophron. (64) Philoſophical. tranſact. numb. 403, 404.

piety to be hanged, and committed the care of the execution to the African militia. This practice had been retained, with little or no intermiſſion, from the foundation of the city; for notwithſtanding the Carthaginians, to avoid drawing upon themſelves the indignation of Darius Hyſtaſpis [n], might, for a few years, ſuſpend it, or at leaſt pretend ſo to do, yet it is certain, that, in his ſucceſſor Xerxes's time, they had reſumed it. This appears from hiſtory; for Gelon, after he had vanquiſhed them in the reign of that prince, concluded a treaty of peace with them, of which this was one article, that no more human ſacrifices ſhould be offered to Saturn [o]; nay, to ſuch a pitch of frenzy, or rather ſavage barbarity, were they come, that mothers, who are naturally the moſt ſuſceptible of tender impreſſions, made it a merit to view their own offspring thrown into the devouring flames, without ſo much as a groan [p]. They even, by kiſſes and embraces, huſhed the cries of their children, before they were caſt into the flaming ſtatue of Saturn above-mentioned, imagining the efficacy of the ſacrifice would have been entirely loſt, if any thing that might have been interpreted as a mark of the leaſt reluctancy or regret had been ſhewn [q]. They uſed a drum or a tabret, among other inſtruments, to drown the ſhrieks and outcries of the unhappy victims [r]. Some authors believe, that the Phœnicians, from whom the Carthaginians derived this deteſtable cuſtom, contented themſelves with making their children paſs through the fire, without burning them; but Selden and others evince this to be a miſtake [s]. Plutarch tells us, that the mothers were, in ſome meaſure, obliged to ſtand by as unconcerned ſpectators; ſince a groan or tear falling from them would have been puniſhed by a fine, and ſtill the child muſt have been ſacrificed [t]. In times of peſtilence, or other public calamities, the Carthaginians endeavoured to appeaſe their offended gods by vaſt numbers of ſuch oblations; of which we have given an inſtance or two above [u] (A).

From

[n] Juſt. l. xix. [o] Diodor. Sic. l. xi. Plut. de ſerv. vind. deor. [p] Plut. de ſuperſt. [q] Idem ibid. & Tertul. in apol. [r] Plut. ubi ſup. [s] Seld. de diis Syr. ſynt. i Univerſ. hiſt. vol. ii p. 120, note. [t] Plut. ubi ſup. [u] Vide etiam Diodor. Sic. l. xx.

(A) Thoſe perſons who are not diſpoſed to give over-much credit to the fragments of Sanchoniatho's hiſtory ſtill extant, think human ſacrifices can be traced up no higher than Abraham.

The

The Carthaginians extremely addicted to superstition.

FROM many authors it appears, that the Carthaginians were extremely addicted to superstition. They had, however, in general, some good notions: they addressed themselves to the gods, before they attempted to put in execution any enterprize by them formed; and after any advantage gained, they were not slack in making proper returns [w] to the powers above for it. Temples very magnificent they abounded with at Carthage, and took care to have no deficiency of them in any part of the Carthaginian dominions. One famous temple, sacred to Baal or Balis, in a city of that name on the borders of Cyrenaica, we find taken notice of by Stephanus [x], who intimates, that the city received its appellation from that deity. There is great reason to believe, that El, Il, Bel, Bal, Baal, Belus, Balis, Helius, &c. were different names of the same pagan divinity.

Carthaginian women prostitute themselves for gain in the temple of Astarte.

WE have already described the manner in which the Babylonian women prostituted themselves [y] to strangers at the temple of Mylitta, as likewise the same custom prevailing amongst the Phœnicians [z], whose women, for this end, repaired to the great temple of Astarte at Byblus. We have now to add, that the same thing, in all respects, was practised at Carthage; excepting that the money got by this infamous commerce amongst the Babylonians and Phœnicians was presented to Mylitta or Astarte, i. e. Venus, whereas the Carthaginian women applied the wages of their prostitution to their own use [a]. This indeed savoured something more [w] Liv. l. xxi. xxiii &c. [x] Stephan. περὶ ἐθνικῶν. [y] Univ. hist. vol iv. p. 327, & seq. [z] Vol. ii. p. 352. [a] Vide Valer. Max. l. ii. & Hendr. ubi supra.

The Canaanites and Phœnicians (65); in whose country that patriarch attempted to offer up his son Isaac, in obedience to the divine command, imitated the Jews in many particulars, and derived many of their institutions from those of that nation, which were of divine origin, as has been before observed. It is probable therefore, that they might reason with themselves after this manner: "If God was so highly pleased with Abraham's "bare intention of offering up his son Isaac, that he showered "down blessings upon his posterity in a most extraordinary man-"ner, what marks of the divine favour may not those persons "expect more of the common harlot than the other; but all these nations were arrived at such an height of infatuation and impiety, on account of their gross idolatry, and variety of pollutions attending it, that it is hard to say which of them was the worst (B).

(65) Vide Bochart. in Phal. & Chan. Hyde de relig. vet. Pers. aliosq; scriptor. quamplurim.

Some traces of Succoth Benoth to be found in Sicca Venerea.

A VERY learned author of our own nation imagines, that some traces of the Succoth Benoth [b], mentioned in scripture, may be found in Sicca Venerea, the name of a city in Numidia, not far from the borders of Africa Propria. The name itself bears a near allusion to the obscene custom above taken notice of, and seems to have been transported from Phœnice. This cannot well be disputed, when we consider, that in this very city there was a temple, where [c] women were obliged to purchase their marriage-money by the prostitution of their bodies. The author of the itinerary sometimes

[b] Selden. de diis Syr. syntag. ii. c. 6. [c] Val. Max. l. ii. Univ. hist. vol. iv. p. 327.

"expect, who actually do sacrifice their children?" Thus the highest instance of obedience upon record might, through the depraved imaginations, and blind understandings, of a great part of mankind, together with the suggestions of their grand enemy, become the accidental cause of one of the most enormous and unnatural kinds of wickedness that could be committed.

(B) Canaan's posterity were a most profligate and abandoned race of men, addicted to all, even the most unnatural, kinds of lust, as the scripture gives us good reason to apprehend. Now, it is worthy admiration, that Noah cursed Canaan only of Ham's sons (66), on account of Ham's breach of modesty in exposing his father's nakedness, which was both unchaste and unnatural. This is a strong intimation, that Canaan only was an accomplice of his father Ham in this wickedness, which was an evident token of a most dissolute and vitious turn of mind. This vile disposition exerted itself in his posterity, and vastly contributed towards drawing down those heavy divine judgments, which, in process of time, fell upon them. Hence it appears, that in conformity to the patriarch's prediction, Canaan's descendents were subject to the posterity of Shem, i. e. the Jews; and that this very judgment was, in a great measure, occasioned by the effects of that vile disposition inherent in them, which so eminently displayed itself in Ham, and, as is probable, in Canaan also, and which immediately drew upon them all the curse of their great ancestor Noah. So true is that observation of the psalmist, Righteous art thou, O Lord, and upright are thy judgments (67).

(66) Gen. ix. 22, 25, 26, 27. (67) Psal. cxix. 137.

times calls it simply Sicca, and Solinus Venerea. Sicca signifies a tabernacle, as well as Succa; and therefore probably this was what it imported in the Punic tongue. Procopius, Victor Uticensis, and others, in conjunction with our author, render this opinion almost incontestable [d].

If any points of consequence relating to the worship of the people at present under consideration should have hitherto escaped us, they will be occasionally touched upon hereafter, as they offer themselves in the course of this history.

Punic tongue at first the same with the Phœnician.

The Hebrew and Phœnician languages were in a manner the same, as has been observed in several places of this history [e], and is apparent, not only from the nature of the thing, but from the concurrent testimony of learned men, who, generally speaking, agree in this particular. The Pœni or Carthaginians therefore having been originally Phœnicians, 'tis undeniable, that their language must at first have been the Phœnician. However Scaliger [f] believes, that the Punic, (he must mean that of after-ages) in some respects, deviated from the Hebrew and Phœnician, which, considering how distant the Carthaginians were from their mother-country, Phœnice, and the people they were incorporated with, is not to be wondered at. 'Tis much more wonderful, that they should have retained so much, nay, in a manner the whole, of their original tongue; for that they did so, after what has been advanced by Scaliger, Petit, Bochart, and others, will scarce admit of a dispute.

This fully proved by Scaliger, Selden, Petit, and Bochart.

Our great Selden, next to Scaliger [g], seems to have been the first who endeavoured in earnest to settle this point; which, from the authority of St. Jerom, St. Austin, and many other writers, he likewise seems to have done effectually. He has moreover given us a specimen of an interpretation of the remains of the Punic language to be found in Plautus [h]. Petit and Bochart have been much more copious on this head [i]; but what they have advanced has not met with universal applause, which the last of these seems to have been beforehand apprehensive of [k]; in short, there is room enough left for any learned man to exercise his wit and talents on this subject.

[d] Procop. Vict. Uticens. Athanas. &c apud Seld, ubi sup. Vid. & Cellar. geogr. ant l. iv. c. 5. [e] Univ. hist. vol i. p. 377, & vol. iii. p. 444. Vid. & Seld. de diis Syr. prolegom. c. 2 [f] Scalig. ad Ubert. p. 362. [g] Seld. ubi sup. [h] Idem ibid. [i] Sam. Petit. & Bochart. in Chan. l. ii. c. 6. [k] Bochart. ubi sup.

Agreed in ſubſtance with the Hebrew.

BOCHART has produced a vaſt collection [l] of Punic words from different authors, and traced them all up to the Hebrew or Phœnician: all which will ſerve as ſo many proofs, that the Carthaginian language agreed in the main with theſe; that, notwithſtanding the ſmall variations from them diſcernable in it, it ever continued to be the ſame in ſubſtance with them.

Hebrew, Phœnician and Punic proper names nearly the ſame.

FROM what has been offered in the firſt ſection of the hiſtory we are now upon, it appears [m], that the word Carthago or Cartaco itſelf was of Hebrew or Phœnician extraction. As therefore an affinity of proper names implies an affinity of the languages to which they belong, the following ſhort catalogue of Hebrew or Phœnician and Punic proper names, by demonſtrating the harmony betwixt theſe languages, will not a little contribute to confirm the ſentiment which we, in common with ſo many others, have eſpouſed.

HEBREW or PHOENICIAN.	PUNIC.
Zachæus	Sichæus.
Michæus.	Machæus.
Amalec.	Amilco, or Himilco.
Melchior.	Amilcar.
Jeſche, or Jeſſe.	Giſgo, or Geſco.
Hinnon, or Hanun, or Hanon.	Hanno.
Hanabaal, or Baal-Hanan.	Hanibal.
Ezra, or Ezdras-Baal.	Aſdrubal.
Barac.	Barca.
Elizabeth.	Eliſa.
Milca.	Imilce.
Magog.	Mago.
Meſſiah.	Meſſe.
Adoni.	Doni.

SOME

[l] Bochart. in Phal. & Chan. paſſim.

[m] See before, ſect. 1.

SOME of these names we have been supplied with by Reineccius [n]; but the following we remember not to have seen compared by any author whatsoever.

HEBREW or PHOENICIAN.	PUNIC.
Anna, or Hannah.	Anna.
Jachin, or Jecon-Jah.	Jachon.
Adar, or Ader-Baal.	Adherbal.
Baal.	Bal.
Mathan, or Matham-Baal.	Muthumbal.
Mehir, or Mehir-Baal.	Maherbal,
Saph, Saphai, Sapham, Saphan, or Saphon.	Sappho.

WE have chosen to compare the Punic proper names in this place with the Hebrew or Phœnician, to which they undoubtedly answer, rather than produce their etymons, as Bochart does; since in our opinion this more clearly exhibits the very great agreement betwixt them, and renders the near relation they bore to one another obvious to all capacities.

Punic tongue tinged with the Chaldee or Syriac.

THE Punic tongue had likewise a tincture of the Chaldee and Syriac, as we learn from Priscian and St. Austin [o]. But as this is chiefly to be understood of it in the latter ages, when it was in its decline, particularly those that immediately preceded St. Austin, or even that in which he lived; and as the Chaldee and Syriac languages themselves were, in all probability, nearly allied to the Hebrew, nay, almost the same with it, in early times, we shall infer nothing from this observation, but leave it to our readers to make what use of it they please.

[n] Reinecc. hist Jul. in rep. Carth. vol. ii. p. 464. ed. Helm. 1505. [o] Priscian. l. v. p. 123. August. super. Joan. tract. 7. tom. iv.

The ſame with the old Egyptian, according to Salmaſius.

ACCORDING to Salmaſius [p] there have been ſome perſons who have believed, that the Punic language and the old Egyptian were the ſame; but as neither arguments nor ſufficient authorities are produced to ſupport this hypotheſis, we ſhall make no ſcruple to reject it.

Some remains of it to be found in the preſent Maltese language.

M. MAIUS, profeſſor of the Greek and Oriental languages in the Ludovician univerſity of Gieſſen [q], publiſhed a ſmall piece in the year 1718, wherein he proves, that the preſent language of the Malteſe contains a great deal of the old Punic in it. The materials of which this tract conſiſts, he was ſupplied with by one father James Staniſlaus John Baptiſt Ribier de Gattis, a miſſionary Jeſuit, and native of Malta, who very well underſtood the language (C) of the Malteſe, having reſided many years amongſt them. This piece is very curious, containing proofs that this iſland was, for a conſiderable period of time, ſubject to the Carthaginians; and that the Punic tongue was planted and continued in it, as likewiſe a large collection of Malteſe words more remote from the Arabic than from the Phœnician, Chaldee, or Syriac. We cannot pretend to tranſcribe the whole treatiſe, though it is but a ſhort one; but as the Malteſe names of the cardinal numbers differ pretty much from thoſe of other living languages, except the Arabic; as they come nearer the terms expreſſing thoſe numbers in the Phœnician or Chaldee, than any other tongue; and conſequently furniſh us with a ſtrong argument, that the Malteſe tongue has much of the old Punic in it; and at the ſame time improve our idea of this laſt; we think we cannot do our curious readers a greater pleaſure than by inſerting them.

MALTESE

[p] Salmaſius in Tertul. de Pal. [q] Joannes Henricus Maius. in ſpecim. ling. Punic. in hodiern. Melitenſ. ſuperſt. Marpurg. 1718.

(C) One of the authors of this hiſtory was very well acquainted with this Father Ribier, or, as he called himſelf, Riviere, at Oxford, where he died in the year 1736. He confirmed to this perſon by word of mouth every particular he had communicated to M Maius, and added ſome others; viz that he had carefully examined moſt of the Oriental words in the Malteſe tongue, and found they approached much nearer the Hebrew and Chaldee than the Arabic; that the natives had a ſort of tradition, that they were deſcended from the Carthaginians, &c. He was a very good Orientaliſt, and had his education, as he related, in the Jeſuits college at Ingoldſtat in Bavaria. Some ſmall MSS. pieces he left in the hands of the perſon above-mentioned.

Maltese.	Chaldee.		English,
Huchet.	חד	Heb. אחת	One.	1.
Tnei.	תריתרי	Heb. שני	Two.	2.
Tlieta.	תלתא		Three.	3.
Herbha.	ארבעא		Four.	4.
Chamſa.	המשא		Five.	5.
Sitta.	שתא		Six.	6.
Seba.	שבעא		Seven.	7.
Tmiena.	תמניא		Eight.	8.
Diſha.	תשעא		Nine.	9.
Haſhra.	עסרא		Ten.	10.
Chaddas.	חד עסר		Eleven.	11.
Tnàs.	תרי עסר		Twelve.	12.
Tlittàs.	תלתא עסר		Thirteen.	13.
Herbahtàs, or Erbatàs.	ארבעא עסר		Fourteen.	14.
Chmiſtàs.	חמשא עסר		Fifteen.	15.
Sittàs.	שתא עסר		Sixteen.	16.
Sebatàs.	שבעא עסר		Seventeen.	17.
Tmientàs.	תמני עסר		Eighteen.	18.
Dſchiatàs.	תשעא עסר		Nineteen.	19.
Haſhrin.	עסרין		Twenty.	20.
Tlietin.	תלתין		Thirty.	30.
Erbhin.	ארבעין		Forty.	40.
Chamſin.	חמשין		Fifty.	50.
Sittin.	שתין		Sixty.	60.
Sebihin.	שבעין		Seventy.	70.
Tmienin.	תמנין		Eighty.	80.
Diſchin.	תשעין		Ninety.	90.
Mia.	מאה		An hundred.	100.
Elf.	אלפא	Heb. אלף	A thouſand.	1000.
Elfein.	תרין אלפין		Two thouſand.	2000.
Tlietelef.	תלתא אלפין		Three thouſand.	3000.
Erbatelef.	ארבעא אלפין		Four thouſand.	4000.

1. Our readers will at firſt ſight diſcover, that the Malteſe words in general here are almoſt the ſame with the Chaldee; which ſeems to be a confirmation of what Priſcian and St. Auſtin aſſert[r], viz. that about their time the Punic language, notwithſtanding it agreed in the main with the Hebrew, was tinged with the Chaldee.

2. It ought to be obſerved, that, tnei, two, borrows ת tau from the Chaldee, and נ from the Hebrew; that huehet, one, and elf, a thouſand, are the Hebrew אחת and אלף; that the numerals from ten ten to twenty end in as, like the Greek μονὰς δυὰς τριὰς τετρὰς &c. and that the reſt are Punic or Phœnician (D).

[r] Priſcian, & D. Auguſt. ubi ſup.

3. FROM the numerals ending in "in" from twenty to an hundred, and thoſe ending in "a" from two to eleven, 'tis evident, that the language of Malta even ſtill follows the Chaldee and Syriac form; and that the Punic did ſo in St. Auſtin's time, and much higher, is plain from ſeveral Punic words that might be produced, though 'tis probable, that in very early times it nearly reſembled the Hebrew or Phœnician.

4. IN ſupport of what has been advanced by Maius, it may be further conſidered, that Joannes Quintinius Heduus, an author who lived in Malta about the middle of the ſixteenth century, was of the ſame opinion, affirming that the iſland of Malta was formerly ſubject to the Carthaginians; that the African, i. e. Punic, tongue was ſpoken there in his time; that there were then extant ſome pillars in the iſland, that had Punic inſcriptions upon them; and that the Punic words to be found in Plautus, Avicenna, &c. were perfectly underſtood by the Malteſe [s]; which he urges as an argument, that the old Punic tongue was not even then much corrupted. All which is confirmed by Fazellus [t] in his curious hiſtory of Sicily; and this gives a great ſanction to the other's authority.

5. ACCORDING to father Ribier de Gattis [u], the Malteſe have the following proverb amongſt them at this day: Il ſtus iffitiech peſt; tnei attieh, li iehdoc inkella, i. e. "The "plague wants a piece of money; give it two, if it will "withdraw itſelf from you." Now this very proverb was a Punic one in St. Auſtin's days, as he himſelf aſſures us. This greatly contributes to evince what M. Maius had in view.

FROM the whole we may conclude, that Poſtellus, Schindler, and Druſius, have not that foundation for maintaining the Arabic and Punic tongues to have been the ſame, as Selden, Scaliger, Bochart, Reineuius, and others, have for ſuppoſing

[s] Joannes Quintinius Heduus in epiſt. ad Soph. [t] Tho. Fazel. de reb. Sic pri. decad. ſub init. in theſaur. ant. & hiſt Sic. vol. iv. Lugd. Bat. 1723. [u] P. Staniſl. Jac. Joan. Bapt. Ribier de Gattis apud Joan. Henr. Maium, ubi ſup.

(D) And ſo are thoſe that end in as, which is evidently the firſt ſyllable of עשר aſar, the Hebrew numerals; if ſo, the numbers from ten to twenty are nearer to the Hebrew than the Chaldee. Perhaps the Greek words here mentioned ending in as, derive that termination from the ſame original.

ſuppoſing that the Hebrew, Chaldee, Phœnician, and Punic, were always moſt nearly related, and even originally the ſame (E).

Punic letters originally the ſame with the Phœnician.

THE Punic letters, as well as language, at firſt muſt certainly have been the Phœnician, for the reaſon above aſſigned; and though they were conſiderably altered by length of time, yet 'tis certain they always retained a great ſimilitude to their originals, as will appear from a nice inſpection into the characters upon the moſt elegant Phœnician and Punic coins. The character, however, upon the Punic coins is various, many of thoſe found in Spain, as well as Sicily, having letters entirely rude and barbarous, whilſt the better ſort

(E) In Arnobius's time the Punic language (4) was ſtill ſpoken in that part of the country bordering upon the Garamantes; but more northerly the Latin tongue was uſed; beſides theſe, in the Mediterranean parts, no leſs than twenty-languages, or rather dialects, prevailed Bochart thinks (5), that the ſix laſt verſes of the unknown language in Plautus were Libyan, becauſe they were entirely different from the other. 'Tis certain the Carthaginians ſpoke both Punic and Libyan; for which reaſon they were called Migdilybes, Bilingues, and Biſulcilingues (6).

Laſtanoſa (7), a curious Spaniſh author, affirms many of thoſe coins, that Aldrete and others took to be Carthaginian, to have been old Spaniſh medals. He aſſerts further, that the character on theſe coins is different from the Carthaginian This he in ſome meaſure proves by obſerving, that the characters on the pieces dug up about Cadiz and in Andaluſia, with which parts the Carthaginians had a more immediate communication, were very different from thoſe found on others diſcovered in places not ſo well known to that people 'Tis certain one of the Spaniſh medals given us by Aldret (8), as well as the greateſt part of thoſe collected by this author, has characters upon it bearing little or no reſemblance to the Punic. This author's work was printed at Hueſca in 1645, and contains a handſome collection of Spaniſh medals, which we may poſſibly have occaſion to conſider more fully when we come to the hiſtory of Spain. Aldrete and others believe many Punic pieces had Libyan letters upon them; which may poſſibly be true; but that it really is ſo, we muſt not preſume to aſſert.

(4) Arnob. in Pſal. civ. (5) Bochart. l. ii. c. 6. (6) Plaut. in Pæn. Virg. Æn. 1. Sil Italic. l. ii. 16. (7) Don Vincencio Juan de Laſtanoſa en Muſeo de las Medallas deſconocidas Eſpanolas, p. 15, 16. This piece was dedicated to Don Bern. Fernandez de Velaſco, conſtable of Caſtile, and is now extremely ſcarce, tho' very curious. (8) Bern. Aldret. varias antiguedad de Eſpana, l. ii. c. 1. en Ambr. 1614.

ſort exhibit a character reſembling the Phœnician, and even the Aſſyrian or Hebrew letters. Two queſtions here ariſe, which we ſhall beg leave to conſider.

FIRST, whether the Samaritan character, which is by many perſons believed, be the ſame with the antient Phœnician? And SECONDLY, whether the Samaritan or the Aſſyrian, commonly called the ſquare letters, were the antient character of the Hebrews?

Samaritan character different from that on the Phœnician coins.

As to the firſt, in order to determine the point couched in it, we muſt diligently compare the letters of the Samaritan Pentateuch with thoſe of the legends found upon the Samaritan and Phœnician coins. This has been done with the utmoſt accuracy by Reland and Loeſcher [w]; from whom it appears, that there is a very conſiderable diſcrepancy betwixt them; almoſt, if not entirely, as conſiderable as that betwixt the old Aſſyrian, or Hebrew alphabet, and the character found on theſe coins. This is rendered evident beyond diſpute by the two learned men aforeſaid, who have obliged the world with an exact and juſt delineation of all the principal Samaritan and Phœnician coins. From whence we cannot but infer, that the antient Phœnician character was different from the preſent Samaritan.

Moſt of the learned imagine the Samaritan letters to have been prior to the Aſſyrian.

WITH regard to the ſecond queſtion, it muſt be owned, that the greateſt part of the learned world, for above a century, have held it in the affirmative. But it muſt likewiſe be owned, that no number of great names can give a ſanction to error, and that this point has not been conſidered thoroughly till of late. The main argument all along inſiſted upon in defence of this opinion has been taken from the legends found upon ſome coins, ſaid to have been dug up in Judæa; wherein are diſcovered theſe words, Jeruſalem the holy, and the ſhekel of Iſrael. The letters of theſe legends are aſſerted to be the Samaritan; and ſince neither the Samaritans, by reaſon of their known averſion to the Jews, nor the ten tribes after their ſeparation from the other two, becauſe from that period they had nothing to do at Jeruſalem, could poſſibly have ſtruck theſe pieces, 'tis from hence inferred, that they muſt have belonged to the Jews before the captivity, or even to the Iſraelites, before the ſeparation of the Chief argument in favour of this taken from ſome coins with Samaritan letters upon them.

[w] Adrian Reland. de vet. Hebræor. num. diſſert. paſſ. & Val. Ern. Loeſcher de cauſis ling. Hebr. p. 201, 202. ed Francof. & Lipſiæ, 1706.

the ten tribes [x]; and consequently, that the Samaritan letters, supposed to be the same with those on these coins, were the Hebrew character in the most early times, and that in which the sacred books of the old testament were originally written.

THIS is the argument which has all along been deemed sufficient to overthrow all the facts, reasonings, and authorities, that can be produced on the other side of the question; and which the learned Dr. Prideaux [y] has not scrupled to pronounce unanswerable. But whether or no it really is so, we shall be the better able to judge, when we have maturely weighed the following considerations:

1. M. Ottius, who applied himself closely to the study of those coins, intimates, that those which are genuine [z], if any such there be, bear a small proportion to the number of the counterfeits; and that he found it a difficult matter to meet with any of them. How then can we be assured, that those mentioned by bishop Walton and Dr. Prideaux are genuine? 'Tis not sufficient to say, there were some of them in Rabbi Moses Ben Nachman's days, above five hundred years ago; for how can we be assured, that any of those now extant were then in being? or if we could, what is this to the purpose, since his age is modern, in comparison of the supposed antiquity of those coins? But, (F). This examined.

2. ADMITTING them all to be genuine, yet the letters on them are most certainly not the same with those of the Samaritan Pentateuch. This clearly appears from Reland and Loescher [a] above-mentioned, who have given us an accurate plate of all these pieces, as well as a complete alphabet of the letters they exhibit. Nay, 'tis evident from them, that these letters resemble the old Assyrian or Hebrew almost as much as they do the Samaritan [b].

SUP-

[x] Walton. in prolegom. 3. Prideaux in connect. l. v. [y] Prideaux ubi sup. [z] Jo. Bapt. Ottii. epist. apud Adr. Reland. de vet. Hebr. num. differt. 3. [a] Adr. Reland. & Val. Ern. Loescher, ubi sup. [b] Idem ibid.

(F) There is great reason to believe, that not one of the Samaritan coins is genuine, at least not one of them is indisputably so. Reland and Ottius as good as confess it; and from what Spanheim has declared on this head, we may find, that he was in a very great doubt about it (9).

(9) Jo. Bapt. Ottius apud Adr. Reland. de vet. Hebr. num. differt. 3. Adr. Reland. ubi sup. differt. 9. Ez. Spanhem. ubi sup.

3. SUPPOSING the character on theſe ſhekels had been the Samaritan, yet nothing could have been from thence collected in favour of ſo remote an antiquity of this character as they are brought to prove. For 'tis now univerſally received amongſt the learned, and the dates on the pieces themſelves clearly evince it, that the oldeſt of theſe coins, with legends upon them, do not precede the ſettlement of the high-prieſthood in the Aſmonean family, which happened not much above an hundred and fifty years before the chriſtian æra, and ſome of them are much later [c]. This ſingle obſervation, which is ſupported by the ſtrongeſt proofs, ſeems to render all concluſions, drawn from the ſuppoſed high antiquity of theſe coins, perfectly chimerical.

THE main difficulty being thus removed, the arguments offered in favour of the contrary opinion cannot fail of having great weight with all perſons of penetration and impartiality. The principal of them are the following:

Arguments in favour of the contrary opinion.

1. THERE cannot be conceived a greater antipathy between any two nations, than that which ſubſiſted between the Jews and Chaldæans or Babylonians, eſpecially after the captivity. The former had the latter, and every thing belonging to them, in the utmoſt abhorrence and deteſtation. 'Tis morally impoſſible therefore, that they ſhould have forſaken their own character, after their return from Babylon, to adopt that of the others.

2. THE Phœnicians received their alphabet from the [d] Aſſyrians; of courſe, therefore, the Aſſyrian letters muſt have been prior to the Phœnician. If, therefore, the Aſſyrian and Phœnician alphabets were different, the ſquare or Chaldee letters are prior to the Phœnician; if the ſame, as we are inclined to believe, the ſquare or Chaldee letters are the true old Hebrew character, and the original letters of the eaſt.

3. FROM a diligent compariſon of the Phœnician, Samaritan, Syriac, old Arabic or Cuphic, &c. with the antient Aſſyrian or Hebrew letters, it will appear that all the others were derived from the Aſſyrian. The ducts of theſe letters are plain, eaſy, and ſimple, ſuch as 'tis natural to ſuppoſe the firſt letters were; the letters on the Phœnician coins are the next to theſe in plainneſs, eaſe, and ſimplicity, and bear a great analogy to them; and laſtly, the Samaritan letters are the others, with ſome additional ſtrokes and lines intermixed, which, which, at first sight, carry with them the air of novelty in respect of the Assyrian. This has been set in so strong a light by two or three eminent hands, that it will be a great pleasure to our learned readers to consult them [e].

[c] Idem ibid. Ez. Spanhem. de uſ. & præſt. num. ant diſſert. 2. & Conringius de num. Hebræor. [d] Plin. l. vii. c. 56.

4. The Septuagint version is of higher antiquity than any of those coins, which are supposed to have the Samaritan character upon them. Now 'tis certain the authors of this version have frequently differed from the Hebrew, by their mistaking one similar Assyrian letter for another [f]. This is an undeniable argument, that the individual Hebrew copy they translated was written, not in the Samaritan, but the Assyrian character; and consequently, that the Hebrew text of the old testament was written in that character, before any of those shekels brought to prove the antiquity of the Samaritan letters were in being.

5. The Samaritan Pentateuch itself differs in several places from the Hebrew. Many of these differences arise [g] from a confusion of similar letters, not Samaritan, but Assyrian; as namely, the ב with the כ, the ד with the ר, the ו with the י, the ח with the ה, the א with the ע, &c. This must be owned to be the strongest proof imaginable, that the Samaritan was posterior to, and even taken from, the Pentateuch written in the Assyrian character; and of course bids fair to put an end to this famous dispute (G).

We

[e] Spanhem. & Loesch. ubi sup. Schultens in institut. ad fund. ling. Hebr. p. 20. & alib. [f] Engelbert. Engels. Marcod. Juliacems. in præfat. ad Val. Schind. pentaglot, Hanov. 1612. [g] Val. Ern. Loescher, p. 217, 218. Steph. Morin, de ling. prim. exercit. 2. c. 7. p. 199. Sq. Jo. Got. Carpzovius in crit. sacr vet. test. Lipsiæ, 1728. p. 229, 230, 231.

(G) The learned baron Spanheim, Dr. Allix. Conringius, and others, have entirely overthrown the common opinion of the antiquity of the Samaritan letters, from several topics not mentioned by us here. But this is the most effectually done by the famous Dr. Carpzou of Leipsick, in his defence of the Hebrew text of the old testament against Mr. Whiston. In relation to the last argument here offered, no further satisfaction can be either given or required by the most curious reader, than what may be met with from him (10).

Father

(10) Allixius apud Spanhem. ubi sup. Conring. de num. Hebræor. pass Jo. Get. Carpzov. ubi sup. Vid. etiam Hottinge. Villalpand Cellar hist. Samarit. aliosq; plurimos.

WE cannot recollect, that any perſon has hitherto tried to explain the legends on any of the Punic coins, notwithſtanding the letters on many of them ſeem to be nearly related, partly to the Hebrew, partly to the Syriac, and partly to the Phœnician.

An attempt to explain the legends on two Siculo-Punic coins.

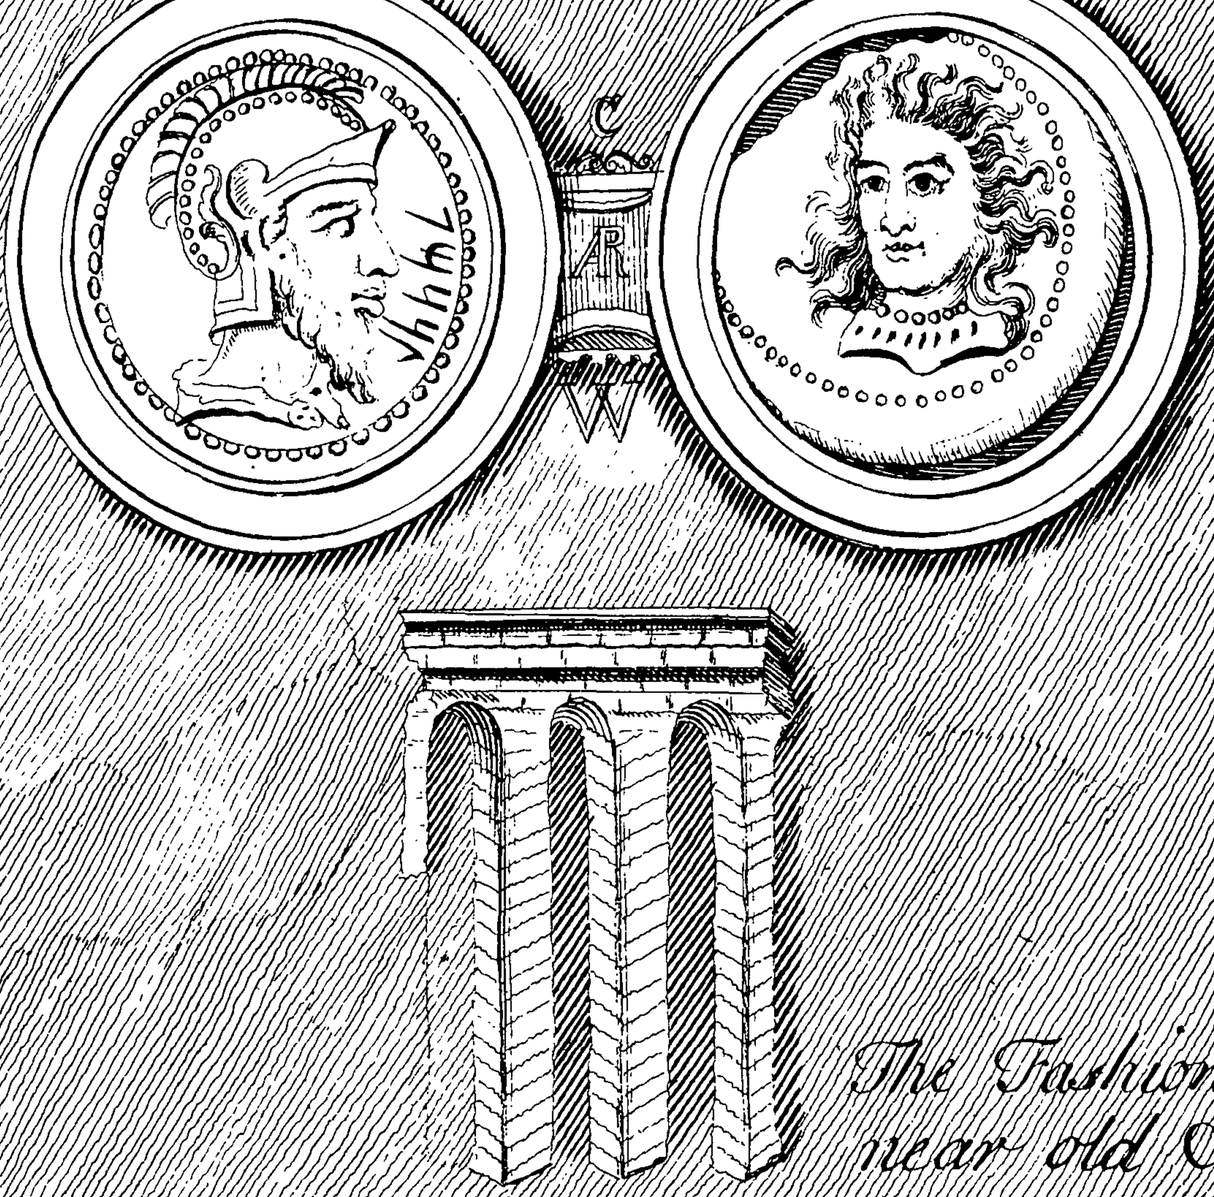
HOWEVER, in order to excite others, who have more leiſure and greater abilities, to ſome attempts of this kind, we ſhall here endeavour at an explication of thoſe upon two Siculo-Punic medals; hoping that our readers will conſider the ſubject as it really is, dark and intricate, and therefore make all favourable allowances for whatever miſtakes may be diſcovered in our conjectures.

I. The firſt which is here exhibited is taken from Paruta, who ranks it amongſt the coins belonging to the city of Panormus, now known by the name of Palermo [h]. Upon the reverſe is a horſe in full ſpeed, with theſe two Punic letters  , which we think ought to be read hhet or hhit, and in our opinion, ſtands for hhittim or hhitte, i. e. of the Carthaginians. That the two letters are hheth and tau [i], appears from Spanheim, Reland, Loeſcher, and others; and that the names of cities, or rather their inhabitants, eſpecially Greek cities, are frequently found upon the reverſes of coins belonging to them, is too obvious to need any proof. Panormus therefore being the metropolis of the Carthaginian part of Sicily, and in the neighbourhood of the Greeks, if not itſelf filled with them, 'tis no wonder the Carthaginians there ſhould in this reſpect imitate the people with whom they lived. What may ſerve to confirm this is, that we find ſeveral Greek coins of the Panormitans [k], done in the manner above-

[h] Parut. apud theſaur. ant. & hiſt. Sic. vol. viii. tab. 14. num. 140. [i] Reland. & Loeſh. ubi ſup. Spanhem. de uſ. & præſt. num. diſſ. 2. [k] Vid. Parut. ubi ſup.

Father Sonciet indeed intimates, that the Samaritan character was reſtored by Simon. But firſt, this is a direct begging of the queſtion; for it ought to be proved, that it was antiently in uſe as to ſacred matters amongſt the Hebrews, before it ſhould be aſſerted, that it was reſtored by Simon. And ſecondly, ſuppoſing this fact, which there is great reaſon to preſume it is not, that the old teſtament was ordered to be written in the Samaritan character, either by Simon, or any other of the Aſmonean family, is an aſſertion utterly deſtitute of the leaſt ſhadow of reaſon or authority, either Jewiſh or chriſtian, to ſupport it (11).

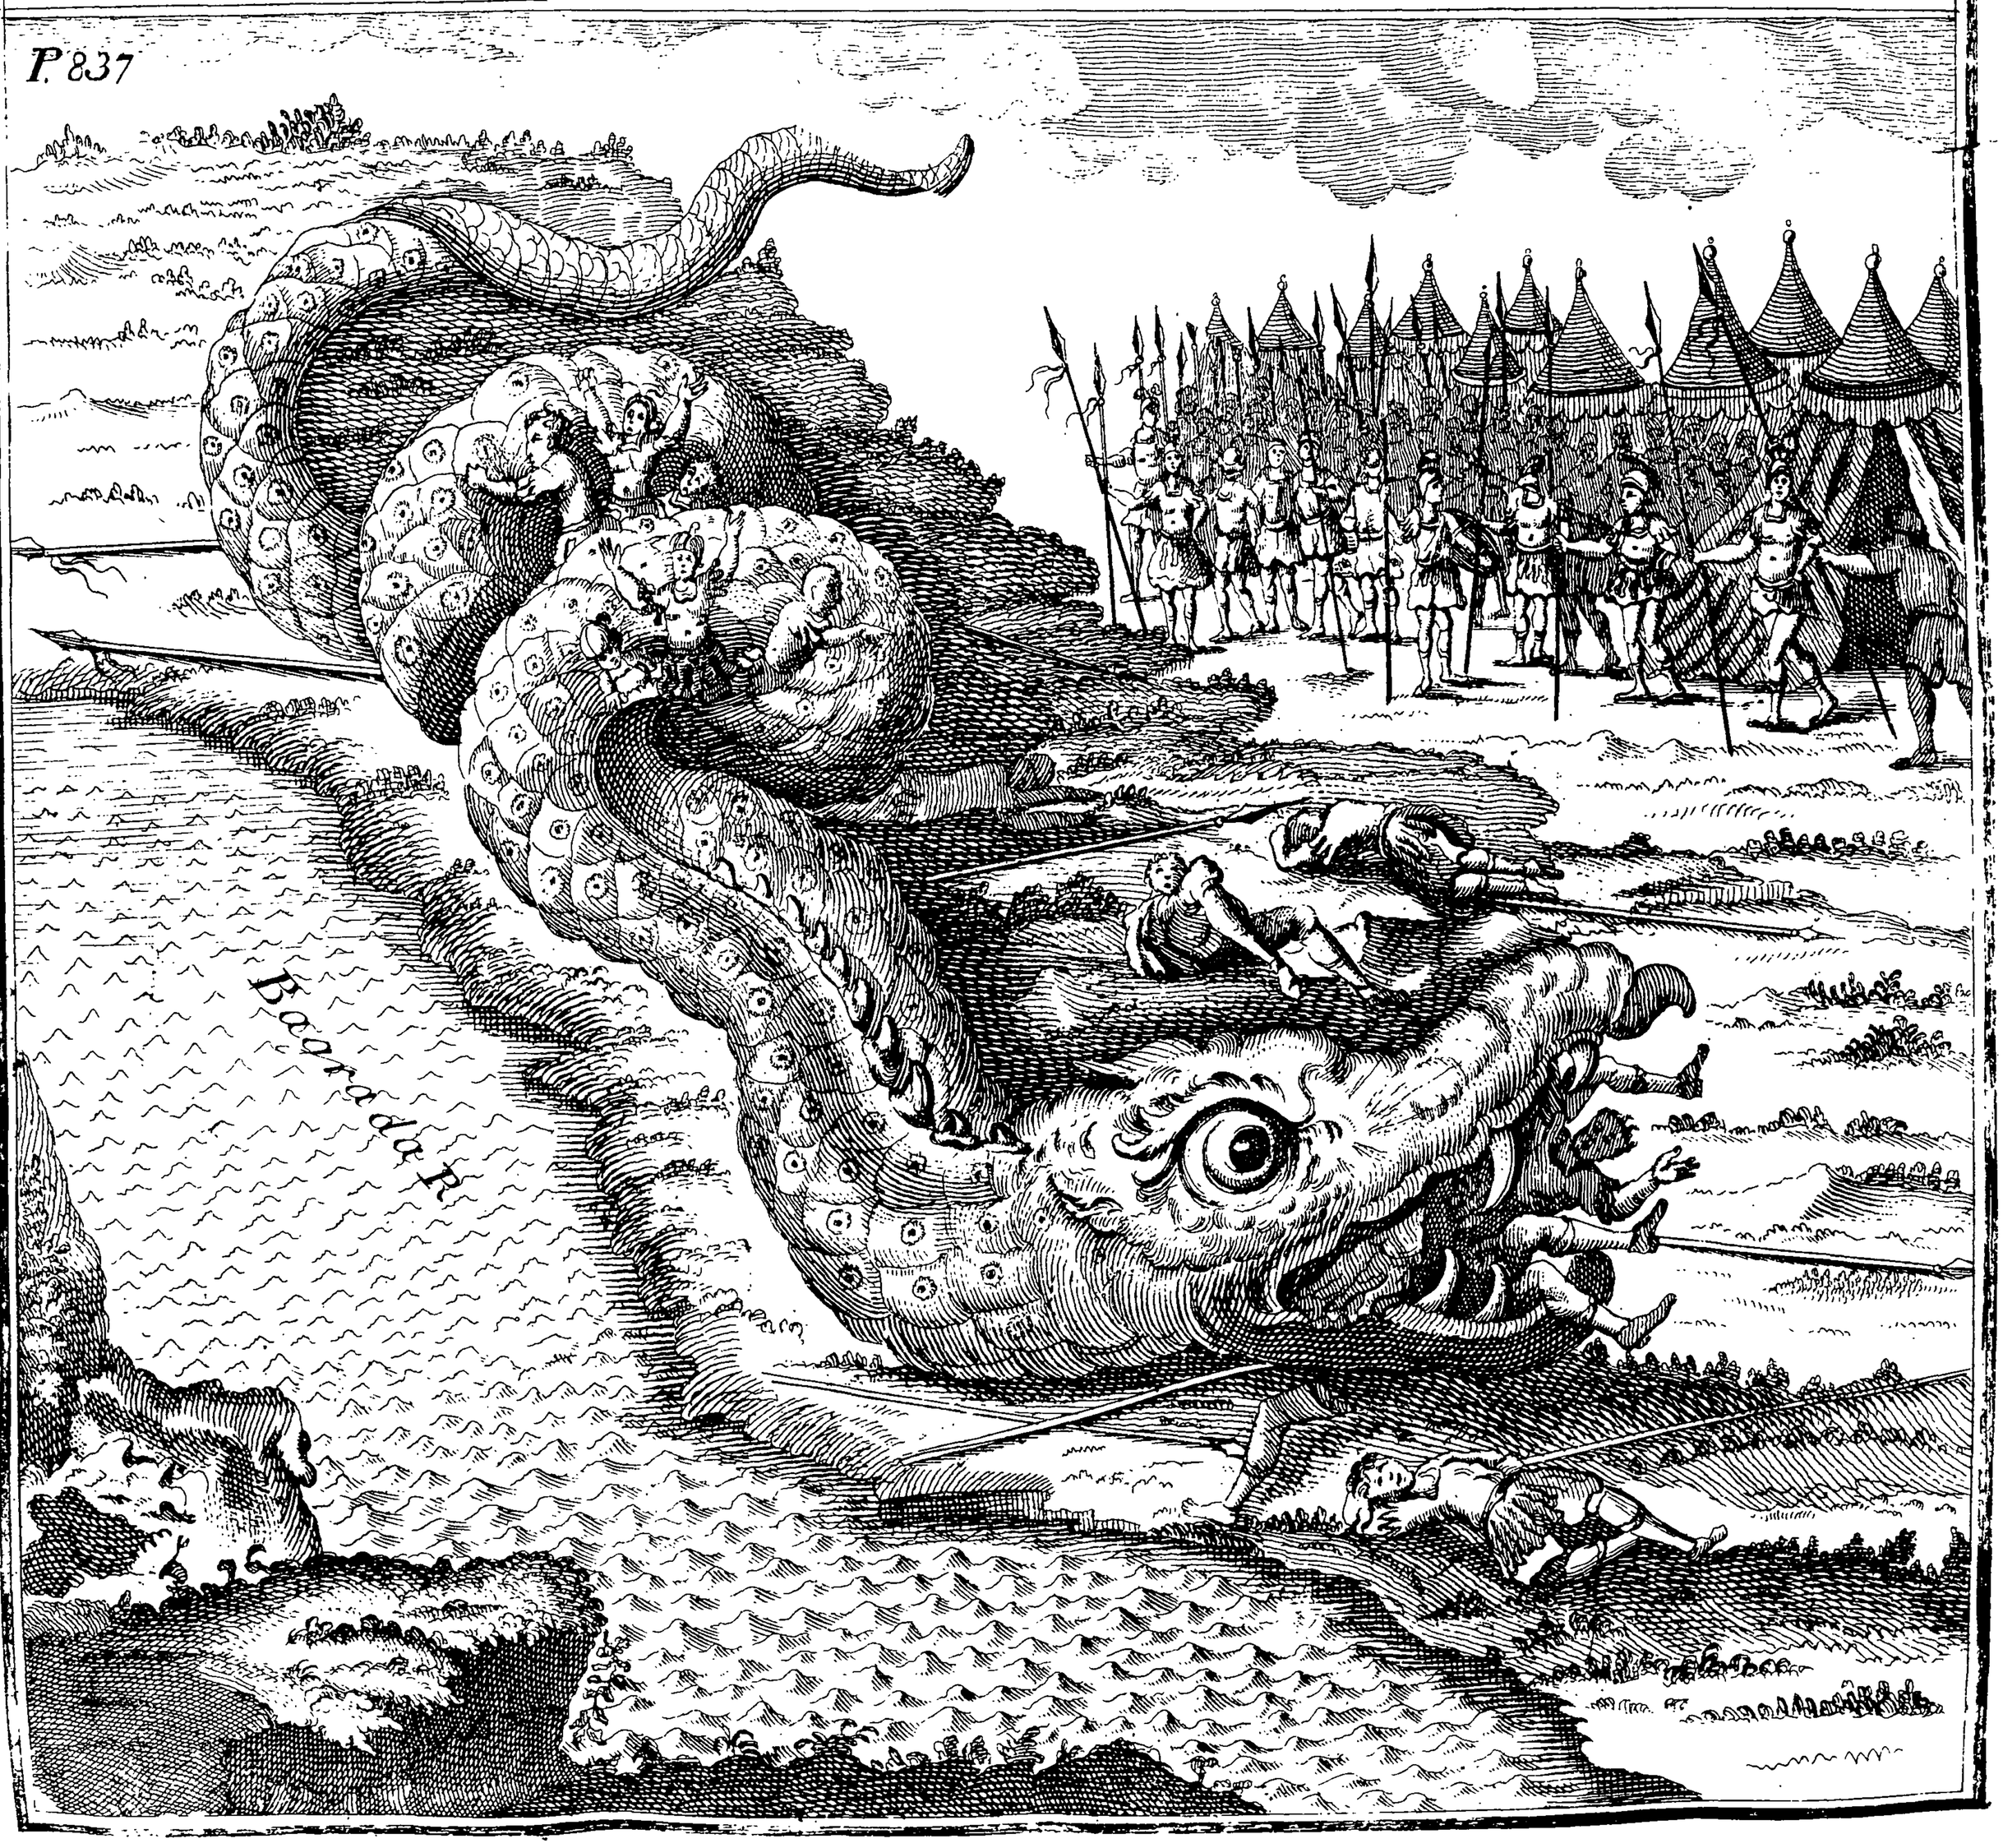
(11) E. Souciet recueil de diſſertat. critiq. ſur les endroit. & ſur de matier qui ont rapporta l'ecriture.



P Simms Sculpt

P 703. 704.

I



II

The Fashion of the Aquaeduct near old Carthage above-mentioned, of as high antiquity as theſe; and there are even inſtances of Sicilian coins [l] with both the Greek and Punic characters upon them. That the Carthaginians ſhould be called Hhittin or Hhitte, i. e. Hittites, we are not to think ſtrange; ſince Anak [m] and his family, from whom Carthage was called Chaedre-Anach or Chaedre-Anak, were Hittites, and conſequently that people were the moſt eminent of the Phœnicians, from whom the Carthaginians deduced their original. As for the name being abbreviated, this is no uncommon thing. The word ΣΥΡΑ for ΣΥΡΑΚΟΣΙΩΝ is frequently found on the medals of the Syracuſans [n], not to mention many other inſtances which might eaſily be produced. For a farther illuſtration of this point, ſee the following note (H).

P. 837

II. The

[l] Parut. apud ſcript. Sic. vol. vii. tab. 13. num. 123, 124. tab. 14. num. 136, 137. [m] Bochart. Phal. l. iv. c. 36. [n] Parut. ubi ſup. vol. viii. Lugd. Bat. 1723. tab. 33. num. 2. tab. 38. num. 12.

(H) The Hittites (12) were the primary nation of Canaan, and ſeem to have been more famous than any of the others. They were not entirely reduced till the time of Solomon, being intermixed with the Iſraelites, and living in the neighbourhood of the Sidonians and Tyrians Hence we may conclude, that not only great numbers of them ſettled in Africa after their expulſion by Joſhua, but likewiſe, that even ſome of their deſcendents might attend Dido into the ſame country They were ſo formidable to their neighbours, that from them the word חתת hittah ſeems to have ſignified fear, and a ſudden conſternation (31). That this Punic word is to be read and interpreted in the manner we propoſe, will farther appear from hence, that the letter 𐤇 is found upon the reverſes of ſeveral other Panormitan (14) coins, which evidently allude to the ſtate of Carthage, and muſt have been ſtruck when the Carthaginians were maſters of that place (15). 'Tis alſo worthy obſervation, that the Greek mark or abbreviation on the reverſes of theſe medals, peculiar to the Panormitans, conſidered as Greeks, was 𐤐𐤍𐤐, 𐤐𐤀𐤐 or 𐤐𐤏𐤐, i. e. ΠΑΝΡ for (16) ΠΑΝΟΡΜΙΤΑΝ. We may therefore reaſonably

(12) Univ. hiſt. vol. ii. p. 181, 183, 196, 209, & 214. (13) Bochart. Phal. l. iv. c. 36. ſub init. (14) Parut. ubi ſup. tab. 14 num. 134. & tab. 17 num. 166. &c. (15) This appears from the ſymbols upon them, and from their being found near this metropolis of the Carthaginians in Sicily. (16) Vide num. Panorm. apud Parut. ubi ſup. paſ.

II. The ſecond coin we are ſupplyed with by Haym, who, following other antiquaries, ſuppoſes the hero there repreſented to be Hannibal. The Punic legend is 𐤀𐤇𐤕𐤉, every one of which letters we ſhall endeavour to decipher [o].

The firſt 𐤀 is evidently the ſame with the old Oriental aleph given us by Loeſcher, as well as the Syriac olaph. It likewiſe in figure approaches near the Phœnician aleph or alpha, (𐤀) as found on coins, wanting only the tranſverſe line at the top, which by length of time, might eaſily have grown into diſuſe amongſt the Carthaginians. We may therefore eſteem it as equivalent to A [p].

The ſecond 𐤇 is apparently the Phœnician 𐤇, which letter we ſee upon ſeveral Phœnician coins in Spanheim. The Etruſcan 𐤇 likewiſe comes near it. We may therefore aſſert 𐤇𐤇 to be NN [q].

The

[o] Haym. in teſor. Britan. [p] Loeſch. p. 224. Et Ezech. Spanhem, de uſ. & præſt. numiſm. diſſert. 2. [q] Spanhem. ubi ſup. & Phil. Bonarot. in additament, op. Dempſt. Florent. 1726.

ſonably imagine, that the Carthaginians had likewiſe an abbreviation in their own language and character, viz. 𐤇𐤇 or 𐤕𐤇𐤇, i. e. hhit for hhittin, or emphatically hhitte. That theſe letters were an abbreviation, is ſo apparent, that Havercamp (17) pronouuces them the mark of Panormus; though he abſurdly confounds them with the Greek Ψ, whereas they are entirely different from it, and indiſputably the Phœnician hheth and tau. It muſt be owned indeed Havercamp will not allow theſe coins to be Punic (18); but the Carthaginian horſe on ours, as well as the palm-tree and horſe on the others, together with the authority of the learned Inveges (19), and the Punic characters on them all, not only refute what he has ſaid, but obviate every thing elſe that can be offered to the contrary.

That this is a Punic abbreviation, in imitation of the Greek manner, is alſo probable, becauſe every thing on this medal is either Greek workmanſhip, or an imitation of it. Other Panormitan coins have on their reverſes ΠΑ (20), which greatly ſtrengthens what has been advanced. If we ſuppoſe hheth here to be of the ſame organ with koph, as it ſometimes is, being by ſome pronounced cheth, then this abbreviation may be chat or chart, i. e. of the Carthaginians. Perhaps this conjecture will pleaſe ſome of our readers better than the other.

(17) Sigebert. Havercamp. comment. in Parut. num Panormitan. p. 61, 62. (18) Idem ibid. (19) Auguſt. Inveg. Carth. Sic. p. 323. & alib. (20) Parut. ubi ſup. tab 10. num. 99, 100, &c.

THE third letter is the Phœnician jud ( ) inverted ( ).

The inversion of letters is a thing that frequently happens; but at present we shall content ourselves with naming one instance only. From the Phœnician is formed the Greek ϛ or Σ. The Punic is therefore of the same power with I.

THE last letter is a more rude and simple kind of beth; for it differs only from the Phœnician ( ) and Hebrew ( ) beth in this [s], that it is destitute of the transverse line at the bottom, and has the vertical angle more acute than that of the Hebrew, and the line parallel to the transverse one at the bottom of the Phœnician beth defaced. In fine, as there is no other letter of the Phœnician alphabet, to which this approaches so near as it does to beth, we may conclude, that they were the same; and therefore we must look upon as B.

THUS we find, that expressed in Latin letters is ANNIB, in conformity to the sentiments of Haym [t] and other antiquaries. And we can assure our readers, that the Punic characters here do not differ so much from the Phœnician, with which we have compared them, as the various forms of the same Phœnician letters found on different medals do from one another [u].

Hannibal's effigies on a Carthaginian coin.

IT has been observed above, that the suffetes of Carthage were called kings by the Greeks; that one of these, at least, was possessed of a vast degree of power; that Hannibal was, some time, the supreme magistrate of Carthage; that he acted in that city, in a manner without controul; and, in fine, that he was deified there in his life-time. After this, who can be surprised, that he should have had his name and effigies upon coins? For our part, we think nothing more probable, and without the additional proof of this medal, should not have scrupled to have affirmed it (I).

As

[r] Spanhem. ubi sup. Montfauc. in dissert. de vet. Græc. & Lat. lit. ad fin. Palæogr. Græc. Par. 1708. [s] Loesch. Spanh. & Montfauc ubi sup. [t] Haym del tesor. Britan. p. 143. [u] Vid. Adrian. Reland. Val Loescher. ubi sup aliosq; plurim.

(I) Havercamp asserts, that the Carthaginians struck medals inhonour of their generals, with their effigies upon them; this is

Liberal arts and sciences, at a low ebb in Carthage.

As to the progress of the liberal arts and sciences amongst the Carthaginians, and the degree of perfection they arrived at in them, we have not much to say. If Carthage could ever have boasted of any famous productions of this kind, they are all now lost; though for our parts we are inclined to believe, that this people gave themselves up so entirely to commerce, that they paid little or no regard to any branch of literature. Military skill some of their generals were most eminently famous for, though even in this they seem to have been very deficient, till put into a right method by Xantippus the Lacedæmonian; but philosophy, we have reason to apprehend, was always at a low ebb amongst them. As they undoubtedly therefore applied themselves chiefly to trade and navigation, as also to the military art, that they might be the better enabled thereby to enjoy in security their immense wealth and possessions, their arts and learning will not be a very copious topic; and even this we must for a moment suspend, in order to give our readers a short sketch of some of their principal customs.

Customs of the Carthaginians.

They suffered no private injury, offered by any person whatsoever to another, to go unpunished. This maxim of equity they received from their first ancestors, and were very strict on all occasions in the observance of it[w].

No one was permitted to carry the news of any near relation's death to another, but some person convicted of a capital crime, for which he was soon to suffer. They thought the messengers of such tragical events ought soon to die, or at least never more to appear before the persons to whom they brought the melancholy advice[x].

If any remarkable misfortune happened to the city, the walls were all hung with black. This was done after the destruction of their fleet by Agathocles; after the loss of their army under Himilco's conduct in Sicily by the plague, and upon other such dismal occasions, as we are informed by various authors[y].

They used dog's flesh for food till the time of Darius Hystaspis; but upon that prince's conceiving some disgust at this is likewise allowed by that learned Sicilian antiquary Inveges (21).

[w] Hendr. ubi supra. in cap. de leg. & consuetud. [x] Idem ibid. [y] Idem ibid. Vide & Diodor. Sic. Liv. Oros. l. iv. c. 6, &c.

(21) Inveg. & Havercamp. ubi sup. p. 84.

this practice, they left it off, at leaſt for a certain period of time [z].

THE ſoldiers were prohibited, under the ſevereſt puniſhment, whilſt in the field, to taſte wine; a laudable inſtance this of their temperance and ſobriety [a].

EVERY ſoldier, at leaſt every officer, wore a number of rings anſwering to the number of campaigns he had made. This doubtleſs was intended to excite a noble ſpirit of emulation amongſt them, inſpire them with a thirſt after military glory, and conſequently lead them on to the greateſt atchievements [b].

THEIR generals, tho' perfectly innocent, upon any diſaſter, were frequently put to death. This probably was deſigned to oblige them to make uſe of all their ſkill, addreſs, and vigilance; tho' after all, it was a moſt barbarous and imprudent cuſtom. This wild maxim prevails amongſt the Turks, who are juſtly looked upon as barbarians for it, at this day [c].

THE populace and the ſenators had diſtinct baths appointed them. This in general we are told by Valerius Maximus; but what gave occaſion to this, he ſays not, nor gives us any further particulars concerning it [d].

It was uſual with many of them to have ſtatues or buſts of their lovers or intimate friends in their bed-chambers, that they might, in ſome meaſure, ſee and converſe with them when abſent. This appears from Silius, in his account of Dido after Æneas's departure from her [e].

DIGNITY and power in this ſtate could not ſcreen any great offender from condign puniſhment. Of which Machæus, Hanno, Bomilcar, and others, that we ſhall meet with in the courſe of this hiſtory, are pregnant inſtances [f].

THEIR anniverſary feſtivals were obſerved with great ſolemnity, partieularly the day on which the Tyrians, under the conduct of Dido, began to lay the foundations of Carthage. This, according to Silius, ſeems to have been celebrated yearly, even till the deſtruction of the city, with the utmoſt ſplendor and magnificence [g].

THERE were no public inns amongſt them. They entertained ſtrangers as friends in their own private houſes.

[z] Juſt. hiſt. l. xix. [a] Plat. de legib. & Hendr. ubi ſupra. [b] Liv. Hendr. ubi ſupra. Ariſtot. Barth. adverſ. l. iv. c. 22. [c] Vide Liv. Diodor. Sic. Sil Italic. &c. [d] Valer. Max. l. ix. c. 5. [e] Sil Ital. [f] Vide Liv. Diedor. Sic. Juſt. Oroſ. &c. [g] Sil. Ital. & Hendr. ubi ſup.

This was likewiſe a cuſtom amongſt other nations, particularly the Greeks and Romans. Hence it came to paſs, that the ſame word frequently ſignified friendſhip and hoſpitality. The manner of receiving gueſts or ſtrangers was thus: A dye or token was divided into two parts; one of theſe was given to the gueſt, and upon his producing it to the maſter of the houſe, he was received by him, and ever afterwards entertained as a friend. This token was tranſmitted down to poſterity, and kept in the family as a mark of friendſhip with the perſon or his family to whom it related [h]. Hence thoſe who violated the laws of hoſpitality were ſaid teſſeram hoſpitalem frangere. The deity preſiding over theſe laws was invoked by the name of Jupiter Xenius, as the god of friendſhip was called Jupiter Philius, and that of ſociety or good-fellowſhip Jupiter Hetærius.

It was a cuſtom with the Carthaginians to conſult their augurs and vates upon all emergencies, and before any enterprize of importance was undertaken. Thus Hamilcar, at the ſiege of Syracuſe, conſulting one of his vates, was told by him, that the next night he ſhould ſup in that city; and, to wave all other inſtances, Pygmalion, upon his intention to purſue his ſiſter Dido, was aſſured by the inſpired college of vates, that he ſhould feel the reſentment of the gods, if he offered, in any manner, to obſtruct the great deſign ſhe was gone upon; nay, according to St. Auſtin, theſe vates were in great repute about theſe parts long after the deſtruction of Carthage, ſince one of them, named Albicerius, was very famous there in his time for the reſponſes he gave [i].

The magiſtrates, during the exerciſe of their power, [k] were obliged to abſtain from wine, though that this inſtitution was obſerved always to the expiration of the commonwealth, we cannot poſitively affirm.

The Phœnicians are ſaid to have repreſented their gods as carrying large bags or ſacks full of money; becauſe gold amongſt them was the emblem of power, and ſymbol of dominion. Perhaps the Carthaginians repreſented theirs in the ſame manner, which, together with the vaſt quantities of treaſure continually rolling into their coffers, and the great variety variety of the moſt precious commodities brought from all parts of the world in their ſhips, might occaſion that inſatiable avarice they were ſo famous for.

[h] Plaut. Penul. act. v. ſc. 1 Budæus in Pandect. Taubman. ad Plaut. loc. citat. Scholiaſt. Euripid. in Hippol. Joan. Hartung. in decur. locor. memor. c. 8. l. 39. Sil. Ital. l. xvii. [i] Virg. Æn. 4. Sil. Ital. de bell. Pun. l. i. Diodor. Sic. Juſt. l. xviii. Auguſt. l. i. cont. academ. [k] Alex. ab Alex.

SEVERAL other cuſtoms might here be mentioned; but as they may be more properly referred to the manners and diſpoſition of the Carthaginians in general, we ſhall compriſe them all in the following ſhort character of that people. Character of the Carthaginians.

THEIR minds were entirely ſet upon amaſſing wealth, being mean-ſpirited, groveling and ſordid to an incredible degree[l]. In order to this, they ſtuck at no low, not to ſay infamous, arts. This muſt be underſtood of the Carthaginian in the later periods, and towards the decline of their ſtate; for it is not to be queſtioned, but that they were of a better turn of mind in the earlieſt ages, and that, even to the laſt, they had many generous and heroic ſouls amongſt them, The ardor and public ſpirit the women themſelves ſhewed juſt before the laſt ſiege of Carthage, as well as during that ſiege *, ſufficiently prove this. In ſhort, we find ſuch a contraſt of good and bad qualities in this people, that it is almoſt impoſſible to determine which of them were predominant. It muſt only be obſerved, that the nearer we approach the deſtruction of their city, the worſe we find them. However, as the characters we have of the Carthaginians come handed down to us chiefly from the Romans, their implacable enemies, we muſt not pay too great a regard to them. The Romans took care to deſtroy, not only their archives, which, by the way, ſhews, that that nation ought to be reckoned amongſt thoſe where barbariſm prevailed, but almoſt every thing they wrote, that had any appearance of literature or true hiſtory.

POLYBIUS[m] makes it his complaint, that both Philinus and Fabius Pictor, the Carthaginian and Roman hiſtorians, were ſo partial in their relations, that no great credit could be given to either of them, when treating of the Carthaginian affairs. Of their perfidiouſneſs and black ingratitude, hiſtory ſupplies us with abundant proof, which will hereafter be produced. According to Plutarch[n], they were of a moroſe, ſaturnine and ſavage diſpoſition (K), utterly averſe to every [l] Polyb. l. i. Diod Sic. l. ii App. in Lybic. Vide etiam Frontin & Veget. * Appian. ubi ſup. [m] Polyb l. i. [n] Plut. in præc. de ger. rep. c. 5.

(K) The great Hannibal was an exception to this general character of the Carthaginians given by Plutarch. Though that renowned thing that had but the leaſt appearance of wit or raillery, not being able to bear a joke, in which they were diametrically oppoſite to the genius of the Athenians and Lacedæmonians. Some of them were likewiſe acted by an intolerable ſpirit of arrogance, and moſt vitious ambition, by which they were prompted to deſire divine honours. Of this Hanno affords us a flagrant inſtance *, who, as we are told by Ælian, taught birds to ſay, Hanno is a god; though this did not anſwer his end, ſince, after their flight from him, they returned to their former notes again (L).

COMMERCE

* Ælian. var. hiſt. l. xiv. c. 30.

renowned general was, for many years, ſo much employed in military labours, he yet found means to cultivate the muſes. Some of his repartees, that have been tranſmitted down to us, plainly ſhew, that he had a great fund of natural wit. This he improved by the moſt polite education that could be beſtowed at that time, and in ſuch a republic as Carthage. Tho' ſeveral ſmart turns, that have been attributed to him by the antients, might be produced, yet we ſhall content ourſelves here with one out of Macrobius (22): Antiochus, valuing himſelf upon the rich armour and ſplendid accoutrements of his troops, aſked Hannibal at a review, Whether he thought they were ſufficient for the Romans, meaning to cope with them? Hannibal, far from being dazzled with the pompous appearance they made, replied, That the Romans were indeed very avaricious; but that however, he thought, theſe were abundantly ſufficient for them, i. e. that the plunder accruing to the Romans from them was enough to ſatisfy that rapacious people. This was a proper rebuke to Antiochus for his prepoſterous notion of military bravery, and at the ſame time a ſpecimen of brilliant and flowing wit in Hannibal.

(L) The Carthaginians were extremely addicted to corruption, to which their conſtitution itſelf had a natural tendency, as Ariſtotle (23) has rightly obſerved. Their chiefs frequently made uſe of this with good ſucceſs, when all other expedients failed them. The Barchine faction ſupported themſelves a long time by the venality of their fellow citizens; and others after them purſued the ſame method of acting, which ended in the total ruin of the commonwealth. In conſequence of this mean diſpoſition, in proſperity they were elevated to a pitch inconſiſtent with the maxims of prudence and moderation, and in adverſity as much depreſſed. Of this we ſhall meet with various examples hereafter (24).

At

(22) Macrob. Saturn. l. ii. p. 225. Vid. etiam. Corn. Nep. in Vit. Hannib. Liv. l. xxxv. Plut in vit. Flamin. & in Pyrrho p. 687. (23) Ariſtot. de repub. ubi ſupra. (24) Vide Liv. Polyb. Juſt. Corn. Nep. Plut. Oroſ. plurimoſque alios hiſtoric paſſ.

Commerce, the army, and the marine, chiefly regarded at Carthage.

COMMERCE, the army, and the marine, were the principal, if not ſole, objects of publick attention at Carthage. Theſe ſo entirely engroſſed the minds of all people there, that they had no inclination to purſue, nor indeed any great taſte for, the liberal arts and ſciences. However, they muſt have known ſomething at leaſt of the rudiments of aſtronomy, ſince, without this, they could not have been tolerably verſed in the art of navigation. Beſides, the Edomites and Phœnicians were famous for being the greateſt adepts, with the Egyptians, in the celeſtial ſciences, of all other nations. The Carthaginians therefore, their deſcendents could not have been void of a competent knowledge herein. That they had ſome notion likewiſe of ſculpture and painting, tho' the degree of perfection they arrived at in them we cannot pretend to aſcertain, is plain from the Dii Patæci they carried along with them in their voyages, as likewiſe from the pictures with which their ſhips of war, and other veſſels, were adorned. As a ſea-faring and mercantile people are always ingenious in contriving a variety of commodities to ſupply the neceſſities or luxury of other nations with, it is alſo probable, that they were very well acquainted with the

At their weddings they entertained their friends with the tunny fiſh; another remarkable cuſtom that deſerves mentioning.

The Carthaginians paid the greateſt deference to their nobility, who held a moſt diſtinguiſhed rank amongſt them. Some perſons were reputed nobles, or at leaſt upon a level with them, on account of their riches; for Ariſtotle intimates, that wealth had a vaſt influence at Carthage, as well as nobility of birth; and that great regard was had to both in filling the high poſts of the ſtate, when vacant. Others received the title of nobles, as a mark of diſtinction due to them for their ſuperior virtue and merit. And laſtly, others derived their nobility from a long train of noble anceſtors. Theſe were the proper nobility; of whoſe families in order to render this hiſtory the more complete, we ſhall beg leave to preſent our readers with the following genealogical table, though it muſt be owned to be a very imperfect one:

1. The family of MACHÆUS.

Machæus.

|

Carthalo.

2. The inferior mechanical arts. The Sidonians and Tyrians were certainly celebrated above other nations for their mechanical skill

2. The Family of MAGO I.

Mago.

Asdrubal. | Hamilcar.

Hannibal. Asdrubal. Sappho. | Hamilco. Hanno. Gisco.

An anonymous son. | Hamilcar.

Hanno. | Gisco.

Hamilco. Hannibal.

Gisco. | Hanno.

Hamilcar. Gisco. | Hanno.

Hannibal, surnamed the Senior. | Hanno.

Hannibal.

3. The family of MAGO II.

Mago II.

Mago.

4. The family of BOMILCAR the tyrant.

Brothers

Hamilcar. An anonymous one.

Bomilcar.

5. The family of HANNO.

Hanno.

Asdrubal.

6. The skill in very early ages, as we learn from ſcripture; conſequently the Carthaginians, one branch of their poſterity, muſt have been ſo likewiſe. But the ſuperb temples, magnificent

6. The family of HAMILCAR.

Hamilcar.

Hannibal. Hanno.

7. The family of HIMILCO.

Himilco.

Maherbal.

8. The family of GISCO.

Giſco.

Hamilcar. Aſdrubal.

Hanno. Sophonisba, the wife of king Syphax.

9. The family of BOMILCAR, the king or ſufes.

Bomilcar.

Hanno.

Hanno the Great.

10. The nificent palaces, rich furniture in their houſes, great variety of

10. The BARCHINE or BARCAN family.

Barca, the brother of Dido foundreſs of Carthage.

.
.
.
.
.
.
.
.
.
. Nineteen generations.
.
.
.
.
.
.
.
.
.
.

Hannibal
|
Hamilcar, ſurnamed Barcas, or Barca.
|

Hannibal the Great.	Imilce.	Aſdrubal.	Mago.	Hanno.
		A daughter, the wife of Naravaſus.	A daughter the wife of Aſdrubal.
	Hamilcar.
			Sichæus.

11. The family of Hamilcar II.

Hamilcar.
|
¶ Himilco, ſurnamed Phamæas.
¶ Giſco.
¶ Aſdrubal, the laſt king or ſufes of Carthage.

For a more particular account of theſe families, our readers may conſult Reineccius, Ubbo Emmius, and Chriſtopher Hendreich, ſo often quoted, at their leiſure (24).

(24) Ariſtot. de rep. ubi ſupr. Chriſt. Hendr. Ubb. Emm. Reinec. in hiſt. Jul. vol. ii. Lucius Ampelius lib. memor. p. 191. edit. Cantab. 1680. Juſtin. l. xix. Liv. Diod. Sic. Polyb. &c.

of arms, &c. in Carthage, put this point beyond diſpute (M).

Few perſons of learning amongſt the Carthaginians.

AFTER what has been ſaid, our readers will not expect to meet with many perſons of erudition amongſt the Carthaginians, though, without doubt, they had more than their enemies have informed us of. The Romans, as has been juſt obſerved, made great havock both amongſt their public and private writings, and this out of a principle of envy and malice prepenſe. However, the names of ſome of their writers have been tranſmitted down to poſterity, the principal of which are the following:

Carthaginian writers Hannibal.

HANNIBAL, the moſt renowned general Carthage ever produced, was well verſed in the Greek language. According to Cornelius Nepos and Plutarch, he wrote ſeveral pieces in it, particularly the hiſtory of Manlius Vulſo's proconſulſhip in Aſia [p].

Mago.

MAGO, another celebrated general of the Carthaginians, acquired as much glory to his country by his writings, as his military atchievements. He wrote twenty-eight volumes upon huſbandry, which the Roman ſenate had in ſuch eſteem, that, after the taking of Carthage, when they preſented the African princes with the libraries founded there, they ordered theſe books to be tranſlated into Latin, though Cato had before written copiouſly on that ſubject. The libraries abovementioned are a further proof, that learning was not entirely baniſhed Carthage [q].

Philinus.

PHILINUS, though a Sicilian, being born at Agrigentum, is eſteemed by Polybius as a Carthaginian hiſtorian. He wrote a hiſtory of the wars betwixt the Romans and the ſtate of Carthage; but diſguiſed facts ſo palpably in favour of the latter,

[p] Corn. Nep. in Hannib. Plut. in Scip. [q] Cic. l. i. de orat. n. 249. Plin. l. xviii. c. 3.

(M) So famous was Carthage for its artificers, that any ſingular invention or exquiſite piece of workmanſhip ſeems to have been called, even by the Romans, their implacable enemies, Punic. Thus the Punic beds or couches, the Punic windows, the Punic wine-preſſes, the Punic lanterns, &c. were of all others eſteemed the moſt neat and elegant for their workmanſhip by that people. This is an undeniable proof, that the Carthaginians had not only good mechanical heads and hands, but likewiſe excelled all other nations, their original anceſtors excepted, in every thing of that kind (25).

(25) Valer. Max. Cato de re ruſt. Ovid. el. vi. Plaut. Aulul.

latter, that, were his performance ſtill extant, it would not be held in any great repute, eſpecially after the ſtigma Polybius has fixed upon it. Fabius Pictor, though in the main a good hiſtorian, yet, in moſt points relating to the Carthaginians, was guilty of as great partiality on the Roman ſide. This we learn from Polybius, who, in order to arrive at truth, has ſteered the middle courſe betwixt them both [r].

Himilco. HIMILCO, a ſea officer, was ſent by the ſenate of Carthage to diſcover the weſtern ſhores and ports of Europe. This he did, and wrote a journal of his voyage, together with an account of his diſcoveries, which were inſerted in the Punic annals. Feſtus Avienus [s] has entirely followed this author in his deſcription of the weſtern coaſts of the world; and intimates, that he ſaw the original journal itſelf in the annals aforeſaid. Nay, from Feſtus it appears, that the Carthaginians were acquainted with the Britannic iſlands, which he calls Oeſtrymnides.

Hanno. HANNO, another Carthaginian general, by order of the ſenate, ſailed with a conſiderable fleet [t] round Africa. He entered the ocean by the ſtreights of Gibraltar, made many important diſcoveries, and had continued his navigation, if proviſions had not failed him. He wrote a relation of his voyage, an extract from, or rather a fragment of a Greek verſion of which, is ſtill remaining. He is ſaid to have hung up in Juno's temple ſome ſkins of ſeveral ſavage women, whom he ordered to be ſlead. Iſaac Voſſius, in oppoſition to his father, ſuppoſes him to have been older then either Homer or Heſiod; but the great Mr. Dodwell ſolidly and learnedly refutes this notion. If Pliny is to be credited, Hanno and Himilco above-mentioned were contemporaries. It is certain there were two Carthaginian generals of theſe names in the time of Agathocles. Whilſt Himilco ſteered towards the weſt, in order to diſcover new countries, Hanno took his courſe from Gades or Cadiz to the fartheſt parts of Arabia. Mr. Dodwell thinks, that the piece going now under the name of Hanno's periplus, is not his, but was written by a Sicilian Greek. However, it cannot be denied, that he penned a relation of his voyage, ſince this is often quoted by the antients. This moſt learned gentleman has, with the greateſt appearance of truth, fixed his time ſomewhere betwixt twixt the ninety-ſecond and the hundred and twenty-ninth olympiad [u].

[r] Polyb. l. i. [s] Feſtus Avienus in or. marit. p. 290. Vide & Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 35, 39, &c. [t] Plin. l. ii. c. 67. & l. v. c. 1. Athen. deipnoſoph. l. iii. p. 83. Pomp. Mel. l. iii. c. 9. p. 63. edit. Iſaaci Voſſii. Voſſ. de hiſtor. Græc. p. 514.

SILENUS was an hiſtorian, who wrote of the Carthaginian affairs in the Greek language; from whence it ſhould appear, that he was a Greek. Some authors take him to have been the ſame with Philinus above-mentioned; but of this we have no ſufficient proof, and therefore we muſt look upon them as two diſtinct writers [w]. Silenus.

CLITOMACHUS, called in the Punic language Aſdrubal, was a great philoſopher. He ſucceeded the famous Carneades, whoſe diſciple he had been, and maintained in Athens the honour of the academic ſect. Cicero ſays, that he was a more ſenſible man, and ſonder of ſtudy, than the Carthagians generally were. He compoſed ſeveral books, in one of which he drew a piece to conſole the unhappy citizens of Carthage, who, by the ruin of the city, were reduced to ſlavery. By this it is manifeſt, that he lived after the deſtruction of that city by Scipio [x]. Clitomachus.

Now we are upon the arts and learning of the Carthaginians, it will not be foreign to our ſubject to mention what Pliny tells us of Hanno, viz. that he was the firſt man who dared to touch, and could tame, a lion. The ſame author adds, that he was condemned, which muſt either imply in it death or baniſhment, upon account of this art; ſince his countrymen could not be perſuaded, but that he who had the power of ſoftening the fierceſt of beaſts, muſt likewiſe be capable of influencing the minds of his fellow-citizens in ſuch a manner, as to become maſter of their freedom [y]. This is related to us by Pliny, and it is either an argument of their extreme weakneſs, or his extreme credulity. Some believe this perſon to have been the writer Hanno above-mentioned (N). Hanno, the firſt who tamed a lion.

AMONGST

[u] Dodwel. diſſert. de peripl. Hannon. ætat. in lim. geogr. vet. ſcript. Græc. min. tom i. edit. Oxon. 1698. Ariſtot. in lib. de admirand. audit. Juſtin. l. xxii. &c. [w] Cic. de divinat. l. i. [x] Plut. de fort. Alex. p. 328. Diog. Laert. in Clitom. Cic. in academ. quæſt. l. iv. n. 98. Tuſc. quæſt. l. iii. n. 54. [y] Plin. ubi ſup. P. Harduin. apud Bayl. voc. Hanno, vol. iii. p. 1579. not. (D). Lond. 1710.

(N) In one reſpect we may rank the celebrated Terence amongſt the writers of this country, ſince, according to Donatus, he was born at Carthage (26). Being taken captive when very young, either by Scipio at the concluſion of the ſecond Punic war, as ſome

(26) Æl. Donat. P. Terent. vit.

The Carthaginians inventors of the quadriremes.

AMONGST other inventions this nation was famous for, we muſt not forget that of the quadriremes, or four-oared galleys ſome will have it, or, as others ſay, by the Numidians, in one of their incurſions into the Carthaginian territories ſome time after that war, he became the property of Terentius Lucanus, a Roman ſenator. Terentius, being much taken with the fine diſpoſition of his ſlave, not only gave him an excellent education, but likewiſe enfranchiſed him, and called him after his own name, as was the prevailing cuſtom of thoſe times. In the conſulſhip of T. Manlius Torquatus and Cn. Octavius Nepos, this famous dramatic poet was in his higheſt reputation (27). Tho' an African born, yet his diction is moſt pure, elegant, and polite; inſomuch, that ſome have not ſcrupled to affirm, that he received conſiderable aſſiſtance in the comedies aſcribed to him from Scipio and his friend Lælius. It is certain, that either to pleaſe theſe great men, who were not unwilling to be thought concerned with him in thoſe performances, or becauſe it was true, he himſelf countenanced this notion (28). Six of thoſe comedies only are now extant, all of which were highly eſteemed at Rome, and met with prodigious applauſe when acted there. Feneſtella makes him to have been older than (29) Scipio and Lælius; but Cornelius Nepos is more to be credited, who aſſerts them all to have been contemporaries. Suetonius ſays (30), that, in his return from Greece, he loſt an hundred and eight comedies tranſlated from Menander, of whom he was a great admirer, and could not ſurvive an accident which afflicted him in a moſt ſenſible manner. However this be, he died in the conſulſhip of Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and M. Fulvius, aged thirty-five years He is ſaid to have been of a middle ſtature, ſlender, and of a ſwarthy complection. He had a daughter who ſurvived him, and was married to a Roman knight.

Under this note we ſhall likewiſe beg leave to obſerve, that it is intimated by Plutarch (31), that this Hànno made uſe of lions as beaſts of burden; which is confirmed by Ovid and Silius (32). If we will believe Ælian (33), there were lions in the temple of Adonis ſo tame, that they fawned upon perſons at their entering in, came to the table there when called, and, after taking what was given them, modeſtly retired. The ſame author tells us, that the Indians (34) had ſo tamed their lions, that with them they hunted bulls, wild aſſes, and all other ſavage animals. John II. king of Portugal is reported to have had a lion always following galleys, which the antients attributed to the Carthaginians. It is moreover probable, that they were the first who made cable-ropes for large vessels of the shrub spartum, which was a sort of broom; at least, that they were the first who communicated this invention to the Romans. But this perhaps more properly belongs to the navigation and trade of the Carthaginians, which we shall now endeavour to give our readers a succinct idea of [z].

(27) Idem ibid. Univerſ hiſt vol. xii. p. 295, 328, 348. (28) Æl. Donat. ubi ſup. (29) Feneſtella apud Æl. Donat. ubi ſup. (30) Sueton in. vit Terent. (31) Plut. de præcep. ger. rep. (32) Ovid. triſt. iv. el. 6. Sil. Ital. l. i. (33) Ælian. de animal. l. xii. (34) Idem ibid. l. xvii.

The trade and navigation of the Carthaginians.

WITH regard to trade and navigation, (for we shall consider them jointly) no nation was ever more famous for these, nor enjoyed them in a larger extent, than they did. The Mediterranean, and all the ports in it, they were perfectly acquainted with. In the eastern parts they pushed their discoveries and commerce as far as any nation whatsoever, and to the westward, in all probability, farther. Britain and the Canaries were known to them; nay, according to some, America itself; but this seems to be a conjecture without sufficient foundation. The formidable fleets they fitted out on many occasions, the vast quantity of shipping they kept in continual employ, the honour they had for a long period of time of being almost universally acknowledged as masters of the sea, to omit many others, are most glaring proofs of the flourishing of their trade and navigation. Neither is this without the best authority to support it; for, to wave many other authors of unquestionable reputation that occur, it appears from Herodotus and Thucydides, that scarce any people made so great a figure by sea as the Carthaginians, which was the natural effect not only of their genius for naval affairs, but also of the flourishing and extensive commerce they following him like a dog (35); and, according to Paulus Jovius, the king of France gave such a one as this to the cardinal de Medicis. What has been said of the Indians, Paulus Venetus likewise relates of the Tartars (36).

[z] Arist. Liv. l. xxi. Polyb. l. i. Cæl. Calcagninus de re nautic. comment. c r. Xenoph. de re venator.

Silenus was an historian mentioned by Cicero, and, as is probable, by Nepos (37). The former of these assures us, that he wrote a history in Greek, with great care and accuracy, of Hannibal's expeditions; and that Cælius in some points followed him.

(35) Petr. Messias, l. ii. c. 3. (36) Paulus Venet. l. vii. c. 17. (37) Cic. de divinat. l. i. Voss de hist. Græc. l. iii. p. 413. Vide Bosium, & not. in Corn. Nep. de Hannib. p. 605. Lugd. Bat 1734.

they were in poſſeſſion of. The baſis of this felicity was owing to the Tyrians, from whom they brought the diſpoſition they were ſo eminent for into Africa. But in proceſs of time they eclipſed the glory of even their anceſtors themſelves; inſomuch, that Pliny derives the origin of trade, not from the Phœnicians, but the Pœni or Carthaginians. The natural fertility of its ſoil, the ſurpriſing ſkill of its artificers, together with its happy ſituation, rendered Carthage the center of traffic, the great mart, not only of the Mediterranean, but even of the moſt remote nations [a].

Their commodities.

THE commodities they ſupplied other countries with, in great abundance, ſeem to have been corn and fruits of all kinds; divers ſorts of proviſions, and high ſauces; wax, honey, oil, the ſkins of wild beaſts, &c. all the natural produce of their own territories. Their ſtaple manufactures were utenſils, toys, cables, all kinds of naval ſtores, and the colour from them called Punic, the preparation of which ſeems to have been peculiar to them. From Egypt they fetched fine flax, paper, &c. From the coaſts of the Red-Sea, ſpices, frankincenſe, perfumes, gold, pearls, and precious ſtones. From Tyre and Phœnice, purple, ſcarlet, rich ſtuffs, tapeſtry, coſtly furniture, &c. From the weſtern parts of the world, in return for the commodities carried thither, they brought back iron, tin, lead, copper, &c. In fine, they purchaſed the ſuperfluities of all nations at an eaſy price; and by knowing the neceſſities of them all, and the particular branch of trade adapted to each of them, they ſold theſe at their own rates; which brought immenſe treaſure daily to Carthage, rendered this republic terrible to all her neighbours, and even enabled her to contend ſo long with Rome for the empire of the world itſelf [b].

HAVING

[a] Feſt. Avien. ubi ſup. Poſid. & Ariſt. de mem. Claud. l. 3. Strab. Apollon. Philoſt. l. ii c. 14. l. 5. Pindar &c. Chriſt. Hendr. Carth. l ii. ſ. 1. c. 8. p. 262, 263, &c. Herodot. l. i. Thucydid. l. i. ſub. init. Plin. nat hiſt. l. vii. c. 56. Liv. Polyb. Diodor. Sic. Juſtin. Oroſ. aliiq; paſſ. [b] Chriſt. Hendr. ubi ſup. Plin. l. xxxi c. 8. Athen. deipnoſoph. l. ii. Jul. Pollux, l. vi. Iſidor. orig l xx. c. 3. A Schotti obſerv. l. iii c. 7 Hieron. Magius in miſcel. l. ii. c. 9 Hadr Jun. animadv. l. vi. c. 17. Turneb. adverſ. l. x. c. 12. Catellianus Cotta in memorab. Varro, l iv. c. 23 de LL. Tibul l. ii eleg. & ad eum Paſſeratius, l. iii. iv. Joh. Brodæus in miſcel l iv. c 24, & l. i. c. 8. Alex. Vanegas, l. ii c. 2. & Menaſſeh Ben Iſrael en eſper. de Iſr. p. 18, 19, &c. En Amſterdam en la Impreſſion de Semeul Ben Iſrael Sociro, A. M. 5410.

HAVING thus given our readers a general idea of the extenſive trade this mighty republic was miſtreſs of, which was the great ſource of all her wealth and power; we muſt now beg leave to remark in particular, that no branch of their commerce ſeems to have been more beneficial to the Carthaginians, than that they carried on with the Perſians, Garamantes, and Ethiopians. Theſe remote nations, beſides other rich commodities, brought with them carbuncles, of almoſt inеſtimable value, to Carthage; to which place they yearly reſort d, as is moſt likely, in caravans. Theſe gems, from the plenty of them at Carthage, were called by the antients Charchedonian or Carthaginian, as Pliny relates. From Polybius it appears probable, that the Carthaginian merchants, at the ſale of their wares, had a crier and ſecretary, or clerk, to attend them. No profeſſion was reckoned more honourable than that of the merchant in the dominions of this ſtate; which is not to be wondered at, conſidering the vaſt advantage accruing from thence to all orders and degrees of men therein. After this, it will be needleſs to obſerve, that the moſt conſiderable perſonages of the city were not aſhamed to apply themſelves to it [c].

The moſt valuable branch of their commerce was that carried on with the Garamantes, Perſians, and Ethiopians.

WE ſhall cloſe this ſection with taking notice of a remarkable cuſtom obſerved by the Carthaginians, and the Libyans bordering on the ſea-coaſts, in their trafficking with each other, as Herodotus himſelf has related it [d].

" THE Carthaginians, ſays this hiſtorian, ſailing beyond " the ſtreights, or pillars of Hercules, traded with the Libyans " of thoſe parts in the following manner: After they had " got into ſome creek, they landed their goods; and leaving " them expoſed on ſome point of land, returned again on " board their ſhips. They then cauſed a great ſmoak to be " raiſed, at the ſight of which the Libyans immediately " came to the place where the wares had been left; and " laying down a certain quantity of gold, retired at a good " diſtance from them. Upon this the Carthaginians went " on ſhore a ſecond time; and if upon viewing the gold it " appeared to them ſufficient, they carried it off, and ſailed " without delay; if not, they left it, and continued quiet " on board for ſome time. The Libyans finding this, " made an addition to what they had before depoſited; and " if this proved inſufficient, they continued improving the " original [c] Plin. nat. hiſt l. xxxviii c 7. & Dalecamp. in loc.. Petron. in fragmic. Polyb. l. iii. [d] Herodot. l. iv.

" original quantity of gold till the Carthaginians were ſatiſ " fied, and the bargain made. Neither of theſe nations of " fered the leaſt injuſtice to the other. The Carthaginian
" did not ſo much as touch the Libyan gold till it was o
" equal value with their wares, nor the Libyans the Cartha" ginian merchandize, till the gold they offered as an equi" valent was accepted and taken away."

SECT. III.

The chronology of the Carthaginians.

Carthaginian chronology the ſame with the Phœnician.

THE Carthaginian chronology was at firſt the Phœnician, already by us conſidered, and, in all probability, ever afterwards, as to its form and manner, agreed with it. That the Carthaginians kept records in the ſame manner as their anceſtors the Tyrians did, cannot well be doubted; eſpecially, if we conſider, how cloſely they adhered to the cuſtoms and maxims of thoſe anceſtors. Sir Iſaac Newton ſeems to imagine, that the artificial chronology of Eratoſthenes did not abſolutely prevail amongſt the Romans even in the Auguſtan age, but thinks that Virgil might have taken ſome of his hiſtorical facts from the records of Carthage; which evidently ſuppoſes, that theſe records might have exiſted. Servius ſeems to inſinuate, that they, or at leaſt ſome part of them, were in being when he wrote; for he tells us, that, according to the Carthaginians themſelves, Dido came from a town called Charta. But, however this may be, 'tis certain, from Solinus and others, that annals, and an epoch, at the deſtruction of their city, the Carthaginians muſt have had; otherwiſe the Romans could never have known how many years had elapſed from the foundation to the deſtruction of that metropolis, as we find they did. But this is ſo apparent, that we ſhall inſiſt no further upon it [e].

THE method of computing time from the building of cities was in uſe throughout a good part of the eaſt in very early ages, though it was of a later date at Rome, particularly among the Lydians, Syrians, and Phœnicians, as it was likewiſe amongſt their deſcendents the old Etruſcans and Carthaginians. This is evident beyond contradiction from Diodorus Siculus, Cenſorinus, Scaliger, and a famous inſcription, whoſe epoch is the foundation of Interamna in Umbria, [e] Newton's chronol. p. 65, 66, &c. Serv. in Æn. i. & Æn. iv. Solin. c. 29.

Umbria, which Gruter and Juſtus Fontaninus, in his antiquities of Horta, have given us [f].

THE antient year of the Phœnicians, as well as that of the other eaſtern nations, was moſt certainly luni-ſolar, i. e. it conſiſted of twelve lunar months, containing thirty days each, with intercalary months to make up what the twelve lunar months wanted of the ſolar year. At length the Egyptians of Thebes, according to Diodorus and Strabo, introduced the ſolar year, i. e. they added five days annually to the twelve lunar months, in order to make them agree with the courſe of the ſun. Now as the computation by the ſolar years did not take place even in Egypt till the time of Amenophis, (tho' the difference betwixt the ſolar and calendar years was diſcovered in the reign of Ammon the father of Seſac) i. e. about an hundred and thirty-ſeven years before the æra of Nabonaſſar; nor amongſt the Chaldæans or Babylonians till the commencement of that æra; and as Dido's departure from Tyre was at leaſt coeval with, if it did not precede, the former of theſe events, the luni-ſolar year was, without diſpute, obſerved then by the Phœnicians, and conſequently afterwards by the Carthaginians [g]. Their year luniſolar.

IN confirmation of which we muſt not omit remarking, that Simplicius, in his commentary on the firſt of Ariſtotle's phyſical acroaſis, affirms the Damaſcenes and Arabians, who were either neighbours to the poſterity of the old Phœnicians, or intermixed with them, to have had the luni-ſolar year in uſe amongſt them ſo late as his time; from whence it is not a little probable, that this was always the Phœnician and Carthaginian year [h]. As was that of the Arabians and Damaſcens.

WE have nothing very material to offer farther on this head, the Carthaginian annals having for a long ſeries of ages been deſtroyed. As therefore we cannot pretend to give any tolerable particular account, much leſs a methodical ſyſtem, of the Carthaginian chronology, all that can be done, in order to ſatisfy our readers, is, to exhibit to their view a chronological table of ſome few of the principal tranſactions in which that famous republic was concerned, including a liſt of ſeveral of its great men, in order of time, as they lived.

[f] Diod. Sic. l. v. c. 1. Cenſorin. de die natal. c. 17. Scalig. de emend. temp. l. v. p. 385. Gruter cxiii. 2. Juſt. Fontanin. de antiquit. Hort. l. i. c. 7. p. 135, 136. ed Rom. 1723.

[g] Cenſorin. de die natal. c. 19, & 20. Cic. in Ver. Geminus, c. 6. Gen. i. 14. viii. 22. Newton's chronol. p. 71—82. Diodor. Sic. l. i. Strab. l. xvii. Plut. de Iſid. & Oſir. Hecataeus apud Diod. l. i.

[h] Simplic. apud Theodor. Gazam de menſibus.

The Monarchy of CARTHAGE.

	Year of CARTHAGE.	Year before CHRIST.
DIDO, the daughter of Mettinus, king of Tyre, founded Carthage. How long ſhe reigned there, hiſtory informs us not.		890 or 892

The Republic of CARTHAGE.

AFTER Dido's death, there is a chaſm in the hiſtory of Carthage for above three hundred years. Only from Juſtin we learn, that this ſtate was much agitated by inteſtine commotions during part of that period.
The Carthaginians plant a colony in the iſland Ebuſus or Ereſus, on the coaſt of Spain, according to Diodorus.	160	730
The Tyrrhenian and Carthaginian united fleets are, according to Herodotus, after a bloody engagement, put to flight by the Phocæans, in the ſea of Sardinia.	347	543
Which action is likewiſe mentioned by Thucydides, who relates that the city of Maſſilia, at preſent Marſeilles, built by the ſaid Phocæans, was then in its infancy (A).	347 Machæus, a famous general, gains ſome conſiderable advantages over the Africans, with whom the Carthaginians are now engaged in a war. This happened,

(A) That this moſt antient naval engagement happened not far from the year, in which our moſt learned archbiſhop Uſher has placed it, is, in ſome meaſure, evident from a circumſtance taken notice of by Thucydides in his firſt book, where he mentions it. That author informs us, that this event happened not long after the foundation of Maſſilia, or Marſeilles, which was built by the Phocæans. Now 'tis aſſerted by Timæus Siculus, that Maſſilia was founded by the Phocæans an hundred and twenty years before the battle of Salamis, which falls in with the firſt year of the forty-fifth olympiad, and conſequently the foundation of Maſſilia preceded the action under conſideration fifty-ſeven years. It might then therefore very juſtly be ſaid, as Thucydides relates, to have been in its infancy. That Maſſilia

was

	Year of Carthage.	Year before Chriſt.
happened, as appears probable from comparing Juſtin with Oroſius, towards the concluſion of Cyrus's reign, or that of his uncle Cyaxares II. and therefore we may place it about the year.	353	537
He reduces part of Sicily to the obedience of the Carthaginians.	354	536
A plague makes great havock at Carthage about this time, when the Carthaginians endeavour to appeaſe the gods by ſacrificing children.	355	535
After a long and ſucceſsful war in Sicily, the Carthaginian army, under the command of Machæus, thinks proper to retire from that iſland.	360	530
The ſame army afterwards invading Sardinia, is entirely defeated by the Sardi, and the greateſt part of it cut off.	360	530
The remaining part, upon their return home, are baniſhed by their countrymen, together with Machæus the general. Incenſed at this barbarous treatment, they attack Carthage, carry the city, and, after putting ten ſenators to death, ſettle the republic upon its former footing.	360	530
Machæus crucifies his ſon about the ſame time.	360	530
Some time after this the ſame general, being accuſed of a deſign to make himſelf abſolute, is puniſhed with death,	360	530 was built by the Phocæans about the time mentioned by Timæus is confirmed by Ariſtotle, Harpocration, Scymnus Chius, Julian, Athenæus, and other authors. Both Thucydides and Herodotus likewiſe ſeem to relate ſome events after this, as happening in the time of Cambyſes; which may be looked upon as an additional argument in defence of our learned primate's notion, which he has taken from Euſebius (1).

(1) Uſh. ad an. per Jul. 4171. Herodot. l. i. Timæus Sic. apud Marcian. in perieg. Solin. Euſeb. in chron. ad olymp. 45, 1. 59. 2. &c. Ariſtot. apud Harpocration in voc. Μασσαλία, Athen. deipnoſoph l. xiii. Juſt. l. xliii. Strab. l. iv. Scymnus Chius, Ammian. Marcellin. 15, 23. Gell. noct. At. 10, 16, &c.

	Year of Carthage.	Year before Christ.
death, and succeeded by Mago in the command of the army.	367	523
An alliance formed between the Carthaginians and the Romans the year after the regifuge, in the conſulſhip of Brutus and Valerius.	382	508
Mago, after the introduction of military diſcipline amongſt the Carthaginians, dies, leaving their forces in an excellent condition. If Juſtin is to be credited, this ſeems to have happened ſome years before Darius Hyſtaſpis died; and therefore we may look upon it to fall in juſtly enough with the year.	401	489
Soon after Mago's death, his two ſons Aſdrubal and Hamilcar attempt the conqueſt of Sardinia, as likewiſe to free their country from the annual tribute impoſed upon them by the Africans.	401	489
Darius ſends embaſſadors to Carthage to demand a body of auxiliaries againſt their common enemy the Grecks, for a war with whom he was then making very great preparations.	402	488
At firſt Aſdrubal and Hamilcar ſeem to have had great ſucceſs in Sardinia, by the number of triumphs Juſtin aſſigns Aſdrubal; but, towards the concluſion of this war, Aſdrubal is mortally wounded, and the entire command of the army thereby devolves upon his brother Hamilcar.	404	486
A treaty of peace is concluded between the Africans and Carthaginians about this period, by which the annual tribute of the latter is continued.	405	485
The Sicilians implore the aſſiſtance of Leonidas, to enable them to ſhake off the Carthaginian yoke.	405	485
Not long after this Hamilcar is killed in Sicily, leaving behind him three ſons, Hamilco or Himilco, Hanno, and Giſco.	410	480
After the death of Hamilcar, and the to-

	Year of Carthage.	Year before Christ.
tal defeat of the Carthaginian army by Gelon, a peace is made, and Gisco, the son of Hamilcar, banished.	410	480
The Carthaginians engage at once in a war with the Moors, Numidians, and other Africans; the result of which is, that they are excused the annual tribute before exacted of them.	430	460
Some time after this period the two brothers Philæni sacrificed themselves for the honour, as they apprehended, of their country.
The centumvirate instituted, somewhere in this interval, to reduce the exorbitant power of Mago's family within proper bounds, and be a curb upon their generals, according to Justin.
Hannibal, the son of Gisco, makes an expedition into Sicily, and takes and razes Selinus and Himera.	482	408
The same general, in conjunction with Imilcar, makes another campaign in Sicily; but dies of the plague in his camp before Agrigentum, of which distemper a great part of his army likewise perishes.	486	404
Imilcar, Hannibal's colleague, takes Agrigentum.	486	404
He likewise reduces Gela.	486	404
He puts an end to this war by a treaty concluded with Dionysius.	486
Dionysius takes Motya from the Carthaginians.	494
Himilco retakes Motya by storm, reduces Messana, and razes it. Mago, the Carthaginian admiral, likewise defeats the Sicilian fleet under Leptines. Himilco advances with his army, drawn up in order of battle, to the very walls of Syracuse, and plunders the temples of Ceres and Proserpina in the suburb of Acradina; but the plague carrying off a great part of his troops, he is obliged to withdraw.	493	395

	Year of Carthage.	Year before Christ.
The Africans, to the number of two hundred thouſand, ſeize upon Tunis, and threaten Carthage itſelf. But famine and diviſions oblige them at laſt to diſperſe. Himilco, not being able to ſurvive his misfortunes, puts an end to them by a voluntary death.	495	395
Mago, the Carthaginian general, is routed by Dionyſius at Abacænum.	498	492
A ſecond peace concluded between Dionyſius and the Carthaginians.	499	391
Dionyſius routs the Carthaginians at Cabala in Sicily, but is beaten by them at Cronion, upon which a peace enſues.	508	382
A plague breaks out in Carthage, which ſweeps away an infinite number of people. The Africans and Sardi riſe up in arms, and endeavour to render themſelves independent of the Carthaginian ſtate. A particular ſpecies of madneſs ſeizes many of the inhabitants of Carthage, and produces diſmal effects there.	512	378
Dionyſius advances, with an army of thirty thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe into the Carthaginian territories. With this force he ſoon takes Selinus and Entella, and plunders all the adjacent country. The Carthaginians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred ſail, and carry off moſt of the beſt Syracuſan galleys laid up in that harbour.	522	368
Dionyſius II. ſucceeding his father, comes to an accommodation with the Carthaginians.	523	367
Paralus, the Carthaginian governor of Minoa, permits Dion to land five thouſand arms there, and ſupplies him with carriages to convey them to Syracuſe; by which means that prince is enabled to proceed in his expedition againſt Dionyſius II.	354	356

	Year of Carthage.	Year before Christ.
Timoleon brings ſuccours from Corinth to the Syracuſans, and lands his forces in Sicily by a ſtratagem.	546	344
He defeats Icetas at Adranum, and poſſeſſes himſelf of Syracuſe and Meſſana, according to Diodorus.	546	343
A ſecond treaty concluded between the Carthaginians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.	547	343
Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimeſus.	551	339
And concludes a peace with that nation.	552	338
About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a deſign at Carthage to aſſume the ſovereignty to himſelf, by deſtroying the whole body of the ſenate. He receives but a ſlight puniſhment for the firſt attempt; but upon his having recourſe afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to ſupport himſelf in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmoſt rigor and ſeverity.	553	337
Alexander forms the ſiege of Tyre, upon which the Tyrians ſend their wives and children to Carthage, where they are kindly received.	554	336
The Carthaginians ſend Hamilcar, ſurnamed Rhodanus, as their miniſter to Alexander at his camp before Tyre; and put him to death on his return home.	559	331
The Cyreneans apply to the Carthaginians for ſuccours againſt a body of Greek mercenaries, that invaded them, but in vain.	559	331
The Carthaginians ſend ſome troops to the aſſiſtance of Soſiſtratus, and the Syracuſan exiles, againſt Agathocles.	568	322
They oblige Agathocles to reſtore the caſtle of Mylæ to the Meſſanians.	574	316
	576	314

	Year of Carthage.	Year before Christ.
Hamilcar routs Agathocles at Himera, according to Diodorus Siculus.	580	310
Agathocles invades Africa, and gives a memorable defeat there to Hanno and Bomilcar, the Carthaginian generals, according to Diodorus.	581	309
Hamilcar is taken by the Syracusans, and has his head struck off, which is sent to Agathocles in Africa.	582	308
Agathocles prevails upon Ophellas, prince of the Cyrenæans, to march to his assistance, and then cuts him off by treachery.	583	307
Bomilcar crucified for forming a design to make himself tyrant of Carthage.	583	307
Agathocles receives a great defeat from the Carthaginians, and is forced to abandon Africa, which produces a peace between the two powers.	584	306
The articles of the peace signed.	585	305
A third treaty concluded between the Romans and the Carthaginians about the time of Pyrrhus's arrival in Italy.	610	280
The Carthaginians offer the Romans assistance in their war with Pyrrhus, and for that purpose send a fleet of an hundred and twenty sail under the command of Mago; tho' the Romans decline accepting it.	610	280
The Carthaginians besiege Syracuse, with an army of fifty thousand men and a fleet of an hundred sail.	612	278
Pyrrhus makes a descent in Sicily, reduces all the Carthaginian towns in that island, except Lilybæum, almost as soon as he appears before them; and loses them again with the same rapidity to the Carthaginians.	613 614	277 276
Hannibal, the Carthaginian general, sends a detachment to reinforce the Mamertine garrison of Messana, and thereby prevents Hiero from possessing himself of that place, which occasions the first Punic war.	625	265

	Year of Carthage.	Year before Christ.
The firſt Punic war begins.	626	264
The Romans, after a ſiege of ſeven months, take Agrigentum, and gain a victory over the Carthaginian forces, under Hanno, ſent to its relief.	628	262
The conſul C. Duilius gains a complete victory over the Carthaginians by ſea, their admiral Hannibal eſcaping with much difficulty. The other conſul Cn. Cornelius Scipio, being ſurpriſed, ſurrenders himſelf to the enemy under Boodes.	630	260
A drawn naval engagement between the Carthaginians and the Romans.	633	257
The Carthaginians receive a great blow by ſea from the Romans; above thirty of their ſhips being ſunk, and ſixty-three taken. Hanno, who had behaved ſo ill at Agrigentum, and Hamilcar are their admirals at the time of this diſaſter. Regulus alſo lands this year in Africa, reduces Adis, a ſtrong fortreſs, and many other places. He gives the Carthaginian army, command by Hanno, Boſtar, and Hamilcar, a moſt memorable defeat.	634	256
The Roman army under Regulus overthrown by Xantippus the Lacedæmonian, who, at the deſire of the Carthaginian ſenate, takes upon him the command of their forces. Regulus himſelf is taken priſoner in this action.	635	255
The Carthaginians become once more maſters of the ſea.	638	252
Lilybæum, a Punic town in Sicily, beſieged by the Romans.	640	250
The great Hannibal born.	642	248
Hamilcar behaves himſelf with great bravery for three years together in Sicily.	645	245
The Carthaginians under Hanno are routed by the Romans near the iſland Æguſa or Ægates.	648	242

Hamilcar,

	Year of Carthage.	Year before Christ.
Hamilcar, having received full powers from the Carthaginian ſenate for that purpoſe, concludes a peace with the Romans. This puts a period to the firſt Punic war, after it had laſted four-and-twenty years.	649	241
After various turns of fortune, the African or Libyan war is brought to a happy concluſion by Hamilcar, though the Carthaginians were reduced to the laſt extremity through the incapacity of Hanno, and Hannibal, by his indolence, had given a great advantage to the enemy.	652	238
Hamilcar, being ſent by the Carthaginians as their general into Spain, partly by perſuaſion, ſubdues nine different nations; but expoſing himſelf too much in a battle with ſome of the moſt warlike Spaniards as yet unconquered, he is ſlain, and ſucceeded in his poſt by Aſdrubal.	661	229
Aſdrubal dies, and is ſucceeded by Hannibal. That general takes Althæa, the capital of the Olcades; conquers that nation, the Vaccæi, Carpetani, &c. The Saguntines apprize the Romans of theſe proceedings.	670	220
The Romans, by their embaſſadors, demand Hannibal for taking of Saguntum. That general, having ſettled matters in Spain, makes preparations for a war with the Romans.	671	219
This year the ſecond Punic war commences, according to Polybius. Hannibal paſſes the Alps, and defeats Scipio near the Ticinus, now called the Teſino, after taking Turin, and routing the Gauls, who diſputed the paſſage of the Rhone.	672	218
The ſame general overthrows Sempronius on the bank of the Trebia.	672	218
Hanno is defeated in Spain by Scipio, who

	Year of Carthage.	Year before Chriſt.
who extends his conqueſts as far as the Iberus.	672	218
C. Flaminius is overthrown by Hannibal at the lake of Thraſymene, now the Lago di Perugia, with the ſlaughter of fifteen thouſand men. He likewiſe gives a terrible repulſe to Minucius; but is checked in his progreſs by Fabius. Cn. Scipio defeats Hanno at the town of Ciſſa in Spain.	673	217
The Roman army commanded by Terentius Varro and Æmilius Paulus, is totally defeated at Cannæ upon the Aufidus in Apulia. This was the greateſt blow the Romans ever received. The Carthaginians in Spain under Aſdrubal, are overcome by the Romans.	674	216
Philip king of Macedon, by his miniſter Xenophanes, concludes a treaty with Hannibal.	675	215
Hannibal takes Tarentum.	678	212
Capua beſieged by the Romans. The two Scipios, with their armies, deſtroyed in Spain by the Carthaginians and their allies.	678	212
Hannibal, in order to raiſe the ſiege of Capua, bends his march towards Rome, and advances within five miles of that capital.	679	211
Tarentum retaken by Fabius.	681	209
Hannibal by a ſtratagem circumventing M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintius Criſpinus, cuts off Marcellus, and other Romans of diſtinction.	682	208
Edeco, Indibilis, Mandonius, &c. petty kings or reguli of Spain, join Scipio. By the acceſſion of their forces he is enabled to vanquiſh Aſdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, at Bætula, and to drive him out of Spain.	682	208
Aſdrubal, coming with a powerful army into Italy to join Hannibal, is overthrown, and his army ruined.	683	207
Scipio in Spain vanquiſhes Aſdrubal the ſon of Giſco, Mago, and Indibilis;		draws

	Year of Carthage.	Year before Christ.
draws off Maſiniſſa from the Carthaginian intereſt; reduces all Spain; and is then recalled to Rome.	684	206
Scipio lands in Africa; beſieges Utica; burns the camps of Syphax and Aſdrubal; overthrows the Carthaginian, Numidian, and Celtiberian forces; and takes Tunis. Hannibal is obliged to quit Italy, and return to Africa.	687	203
An interview between Scipio and Hannibal. The latter of theſe is entirely defeated at the battle of Zama; which produces a peace, and terminates the ſecond Punic war.	688	202
Hannibal, being obliged to leave his native country, lands at Tyre, and afterwards ſeeks an aſylum at the court of Antiochus.	689	201
Hannibal dies, according to Livy and Cornelius Nepos.	695	195
Maſiniſſa, depending on his friendſhip with Rome, makes an irruption into the province of Tyſca, and invades the Carthaginian territories.	708	182
An embaſſy is ſent from Rome, at the head of which is Cato, to diſpoſe both parties to an accommodation, and determine all differences between them on the ſpot. But the Carthaginians reject the mediation of the Romans, tho' they had before admitted it; which occaſions the third Punic war.	731	159
A bloody war breaks out between Carthage and Maſiniſſa.	732	158
The Carthaginians, after the Romans had moſt perfidiouſly and inhumanly deprived them of all means of defence, are commanded to abandon their city; which they not complying with, it is totally deſtroyed by Æmilianus, and levelled with the ground.	740	150
	774	146
	746	146

Or, according to Sir Iſaac Newton and Salmaſius, in conjunction with Solinus.

Menander Epheſius, Solinus, Salmaſius, Petavius, and Sir Iſaac Newton, agree very well in ſettling the æra of Carthage.

APPIAN tells us in round numbers, that Carthage ſtood ſeven hundred years; but Solinus, with great accuracy, determines its duration to have been ſeven hundred and thirty-ſeven years, i. e. either ſo many complete years preciſely, or ſo many complete years, with part of another elapſed, which was not reckoned in the computation. Now, if, with Sir Iſaac Newton and Salmaſius, we ſuppoſe this term to have commenced at the encœnia or dedication of the city, which they have proved, fell upon the ſixteenth year of Pygmalion's reign at Tyre, the beginning of the foundation of Carthage muſt be placed nine years higher, ſince Dido came to Africa in the ſeventh year of that prince's reign; and conſequently this happened ſeven hundred and forty-ſix years before the final deſtruction of that city by Æmilianus. Since therefore Joſephus, from Menander of Epheſus, or, according to Tatian, Menander of Pergamus, as he is corrected by Petavius, intimates, that Carthage preceded Rome an hundred and forty years, which almoſt exactly correſponds with Sir Iſaac Newton and Salmaſius; and ſince the æra of Petavius, which we have followed, does not differ from that of Solinus as ſtated by the two great men above-mentioned, above two years, a trifle in a point of ſo remote antiquity, we may look upon theſe æras as the ſame. This is a ſtrong preſumption, that both of them approach very near the truth; and therefore we may venture to aſſure our readers, that they cannot greatly err, chuſe which of them they pleaſe [i].

End of this chronological ſynopſis.

THE chronological ſynopſis here inſerted, gives our readers the whole plan of the affairs of Carthage at one view, and, by enabling them to form a general idea of all the principal events that happened to this republic at once, prepares them for the peruſal of the following hiſtory with double advantage (B).

IT

[i] Appian. in Libyc. Solin. c. 30. Salmaſ. in Solin. ibid. Newton's chronol. p. 65, 66, &c. Joſeph. antiq. l. viii c. 2. 5. l. ix. c 14. & cont Apion. l. i. Dion Petav. de doct. temp. l. ix. c. 69. Solin. c. 27. Tatian. adv. Græc.

(B) We doubt not but the whole learned world will entirely concur with us in our notion of the incomparable archbiſhop Uſher; and, to ſhew our regard to the memory of ſo profound a chronologer, we ſhall endeavour to clear up a point, which he has left a little confuſed. That moſt learned prelate fixes the foundation of Rome, with Fabius Pictor, towards the cloſe of the ſeventh, or beginning of the eighth olympiad; and yet he will have the year of Rome ſix hundred and ſeven (in which Carthage was finally deſtroyed) to have preceded the chriſtian æra an hundred and forty-ſix years. This ſeems to render him a little inconſiſtent with himſelf; for an hundred forty-ſix years, added to ſix hundred and ſeven, makes ſeven hundred and fifty-three Authorities upon which it is founded.

It may not be improper to inform readers, that the our firſt part of this ſynopſis depends chiefly upon the authority of Juſtin and Oroſius, compared with Diodorus Siculus, as the latter does upon that of Diodorus Siculus and Polybius, in conjunction with archbiſhop Uſher. The times of the firſt tranſactions of this ſtate it is impoſſible to determine to any tolerable degree of exactneſs, yet, we hope, our determination of them is not very remote from the truth. In aſcertaining the years of thoſe of a later date, we have paid no regard to the ſentiments of thoſe writers who differ from Diodorus Siculus and Polybius, as being in point of authority vaſtly inferior to them [k].

[k] Juſtin. Oroſ. Diodor. Sic. & Polyb. paſſim. Uſſ. annal. vet. teſt. paſſ. Vide etiam Glareani chronol. in Liv. per Badium Aſcenſium, Pariſ. ex officin Mich. Vaſcoſani, 1543.

three years, which, he appears to intimate, was the age of Rome at the birth of Chriſt. But this ſeeming inconſiſtency will vaniſh, when we conſider, that he all along follows Fabius Pictor, who places the foundation of Rome five years lower than Varro, whom Pliny, Solinus, and moſt of the Roman authors, follow. This obſervation will obviate all difficulties that might otherwiſe occur in ſome material points, from comparing archbiſhop Uſher with the generality of the Roman chronologers, and thereby prevent confuſion. The year of Rome, in which the deſtruction of Carthage happened, according to Fabius Pictor, muſt have been the ſix hundred and ſecond, to which add an hundred and forty-ſix, and it correſponds, as well as the other, with the chriſtian æra. This is a demonſtration of the truth of archbiſhop Uſher's computation in this particular; and nothing further can be added to it. We think it proper to inform our readers here, that, from the commencement of the olympiads, our numbers perfectly agree with them, and conſequently are not repugnant either to the Varronian or Fabian accounts, tho' with archbiſhop Uſher, we are of opinion, that the latter points out of the true epoch of Rome. It muſt not be forgot, that we were miſtaken in the Roman hiſtory, vol. xi. p. 290, & 291. when we made archbiſhop Uſher to prefer Varro's opinion to that of Fabius; and yet at the ſame time obſerved, that the archbiſhop places the birth of Chriſt ſeven hundred and forty-eight years diſtant from the foundation of Rome, in direct agreement with Fabius. What led us to that miſtake, was a paſſage in him, wherein he ſeems to follow Varro; but, upon a ſecond peruſal of that paſſage, we are fully convinced, that he there only gives us what, he conceived, was Pliny's opinion.

(2) Jac. Uſſ. annal. par poſt. ad ann. Jul, period. 4568 p. 87. & annal. vet. teſt. ad ann. Jul. period. 3960. p. 87. edit. Lond, 1650, & 1654.

End of the Sixteenth Volume.

AN INDEX

TO THE

SIXTEENTH VOLUME.

The Figures direct to the Page, and Letter n to the Notes.

A

ABaddir and Abaddires at Carthage, whence worſhipped, 634.

Abdelmelek the Saracen makes peace with Juſtinian II. 350, & ſeq.

Ablavivus, a king of the Thervingi, heads them towards Thrace, 14. Outwits and ſurpriſes the Romans, 15.

——— put to death for treaſon, 316.

Abraham Halim defeated by the Romans, 451.

Abundantius the raiſer of Eutropius, 125. Ungratefully requited by him, 127. Baniſhed, ibid.

Abydus taken by the Turks, 532.

Aca, Aco, a famed port in Phœnice, 561 & n.

Acacius ſent againſt the Perſians, 321. Abandoned by the army, ibid.

Achaia betrayed to, and ravaged by Alaric, 122.

Achella, where ſituate, 582.

Acra, Hippo, whence ſo called, 578.

Adda, Addis, its ſituation, 575 n.

Adrian baniſhed for not relieving Syracuſe, 401.

Adrianople blocked up by the Goths, 18. The battle of, 20. Betrayed to the Bulgarians, 411. Beſieged by the Scythians, 476. Preſerved by a ſtratagem, ibid. Taken by the Turks, 539. Made the metropolis of their empire, ibid.

Adrumentum deſcribed, 580. Whence ſo called, ibid.

Advaſmanes defeated by the Romans, 324.

Ægidius, the Gaul, marches againſt Ricimer, 271. Succeſs againſt the Viſigoths, 272. Murdered, ibid.

Ægimurus, iſland, deſcribed, 587 n.

Ægypt, all the temples of, demoliſhed, 87, 89.

Ægyptians converted under Theodoſius, 88. Subdued by Haumar, 343.

Ætius governor of Conſtantinople's life attempted by Coryachus, 201. His riſe and character, 213. Sides with the uſurper John, 214. Submits to Placidia, 216. Succeſs againſt the Vandals, 217.

Æonia, the mother of Auſonius, her extract, 56 n.

Æſculapius, his temple at Carthage, 566. Burnt, 631.

Æthuſa, iſland, where ſituate, 587 n.

Ætius's treachery to Boniface, 217, 218. Succeſs againſt the Franks, 219. Treachery to Felix, ibid. To Placidia diſcovered, 220. Defeated by the Vandals, 221. Forgiven and raiſed by Placidia, ibid. Succeſs againſt the Burgundi, 222. Rejects the complaints of the Britains, 234. Raiſes numerous forces againſt Attila, 246.

Repulſes him at the battle of Chalons, 248. Alarmed at entering Italy, 250. Undermined by Heraclius, 254. Murdered by Valentinian, ibid.

——— Irene's favourite, prevents her marriage with Charles of France, 375. Sent againſt the Saracens, 394. Defeated, ibid.

Ætolia ſeized by Michael Angelus, 508.

Africa revolts to Arcadius, 122. Returns to Honorius, 135. Kept locked up by Heraclian, 178, 181. Over-run by the barbarians, 221. Poſſeſſed by the Vandals, 285. Subdued by the Saracens, 345. Ravaged by them, 349.

——— Propria deſcribed, 571.

Agar, where ſited, 582.

Agelmond choſen king by the Jepidæ, 36.

Ajonus heads the Lombards into Germany, 36.

Air worſhipped by the Carthaginians, 632.

Alabicus put to death for treaſon, 186.

Alacaſeus's noble ſtratagem, 476.

Aladin's family and empire, 507.

Alamundunus's impotent threats againſt the Romans, 204. Commands the Saracens againſt them, 307. Repulſed in Syria, ibid.

Alans, where ſituate, 11. Ally with the Huns, ibid. Enter Gaul, 179. Settle in Spain, 180. Defeated by Wallia, 200. Submit to Gonderic, ibid. Settle upon the Loire, 227. Defeated in Italy, 272.

Alaric a Frank general under Theodoſius, 101. Makes dreadful havock in Syria, 122. Narrowly eſcapes, 126. Promoted by Arcadius, 150. Invades the Roman territories, ibid. His extract and character, ibid. Firſt retirement, 152. Second invaſion, 153. Ravages Italy, ibid. Defeated, 155. Makes peace, and breaks it, 156. Exorbitant demands on Honorius, 166. Strengthened by the barbarians, 171. Blocks up Rome, ibid. Raiſes the ſiege on exorbitant terms, 172. Retires into Hetruria, ibid. Second ſiege of Rome, 174. Sends more moderate terms to the emperor, 176. And to the city of Rome, 177. Proclaims Attalus through Italy, 179. Depoſes him, and confirms Honorius, 182. Breaks off with him, ibid. & ſeq. Reſtores and depoſes Attalus, 183. Takes the city of Rome, ibid. His death, 185. Buried in the bottom of a river, ibid.

Alcan's bravery at the ſiege of Mantzirchierta, 453.

Alexander, the brother of Leo, made regent of the empire, 408. His cruelty and debauchery, 409. Affront to the king of Bulgaria, ibid. Death, ibid.

Alexius patriarch's baſe complaiſance to Zoe, 443.

——— Comnenus. Vide ſub Comnenus, 465.

——— II. governed by his wicked mother, 491. By Andronicus, 492. Strangled by him, 494.

——— Angelus revolts againſt his brother Iſaac, 499. Cruelty to him, ibid. Defeat and flight, 501.

——— preſident under Alexius II. defeated, 492. His wretched character, ibid.

——— the ſon of Iſaac, ſtirs up the weſtern princes in his favour, 500. His ſucceſs againſt Angelus, ibid. & ſeq. Crowned with his father, 502. Murdered, 503.

——— ſtirs up the Turks againſt Laſcaris, 507. Defeated by him, 508. Impriſonment and death, ibid.

——— Strategopolus ſent againſt Angelus, 515. Seizes on Conſtantinople, ibid.

Alſace taken by the Burgundi, 192.

Alypius vicar of Britain, baniſhed by Valens, 2, 3.

Amantius conſpires againſt Juſtin, 303. Executed, ibid.

Ambroſe St. in high eſteem with Gratian, 35. Noble ſpeech to the uſurper Maximus, 54. To Theodoſius, 83. Baptizes Valentinian, 93. Panegyric upon that prince, 95. Letter to Eugenius, 96. Reproof of Theodoſius's cruelty to the Theſſalonicans, 108. Letters to queen Fritigil, 131. Death, 133.

Ambuſtus's conſpiracy, 455. Bravery, 456.

Amida taken by the Perſians, 298. Reſtored to the Romans, 299.

Amidan's brave defence againſt the Perſians, 297. Put to the ſword, 298.

Ammianus Marcellinus, a chaſm in his hiſtory, 10. Writings and character, 24 n.

Amorium taken by the Saracens, 346. Retaken from them, 347. Why engraven upon their ſhields, 394. Betrayed and razed, ibid.

Amurat's ſucceſs in Europe, 539. Severity to his ſon, 540.

——— II. repulſed before Conſtantinople, 543. Frequently defeated by John Hunniades, 544. Signal victory over him, 545. Haughty demands on the emperor, ibid. & ſeq. Death, 546.

Anac Anax the father of the Anakims, 588 & n. Whence ſo called, ibid.

Anaſtes

Anactes or Dioscuri at Carthage, who, 637 & 638 n.

Anastasia, daughter of Valens, 24.

——— wife of Tiberius created Augusta, 323. Affronted by her son's ministers, 351.

Anastasius crowned emperor, 292. His rise and extract, ibid. & seq. Excellent beginning, 293. Insulted on account of his new tax, 295. Acknowledges Theodoric in Italy, ibid. Escapes being massacred, 296. Invaded by the Persians, 297. Makes a truce with them, 299. His long wall described, ibid. Compliments to Clovis, 300. Persecutes the orthodox, ibid. & seq. Treachery to Vitalianus, 301. Death and character, 302.

——— patriarch of Antioch, massacred by the Jews, 333.

——— Phocas's minister, conspires against him, 334. Put to death, ibid.

——— the son of Thomas, put to death, 386.

——— Artemius proclaimed emperor, 356. His excellent character, ibid. Fortifies himself against the Saracens, 357. Banished by Theodosius, ibid. Resumes his claim, 359. Put to death, 360.

Andragathius, the supposed murderer of Gratian, 51. Sent to oppose Theodosius, 79. Drowns himself, 80.

Andronicus excommunicated and degraded, 186.

——— Ducas betrayed by Samonas, 406. Flees to the Saracens, ibid. Dies, 407.

——— the son of Ducas, left under guardianship, 459. Treachery to Diog. Romanus, 462.

——— Revolts against Alexius II. 491. Declared his guardian, 492. And protector, 493. Horrid butcheries and impiety, ibid. Defeated by William king of Sicily, 494. His dreadful end, 495.

——— Paleologus. Vide sub Paleologus, 468.

Anglo-Saxons come into England, 54.

Ann, princess, conspires against her brother, 485. Forgiven, 486.

Anna, empress, instigated against Cantacusenus, 534. Over-reached by his enemies, ibid. & seq.

Anna Perenna worshipped at Carthage, 632.

Annian family, converted to christianity, 85.

Athemius's rise and consulship, 159. Excellent government, 172, 186. Extract and character, 173. Resigns to Pulcheria, 195. Success against the Ostrogoths, 270. Against the Hunns, 273. Raised to the empire by Ricimer, 274. His reception at Rome, ibid. Put to death by Ricimer, 279.

Antioch raises a sedition, 70. Severe punishment, 71 & seq. Dreadful condition, 73. Pardoned by Theodosius, 77. Gratitude to Eudocia, 226. Ruined by an earthquake, 269. Under Justin, 304. Destroyed by the Persians, 310. By an earthquake, 326. Retaken by Burzas, 422. By the cruisadors, 482.

——— the noble portico of, built by Rufinus, 120.

Antiochus the sophist, betrays Achaia to Alaric, 122.

——— the governor of Theodosius II. 174. Degraded, ibid. & seq.

Anysius drives the Moors out of Pentapolis, 189.

Apamea plundered by Cosrhoes, 311. Taken and burnt by him, 321. By Cosrhoes II. 335.

Apocaucus's cruelty to Cantacusenus's mother, 536.

Apochapsus seizes on Crete, 387.

Apollinarians suppressed by Theodosius, 84. By Arcadius, 133.

Apollo, his temple and golden statue at Carthage, 569.

Apostate christians deprived from making a will, 45, 48. Disfranchised by Theodosius, 90.

Apsimar revolts against Justinian. See sub Tiberius, 352.

Aquilaria in Tunes, where situate, 576.

Aquileia taken by Maxentius, 79. Destroyed by Attila, 250.

Aquitania second and third given to Vallia, 200. Their situation, ibid.

Aquitans invaded by the Vandals, 162.

Aquiulphus revolts from Theodoric, 263.

Arabia subdued by the Saracens, 345.

Aradus conquered by the Saracens, 345.

Aratus revolts to the Romans, 304. His reception from Narses, 306.

Arbazacius countenances the plundering of the Isaurians, 158.

Arbogastes sent to Theodosius's assistance, 45. To invest Maximus, 80. To put Victor to death, 81. Murders Valentinian, 93. Signal arrogance to him, ibid. Wars against the Franks, 100. Defeated by Theodosius, 103. Kills himself, 104.

Arbon, where situate, 28.

Arboreus, the father of Ausonius, his extract, 56 n.

Arcadia born to Arcadius, 150. Her character, buildings, &c. 165. Death, 233.

Arcadius, the son of Theodosius, born, 35. Proclaimed emperor, 59. Softens the penalties against the marriages of first cousins, fins, 63. Choſen conſul, 67. Clemency to the Arians, 82. Has the eaſt aſſigned to him, 106. Under the care of Rufinus, 116. Proves a weak prince, 119. Marries Eudoxia, 120. Swayed by the villain Eutropius, 126. Againſt Stilicho, 127. Law againſt the aſyla of churches, 130. Journey to Ancyra, 131. Acknowledged in Afric, 132. Depoſes Eutropius, 142. Laws againſt idolatry, 144. Timorous compliance to Gainas, 146. Interview with him, ibid. Severity to the Goths, 148. Preſented with the head of Gainas, 150. His column and ſtatue reared, 154. Death and iſſue, 164. The fabulous ſtory of his laſt will, 173.

Ardaburius's ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, 203, 205. Sent into the weſt againſt John, 214. Shipwrecked and taken by him, 215. Outwits and takes him, ibid. Becomes ſuſpected to Leo, 278. Put to death, ibid.

Ardſhir. Vide Artaxer, 64.

Argentaria, where ſited, 27.

——— the battle of, ibid.

Ariadne married to Zeno, 277. Suſpected of incontinence, &c. 291. Married to Anaſtaſius, 292. Inſulted with him, 295.

Arians ſuppreſſed by Theodoſius, 44, 45. Commit freſh outrages, 82. Driven out of the cities, 92. Suppreſſed by Juſtin, 304.

Ariobundus's valour againſt the Perſians, 205. Defeated by Cabades, 298.

Ariſius defeated in Thrace, 297.

Ariſtotle's account of the Carthaginian government, 590. Defects obſerved by him, 604, 605. & n.

Arles beſieged by Geronicius, 186. By Conſtantius, 187. Surrendered, 188. Relieved by Egidius, 271.

Armenia, the end of that kingdom, 230. Subdued by the Saracens, 351. Betrayed to them, 353.

Armenian legions refuſe to ſwear to Irene, 372. Severely puniſhed, 373.

Armorici, who, 179. Short-lived revolt, ibid.

Arnagiſelus defeated and killed by Attila, 234, 235.

Arſaces yields his kingdom to the Perſians, 230.

Arſacius diſgraced, 175.

Artabanus's ſucceſs againſt the Romans, 321.

Artaxer ſucceeds Sapor in Perſia, 63.

Artemius proclaimed emperor. Vide Anaſtaſius, 292.

Aſan's ill ſucceſs in Media, 451.

Aſcolus, biſhop, baptizes Theodoſius, 40.

Aſoumes. See Mercury, 627.

Aſpar ſent with Placidia into the weſt, 214. Takes Aquileia from the rebel John, 215. Enters Ravenna, and takes him priſoner, ibid. Taken priſoner by the Vandals, 221. Eſcapes, and is defeated by Attila, 235. Raiſes Leo to the throne, 266. A great favourer of the Arians, ibid. Fatal jealouſy of Leo, 278. Put to death by him, ibid.

Aſpocaſtrum, a Turkiſh fort at the mouth of the Boſporus, 547.

Aſtarte, conjectures concerning that deity, 614 n.

Aſteria iſland, whence ſo called, 589 n.

Aſterius's gigantic remains, 589 n.

——— Succeſs againſt Gonderic, 201.

Aſtorga plundered and maſſacred by the Goths, 267.

Aſtulphus the Lombard ſeizes Ravenna and Pentapolis, 368. Stripped of them by Pepin, ibid.

Aſyla. See churches, 99.

Ata killed by Vallia, 200.

Atapacus lays waſte all Phrygia, 491.

Ataulphus ſent for into Sicily, 171. Defeated, 175. Joins Alaric, ibid. Raiſed by Attalus, 177. Made king of the Goths in Italy, 186. Betrays Jovianus to Honorius, 190. Falls out with him, 192. Marries Placidia, 193. Generoſity to her, ibid. Flees into Spain, 194. Stabbed to death, 195.

Athanaric invaded by the Hunns, 12. Retires into the rocks of Caucalanda, 14. Takes refuge with Theodoſius, 44. His death, ibid.

Athenodorus, one of Longinus's generals, 296. Beheaded, ibid.

Attalus promoted by Honorius, 174. Narrow eſcape from Alaric, 175. Made prefect of Rome, ibid. Made emperor by Alaric, 177. His character and religion, ibid. Falls out with Alaric, 182. Depoſed by him, ibid. Reſtored, 183. Advice to the Goths, 190. Forced to reſume the purple, 194. Taken priſoner, 198. His mild puniſhment, ibid.

Atticus choſen conſul, 131.

——— biſhop of Conſtantinople's kindneſs to the refuged chriſtians, 203.

Attila the Hunn's advantageous peace with Rome, 231. Cruelty to the Hunniſh princes, ibid. Northern conqueſts, ibid. In Thrace, &c. 232. Peace with Theodoſius, ibid. Proud demands on him, 233. Horrid devaſtations in the empire, 234. New peace, 235. Falls out with Valentinian, ibid. Conſpired againſt by Theodoſius, 236. Reconciled to him, ibid. Powerful army againſt Valentinian, 244.

High

High demands on him, 245. Ravages in Gaul, 246. Repulsed by Ætius, 247. Bravery at the battle of Chalons, 248. Repasses the Rhine, 249. Enters Italy, ibid. Cruelty to the Aquileians, 250. Odd retaliation for the Roman pictures, ibid. Truce with Rome, 251. Invades Dauphiné, 252. Defeated by the Visigoths, ibid. His death, ibid. & seq.

Avari at Rome, who, 320. Deprived of their pension by Justin, ibid. By Tiberius, 324. & seq. Invade the Romans, 327. Defeated by Priscus, 328. Stirred up by Cosrhoes against Heraclius, 339.

Augustus, the son of Orestes, why so called, 282. Crowned emperor, ibid. Deposed and resettled by Odoacer, 284, 285.

Avitianus's bravery against the Saracens, 205.

Avitus makes peace with the Goths, 225. Made general of the Romans, 261. Proclaimed emperor by Theodoric, 262. Deposed, 264. His death, 265.

Aulon taken by Robert Guiscard, 471.

Aurelianus chosen consul, 145. Sacrificed to Gainas, and banished, 146. Escapes to Constantinople, ibid.

Ausæ, from whom descended, 587.

Ausonius raised by Gratian, 31. Speech to him. 36. Writings and character, 56 n.

Austin St. Panegyric on the Roman consuls, 67. Zeal for church asyla, 99. Sermon on the deliverance of Constantinople, 130. Character of Olympius, 170. Apology for the destruction of Rome, 185.

Ausurians, who, 189. Waste Pentapolis, ibid.

Auvergne taken by Euric, 278.

Auzoriani, where situate, 160. Ravage Egypt, ibid.

Axan sultan's offers of peace rejected by Romanus, 462. His singular generosity to him, 463. Treaty with Cultumoses, 464, 465.

Axieros, what among the Phœnicians, 637 n.

Azar, the Saracen, defeated in Cilicia, 353.

Azarethes commands the Persians against the Romans, 307.

Azazene, where sited, 203. Abandoned by the Romans, 204.

B

BAal, conjectures concerning that deity, 614 & seq. & n.

——— sometimes signifies the true God, 626.

Bacurus serves under Theodosius, 101. His character and gallantry, 102.

Bætilæ of the heathens, their origin, 634, 635 & n.

Bagrada river, described, 585.

Bagundæ give a free passage to Sarus, 164.

Bajazet's swift conquests in Europe, 540. Arrogance to the Greek emperors, ibid. Defeats 130,000 christians, 541. Defeated by Tamerlane, 543. His dismal end, ibid.

Balamir king of the Hunns, 12.

Baldwin saves Edessa, 482. Sudden disappearing, ibid.

——— crowned emperor of Constantinople, 506. Defeat and miserable end, ibid.

——— II. crowned Latin emperor at Constantinople, 510, 512. Driven out of it, 515.

Balearic islands ravaged by the Vandals, 216.

Barahanes kills Siroes, and mounts the throne, 342.

Barames dethrones Hormisdas, 327.

Barbas's treachery to Theoctistus, 396. Tyranny under Michael, 398. Murdered, 399.

Barchine or Barcan family at Carthage, 664 n.

Bardanes's revolt, 377. Eyes put out, 378.

Bardas defeated by the Romans, 415.

——— Phocas's revolt, 424. Punishment, 425. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. Treachery to Sclerus, 434. Death, ibid.

——— Sclerus's success against the Rossi, 424. Defeats Bardas Phocas, 431. Defeated by him, 432. Imprisoned by Cosrhoes, ibid. By Phocas, 434. Submits to Basilius, 435.

Bargus, the infamous betrayer of Timasius, 128. Put to death, 129.

Baronius, a mistake of, rectified, 62.

Basilicæ or Basilius's laws, whence so called, 403.

Basiliscus made admiral of Leo's fleet, 275. Treachery and defeat, 276. Declared emperor, 283. His extortions and heresy, 286. Resigns his crown, 287. Death, ibid.

——— the son of Harmatius, created Cæsar, 287. Deposed, ibid. Made bishop of Cizycus, ibid.

——— Tiberius declared emperor, 539. Put to death, ibid.

Basilitzas, an infamous favourite of Alexander, 409.

Basilius sent to treat with Alaric, 172.

——— a favourite of Michael, created Cæsar, 399. His extract and character, ibid. Over-reaches Bardas, ibid. Kills the emperor, 400. Makes two of his sons Cæsars, ſars, ibid. Defeats the Manichees, ibid. Succeſs againſt the Saracens, 401. Builds a great number of churches, ibid. His death, 402. Wiſe inſtructions to his ſon, ibid.

Baſilius, an impoſtor's treaſon and death, 413, 414.

——— an extortioning eunuch, 427. Poiſons the emperor, 428. Defeated by Sclerus, 430.

——— the ſon of Romanus, made colleague with Remiſces, 423. Defeated by Sclerus, 430, &c ſeq. Ill ſucceſs againſt the Bulgarians, 432. Defeats Bardas Phocas, 434. Wars againſt the Bulgarians, 436. Cruelty to them, ibid. Subdues them, 437. Againſt the Saracens, 438. Death, character, 439.

Baſſi, the family of, converted, 85.

Baſſianus, ſtripped of his eſtate, 2.

Baudo ſent to Theodoſius's aſſiſtance, 45.

Bauto choſen conſul, 67.

Beggars ſuppreſſed by Gratian, 46.

Belimer marches to ſuccour Rome, 279. Defeated by Ricimer, ibid.

Beliſarius defeated by the Perſians, 304. Made commander on the Perſian frontiers, ibid. Fortifies them, 306. Forced to abandon them, ibid. Defeats the Perſians, 306, 307. Appeaſes a revolt at Conſtantinople, 309. Sent into Afric, 310. Recalled againſt the Perſians, 312. Drives away the Hunns, 316. Diſgraced and ſtripped, ibid. Cleared and reſtored, ibid.

Beltis. Vide Urania, 619.

Belus, many deities of that name, 619.

Beorgor defeated by Ricimer, 272.

Bergulæ, whence ſurnamed Arcadianopolis, 154, 155.

Beſſus's ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, 314.

Births, two ſtrange ones under Theodoſius, 86.

Biſhops, privileged by Theodoſius, 45.

Bleda, the Hunn, makes peace with Theodoſius, 231.

Blemmyes, repulſed by Marcian, 252.

Boanas defeated by the Saracens, 343.

Bœtica reduced by the Hunns, 233.

Boetius murdered by Valentinian, 254.

Bohemond's ſucceſs againſt Alexius, 472. Narrow eſcape, 481. Enters Antioch, 482. Made prince of it, ibid. Wars with Alexius, 483. Raiſes new forces in Italy, 484. Returns and beſieges Dyrrhachium, ibid. Makes peace with Alexius, ibid. His death, 489.

Bolus, a Perſian fortreſs, betrayed to the Romans, 307.

Bonifacius, count, repulſes Ataulphus from Marſeilles, 192. Highly rewarded by Placidia, 217. Undermined by Ætius, ibid. Defeats and kills Sinex, 218. Invites the barbarians into Afric, ibid. Beſieged by them, 220. Returns to Italy, 221. Sent by Placidia againſt Ætius, ibid. Killed, ibid.

——— made king of Theſſaly, 505.

Bonoſus ſent againſt the revolted Jews, 333.

Bonus, governor of young Conſtantius, 337.

Books, 120,000 burnt at Conſtantinople, 287.

Boriſes taken priſoner, 426.

Boſporans cruelly butchered by Juſtinian, 355. Join with the Chazari againſt him, ibid.

Boſtra taken by Haumar, 342.

Boterius murdered at Theſſalonica, 107.

Bourdeaux receives Ataulphus, 192.

Branas's fatal raſhneſs and defeat. 474.

——— defeats the Sicilians, 496. Revolts, ibid. Defeated and killed, 497.

Bretagne, whence ſo called, 273.

Bretania Armorica, three different colonies ſent into, 54.

Brienne, John de, made guardian of Baldwin II. 510. Defeats Azem and Ducas, 511. His death. ibid.

Britain defended by Stilicho, 137. Abandoned by the Romans, 285.

Britons revolt afreſh from the Romans, 172. Invaded by the Picts and Scots, 234. Settle in Vennes, &c. 273.

Britons follow Maximus into Gaul, 54. Settle in Bretagne, ibid.

Bructerians invaded by Eugenius, 100.

Bryennius recalled, 455. Quarrels with Opſaras, 455. Eyes put out by him, 456.

——— revolt and defeat, 466. Taken priſoner, 467.

Bulgaria, whence ſo called, 349.

Bulgarians defeat Ariſius, 227. Invade the empire with 100,000 men, 349. Make Peace with it, ibid. Defeat Juſtinian, 352. Ravage quite to Conſtantinople, 356. Aſſiſt Anaſtaſius, 359. Irruptions into the eaſt, 367. Totally defeated, 367. Put to flight by Conſtantine, 374. Succeſs againſt Nicephorus, 379. Againſt Michael, 380. Againſt Conſtantine, 412. Defeated, 436. Submit to Baſilius, 437. Revolt, 445. Defeat the Latins, 506. Defeated by Andronicus, 531. Make Peace with him, ibid.

Burgundi join with the Vandals, 152. Their Kingdom in Gaul, how founded, 192. 20,000 killed by the Hunns, 222. Settle in Savoy, 227. Seize on part of Gaul, 265.

Burtzas ill requited by Nicephorus, 422.

Butrotum taken by Guiſcard, 470.

Buzes defeated by the Romans, 306. Abandons Syria to the Perſians, 310.

Byrſa, the citadel of Carthage, deſcribed, 566. Whence ſo called, 568.

Byzatium deſcribed, 529. Whence called Libyphœnicia, 590 & n.

C.

CAbades invades Armenia, 297. Defeats the Romans, 298. Makes a truce of 20 years with them, 299. Embaſſy to Juſtinian, 303. Wars with him, 306. His Death 308.

Cabiri, their worſhip, &c. at Carthage, 636.

Caccabe, Carthage, whence ſo called, 565.

Cadmus's expedition to Carthage, 558.

Cæcilianus ſent to, and promoted by, Honorius, 174, & ſeq.

Cæranius, the philoſopher, tortured to death, 4.

Cæſarea razed by Baſilius, 401.

Cæſarius ſent to judge the Antiochians, 72. His character, ibid. Severity to them, 73. Softened 74. Goes to ſoften Theodoſius towards them, 76. Choſen conſul, 131.

Callinicus, the Heliopolitan's invention of ſea-fire, 348.

——— patriarch of Conſtantinople, cauſes Juſtinian to be depoſed, 351, 352. His puniſhment, ibid.

Canaanites retire to Carthage. 558.

Candax and his ſubjects ſettled in Scythia Minor, 253.

Candia, by whom built, 387.

Candidianus, conſulſhip and command in the weſt, 214.

Candidius's writings and character, 291, n.

Cantacuſenus, a wicked tool of Andronicus, 525, 534. Made guardian to young John, ibid. Undermined by John the patriarch, ibid. Proſcribed, 535. Aſſumes the purple, ibid. Marches towards Conſtantinople, ibid. Over-reached and attempted, 536. Enters that metropolis, 537. Crowned, 538. Reſigns, and turns monk, 539.

Canthele, where ſituate, 577.

Capellas's philological writings, 212, n.

Capito's, Greek verſion of Ammianus, 26, n,

Capitol forſaken, and left to ruin, 85.

Capſo, where ſituate, 583.

Caracia ſcours the neighbourhood of Conſtantinople, 548.

Carbeas, head of the Manichees, flies to the Saracens, 396, Defeated by Baſilius, 400.

Careſa, the daughter of Valens, 24.

Carpis, where ſituate, 576.

Carpodax defeated by Theodoſius, 45.

Carthage founded, 556. By whom, 558, 560. Its various names and etymons, 561. Deſcribed, 566. Its extent, 569. Old ruins, 570. Diviſion, 572. Situation, ibid. Government, 590, & ſeq. Senate, 594, & n. Centumvirate and quinquevirate 597, & ſeq. Officers, 599, & ſeq. Laws, 602. Their defects, 604. Submits to Arcadius, 116. Taken by Sigiſwall, 218. By Geſeric, 226.

Carthagena ſeized by the Alans, 180. By the Hunns, 233. By the Suevians, 263.

Carthaginians, from whom ſprung, 558. Their various Names, 565. How populous, 569. Extent of their dominions, 570, & 571, n. Antient Canaanites, 588, & ſeq. Sacrifice noble children to Saturn, 602. Forbid to learn Greek, ibid. Their religion, 607. And various deities, 608. Portable temples, 635. Language, 643, & ſeq. Characters and coin, 654, & ſeq. Arts and ſciences, 658. Cuſtoms, ibid. Hoſpitality, 660. Character, 661. The genealogy of their noble families, 663, & ſeq. Commerce and military diſcipline, 663. Learned men, 667. Expert artificers, ibid. Writers, ibid. Trade and navigation, 671, & ſeq. Chronology, 674, & ſeq.

——— women proſtituted themſelves for gain, 641.

Caſſianus, killed by the cruiſadors, 482.

Caſſiodorus publiſhes the hiſtoria tripartita, 239, n.

Caſtinus's ſucceſs and ill-timed raſhneſs in Spain, 206. Stirs up John to revolt, 213. Baniſhed, 216.

Cataceles's ſucceſs againſt Thomas, 386.

Catada, river, deſcribed, 585.

Catalaunian plains, whether the ſame with the Mauriac, 247.

Catalans hired by the Greek emperors, 520. Ravage his dominions, ibid. Invite the Turks to join, 521.

Celer, Anaſtaſius's general, ravages Arzanene, 298.

Cenſor, at Carthage, its power, &c. 601.

Cenſorinus beſieged and taken priſoner, 227.

Ceres, one of the Carthaginian deities, 627.

Chabdanus's revenge on Leo, 415. On Phocas, ibid. Defeated, 418.

Chaedrante, an antient name of Carthage, 583.

Chagan, king of the Avari, invades the Romans, 324. Makes a truce and breaks it, 327. His army deſtroyed by peſtilence, 328.

328. Cruelty to his prisoners, ibid. Makes peace with Heraclius, 336. Kindness to Justinian, 353. Bought off by Tiberius, ibid.

Chalcis plundered by Cosrhoes, 311.

Chalons, the battle of, 247. Number of the slain, 248.

Chamavians invaded by Eugenius, 100.

Charcedon, the Greek name of Carthage, 559, 565, n.

Charles the Great's embassy to Irene, 375. Acknowledged emperor of the west, 377.

——— of Anjou, makes peace with Paleologus, 518. Gets him excommunicated, ibid.

Charms and other witcheries severely punished, 3.

Chartaca, an antient name of Carthage, 561.

Chazari, who, 339. 40,000 join Heraclius, ibid.

Chersonians, horridly butchered by Justinian, 355. Submit to Philippicus, ibid.

Chesnuts eaten instead of corn, 181.

Childeric taken prisoner, 245.

Children, four, eaten by their mothers, 181.

Chios taken by the Turks, 474.

Christians massacred by Gerontius, 186. By the Jews at Alexandria, 196. Barbarity to Hypatia, 197. Persecuted in Persia, 203. Their liberty restored, 205. Massacred by the Jews, 333, 336. By the Mohammedans, 359. By the Saracens, 369.

Christian women exempted from stage-playing, 40.

Christopher banished and murdered, 374.

——— the son of Romanus, crowned, 412. His death 413.

Chronos. Vide Saturn, 608.

Chrysaphus's treachery to Attila, 236. Forgiven, ibid.

Chrysargyrum, abolished by Anastasius, 293. Various sorts of it, 294.

Chrysostom's narrow escape, 4. Excellent homilies to the Antiochians, 71. Dreadful account of their trials and punishments, 72. Intercedes for them, 74. His singular piety to the prisoners, 76. Joyful Speech at their being pardoned, 78. Panegyric on Eudoxia, 121. Banished by her, 130. Letters to Pentadia, ibid. Zeal for the church-asyla, 143. Saves the lives of three great persons, 146. Intrepidity against the Arians, 147. Banishment, 157. His manuscripts burnt, 372.

Chrysotelia, a new tax, raised by Anastasius, 295.

Churches, when first made sanctuaries, 99. Suppressed by Eutropius, 130. Restored, ibid. Respected by Alaric, 184, And by the Goths, ibid. By Honorius, 195. Inlarged fifty paces round, 200.

Circumcellæ, the antient name of Civita Vecchia, 209, n.

Claudian's poem on Eutropius, 127, n. On Honorius's marriage, 137. On Stilicho's exploits, ibid.. On Manlius's consulship, 138. His other writings and character, 207, n.

Claudiopolis taken by Diogenes, 296.

Clearchus's rise and character, 60.

Clergy, inlarged by Gratian, 17. By Honorius, 133 By Marcian, 259.

Clitomachus's writings and character, 669.

Clodius defeated by Ætius, 219.

Clovis defeats Theodoric, 300. Congratulated for it by Anastasius, ibid. and seq.

Clyppea, where situate, 577.

Code of Justinian, 224, 317. Of Theodosius, ibid. Gives way to a second, 318.

Cœlistis dea. Vide Urania, 615. Her temple at Carthage turned into a church, 145.

Coimbra taken by the Suevians, 272.

Colossus of Rhodes destroyed by the Saracens, 345. The weight of it, ibid.

Comet appears under Theodosius, 86. Under Constantine IV. 367. Under Ducas, 459.

Commentiolus's success against the Persians, 326. Put to death by Phocas, 330, 333.

Comnenus, Isaac, chosen emperor, 455. Defeats Stratonicus, 456. Crowned 457. Resigns, 458.

——— Alexius's success against the rebel Rutilius, 465. Sent against Bryennius, 466. Stratagem against him, ibid. Against Basiliacius, 467, Chosen emperor, 468, Crowned, 469. Does penance, ibid. Makes peace with the Turks, 470. Marches against count Guiscard, 471. His defeat and flight, 472. By the Scythians, 474. Signal defeat of them, ibid. Second defeat and peace with them, 477. Jealousy of the cruisadors, 479. Treachery to them, 482. Success against the Turks, 483. Falls out with Bohemond, ibid. Makes peace with him, 484. And with the Turks, ibid. His death and character, 485.

——— John, his son, declared emperor, 485. Defeats several barbarians, 486. Reduces several provinces, 487. Impious attempt upon Antioch, ibid Death, 488. Singular character, ibid. & seq.

——— Alexius II. Vide sub Alexius, 491.

Conen Meriodoc comes into Britain, 55.

——— bishop of Claudianoplis's bravery against the Romans, 296. Slain, ibid.

Conſtantia, the widow of Mauritius, racked and executed, 332.

Conſtantine III. choſen emperor in Britain, 163. Succeſs in Gaul, 164. In Spain; 165. Acknowledged by Honorius, 166. Invades Italy, 186. Driven back, ibid. Beſieged in Arles, 188. Surrenders to Conſtantius, 189. Beheaded. ibid.

——— IV. the ſon of Heraclius, created Cæſar, 336. Meets his father's triumph, 341. Crowned and poiſoned, 344.

——— V. the ſon of Conſtans, II. proclaimed emperor, 347. Why ſurnamed Pogonatus, 348. Jealous of his two brothers, ibid. Makes peace with Mahuvias, 349. With the Bulgarians, ibid. Calls a council, ibid. His death, 350.

——— VI. Copronymus born, 359. Why ſo called, ibid. Proclaimed 360. Marries Irene, 364. Crowned, ibid. Depoſed by his brother-in-law, ibid. His revenge on him, 365. Succeſs againſt the Saracens, ibid. & ſeq. Diverted from his purſuit by public calamities, 336. Invaded by the Bulgarians, ibid. Perſecutions againſt image-worſhippers and friers, 367. Defeats the Bulgarians, ibid. Outwitted by their king, ibid. His death and character, 368.

——— VII. the ſon of Leo III. by Irene, created his collegue, 369. Crowned, 370. Why ſurnamed Porphyrogenitus, ibid. Conſpired againſt, ibid. Falls out with his mother, 371. Confined by her, 372. Reſtored, and deprives her, ibid. Succeſs againſt the Bulgariane, 373. Cruelty to Nicephorus and his friends, ibid. To the mutinous Armenians, ibid. Divorces Mary, and marries Theodota, ibid. Noble anſwer to Cardames, 374. Put to flight by him, ibid. Put to death, ibid.

——— VIII. the ſon of Michael, made Cæſar, 400. His death, 401.

——— IX. the ſon of Leo, born, 404. Left under his uncle's care, 408. Kept under by Romanus, 413. Reſumes his power, 415 Severity to Romanus's family, ibid. His death, 417.

——— X. the brother of Baſilius, made his collegue, 423. Reigns ſole emperor after his death, 439. His wicked reign, ibid. and ſeq. Death, 440.

——— XI. Monamachus, marries Zoe, 448. Crowned, ibid. Succeſs againſt the Saracens, ibid. Againſt the Turks, 452. His death 454.

——— XII. Ducas choſen Emperor, 458. His fatal avarice and death, 459.

——— the ſon of Michael, ſuffered to wear the purple robe, 469.

——— XII. Paleologus. Vide ſub Paleologus, 546, & ſeq.

——— Attilius's general, cut off in Afric, 177.

——— the ſon of Andronicus, his narrow eſcape, 407. Leo's timely warning to him, ibid. His treaſon and death, 410.

——— the favourite of Leo, made high chamberlain, 407. Swears the Romans before the holy croſs, 411. Poiſoned by Romanus, 417. His character, ibid. & ſeq.

——— the ſon of Andronicus Paleologus, ſent againſt his rebellious grandſon, 527. Over-reached and kept priſoner by him, 528.

Conſtantine's ſquare burnt, 297.

Conſtantinople, in danger from the Goths, 122. Threatened by a fiery ſky, 130. Shattered by an earthquake, 150. The great church of it burnt, 158. In an uproar for want of corn, 181. Surrounded with new walls, 193. Burnt by a three days fire, 222. Damaged by an earthquake, 234. By a ſix days fire, 273. City and library burnt, 287. In a tumult through various factions, 308. 30,000 perſons killed in it, 309 Laid waſte by a peſtilence, and the Hunns, 315. Beſieged by the Saracens, 348. Surpriſed by Juſtinian, 354. Taken by Theodoſius, 357. Brave defence againſt the Saracens, 358. Damaged by an earthquake, 365. Taken and plundered, ibid. Both ſeas of it frozen, 367. Damaged by a great fire, 372. And earthquake, ibid. Plundered and ravaged, 468. Beſieged by Alexius, 501. Set on fire, 502. Beſieged by the Latins, 504. Taken and plundered, ibid. Retaken by the Greeks, 515. Rebuilt, 517. Beſieged by Bajazet, 541. Relieved 542. Blocked up by Mohammed II. 547. Beſieged, 548. Taken and put to the ſword, 554. Becomes the metropolis of the Turkiſh empire, 555.

Conſtans, the ſon of the Britiſh Conſtantine, made Cæſar, 165. Conquers Spain, 166. Declared Auguſtus, ibid. Driven out of Spain, 180. Choſen conſul, 193. Married to Placidia, 199.

——— the grandſon of Heraclius, crowned, 345. The diſaſters of his reign, ibid. Promotes Monotheliſm, ibid. Defeated at ſea, 346. Marches againſt the Sclavi, ibid. & ſeq. Makes peace with the Saracens, ibid. Murders his brother, ibid. His melancholy ſtate ſince, ibid. Succeſsleſs expedition againſt the Lombards, 347. Extortions and death, ibid.

Conſtantius general of Theodoſius, ſent againſt Conſtantine, 187. His extract and character, ibid. Succeſs, ib. & 188. Choſen conſul, 193. Defeats Athulpius's offers. 194. Raiſed to the imperial dignity by Honorius, 201. His death, ibid.

Conſtoſtephanus ſent to intercept Bohemond, 483.

Conſulſhip, reckoning by, aboliſhed, 310. Reſtored by Juſtin II. ibid.

Corcyra taken by Manuel, 489.

Corinth damaged by an earthquake, 304.

Corybantes among the Phœnicians, who, 636.

Coſrhoes invades Syria, 310. Deſtroys Antioch, ibid. Makes peace with Juſtinian, 311. Treachery to him, ibid. Marches againſt Beliſſarius, 312. Repulſed by him, ibid. Before Edeſſa, ibid. Truce with the Romans, 314. Sues for peace, 315. Renews the war, 321. Takes Duras, ibid. New truce made and broken, 322. Defeated, and breaks his heart, ibid. & 323.

——— the ſon of Hormiſdas, forced to depoſe his father, 327. Driven from his kingdom, ibid. Reſtored by Mauritius, ibid. Takes up arms againſt Phocas, 331. Succeſs and deveſtations in Syria, 333. In Cappadocia, &c. 335. Egypt and Paleſtine, 336. Blaſphemous anſwer to Heraclius, ibid. Defeated by him, 338. Perſecutes the chriſtians in revenge, 339. Flees to Seleucia, 340. Depoſed and murdered, ibid.

Coſſa, why forſaken by its inhabitants, 209, n.

Coſſyra, iſland, deſcribed, 586, n.

Cothon, one of the three parts of Carthage, 567. Its etymon, 568.

Council, ſecond of Conſtantinople, 45. Of Epheſus, 220. Of Chalcedon, 252. Third of Conſtantinople, 349. Second of Nice, 377, 396. Of Clermont decrees the holy war, 478. Of Lyons, 518. Of Florence unites the Greek and Latin churches, 545.

Couſin-germans forbid to intermarry, 63. That law when put into the code, ibid.

Craterus defeated in Crete, 388. Crucified, ibid.

Crates's kind reception of Cantacuzenus, 536, 537. Falls out with him, 538.

Crete, whence called Candia, 387. Recovered by the Romans, 418.

Criminals releaſed at the feaſt of Eaſter, 43. Condemned to death, reſpited for thirty days, 46.

Criſpus, general of Heraclius, his ill ſucceſs againſt the Perſians. 335.

Crœſus's treaſure found and carried off by Heraclius, 338.

Croſs the ſign of life among the Egyptians, 88. Part of Chriſt's croſs carried off by the Perſians, 336. Reſtored and brought back to Heraclius, 340. To Jeruſalem, 341.

Crumus's ſucceſs and indignities againſt Nicephorus, 379. Defeated by Leo, 382.

Cruſade, or holy war, the beginning of, 478.

Curtzer's raſhneſs and defeat, 306.

Curubis, where ſituate, 577.

Cutlumoſes's ill ſucceſs againſt the Arabians, 450. Revolts againſt Tangrolipix, 464. Makes a treaty with his ſon Azan, 465. Wars againſt the Romans, ibid. & ſeq.

Cynegus ſent to proclaim Maximus, 58, 59. Ordered to ſuppreſs idolatry, 62. His death and character, ibid.

Cyril St. falls out with Oreſtes, 197.

——— governor of Thrace, taken priſoner by Vitalianus, 301.

Cyrus's riſe and character, 229.

——— biſhop of Alexandria, ſaves Egypt by a tribute, 343.

Cyzicus, part of, overturned by an earthquake, 270.

D.

DAcia, New, part of, yielded to Theodoric, 289.

Dagiſthenes ſent againſt Petra, 313. Cowardly flight, ibid.

Dagobert's embaſſy to Heraclius, 342.

Dalmatia deſtroyed by the Quadi, 29. By the Goths, 122. Made a new empire, 271.

Damaſcus taken by the Saracens, 343.

Damianus defeated and killed, 387.

Dandalo Henry, his ſingular bravery, 501.

Daphne oppreſſed by Proculus, 60.

Daphnomelus's deſperate attempt on Ibatzes, 437. Rewarded, 438.

Daras, where cited, 300. Fortified, ibid. Taken by Coſrhoes, 321.

Dardanus, prefect of Gaul, his motley character, 190, & n.

Darkneſs over the Roman empire, 106. A dreadful one under Conſtantine IV. 366.

Delaſſenus Conſtant. ſent into baniſhment, 444.

Deleanus choſen chief of the revolted Bulgarians, 445. Treachery to Teichomerus, 446. His reward, ibid.

Delphinus defeated by Baſilius, 434.

Demetrius, high treaſurer to Honorius, 175.

Demon or genius of Carthage worſhipped there, 635.

Demophilus, an Arian biſhop, depoſed, 43

Dengizic, the Hunn, ſlain, 273.

Dexterus tortured to death 168.

Diana her worſhip at Carthage, 619.
Dido, the time of her coming to Carthage, 558, 560. Whether ſhe founded it, 559, 560. Worſhipped there, 632.
Didymus driven out of Spain, 165. Put to death, 166.
Die in Dauphiné ſubject to the Burgundians, 265.
Digeſta of Juſtinian, when and by whom compiled, 318.
Dioceſe, what, 11.
Diogenes governor of Bithynia, put to death, 2.
——— Anaſtaſius's general, cloſely ſhut up in Iſauria, 296. Relieved by crook-back'd John, ibid.
——— Romanus raiſed to the empire, 460. Succeſs againſt the Turks, 461. Defeated and taken priſoner, 462. Kindly received and releaſed by the ſultan, ibid. Defeated by Andronicus, 463. His miſerable end, ibid.
Diomedes's writings and character, 212 n.
Dionotus, king of Cornwall, ſupplies Cenon with women, 55. The ſtory confuted, ibid.
Diſtagerda, the Roman ſtandards, &c. releaſed from, 340.
Dobbius, the murderer of Ataulphus, 196.
Dogs fleſh eaten by the Carthaginians, 658.
Domeſtics forbid to impeach their maſters, 134.
Domitia married to Priſcus, 332.
Donatiſts ſuppreſſed by Gratian, 11, 31. Favoured by Honorius, 176.
Dorotheus's ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, 306.
Doryphorianus put to death for extortion, 8.
Dracontia, iſland, 588 n.
Drepanius Pacatus's panegyric on Theodoſius, 84.
Ducas John ſets his nephew on the throne, 463. Governs him, ibid. Taken priſoner by Ruſelius, 464. By ſultan Azan, ibid. Inveteracy againſt Boloniates, 469.
——— Succeſs againſt the Turks, 474, 475. Makes peace with Tzachas, 475. Defeats him, ibid.
——— Murtzuphius's treachery to Alexius III. 503. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. Wars with Henry the Latin emperor, 508.
——— Vataces ſucceeds Laſcaris, 509. Succeſſes againſt the Latins, ibid. Allies with Azem, ibid. Ravages Thrace, 512. His death, ibid.
——— account of the taking of Conſtantinople, 553.
Duilius's columna roſtrata explained, 562. n.
Duras taken by the Oſtrogoths, 288. Abandoned by them, ibid.
Dyrrhachium revolts, 446. Attempted by Guiſcard, 471. Taken, 472. Relinquiſhed by his ſon, 473. Opens to young Alexius, 501.

E

EArthquake under Theodoſius, 106. In the eaſt under Arcadius, 130. Under Theodoſius, 234. At Antioch, 269. At Cyzicus, 270. At Neocæſarea, 297. At Antioch, &c. 304. Under Juſtinian, 315. At Antioch, 326. At Conſtantinople, 364. A dreadful one under Conſtantine IV. 366. Under Michael Balbus, 388. Under Romanus II. 442, 445. Under Ducas, 459.
Eaſter, the time of, ſettled by Gratian, 47. Criminals releaſed on that feſtival, 70.
Ecdices's treachery and reward, 188.
Edecom hired to aſſaſſinate Attila, 236.
Edeſſa taken by Coſrhoes II. 335. Narrow eſcape from the Saracens, 445.
Edeſſans, their prayer againſt Alaric, 154.
Edobicus ſuccours Conſtantine, 188. Killed by Ecdices, ibid.
Eleric's ſtratagem to find out his treacherous ſubjects, 367. Turns chriſtian, and abdicates, 368.
Elias, the Boſporan king, defeats and kills Juſtinian, 355.
Eliſa, the ſame with Dido, 560. The reſt ſee under Dido, 558.
Ellobicus ſent to try the Antiochians, 72. His ſeverity to them, 73. Softened by ſome good chriſtians, 74.
——— ſucceeds Vigilantius, 176.
Elpidius preſerves Symmachus's writings, 110 n.
Encratites, Manichees, whence ſo called, 47.
Eoric, the Alan, ſettles on the Loire, 227.
Ephori of Sparta compared with the Carthaginian quinquevirate, 597.
Ephtolites, who, and where ſited, 59. Beſiege Edeſſa, ibid.
Epirus plundered by the Gauls, 126. Seized on by Michael Angelus, 508.
Equiſo taken priſoner by the Goths, 20. Eſcapes and is ſlain, 21.
Erigenes, a copier of Macrobius, 211 n.
Ermenric invaded by the Hunns, 12. Kills himſelf, ibid.
Ermeric king of the Suevians in Spain, 180.

180. Vain attempt on Galicia, 181. Driven out by Gonderic, 201. His treaty with the Galicians, 224.

Erna and his Hunns ſettle in Scythia Minor, 253.

Eububezer ſucceeds Mohammed, 342. His conqueſts and death, ibid. &c.

Eucherus, the ſon of Stilicho, born, 118. Vain threats againſt chriſtianity, 168. Put to death, 169.

Eudocia's extract and character, 202. Marriage with Theodoſius, ibid. & ſeq. Excellent poems, ibid. & n Declared Auguſta, 214. Journey and largeſſes to Jeruſalem, 226. Retirement, 228. Death, buildings, &c. ibid. & ſeq.

——— Eudoxia's daughter, carried priſoner, 259. Married to Hunneric, ibid. & 272.

——— the wife of Heraclius, crowned, 335. Her delivery and death, ibid.

——— widow of Ducas, made regent, 459. Invaded by the Turks, ibid. Forced to marry, 460. Depoſed and confined, 463.

Eudoxia married to Arcadius, her extract, &c. 120. Imperious and wicked ſway, 145. Aſſumes maſculine titles, 150. Gets St. Chryſoſtom baniſhed, 157. Dies in child-bed, ibid.

——— Licinia betrothed to Valentinian III. 215. Married to him, 223. Forced to marry Maximus, 258. Hatches his death, ibid. & ſeq. Carried away captive, 259. Sent back to Leo, 271.

Eugenius created emperor by Arbogaſtes, 95. Proud embaſſy to Theodoſius, 98. Succeſs againſt the Franks, 100. Reſtores paganiſm, ibid. Defeated, 102. Put to death, 103.

——— the father of Themiſtius, his writings and character, 112 n.

——— defeats the Scenites in Syria, 397.

Eunapius's writings and character, 115 n.

Eunomians ſuppreſſed by Gratian, 31. By Theodoſius, 45.

Eunuchs, excluded from being patricians, 233.

Euphemia, Marcian's daughter, married to Anthemius, 244.

Euphemius's ſacrilege, 389. Treaſon, ibid. Death, ibid.

Euphraſius killed by an earthquake, 304.

Euphroſyna forced out of a monaſtery by Balbus, 388. Sent back by his ſon, 390.

Euric murders his brother, and mounts the Gothiſh throne, 273. Seizes ſome provinces in Gaul, 278. Makes peace, 281.

Euſebius brother-in-law to Conſtantius, fined and baniſhed, 2.

——— high chamberlain to Honorius, 115.

——— the author of Gainas's war, his poem loſt, 213 n.

Euſtatius his writings and character, 292 n.

——— archbiſhop, his learned comment upon Homer, 491.

Euthymius abſolves the emperor of his unlawful marriage, 405.

Eutropius's writings and character, 25 n.

——— ſent to conſult the hermit John, 98. High ſway with Arcadius, 120 Envied by Rufinus, 121. Succeeds him, 124. His extract and ſad character, 125. Envy againſt Stilicho, 126. Treachery to Abundantius, 127. To Timaſius, 128. To Barbus, 129. Stirs up Gildo to revolt, 131. His griping conſulſhip, 137. Diſowned by Honorius, ibid. Undermined by Gainas, 141. & ſeq. Degraded and depoſed, 142. Protected by St. Chryſoſtom, 143. Baniſhed, ibid. 144. Beheaded, ibid.

Eutychians ſuppreſſed by Marcian, 259. Raiſe a tumult in Alexandria, 266. And a maſſacre at Conſtantinople, 300, 301.

Euxine ſea frozen 20 days, 152.

Exilaratus, duke of Naples, murdered, 362.

F

FAbia Eudocia. Vide ſub Eudocia, 335.

Faction, blue, at Conſtantinople, beaten by the green, 297.

Faramond, whether he had any ſway over the Franks, 199. His extract, ibid.

Farnobius's petition to ſettle in the Roman territories rejected, 14. Defeats ſome of their legions, 17.

Felix a famed rhetorician, 212 n.

——— murdered by the ſoldiers, 219.

Feſtus Pomp. made proconſul of Aſia, 2. His cruelties there, 3.

Fire worſhipped by the Carthiginians, 632.

Fiſhes, a ſtrange kind of, caught, 277.

Flacilla, the wife of Theodoſius, her extract and character, 34. Death, &c. 67.

——— daughter of Arcadius, born, 134.

Flavianus, biſhop, ſent to intercede for the Antiochians, 76. Excellent ſpeech to Theodoſius, 77. Succeeds in his ſuit, ibid.

——— guards the Alps againſt Theodoſius, 101 Killed, ibid.

Fleſh, human, ſold publicly, during the famine, 181.

Florence relieved by Stilicho, 161.

Franks defeated by Maximus, 81. Ravage Gaul, 191. Permitted to ſettle in it, 192. Embrace chriſtianity, ibid. Allowed ed to ſettle in Hungaria, 199. Defeated by Attila, 245. Waſte Germany, 255. Settle along the Rhine, 273.

Fravitus's fidelity to the Romans, 149. Conſulſhip, 152. Repulſes the Hunns, ibid.

Frederic, the Viſigoth, ſlain, 272.

——— Barbaroſſa betrayed by Iſaac Angelus, 497. Invades his territories, 498. Anſwer to his embaſſadors, ibid.

French aſſiſt Alexius III. 501. Beſiege and take Conſtantinople, 504.

Friday Good, criminals releaſed on, 65.

Frigerid defeats the Romans, 17.

Frigidum, river, where, 101. The battle of, ibid.

Fritigern leads the Goths into Thrace, 14. Falls foul on the Romans, 15. Defeated by Sebaſtian, 19. Amuſes Valens, 20.

Fritigil converted to chriſtianity, 131.

Froſt, a terrible and long one in the eaſt, 367.

Frumarius waſtes Luſitania, 269.

Fulgentius Planciades, an ignorant and trifling author, 212 n.

G

GAinas, a Gauliſh general, 101. Aſſaſinates Rufinus, 124. Stirs up a revolt againſt Utropius, 140. Marches againſt Conſtantinople, 145. Arrogant demands granted, 146. Thoſe in favour of the Arians refuſed, 147. His deſign on Conſtantinople defeated, 148. Driven out of Thrace, 149. Repulſed by Fravitus, ibid. His death, ibid.

Galata, iſland, 588 n.

Galicia ſeized by the Vandals, 180. Ravaged by the Goths, 267.

——— Galla the daughter of Valentinian married to Theodoſius, 69.

——— Placidia born, 69. Dies in childbed, 95.

——— the wife of Dardanius, 191 n.

Gamaliel, the laſt patriarch of the Jews, depoſed, 198.

Garamantes, who, 673. Trade with the Carthagin ans, ibid.

Gaſcony invaded by the Vandals, 162.

Gaul haraſſed by the Vandals, 162. By Attila, 246. Erected into ſeveral kingdoms, 285.

Gautier marches on the cruiſade, 479. Defeated by the Hungarians, ibid.

Gaza, the temple of, by whom deſtroyed, 62.

——— the famed church of, built by Eudoxia, 121.

Generides made general of Rhœtia, 176. His character, ibid.

Genius. Vide Demon, 635.

Genoeſe ſettled in Conſtantinople, 517. Removed to Galatea, ibid. Seize on ſeveral iſlands, 538.

Genſeric, king of the Vandals, his character, 218. Aſſiſts Bonifacius in Afric, ibid. Falls out with him, 220. Makes peace with the Romans, 222. Surpriſes Carthage, 226. Succeſs in Sicily, ibid. Outwits Theodoſius, 229. Invited by Eudoxia againſt Maximus, 258. Plunders Rome, ibid. Defeated at ſea, 264. Defeats the Romans before Alicant, 269. Makes peace with them, ibid. Breaks it, 271. & ſeq. High demands on Leo, ibid. In favour of Olybrius, 274. Reſentment at his refuſal, ibid. & ſeq. Outwits and defeats the Romans, 275. Makes peace with Zeno, 283. Succeeded by Huneric, 288.

Gentidæ, the ſame with the Lombards and Franks, 36. Kill one another in the dark, 247. Join the Avari, 327.

Germanus forced to command the mutinous Romans, 325. Totally defeats the Perſians, 326. Defeated by Narſes, 331. His death, ibid.

Gerontius betrays the ſtreights of Thermopylæ to the Goths, 122.

——— ſent into Spain, 165. Guards the Pyrenees, 166. Sets up Maximus in Spain, 179. Succeſs againſt Conſtantine, 186. Deſperate end, 187.

Getæ, their terrible inroads into Illyricum, &c. 301.

Gildo revolts from Honorius, 131. His riſe and character, 132. Defeated and taken, 135. Hangs himſelf, 136. His huge eſtate confiſcated, ibid.

Gladiators forbid by Honorius, 157.

Glycerius takes the imperial diadem, 280. Depoſed by Nepos, and made archbiſhop, 281. Receives him in his flight, 282.

Godfrey's hoſtile march againſt Conſtantinople, 479. Treaty with Alexius, 480.

Gonderic, king of the Vandals, invades Gaul, 162. And Spain, 180. Driven out of Biſcay, 201.

Gondiac defeated by Ægidius, 271.

Gondibal ſupports Glycerius in his uſurpation, 280

Gondicavius, king of the Burgundians in Gaul 192. Defeated by the Hunns, 222.

Gongylas Conſtant. defeated by the Saracens, 416.

Goths driven out by the Hunns, 12.

200,000 ſettle in Thrace, ibid. A number of them encamp about Adrianople, 14. Provoked to revolt, ibid. Their ſucceſs in it, 16. Plunder the ſuburbs of Conſtantinople, 18. Repulſed before Adrianople, 29. Cruelties in Thrace, &c. ibid. Deſtroyed in Aſia, 30. Defeated by Theodoſius, 38. Make peace with Rome, 40. Break it, 42. Defeated by Theodoſius, ibid. & 45. Settled in Thrace, and Mœſia, 47. Tranſplanted from Pannonia into Thrace, 217. Settled in Spain, 218. In Aquitaine, ibid. & ſeq. Defeated before Narbonne, 223. By Ætius, 224. How divided and ſettled, 248. Their treachery to the Spaniſh cities, 263. Ravage Luſitania, 277. Strive to revenge Aſpar's death, 279. Make war againſt both empires, 280.

Grata, the daughter of Valentinian, turns nun, 95.

Gratian confirms his brother's election, 8. Divides the empire with him, ibid. Injuſtice to Theodoſius, 9. Remits his father's dues, 10. Some of his laws, 11. In favour of the clergy, 17. Goes to ſuccour Valens, 27. Courage and ſucceſs againſt the Germans, ibid. Haſtens to ſave Conſtantinople, 29. Recalls the orthodox, 31. Laws againſt heretics, ibid. Divides the empire with Theodoſius, 32. Goes into Gaul, 35. Into Illyricum, 40. Makes peace with the Goths, ibid. Succeſs againſt the barbarians, 45. Some excellent laws of his, 46, 48. Marches againſt Maximus, 50. Abandoned by his troops, ibid. Put to death, ibid. Interred at Milan, 52. His excellent character, ibid. Refuſes the title of pontifex maximus, ibid.

——— the ſon of Theodoſius, 35.

Greek forbid by the Carthaginians, 602, 603 & n.

Greeks invade the eaſtern empire, 121. Allowed a church at Conſtantinople, 147. Maſſacred and burnt in it, 148. Ravage Italy, 152. Take and deſtroy Rome, 183. Ravage Gaul, 188. Invite the Bulgarians againſt the Romans, 506. Submit to the pope, 518. Shake him off, 519.

Gregory biſhop of Antioch, quells the mutinous Romans, 326.

——— pope, his flattering letter to Phocas, 330, & ſeq.

——— prefect of Afric, defeated, 345.

——— II. pope, ſtirs up the Venetians, 361. Attempted by Leo, ibid. Letter to the Lombards, &c. ibid. Whether he aſſumed the ſupreme power, 362.

——— Michael's general, defeated and killed, 386.

Greuthongi invaded by the Huns, 12. Defeated by Theodoſius, 68.

Grimould defeats Conſtans II. 347.

Grotius's account of the Gepidæ, 36, 37.

Gryllus, a wicked tool of Michael, 397.

Gubaſos goes over to the Perſians, 311. Treacherouſly attempted by Coſrhoes, 313. Goes back to the Romans, ibid. Takes Petra, 314. Treacherouſly murdered by the Romans, 315.

Guiſcard, Robert, his extract and character, 470. Preparations againſt Alexius Commenus, ibid. Succeſs againſt him, 472. Againſt the emperor Henry, 473. His death, ibid.

——— Roger, relinquiſhes his father's conqueſts, 473.

Gurgenes, king of Iberia, invaded by the Perſians, 304.

Gyzacum taken and burnt by Heraclius, 338.

H

HAdrumentum. Vide Adrumentum, 580.

Hali murdered by Mahuvias, 346.

Haly, a private friend to the chriſtians, 551, 552.

Hamilcar worſhipped at Carthage, 633. His effigy and name on their coins, 657.

Hammam Leef, a hot water, deſcribed, 586 n.

Hannibal's ſmart rebuke to Antiochus, 662 n. Writings, 667.

——— his tower, where ſited, 582.

Hanno's unmeaſurable arrogance, 662. Writings and navigation, 668. Tames the firſt lion, 670 n.

Harmatius betrays Baſiliſcus, 286. Promoted by Zeno, 287. Murdered by him, ibid.

Haumar, the Saracen, his conqueſts in Arabia, 342. Succeſs againſt Heraclius, 343. Other conqueſts, 344. Begins a temple at Jeruſalem, 345. Subdues Afric, ibid. Perſecutes the chriſtians, 359.

Helio ſent with the purple to Valentine, 216.

Heliocrates's moderation to Stilicho, 169. Narrow eſcape, ibid.

Helpidius put to death by Phocas, 332, 334.

——— revolt and defeat, 371.

Hemeric's cruelty to his wife, 245. Stirs up Attila againſt her father, ibid.

Henry, ſucceeds to Baldwin, 508. Wars againſt the Greek emperors, ibid. Death, ibid.

Hera-

Heraclea burnt by the Perſians, 321. By Michael, 387.

Heraclianus defeats the Romans in Afric, 178. His conſulſhip erazed for revolting, 191. His great fleet, ibid. Defeat and death, ibid.

Heraclius's treachery to Ætius, 254. Death, 256.

——— the Edeſſan, his ſucceſs in Libya, 275. Forced to retire, 276, Conſpires againſt Phocas, 334.

——— the ſon of the former, declared emperor, 334. Puts him to death, ibid. Crowned, 335, Marries his brother's daughter, 336. Preparations againſt Coſrhoes, ibid. Succeſs againſt him, 337. Releaſes 50,000 Perſian priſoners, 338. Gains ſeveral victories, 340. Waſtes Lazica, and raiſes it, 339. Deſtroys the Perſian dominions, 340. Returns in triumph, 341. Thankful journey to Jeruſalem, ibid. Receives embaſſies far and near at Edeſſa, 342. Turns Monothelite, ibid. Invaded by the Saracens, ibid. Retires to Conſtantinople, 343. Perſecutes the orthodox, and neglects the Mohammedans, 344. His death, ibid.

——— the brother of Conſtantine III. disfigured by him, 348.

——— brother of Tiberius, defeats the Saracens in Syria, 353. In Cilicia, ibid. Put to death by Juſtinian, 354.

Hercules worſhipped at Carthage, &c. 628, Forty-five heroes of that name, 629, & n, Herebus worſhipped at Carthage, 631.

Heretics ſuppreſſed by Gratian, 11, 36. By Theodoſius, 43, 63, 84, 90. By Arcadius, 126. By Honorius, 170. By Leo, 279.

Hermits leave their cells to intercede for the Antiochians, 74.

Hermogenes concludes a peace with the Perſians, 308.

Herſa ſeized by Mundon, 299.

Heruli ſettled in Thrace, 300.

Heſperus, the ſon of Auſonius, his promotion, &c. 57, n.

Hilarius, a magician, burnt, 3.

Hilderic, king of the Hunns, 259.

Himerus, Leo's general, defeated, 407.

Himilico's journal, 668.

Hippo in Afric, deſcribed, 578. Taken by Sigiſvult, 218. Beſieged by the barbarians, 220. Taken and deſtroyed, 221.

Hippodrome at Conſtantinople, burnt by the mob, 297.

Hipponitis, the lake of, deſcribed, 584.

Hittites ſettle in Africa, 655, & n.

Homer's works burnt at Conſtantinople, 287.

Honoria, the daughter of Placidia, taken with her at Conſtantinople, 206.

——— ſiſter to Valentinian, her incontinence and treaſon, 222. Demanded in marriage by Attila, 245.

Honorius, whether the father of Theodoſius, 33.

——— the ſon of Theodoſius, born, 64. Choſen conſul, 68. Declared Auguſtus, 99. Sent for, and proclaimed emperor of the weſt, 105, 106. Under the guardianſhip of Stilicho, 116. Comes to the empire very young, 119. Stripped of Africa, 132. Complains to Arcadius, ibid. Recovers it, 135. Laws againſt falſe informers, 136. Marries Maria, 137. Demoliſhes the heathen temples, 144. Retires to Ravenna, 154. Triumphant entry into Rome, 157. Fixes his ſeat at Ravenna, 159. Acknowledges Conſtantine his collegue, 166. Marries Thermantia, 168. Laws againſt heretics, 170. Provokes Alaric to invade him, 174. His troops intercepted, and cut off, 175. Rejects Alaric's new propoſals, 176. His offers to Attalus rejected, 178. Supported by Theodoſius, ibid. By Heraclianus, 179. Agrees with Alaric, 182. Falls out with him, ibid. Breach of Faith to Conſtantine, 189. Proves irreconcilable to Ataulphus, 194. Confirms the churches aſyla, 195. Enters Rome in triumph, 199. Makes Conſtantius his collegue, 201. Attempts the recovery of Spain, 205. Falls out with Placida, 206. His death, ibid.

Hormiſdas ſucceſſor of Coſrhoes, defeated by the Romans, 323. Sues for peace and breaks it, 325. Defeated by Philippicus, ibid. Dethroned and impriſoned by Baramas, 327. His proud behaviour and miſerable end, ibid.

——— the laſt king of the Perſians, 342.

Hugh, prince, ſent priſoner to Conſtantinople, 478, 479. Succeſs againſt the Turks, 481. Shameful return into France, 482.

Humar's ill ſucceſs in Thrace, 359. Before Conſtantinople, ibid.

Huneric makes Peace with Zeno, 288.

Hunniades, John's, ſundry victories over the Turks, 544, Defeated at Varna, 545.

Hunns, their firſt ſally, 11. Ally with the Alans, ibid. Invade the Goths, 12. Incurſions into the eaſtern empire, 121. Ravage Thrace, &c. 158. Cut off by the Romans, 174. Invited by the uſurper John, 213, 214. Diſmiſſed by him, 216. Driven out of Thrace, 217. Aſſiſt the Romans againſt the Goths, 223. Re-enter Thrace, 230. Defeated before Orleans, 247. The end of their kingdom, 252. Defeated in Dacia, 273. Dreadful Inroads to Illyricum, 310. Ravages about Conſtantinople, 315.

Put

Put to flight by old Beliſſarius, ibid. Defeated by John Comagene, 486.

Hydroparaſtata, a ſet of Manichees ſo called, 47.

Hypatia's excellent character, 187. Murdered by his chriſtians, ibid.

Hypatius fined and baniſhed, 2.

——— Anaſtaſius's general, defeated by the Perſians, 298. Defeated and taken by Vitalianus, 301. Releaſed, ibid. Forced to revolt, 309. Defeated and put to death, ibid.

I.

JAcob's ſtony pillar worſhipped by the Canaanites, 634.

Jathanites aſſiſts Alex. Angelus, 507. Defeated and killed by Laſciris, ibid.

Iboreus heads the Lombards into Germany, 36.

Ibrions, who, and where ſited, 246.

Icarus's ſevere proconſulſhip, 60. Cruelty to the poor, 61.

Iconium taken by the Turks, 461.

Iconoclaſts, who, 361. Raiſe a revolt in the empire, ibid. The reſt ſee under images, ibid. & ſeq.

Idatius's writings and character, 260, n.

——— biſhop, taken priſoner, 269.

Idolatry forbid by Theodoſius, 61, 89. By Arcadius, 144. Whether revived during the ſiege of Rome, 171. Through the whole empire, 223.

Jerom's, his account of the Gothiſh cruelties, &c. 29.

Jeruſalem plundered by the Iſaurians, 158. Taken by the Perſians, 336. Hard fate of the chriſtians taken priſoners in it, ibid. Taken by Haumar, 344, & ſeq.

Jews, forbid to buy chriſtian ſlaves, 63. Privileged by Arcadius, 133. Maſſacre the chriſtians at Alexandria, 196. Expelled by St. Cyril, 197. Maſſacre them at Antioch, 333. Forbid to come within three miles of Jeruſalem, 341.

Ignatius, patriarch, his zeal, 398. Depoſed and impriſoned, ibid.

Iibel-Had-Deffa, a ſalt Mountain, deſcribed, 516.

Illus ſent againſt Zeno, 286. Revolts, ibid. Joins with Leontius, 289. Put to death, 290.

Illyricum, ſadly ravaged by the Goths, 29, 30. How divided, 32. Ravaged by the Hunns, 158. The frontiers of, fortified, 190. The weſtern part yielded to Theodoſius, 223. Its extent, 224. Repeopled by barbarian nations, 253. Ravaged by the Hunns, 310.

Images deſtroyed at Conſtantinople, 360. By Leo, 362. By Conſtantine IV. 366. By Leo III. 369. By Leo X. 382. Allowed by the ſecond council of Nice, 396.

Informers ſuppreſſed by Theodoſius, 41. By Gratian, 48. By Annaſtatius, 294.

Innocent, pope, ſent to treat with Alaric, 176.

Inſtitutes of Juſtinian, 318.

John, a pious hermit, his anſwer to Theodoſius, 93.

——— Arcadius's ſecretary, delivered up to Gainas, 146. Eſcapes to Conſtantinople, ibid.

——— Honorius's ſecretary, ſent to treat with Alaric, 171, 172. Aſſumes the purple, 212, 213. Taken and beheaded, 215, 216.

——— a deacon put to death, 228.

——— two hiſtorians of that name, 241, n.

——— admiral under Baſilius, his bravery and death, 275, 276.

——— general of Zeno, his ſucceſs againſt Leontius, 289.

——— the Scythian and the crookbacked, their bravery againſt the Iſaurians, 295. Againſt the Saracens, 354.

——— the deacon, made admiral, 357. Killed for his ſeverity, ibid.

John Zimiſces. Vide Zimiſces, 421.

——— Comnagen. Vide ſub Comnagen, 485.

Joſeph's treachery to Nicephorus, 419. Outwitted by him, ibid. & ſeq. Baniſhed, 420. Refuſes to ſubmit to the pope, 518. Baniſhed, ibid.

Jovinus takes the Imperial dignity, 189. His extract and character, ibid. Falls out with Ataulphus, 190. Put to death, ibid.

Jovius made prime miniſter to Honorius, 175. Interview with Alaric, 176. Swears perpetual war againſt him, 177. Sent to treat with Attalus, 178. Treachery to Honorius, ibid. & ſeq.

Irene converted, and married to Conſtantius, 364. Diſgraced for her devotion to images, 370. Takes the reins during her ſon's minority, ibid. Allies him with Charles of France, ibid. Breaks off, and marries him to Maria, 371. Stripped of her power, ibid. Recalled, 172. Undermines her ſon, 374. Cauſes him to be murdered, ibid. Enters Conſtantinople in triumph, 375. Her popularity, 375, ibid. Courted by Charles the Great, ibid. Depoſed and confined, 376. Her death, ibid.

——— encourages Alexius to regain the empire, 500.

Iſaac Comnenus ſeizes upon Cyprus, 494. His cruelties there, ibid. Defeats Angelus's fleet, 496.

—— Angelus's narrow escape, 495. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. Severity to Andronicus, ibid. Successes in Sicily, 496. Vain attempt on Cyprus, ibid. Treachery to Fred. Barbarossa, 497. Forced to submit to him, 498. Defeated by the Scythians, 499. His eyes put out, and flung into a prison, ibid. Released and restored, 502. His death, 503.

Isaurians ravage several provinces, 158. Banished out of Constantinople, 294. Revolt, ibid. Defeated, 295. Maintain the war six years, 296. Forsake their country, ibid.

Isdegestes, king of Persia, persecutes the christians, 139. Whether left guardian of Arcadius's children, 173.

Ishmael outwitted by Manuel, 393. Fury against Theophilus, 394.

Itaca, the antient name of Utica, 573.

Italy ravaged by the Goths, 153. Freed from them, 156. Invaded by Radagaisus, 160. Subdued by Odoacer, 285. By Theodoric, 290. By the Lombards, 320.

Julian, the son of Constantine, besieged, 188. Beheaded, 189.

Juno worshipped at Carthage, 618.

Jupiter worshipped at Carthage, 619. Whence so named, 620, n.

Justa, turns nun, 95.

Justin the emperor, proclaimed, 302. His rise and character, ibid. & seq. Conspired against 303. Rejects Cabades's proposals in favour of Cosrhoes, 304. Edict against the Arians, ibid. Death and character, 305. Piety to the destroyed cities, 304, 305.

—— nephew of Justinian, proclaimed, 319. Incensed against the Avari, 320. Cruelty to his kinsman Justin, ibid. Takes the Persarmenians under his protection, ibid. Runs mad, 321. Death and character, 323.

Justina's great sway over Valentinian II. 60. Favours the Arians, ibid. Persecutes the orthodox, 67. Her death, 82.

Justinian's code compiled and published, 224.

—— chosen consul, 303. Copartner with Justin, 305. Succeeds him, ibid. His proposals of peace rejected by the Persians, 307. Stratagem against them, 308. Concludes a peace with them, ibid. Insulted at Constantinople, 309. Fatal jealousy of Belisarius, 310. Fresh peace with Persia, 311. Truce, 314. Conspired against, 316. His death and charcter, 317. Code, &c. ibid. & seq.

—— the kinsman of Justin, his success against the Persians, 322. Disgraced, 323.

—— II. chosen emperor, 350. III

VOL. XVI.

success against the Bulgarians, ibid. Breaks the peace with the Saracens, ibid. Defeated by them, 351. Cruel revenge on the Sclavi, ibid. Busies himself with building, ibid. His massacre of the Constantinopolitans prevented, ibid. Deposed, 352, Defaced and banished, ibid. Flees to the Chazari, 353. To the Bulgarians, 354. An instance of his unforgiving temper, ibid. Restored to his crown, ibid. Cruelties and ingratitude, 355. Defeated by the Bulgarians, ibid. Horrid butcheries, ibid. Taken prisoner and beheaded, ibid.

Justinianus's brave defence of Constantinople, 549. Death, 553.

Juthungi defeated by Ætius, 219.

Ized, the son of Mahuvias, wastes Phrygia, 346. Ravages Sardinia, 348.

—— Mualbis revolts in Persia, 360.

Izeth repulsed before Constantinople, 358, 359.

K.

KEgenes well received at Constantinople, 452. Sound advice to the Roman general, ibid.

Kiun, some probable conjectures about that deity, 611, n.

L.

LAgodus driven out of Spain, 166.

Laodicea taken by Alexius 483. By his son, 486.

Larissa restored to Zeno, 289.

Laruneſiæ, islands, where, 588, n.

Lascaris Theod. sides with the usurper Angelus, 502. His flight to the Turks, ibid. Erects Nice into a new kingdom, 505. Success against the Turks, 508. Death, 509.

—— the son of Vataces, success against the Bulgarians, 512. His death, 513.

—— John, his son and successor, 513. His eyes put out, 517.

Lazi revolt to the Persians, 311. To the Romans, 313. Abandoned by them, 315. Appeased by Justinian, ibid. Treachery to Heraclius, 338. Corrupted by Cosrhoes, 339.

Lazica, its situation and government, 311.

Lemnos taken by the Saracens, 405.

Lent, marriages forbid during, 41. And the execution of criminals, 86.

Lentientes breaks into Gaul, 27. Defeated, ibid. Submit to Gratian, 28.

Leo, a tool of Eutropius, sent to Tribigil, 140. Defeated and killed, 141.

—— pope, sent embassador to Attila, 251. His character of Martian, 265,

——— I. proclaimed emperor. 265. His extract and rise, 266. Makes peace with the Ostrogoths, 270. Embassy to the revolted Marcellinus, 271. And to Genseric, ibid. Vast fleet against the latter, 274. Defeated by the treachery of Basiliscus, 276. Promotion of Zeno the Isaurian, 277. Flattery to Aspar, 278. Puts him to death, ibid. His death, 281.

——— the son of Zeno, created Cæsar, 281. His death, ibid.

——— II. the Isaurian, sent against the Saracens, 357. Success against Theodosius, ibid. & seq. Proclaimed emperor, 358. Why surnamed Iconomachus, ibid. Edict against images, 360. Insulted by the people for it, ibid. Deserted by the Romans, 361. His death, 364.

——— III. proclaimed, 366. Succeeds his father, 369. Promotes his brother, ibid. Reception of Eleric, ibid. Severity against saint and image-worshippers, ibid. Death, 370.

——— IV. Success against the Saracens, 380. Proclaimed emperor, 381. Cruelty to Michael and his family, 382. Victory over the Bulgarians, ibid. Severity to the image-worshippers, ibid. Murdered at the altar, 383. His character, ibid.

——— the son of Michael, created Cæsar, 400. Over-reached by a monk, 401. Released by means of a parrot, 402. His excellent character, 403. Defeated by the Bulgarians, ibid. & seq. Causes a schism in the church, 404. By his fourth marriage, ibid. His life attempted, 405. Invaded by the Saracens, ibid. His death and character, 408. Writings, ibid.

——— Zoe's general, makes the Romans lose a victory, 411. His treason and death, 412.

——— bishop, his wonderful golden machine melted down, 397.

Leontia, the wife of Phocas, crowned empress, 329. Her character, 330.

Leontius, the Chalcidian, revolts against Zeno, 289. Defeated by John, ibid. Besieged four years in Palmyra, 290. His death, ibid. & seq.

——— Phocas's general, defeated, 331.

——— a patrician, imprisoned by Justinian, 351. Deposes him, 352. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. Success against the Saracens, ibid. Deposed, defaced, and confined, ibid. Put to death, 354.

Leptis the Major, and Minor, described, 581.

Lerida taken by the Suevians, 235.

Leucadius condemned and pardoned by Maximus, 53.

Libanius's partial apology for Theodorus, 2. Narrow escape, 6. Invectives against Theodosius, 61.

Libellers, Arcadius's law against, 161.

Libyans, their odd manner of trading with the Carthaginians, 673.

Liehudes, patriarch, banished, 458.

Liguria plundered by Attila, 250.

Lions forbid to be hunted for shews, 195.

Lipparites success against the Turks, 451. Taken prisoners, ibid. Honourably dismissed, ibid.

Lisbon taken by the Suevi, 268. Betrayed by Remismond, 277.

Lisians, who, and where sited, 216.

Litorius's success against the Goths, 223, 225. Defeated and killed, ibid. His character, ibid.

Lombards first invasion of Germany, 36. Found their kingdom in Italy, 320. Defeat the Romans, 345. Oppose the iconoclasts, 361.

Longinus the brother of Zeno, defeated by Leontius, 289. Set aside from succeeding his brother, 292. Raises new commotions, 294. Stripped and sent into Isauria, 296. Revolts, ibid.

——— Selonicus joins in Longinus's revolt, 294. Taken and racked to death, 296.

Lopadusa, island, described, 588, n.

Lucianus, count of the east, misrepresented to Arcadius, 120. Barbarously put to death, ibid.

Lucius a pagan, attempts the life of young Theodosius, 192.

Luitprandius seizes Ravenna, 360. Driven out by the Venetians, 361.

Lupricinus provokes the Goths to revolt, 14. Defeated by them, 15.

Lusitania, seized by the Alans, 180. By the Suevians, 268.

Lycians degraded by Rufinus, 97. Restored by Arcadius, ibid.

Lyons taken by the Vandals, 162. By the Burgundians, 265. Retaken by Majoranus, 268. By the Burgundians, 278.

M.

MAcedonius a hermit's noble speech to the Antiochian judges, 75.

——— the orthodox bishop of Constantinople, deposed, 300.

Macodana, where situate, 583.

Macrobius's writings and character, 210, n.

Magicians, a number of them executed, under Valens, 2.

Magna, a zealous orthodox, 292.

Mago's genealogy, 666, n. Writings, 667.

Mahuvias deſtroys and ſells the Rhodian coloſſus, 345. His fleet, burnt, 346. Succeſs againſt the Romans, ibid. & ſeq.

Majeſty, the law of, repealed, 99.

Majoranus proclaimed emperor, 266. His riſe and extract, ibid. & ſeq. Succeſs againſt the Vandals, 268. In Gaul, ibid. & ſeq. Defeated at ſea, 269. Depoſed by Ricimer, 270. Put to death, ibid.

Mallobaudes's ſucceſs againſt the Germans, 27.

Malteſe language allied to the Punic, &c. 646.

Malus's writings and character, 291, n.

Mamut's war with Manuel, 489.

Maniaces recovers the Roman plunder by a ſtratagem, 441. Revolts, 448.

Manichees ſuppreſſed by Gratian, 31. Three ſects of them condemned to death, 47.

Manuel defeated in Egypt, 343. His bravery ſaves Theophylus, 391. Forced to flee to the Saracens, 392. Reſtored to great honours, 293. Retires, 396.

——— the emperor, proclaimed, 488. Treachery to the cruiſadors, ibid. Wars with the king of Sicily, 489. Makes peace with him, 490. Diſtreſſed by the Turks, ibid. Makes peace with them, 491. His death, ibid.

——— the ſon of Michael Paleolog. killed, 525.

——— the ſon of John defeated by Bajazet, 541. Reſigns to his nephew John, 542. Goes to beg aſſiſtance from the chriſtian princes, ibid. Reſtored, 543. Dies, ibid.

Maraſas, general of the Perſians, defeated and killed, 326.

Marcellinus brother of Maximus, defeated and drowned, 80.

——— raiſes a new empire in Dalmatia, 271. Joins with Anthemius, 274. Sent to invade Sardinia, 275. Aſſaſſinated, 276.

Marcellus revolts, and ſtabs himſelf, 316.

Marcian's revolt and puniſhment, 288.

Marcianus, general of Theodoſius, taken priſoner, 221. Marries his ſiſter Pulcheria, 242. Choſen emperor, ibid. His character, 243. Why ſet free by Genſeric, ibid. Anſwer to the proud Attila, 244. Convenes the council of Chalcedon, 252. Laws in favour of the church, 259. Admits Avitus his collegue, 262. His death and excellent character, 265.

Marcomir's treachery to Stilicho, 122. Suppoſed the father of Pharamond, 123.

Marcus declared Cæſar, 283.

Maria, the celebrated ſiſter of Theodoſius, 34.

——— daughter of Stilicho. born, 118. Married to Honorius, 137. Her death, 168. Rich tomb diſcovered, ibid.

Marina, daughter of Arcadius, born, 154. Her life, &c. 165.

Mark made emperor, and killed, 163.

Maronites ſettled in Libanus, 349. Defeated by Juſtinian, 350

Marriage between Jews and chriſtians, 84.

Marſeilles when founded, 677, n.

Martina married to Heraclius, 336. Poiſons the Conſtantines, 344. Her puniſhment, ibid.

Martinianus ſent againſt the Perſians, 321. Baffled before Niſibis, ibid.

Martinus, his houſe burnt by the Eutychians, 301.

Martyropolis taken by the Perſians, 297. Where ſituate, 308. Beſieged and forſaken, ibid. Betrayed to them again, 326. Retaken, ibid.

Mary, princeſs, put to death by Andronicus, 493.

Maſcezel, his ſingular character, 134. Miraculous ſucceſs againſt his revolted brother, ibid. & ſeq. Treacherouſly murdered by Stilicho, 136.

Maſſagetes invade the Romans, 308. When firſt called Turks, 320. Where ſituate, ibid. & ſeq. Defeated by Otoman, 520. Ravage Helleſpont, ibid.

Matthew, the ſon of Cantacuſen, aſſumes the purple, 539. Defeated and reſigns, ibid.

Mavia ſends ſuccours to the Romans, 29.

Mauritania, ſecured to the Romans, 226.

Mauritius ſent againſt the Perſians, 323. His extract and character, ibid. Vaſt ſucceſs againſt them, ibid. Created Cæſar, 324. Crowned emperor, ibid. Succeſs againſt the Perſians, 325. Kindneſs to young Coſrhoes, 327. Delivered from the Avari, ibid. Inſulted by his ſoldiers, 328. Forced to retire, 329. Put to death with five of his children, ibid.

Maximin put to death, 8.

Maximus Pupien, impriſoned, put to death for his witcheries, 3.

——— the father of Euclid, different from the magician, ibid.

——— general in Britain, his revolt, 48. His extract and character, 49. Croſſes over to Gaul, ibid. Defeats and kills Gratian, 50. A ſcurvy pun turned into a prophecy by his tools, 52. Acknowledged by Theodoſius's collegue, 58. Invades Valentinian's territories, territories, 78. Takes ſeveral cities from him, 79. Defeated by him, 80. Put to death, ibid

Maximus made emperor in Spain, 179.

——— Petronius undermines Ætius, 254. Murders Valentinian, and mounts the throne, 256, 257. Forces his Widow to marry him, 258. Murdered, ibid.

Maxula, where ſituate, 575. Deſcribed, ibid.

Mazichi, where ſituate, 160. Ravage Egypt, ibid.

Mecca ſeized by Mohammed, 342.

Medea taken by the Saracens, 356.

Medina taken by Mohammed, 342.

Megara, one of the three parts of Carthage, 567.

Mejerda, river, ſtops up the Carthaginian harbour, 570.

Melenus entertains the emperor, 435. Confined by him for his wealth, 436.

Mentz taken by the Vandals, 162.

Mercury worſhipped at Carthage, 627 & n,

Merdoſa declared Coſrhoes's ſucceſſor, 340. Murdered by his brother, ibid.

Merida taken by Richila, 226. Taken and ravaged by the Goths, 277.

Mermeroes defeated by Dorotheus, 306. Relieves Petra, 313. Repulſed before Archeopolis, 314.

Merobaudes proclaims young Valentinian emperor, 7. Commands under Gratian, 50. Put to death by Maximus, 53.

Meſopotamia put to fire and ſword by the Saracens, 283. By Coſrhoes, 311.

Meſſianus's embaſſy and entry into Thouſe, 257.

Mezizius proclaimed at Syracuſe, 347. Put to death, ibid.

Michael choſen emperor, 330. Defeated by the Bulgarians, ibid. Reſigns the empire to Leo, 381. Impriſoned by him, 382.

——— Traulus forces Leo to accept of the empire, 381. Treaſon and condemnation, 382. Mounts the throne by murder, 383, 384. Cruelty to Theodoſius and her four ſons, 384. Horrid hereſies, ibid. Defeated by Thomas, 385. Calamities under his wicked reign, 388. His death, 389.

——— the ſon of Theophylus, taken into partneriſhip, 393. Becomes a ſecond Nero, 397. Defeated by the Saracens, 398. Expedition into Crete, ibid. Murdered by Baſilius, 400. Funeral honours, 403.

——— a Paphlagonian, raiſed to the empire, 443. Leaves the government to his brother John, 444. Reſigns the empire, and dies, 446, 447.

——— Calaphates raiſed to the empire, 447. Cruelties and depoſition, ibid.

——— Stratonicus choſen emperor, 454. His inability, ibid. Conſpired againſt, 455. Defeated, 456. Reſigns, 457.

——— Ducas ſet up by his uncle, 463. His fatal indolence, ibid. Why nicknamed Parapanaces, 465. Forced to reſign, 466. Flees to Robert Guiſcard, 470.

——— Paleologus defeated by the Turks, 520. By the Catalans, 521, Dies for the loſs of his ſon, 525.

Milan taken by Attila, 250.

Mitetene taken by Conſtantine, 366.

Miſua, where ſited, 576.

Modares goes over to the Romans, 38. His character, 39.

Mohammed ſpreads his doctrine, 342. His death and ſucceſſes, ibid.

——— general of the Saracens, ſent againſt Juſtinian II. 350. Defeats him, ibid. Recovers Armenia, 353.

——— invites the Turks to his aſſiſtance, 449. His death, 450.

——— the ſon of Bajazet, defeats his four brothers, 543.

——— the ſon of Amurat, butchers all his brothers, 546. Shuts up the mouth of the Boſporus, 547. Beſieges Conſtantinople, 548. His fleet forced by the Genoeſe, 550. Impotent rage againſt them, ibid. Prodigious cauſway and bridge, 551 Cruelty to the Conſtantinopolitans, 554.

Moloch, the ſame with Chronus, 609 & n.

Monaxes's houſe burnt at Conſtantinople, 181.

Monaxius choſen conſul with Plintha, 200.

Monks confined to their deſerts, 89. Suppreſſed by Conſtantius IV. 367.

Monomachus ſent to poiſon Cantacuſenus, 537.

Monothelites, their doctrine, 342. Condemned by the council of Conſtantinople, 349. Revived by Philippicus, 356.

Mopſueſtia taken and fortified by the Saracens, 353.

Mopſus, who, 631. Worſhipped at Carthage, ibid.

Mortagon comes to the relief of Conſtantinople, 386. Defeated, ibid.

Moſoles Alexius ſet up by the Armenians, 373. His puniſhment, ibid.

Mundon, the Goth, invades the Romans, 299.

Mundus quells a riot at Conſtantinople, 309.

Murſa

Murſia ruined by the Quadi, 30.
Muſtapha ſtrangled by Amurat, 544.
Muſulani, who, and whence, 566 n.
Muzalo made guardian to John Laſcaris, 513. Aſſaſſinated by the nobility, 514.
Myſticus Nicol. excommunicates the emperor Leo, 404. Depoſed, 405.

N

NAbal, a city in Tunes, 578.
Nachoragan defeated in Lazica, 315.
Nannianus's ſucceſs againſt the Lentienſes, 27.
Nanrius's ſucceſs againſt the Franks, 81.
Narbonne taken by Ataulphus, 192. Relieved by Litorius, 223. Betrayed to the Viſigoths, 271.
Narſes pardoned by Maximus, 53.
——— defeated by the Romans, 203. Succeſs againſt them, 304. Revolts to them, ibid. Spirits up Coſrhoes againſt Phocas, 331. Defeats Germanus and Leontius, ibid. Burnt alive by Phocas, ibid.
Nazar defeats the Saracens fleet, 401.
Nazianzen's dreadful account of the Gothiſh invaſion, 37. Made biſhop of Conſtantinople, 43. Letter to Ellebichus, 72.
Neapolis, an antient emporium of the Carthaginians, where ſited, 577.
Nebridius marries Salvina, 34.
Nectarius, biſhop, burnt in his houſe by the Arians, 82.
Neocaſtrum, a Turkiſh fort at the mouth of the Boſporus, 547.
Nephiris, where ſituate, 547.
Nepos Licinius depoſed by Glycerius, 281. Flight, 282.
Nepotianus ſent againſt Remiſmond, 269.
Neptune, one of the Carthaginian deities, 625.
Neſtorius condemned by a council, 220.
Nevers, count, aſſiſts Manuel, 541. Taken priſoner, ibid.
Nice delivered up to Sclerus, 431. Taken by the chriſtians, 481. Made into an empire, 505. Taken by the Turks, 532.
Nicephorus rebels againſt his brother, 569. Baniſhed, ibid. Severely uſed by Conſtantine III. 373.
——— the brother of Conſtantine, baniſhed and murdered, 374.
——— a patrician, depoſes Irene, 376. Declared emperor, ibid. Inſtances of his cruelty, 377. Defeated by the Saracens, 378. Slain, 379. His character, 380
——— Phocas's ſucceſs in Crete, 418. Sent for to court, 419. Forced to take the purple, 420. Excommunicated and reſtored, ibid. Succeſs againſt the Saracens, 421. Murdered, 422. His character, ibid.
——— Uranus's ſucceſs againſt the Bulgarians, 436.
——— Comnenus's eyes put out for being virtuous, 439.
——— outwitted by Theodora, 453.
——— Baſilianus taken priſoner by the Turks, 461, 462.
——— Botoniates uſurps and reſigns the empire, 466.
Nicetas conſpires againſt Phocas, 333. Murdered by Nicephorus, 367.
Ninitinghus joins in Longinus's revolt, 394. Slain, 395.
Niſibis beſieged by Ardaburius, 204. Abandoned in a great fright, ibid.
Nonnichius's deſperate end, 187.
Norici defeated by Ætius, 219.
Notitia imperii, when and by whom written, 262 n.
Novellæ, the conſtitutions of Juſtinian, ſo called, 318.
Novempopulania, the ancient name of Auch, 200.
Nubians repulſed by Marcian, 252.
Numidia kept by the Romans, 226.

O

OAſis, a diſmal place in Libya, 129.
Obeliſk ſet up at Conſtantinople by Theodoſius, 90.
Odoacer defeated by Childeric, 278. His extract and character, 284. Puts Oreſtes to death, ibid. Kindneſs to his ſon, 285. Takes the title of king of Italy, ibid. Defeated by Theodoric, 290.
Odonachus driven out of Lazica, 314.
Odotheus over-reached by Promotus, 68. His defeat and death, 69.
Olbianus's ſucceſs againſt Thomas, 386.
Olybrius raiſed by Gratian, 32. By Theodoſius, 105.
——— marries Placidia, 271. Proclaimed emperor, 279. His death, 280.
Olympiodorus's account of the ſiege of Rome, 171. Other writings and character, 207 n.
——— a philoſopher heads the heathens againſt the chriſtians, 87. Retires out of Egypt, 88.
——— a confident of Honorius, diſcovers Stilicho's treaſon, 167. Made his prime miniſter, 169. His character and zeal againſt heretics, 170. Diſgraced, 175.
Onoulus murders Baſiliſcus, 287.
Optatus a Donatiſt biſhop, impriſoned for treaſon, 136. His death, ibid.
Optila, the murderer of Valentinian, 256.

Orchanes invades the Greeks, 527. Stratagem by which he takes Nice. 532.

Oreſtes inſulted by the monks at Alexandria, 196. Raiſed by Nepos, 282. Revolts againſt him, ibid. His extract, &c. ibid. Governs as tutor to his ſon, 283. Diſobliges the barbarians, ibid. Put to death, 284.

Orleans, beſieged by Attila, 246. Relieved by Ætius, 247.

Orthodox burnt alive, 13. Reſtored by Gratian, 31. By Theodoſius, 40. Perſecuted by Anaſtaſius, 300. Reſtored by Juſtin, 303. Perſecuted by the Perſians, 339.

Oſtrogoths, who. 12. Where ſettled by Marcian, 253. Driven out of Illyricum, 270.

Oſtrovi heads the Goths againſt Leo, 279.

Othoman invades the Greek empire, 519, 527. His death, 531.

P

PAcurianus's ſingular friendſhip for the Comneni, 468, 471. Defeated by the Scythians, 474.

Pæanius's Greek verſion of Ammianus, 264.

Paganiſm ſuppreſſed by Gratian, 46. Whence ſo named, 61. Suppreſſed by Theodoſius, ibid. & ſeq. Reſtored by Eugenius, 100. Laws againſt it revoked, 176. Renewed, 198.

Pagans at Alexandria maſſacre the chriſtians, 87. Laws againſt them, 198.

Paleologus's timely zeal for A. Comnenus, 469. Noble defence of Dyrrhachium, 471.

——— Michael's ſucceſs againſt the Servii, 489. & ſeq Goes over to the Turks, 513. Recalled, ibid. Declared guardian, 514. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. Vain attempt on Pera, 515. Grand entry into Conſtantinople, 516. Cruelty to the young emperor, 517. Defeated by the Bulgarians, 518. Submits to the pope for quietneſs ſake, ibid. Cruelty to the recuſants, ibid. Excommunicated for the Sicilian maſſacre, ibid. His death, 519.

——— Andronicus ſhakes off the pope's ſupremacy, 519. Cruelty to his brother Conſtantine, &c. ibid. Defeated by the Turks, 520. Marches againſt them, 522. Defeated by them, ibid. Fatal fondneſs for his worthleſs grandſon, 525. Makes him his collegue, 526. Falls out with him, 527. Makes peace with him, 528. Surpriſed and depoſed by him, 530. Retires and dies, 533.

——— his grandſon's wretched character, 525. Public ſubmiſſion, 526. Eſcape, ibid. Obtains half of the empire, ibid. Falls in and out with the emperor, 527. Stratagem againſt his uncle, ibid. Treachery to his grandfather, 528. Seizes on ſeveral of his provinces, 529. Prepares to beſiege Conſtantinople, 530. Takes it by ſurprize, ibid. Depoſes his grandfather, ibid. Succeſs againſt the Bulgarians, 531. Wounded and defeated by the Turks, 532. His death and character, 533.

——— John, the ſon of Andronicus, 534. Severity to his two ſons, 539. Impriſoned, 540. Reſtored, ibid. Dies, ibid.

——— Andronicus, the ſon of John, his treaſon and puniſhment, 539. Eſcape and revenge, 540. Obtains Selymbria for his retreat, ibid.

——— John, his ſon's treaty with Bajazet, 541. & ſeq. Crowned, 542. Baniſhed, 543.

——— John, the ſon of Manuel, crowned, 543. Goes to the council of Florence, 545. His death, 546.

——— Conſtantine, his embaſſy to Mohammed II. 546. Revives the union of the Greek and Latin churches, 548. Invaded by Mohammed ibid Beſieged, ibid. Offers of peace and tribute rejected, 551. Brave and pious defence, 552, 553. Death, 554.

Palelogus Philet. begs to head the army againſt the Turks, 523. Surpriſes and defeats them, 524. Cuts them all off, ibid.

Paleſtine infeſted with graſshoppers, 161. By the Bulgarians, 297. Subdued by the Saracens, 344.

Palic at Carthage, their worſhip, 639.

Palladius's incredible 700 miles journey in three days, 204.

——— the ſon of Maximus, choſen Cæſar, 257. Marries Eudoxia's daughter, 258.

Pamphilus put to death, 332.

Pancratius, a lying aſtrologer, his death, 373.

Pandecti of Juſtinian, 318.

Panormitan coins, ſome account of, 654, 655 & n.

Pappus's writings and character, 116 n.

Par s put to death, 6.

——— the city of, taken by Childeric, 273. Made a metropolis by Clovis, 300.

Paſiphus's ſurpriſing conſtancy on the rack, 2.

Pataici at Carthage, what, 639.

Patricius burnt for magic, 3.

——— the ſon of Aſper, marries Leo's daughter, 278. Narrowly eſcapes death, ibid. Defeated by the Perſians, 298.

Pat-

Patzinacæ, who, 451. Defeated by the Romans, 452.
Pavia taken and burnt by Attila, 250.
Pavium overturned by an earthquake, 386, 387.
Paul, St. church of, at Rome, by whom built, 69.
Paulinian family converted to chriſtianity, 85.
Paulinus, Eudocia's favourite, why put to death, 227.
Paulus, count, governor in Gaul, 272.
——— exarch of Ravenna, excommunicated, 361. Murdered, 362.
Peloponneſus ravaged by Genſeric, 274.
Pentadia, wife of Timaſus, refuges into a church, 130.
Pentapolitans oppoſe the iconoclaſts, 361, 362. When and how they became ſubject to the pope, ibid. 363, 369.
Pepin preſents Ravenna to the pope, 368.
Pergamus taken by the Saracens, 358. A juſt puniſhment for their horrid witcheries, ibid.
Peronia, the betrayer of Conſtantina, 332
Perozes defeated by the Romans, 306.
Perſarmenians defeated by the Romans, 306. Submit to them under Juſtin II. 320.
Perſians renew the war againſt the Romans, 203. Defeated by Ardaburius, ibid. & ſeq. Make peace, 204. Invade them anew, 230. And make a new peace, ibid. Renew the war, 304. Defeated, 306. Defeated in Syria, 307. Outwitted before Martyropolis, 308 Conclude a perpetual peace, ibid. 4,000 defeat 30,000 Romans, 312. Defeated by the Lazians, 313. Invade Lazica 314. Defeated, 315. Ravaged by Juſtinian, 323. By Mauritius, ibid. By Heraclius, 325. By Germanus and Philippicus, 326. By Heraclius, 338. End of their kingdom, 342. Court the Romans, 392.
Perſtalba rebuilt, and called Pannepolis, 426.
Petavia deſtroyed by the Quadi, 30.
Peter tortured to death by Honorius, 168.
——— a frier, ſtirs up the mob againſt Hypatia, 197
——— made duke of Naples, 362.
——— ordered over the Danube, 328. Put to death by Phocas, 330.
——— the hermit, ſtirs up the chriſtians to the holy war, 477 Goes at the head of it, 478. His ill conduct, 479. And defeat, 480.
——— earl of Auxerre, crowned emperor, 508. Put to death by Theodorus, 509.
Petra, beſieged and abandoned by the Lazians, 313. Taken and diſmantled by Beſſus, 314.
Peutinger's itinerary, 213 n.
Phenice ſubdued by the Saracens, 345.
Phiditia at Carthage, what, 604 n.
Philadelphia beſieged by the Turks, 520.
Philæni worſhipped at Carthage, 633.
Philænorum aræ, their diſtance from Hercules's pillars, 570, 571 n.
Philanthropenus's ſucceſs againſt the Turks, 519. Revolts, 520. Betrayed and puniſhed, ibid.
Philinus's writings and character, 667.
Philip emperor of Germany's treaty to inthrone Alexius III. 500.
——— of Sida, his voluminous works loſt, 240 n.
Philippicus's ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, 325 Put to flight by Cardariga, ibid. Recalled, ibid. Sent back and repulſed by the army, ibid. Reconciled and victorious, 326. Baniſhed by Tiberius, 353. Proclaimed emperor, 355. Marches to Conſtantinople, ibid. Favours the Monotheliteſ, 356. Blinded and depoſed, ibid.
Philoſtorgius's writings and character, 240 n.
Phocas declared and crowned emperor, 329 Cruelty to Mauritius, ibid. And to his friends, 330. His image ſent to Rome, ibid. Character, ibid. Calamities of his reign, ibid. Treachery to Narſes, 331. Horrid butcheries, 332. Inſulted and conſpired againſt, 333. Butchered by Heraclius, 334.
Photinians ſuppreſſed by Gratian, 31.
Picts invade North Britain, 54.
Piſſamina, the mother of Lætus, her extraordinary charity, 51. During the ſiege of Rome, 172.
Placidia, the mother of Valentinian II. born, 35. Conſents to Serena's death, 172. Carried captive by Alaric, 185. Married to Ataulphus, 193 n Ill uſed by Sigeric, 196. Sent back to Honorius, 198. Married to Conſtantius, 199. Retires to Theodoſius's court, 206. Reſtored to her former titles, &c. 215. Returns to the weſt with her ſon, ibid. Declared regent, 216. Inſtigated by Felix againſt Bonifacius, 217, 218. Invites him into Italy, 220. Reconciled to him, 221. Carried captive by Genſeric, 259.
——— daughter of Eudoxia, married to Olybrius, 271.
Placilla, the wife of Theodoſius. See Flacilla, 34.

Plague under Gratian, 17. Under Conſtantine IV. 366.
Plinthia's revolt and riſe, 200.
Pollentia, the famed battle of, 155.
Pollentius, an extraordinary youth, ſlain, 21.
Pompeius defeated by the Getæ, 301. Put to death for treaſon, 309.
Popes, their power, how founded, 362. By whom granted, 368, 369.
Portucal, where ſited, 263.
Prætexatus his riſe and excellent character, 65. Oration in the capitol, 66. Funeral honours, ibid.
Prætors at Carthage, their office, 608.
Priſcus aſſiſted in his hiſtory by Euphemius, 241 n.
——— Mauritius's general repulſed by the army, 325. Deſtroys 30,000 Avari, 328. Conſpires againſt Phocas, 333.
Proba opens Rome's gates to the Goths, 183.
Probinus choſen conſul by Theodoſius, 105.
Proclus diſſuades the adoption of Coſrhoes, 304.
Procopia crowned empreſs, 380. Baniſhed by Leo, 382.
Procopius an upright judge of Timaſius, 128. Bravery againſt the Perſians, 205.
Proculus, depoſed for extortion, 60.
——— the ſon of Titianus, put to death for the ſame crime, 96, 97.
Profuturus ſent againſt the Gauls in Thrace, 16. Defeated, ibid. & ſeq. His writings and character, 207, n.
Promotus's ſucceſs againſt the Greuthongi, 68. Sent againſt Maximus, 79. Saves Theodoſius from the barbarians, 91. His death, 92.
Proſerpine worſhipped at Carthage, 602, 627.
Proſtitutes forced to pay a tax, 293. Baniſhed by Theophylus, 395.
Proterus, an orthodox biſhop, murdered by the Eutychians, 266.
Protopaſchites ſuppreſſed, 193.
Pruſa taken by Orchanes, 527.
Pulcheria, the daughter of Theodoſius, born, 35. Her death and character, 67.
——— daughter of Arcadius, her character, 165. Takes the adminiſtration upon her, 195. Her ſignal piety, ibid. Marries her ſon to Eudocia, 202. Her death and character, 244.
——— ſiſter of Theodoſius, her ſtratagem to make him read what he ſigned, 237. Reigns after his death, 242. Marries Marcianus, ibid. & ſeq. Her death, gifts, &c. 253.
Punic tongue allied to the Hebrew, 644. Its numbers of the ſame nature, 648.
Pyrrhus, the worthleſs patriarch of Conſtantinople, 344. Flees into Afric, ibid. Betrays Antioch to the chriſtians, 482.

Q.

QUaderna taken by Maximus, 79.
Quadi, waſte the Romans country, 29.
Quadiremes firſt invented by the Carthainians, 670.
Quæſtors at Carthage, their office, &c. 601.
Quinquevirate at Carthage, 597.
Quintinus defeated by the Franks, 81.

R.

RAdagaiſus, king of the Hunns, invades the Romans, 150, & ſeq. His ſecond formidable invaſion, 160. Defeated before Florence, 161. Taken and put to death, ibid.
Ramizſus ravages Paleſtine, 335.
Ravenna, becomes the ſeat of the weſtern empire, 159. Deſcribed, ibid, Taken by Theodoric, 295. When become ſubject to the pope, 362, 363. The exarchate of, ibid. & ſeq. Its extent, 368. Given to pope Stephen III. ibid.
——— Valentian's tomb at, 256.
Raymond ſucceeds Gualtier in the cruiſade, 480.
Razaſtes, a Perſian general, defeated and killed by Heraclius 339, 340.
Rebaptizers ſuppreſſed by Gratian, 36. By Theodoſius II. 193.
Rechilus's ſucceſs in Spain, 234. Death, 235.
Regium, an imperial palace near Conſtantinople, 130.
Remiſmond waſtes Orenzo in Spain, 269. Makes peace with Theodoric, 272.
Remphan, ſome conjectures concerning that deity, 611, n. & ſeq. n.
Requiarius's ſucceſs in Spain, 235. Ravages Carthagena and Tarraco, 263. Deſeated and put to death, ibid.
Retiarium taken by Attila, 232.
Rhodes conquered by the Saracens, 345. Plundered, 378.
Richomeres ſent by Gratian againſt the Goths, 16. Arrives at Valens's camp, 19. Tries in vain to make him ſtay for Gratian, 28, 29. Succeſs againſt the Saracens, 59. Conſulſhip, extract, &c. 60.
Ricimer's ſucceſs againſt Genſeric, 264. His riſe and character, ibid. Cauſes Avita to be depoſed, ibid, & ſeq. And Majora-nus

nus to revolt, 266, & seq. Treachery to him, 270. Raises Severus to the throne, ibid. Absolute sway during the inter-regnum, 273. Marries Anthemius's daughter, 274. Revolts and besieges him in Rome, 279. Puts him to death, ibid. His own death, 280.

Ricomer promoted by Theodosius, 38.

Riotham, one of the kings of Britain, 54.

——— defeated by Euric, 273.

Riverines who, and where sited, 246.

Rivers worshipped by the Carthaginians, 632, & seq.

Robert crowned Latin emperor, 509. Defeated by John Ducas, ibid. His death, and the occasion of it, 510.

Roche-taillee, the castle of, by whom built, 191, n.

Roger, king of Sicily, wars with Manuel, 489. Makes peace with him, 490.

Roman empire under a grievious famine, 48. Pestilence, 234. End put to it by Odoacer, 285.

Romania, whence so called, 159.

Romans forbid to follow the Gothic dress, 133. Their famine and distress in Spain, 180. Submit to the barbarians, 181. Seized with a panick before Nisibis, 204. In Italy, revolt from Leo, 362. Submit to the pope as a temporal prince, ibid.

Romanus defeats the Scenitæ in Palestine, 297. Put to death by Phocas, 332.

——— Zoe's general, his treason, 411. Cruelty to Leo, 412. Takes the purple upon him, ibid. Allies with the Bulgarians, 413. Outwitted and dethroned, 414. His banishment and death, ibid.

——— the son of Constans, crowned, 415. Poisons his father, 417. His reign and character, ibid. Success against the Saracens, 418. Death, 419.

——— II. forced to marry Constantine's daughter, 440. Ill success against the Saracens, 441. Works of piety, 443. Death, ibid.

——— Diogenes. Vide sub Diogenes, 460.

Rome under a famine, 66. Another caused by Gildo, 133. Greatly streightened by Alaric, 171. Relieved at a vast expence, 172. Blocked up afresh by him, 174. Submits to him, 177. Under a grievous famine, 180, 181. Taken and burnt by the Goths, 183. Entered and plundered by Genseric, 258. Besieged by Ricimer, 279. Covered with the cinders of mount Vesuvius, 280. Submits to Odoacer, 285.

Ronzerius, Rouzerius, revolts against the Greeks, 520. Put to death by Michael, 521.

Rossi invade the Romans, 414. Defeated by Bardas, 424. By Zeminisces, 426. By Monomachus, 448.

Rotdrudis taught Greek by Elizeus, 370.

Rouas's design against the Boisci, 231. Proud message to the Romans, ibid. Makes peace with them, ibid. His death, ibid.

Rougas killed by lightning, 216.

Rufinus's treachery to Commodus, 92. To Tatianus, &c. 96. Made guardian to Arcadius, 116. His rise and character, 117. Avarice and ambition, 119. Cruelty to Lucianus, 120. Sets the empire in a flame, 121. Sues to be the emperor's collegue, 123. Murdered by Gainas, 124. Indignities offered to his corpse, ibid.

Rufus revolts against Philippicus, 356.

Rugula, the Hunn, assists Ætius, 221. Killed by lightning, 230.

Ruselius's revolt, 464. Taken prisoner, ibid. New revolt, 465. Sent in chains to Constantinople, ibid.

Ruspina, where situate, 581.

Rutilius's rise, writings, and character, 208, n. Itinerary, 209, n.

S.

SAbaras, the Persian, ravages Asia, 337.

Sabbatians suppressed, 193.

Sabinianus's success against the Ostrogoths, 288. Defeated by Pitza, 299.

Saccophori, Manichees, whence so called, 47.

Saes, the Persian, his treachery to Heraclius, 337. Flayed alive, ibid.

Saladin bribes Isaac against Barbarossa, 497.

Salia Flavius's sudden death, 2.

Salices, the battle of, 16.

Salone taken by Theodosius, 215.

Salvianus's character of all the northern nations, 227.

Salust, the stately palace of, burnt, 184.

Samaritan character, whether the same with the same with the Phœnician, 650.

Samona's rise, and treachery to Leo, 406. Disgraced, 407.

Samosata taken by Heraclius, 331.

Samuel defeated by the Romans, 436. Dies of grief, ibid.

Santabarenus's treachery to Leo, 401. Punishment, 403.

Sapor his death and long reign, 63.

——— a Roman general, sent to suppress the heretics, 43.

Saracens, repulsed by the Goths, 29. Waste Egypt, Syria, &c. 189. Desperate panic under Alamundarus, 204. Repulsed by Marcian. 252. Join themselves to Mohammed, 342. Success against the Romans, 343. Swift conquests, ibid, & seq. Obtain a peace from Constans II. 346. Cruel ravages in Afric, 348. In Sicily, ibid. Repulsed before Constantinople, ibid. Make peace with Constantine III. 349. Defeated in Syria, ibid. Repulsed before Antaradus, 353. Driven out of Armenia, ibid. Fresh invasion, 356. Defeated at sea, 365, 366. By Leo III. 369. Persecute the christians, ibid. Repulsed by Irene, 370. Bought off by the Persians, 371. Repulsed in Cilicia, 374. Success against Irene, 375. Against Nicephorus, 378. Defeated by Leo, 380. Settle in Crete, 387. Signal victory there, 388. Seize on Sicily, 389. Defeated by Petrona, 398. By Basilius, 401. New conquests on the Romans, 405. Defeated by Heraclius, 406, 407, 415. In the east, 418, 421, 424.

Saragossa plundered by the Suevians, 235.

Sarbarazes repulsed before Chalcedon, 340. Revolts to Heraclius, ibid. Put to death, by Cosrhoes, 340.

Sardica taken by Crumus, 379.

Sardinia taken by Genseric, 271. Reduced by Marcellinus, 276.

Sarmatians, cruelties in the Roman territories, 29. Cut off by Theodosius, 64.

Sarnabazas sent against Heraclius, 338. Defeated, 340.

Sanus sent against the Goths, 161. Against Constantine, 163. Repulsed by him, 164. Disobliges Alaric, 182. Noble defence and death 190.

Saturacius lays the Sclavi under tribute, 371. Conspires against Irene, 375. Dies of grief, ibid.

——— made collegue with Nicephorus, 378. Narrow escape, 379. Retirement and death, 380.

Saturn's inhuman worship at Carthage, 602. The chief deity of that nation, 608. Whence the fable of his devouring his children, ibid. & n. The same with Moloch, 609, n. Worshipped by other nations, 613, n.

Saul, a Gothish general, under Theodosius, 101.

——— a Pagan one under Honorius, 155.

Saxons settle at Nantes, &c. 273.

Scandinavia, the original country of the Lombards, 36.

Scenitæ Arabs defeated, 297.

Sclavi join with the Avari, 328. Against Heraclius, 339. Defeated by Constans II. 346. Leave Justinian in the lurch, 350. Cruelly punished by him, 351.

Sclavonia, whence so called, 346.

Scots invade North Britain, 54.

Scyrri defeated by Theodosius, 45. In Thrace, 174.

Scythians, desperate defence, 425, 426. New invasion, 473. Total defeat, 474. New War, 476. Repulsed before Adrianople, ibid. By John Comnagen, 486.

Sebastian sent against the Goths, 18. Success against them, 19.

——— made collegue to Jovinus, 190. Murdered by Ataulphus, ibid.

Selymbria inclosed within Anastasius's long wall, 299. Noble defence against the Turks, 548. Taken, ibid.

Saturninus, the base judge of Timasius, 128. Delivered up to Gainas, and banished, 146. Escapes to Constantinople, ibid.

Senate's embassy to Theodosius for the altar of Victory, 83. Converted to christianity, 85.

Senators how to be tried, 8.

Serapis, the temple of, demolished by Theodosius, 87, & seq.

——— the statue of, broken, 88.

Serena, the celebrated sister of Theodosius, 34. Married to Stilicho 105. Plunders the statue of Cybele, ibid. Put to death, 172.

Sergius's revolt and death, 316.

——— patriarch of Constantinople, left prime minister by Heraclius, 337

——— governor of Sicily, raises a revolt, 359.

Servii defeated, 486.

Seven, some curious remarks on that number, 615, n.

Severa, mother of Gratian, recalled by him, 8.

Severus Acilius's writings and character, 26, n.

——— a priest put to death by Theodosius, 228.

——— raised to the throne by Ricimer, 270. Consulship, ibid. Death, 273.

Seville taken by Attila, 233.

Shibkah, among the Arabians, what, 580, n.

Sicca Venerta. See Succoth Benoth, 642.

Sicily plundered by the Vandals, 226. Ravaged by the Saracens, 348.

Siculo, Punic coin, explained, 654.

Sigeric chosen king of the Goths, 196. Murders Ataulphus's children, ibid. Murdered, ibid.

Sigismund sent to assist Manuel, 541. Defeat and narrow escape, ibid.

Sigiſvult's ſucceſs againſt Boniſacius, 218.
Silentarii among the Romans, what, 292.
Silenus's writings and character, 669.
Simeon wars againſt the Romans, 403. Cruelty to them, 404. New invaſions, 409. Allies with Romanus, 413.
Simplicius put to death, 8.
Sinex's treachery and death, 218.
Sirmium taken by the Avari, 324.
Siroes dethrones and murders his father, 340. Makes peace with Heraclius, ibid. Murdered by Barahanes, 341.
Siſibranum taken by Beliſſarius, 312.
Sittas defeated by the Perſians, 304. Succeſs againſt them, 306.
Slaves encouraged by Honorius to take up arms, 162. 40,000 of them deſert over to Alaric, 175.
Socrates's writings and character, 238 n.
Soiſſons made a ſmall kingdom, 272.
Soiyman's irruption into Thrace, 358. Death, ibid.
——— the ſon of Cutlumoſes, makes peace with Rome, 470. Attempts to ſave Nice, 481.
——— the ſucceſſor of Orchanes, invades Europe, 539.
Sophia, the empreſs, inſpires Juſtin with cruelty, 320. Moving letter to Coſrhoes, 322. Cabals againſt Tiberius, 323. Deprived of her treaſure for it, ibid.
——— St. the church of, by whom burnt, 83.
Soſipater Char. his writings and character, 212 n.
Sozomen's writing, and character, 239 n.
Sozopetra deſtroyed by Theophylus, 394.
Sozopolis taken by ſtratagem, 486.
Spain ſubmits to the Britiſh Conſtantine, 166. Invaded by the Alans and barbarians, 180. Cruelly ravaged by them, ibid. How divided amongſt them, ibid. Part of, ſubdued by Attila, 233. By the Goths and Suevians, 285.
Spendoſthalbus makes peace with the Romans, 427 & ſeq.
Spire taken by the Vandals, 162.
Squiri, &c. ſettled in Scythia Minor, 253.
Statues, heathen, demoliſhed in Egypt, 88. At Rome by the Goths, 184.
Stephen, a cruel miniſter of Juſtinian, 351. Burnt alive, 352.
——— the ſon of Baſilius, turns monk, 400. Made patriarch of Conſtantinople, 403.
——— the ſon of Romanus, crowned, 412.
——— over-reaches Baſilius, 432.
Stilicho's revenge on the Baſtarnæ, 92. Commands the Romans againſt Eugenius, 101. Plunders Jupiter's temple, 105. Made guardian to young Honorius, 116. His riſe and character, 118. Avarice, 119. Hatred againſt Rufinus, ibid. Arrogates an unlimited power, 121. Makes peace with the Germans, 122. Marches to Arcadius's aſſiſtance, 123. Stopped ſhort by him, ibid. Sends him forces by Gainas, ibid. Defeats Alaric in Greece, 126. Suffers him to eſcape, ibid. Undermined by Eutropius, 127. Falls out with St. Ambroſe, 131. Preparations and ſucceſs againſt Gildo, 134. Treachery to Maſcezel, 136. Exploits in Britain, 137. Choſen conſul, 145. Suppoſed to have ſtirred up Alaric, 153. Marches againſt him, 155. Makes peace with him, 156. Succeſs againſt Radagaiſus, 160. Invites the northern nations into Gaul, 162. Holds private correſpondence with Alaric, 166. Diſgraced and put to death, 167. With all his friends after him, ibid. His character, ibid. & 169. Eſtate confiſcated, 169.
Strasburgh taken by the Vandals, 162.
Succoth Benoth, probable conjectures concerning that deity, 642.
Suevians enter Gaul, 162. Spain, 234. Submit to Theodoric, 263. Chuſe Maldra for their king, 264. Fall out among themſelves, 267. Reconciled by him, 268.
Suffetes at Carthage, their office, 593 & n. Whence ſo called, 598, 599 n.
Sun worſhipped at Carthage, 627.
Suniator, a betrayer of his country, 603 n.
Sunieric's ſucceſs in Luſitania, 269, 270.
Sunno makes peace with Stilicho, 122. His treachery to him puniſhed, ibid.
Suphian repulſed before Conſtantinople, 358.
Suphianus defeated by Florus, 348.
Sureta's notitia, when firſt publiſhed, 112 n.
Syagrus the ſon of Ægidius, king of Soiſſons, 272.
Symmachus ſent to obtain the liberty of pagan worſhip, 47. Repulſed, ibid. Baniſhed by Theodoſius, 83. Recalled and promoted by him, 84. Sent by the heathens to Valentinian, 93. His writings and character, 109 n. Extract and riſe, ibid.
Synadenus's ſucceſs againſt the rebel Andronicus, 527 & ſeq.
Syracuſe plundered by the Saracens, 348. Taken by them, 401.
Sygiannes a wicked tool of Andronicus, 525. Forſaken by the Turks, 528.
Syria ravaged under Theodoſius, 61. Invaded by the Goths, 122 Ravaged by the Perſians, 310. & ſeq. Subdued by the Saracens, 343.

Syria Dea worſhipped at Carthage, 630.
Syrophœnicians, who, and whence, 591.

T

TAifales driven out by Athanaric, 14. Join with the Gruthungi, ibid.
Talicius's ſucceſs againſt the Scythians, 474.
Tamocoſrhoes defeated by Maurit'us. 324.
Tancret the Norman, his riſe and progeny, 470.
Tangripermes repulſed by Alexius, 483.
Tangrolipix's ſucceſ. againſt Mohammed, 450. Made king of Perſia, ibid. Ill ſucceſs againſt the Arabians, 451. Huffing meſſage to the emperor, 451. Excurſions into Iberia, 453.
Tarbigil. Vide Tribigil, 140.
Tarichæ iſlands, where ſituate, 586 n.
Tartars ſucceſs againſt the Turks, 510, 513, 519.
Tatianus accuſed by Rufinus, 96. Baniſhed, ibid.
Tatitius deſtroys the Cruiſado fleet, 483.
Taurominium taken by the Saracens, 405.
Teichomerus betrayed and murdered, 446.
Telemachus a hermit, ſtoned to death, 157.
Temples, pagan, ſuppreſſed by Gratian, 46. Forſaken under Theodoſius, 85. Demoliſhed under Arcadius, 144. Or turned into churches, 145.
Terentius ſacrificed to the mutinous ſoldiers, 175.
Thala, where ſituate, 583.
Thapſus, where ſituate, 582.
Themiſtius ſent embaſſador to Gratian, 10. His worthleſs ſpeech before the ſenate, ibid. Embaſſy to Theodoſius from the Conſtantinopolitans, 38. Fifteenth oration addreſſed to him, 44. Extract, writings, and character. 112 n.
Thena, where ſituate, 583.
Theocritus executed for treaſon, 303.
Theodomir, where ſettled with his Goths, 253. Invades the eaſtern empire, 280. His death, ibid.
Theodora her magnanimity ſupports the frighted emperor Juſtinian, 309. Inclined to Eutychianiſm, 319.
—— —— widow of Theophilus takes the adminiſtration, 395 Severity to the Manichees, 396. Reſigns, 397. Her death, ibid.
—— —— Conſtantine's daughter raiſed to the imperial government, 447. Mounts the throne, 454. Her good, but ſhort reign, ibid.
Theodoric ſucceeds Vallia in Spain, 200. Beſieged by Litorius, 225. Takes him priſoner, ibid. Makes peace with the Romans, ibid. Succeſs againſt Attila, 247. Bravery at the battle of Chalons, 248. Death, ibid
—— —— the murderer and ſucceſſor of Thoriſmond, 252. Embaſſies to Requinarius in Spain, 263. Defeats him, ibid. Returns to Tholouſe, 267. Defeated by Majoranus, 268. Sues for peace, ibid. Murdered by his brother, 273.
—— —— the ſon of Triarius invades Zeno, 287. Enters Macedonia, 288. Makes peace with Zeno, 289. Succeſs againſt Leontius, ibid. Makes a new treaty with Zeno, 290. Invades and ſubdues Italy, ibid. Acknowledged king of it by the emperor, 295. Pays a kind of ſubmiſſion to him, ibid. Aſſiſts Mundon againſt him, 299. Favours the Arians, 304.
—— —— king of Italy delivered up hoſtage to Leo, 270.
Theodoropolis, whence ſo called, 428.
Theodorus put to death for magic and treaſon, 1.
—— —— Manlius's conſulſhip, 138. Riſe and character, ibid. & ſeq.
—— —— the reader, his hiſtory imperfect, 240 n.
—— —— joins in Longinus's revolt, 294. Taken and beheaded, 296.
—— —— prefect of the eaſt, put to death, 332.
—— —— Cappadocian, conſpires againſt Phocas, 334. Put to death, ibid.
—— —— brother of Heraclius's ſucceſs againſt Sais, 339. Defeated by Haumar, 342.
—— —— revolt and baniſhment, 454, 455.
—— —— deſpot of Epirus, 508. Treachery to Peter, 509. Aſſumes the purple, 510. Defeated by John, ibid. His eyes put out, ibid. & ſeq. Reſtored by Azen, 512.
Theodoſiolus put to death by Valens, 4. Not the ſame with the great Theodoſius, 8.
Theodoſipolis defended by biſhop Eunomius againſt the Perſians. 204. Taken by Cabades, 297. Retaken by Conſtantine IV. 366.
Theodoſitius driven out of Spain, 166.
Theodoſius unjuſtly put to death by Gratian, 9. Honours conferred upon him after his death, ibid. &c.
—— —— his ſon retires into Spain, 10. Sent for back by Gratian, 30. Succeſs againſt the Sarmatians, 31. Raiſed to the imperial dignity, 32. Singular modeſty and and valour, ibid. Extract, riſe, &c. 33. Why called Theodoſius, 34. Addreſſed to by ſeveral cities, 38. Succeſs againſt the Goths, ibid. & ſeq. In Thrace, 39. Sickneſs, baptiſm, and recovery, 40. Zeal for orthodoxy, ibid. Wholſome laws, 41. Victory over the Goths, 42. Honours to Athanaric highly pleaſing to them, 44. Summons an œcumen. council, 45. Succeſs againſt the Goths, ibid. Subdues and ſettles them, 47. Allies with the revolted Maximus, 58. Succeſs againſt the Saracens, ibid. Great ſway over Valentinian II. 60. Severe laws againſt idolatry, 61. & ſeq. Againſt inceſtuous marriages, 63. Againſt heretics, ibid. Againſt Jews, ibid. Sends plentiful ſupplies of corn to Rome, 66. Clemency to the conſpirators, 67. Succeſs againſt the Greuthungi, 68. Clemency to them, ibid. Marries Galla, 69. A noble wiſh of his, 70. Inſulted by the Antiochians, ibid Severity to that ungrateful city, 71. Yet mitigated by him, 72. Forgives them wholly at length, 77. His letter to them, ibid. & ſeq. Goes to ſuccour Valentinian, 78. Marches againſt Maximus, 79. Succeſs againſt him, 80. Clemency to his adherers, 81. To his family, 82. To Valentinian, ibid. To the Arians, ibid. Laws againſt heretics, 84. Entry into Rome, ibid. Proves the means of converting that city, 85. Clemency to the pagans of Alexandria, 87. Demoliſhes idolatry there and in Egypt, ibid. His ſilver ſtatue reared, 90. Laws againſt apoſtates and heretics, ibid. Marches againſt the barbarians, ibid. Makes dreadful havock of them, 91. In great danger from them, ibid. Laws againſt extortion, 97. Againſt the Lycians, ibid. & ſeq. Marches againſt Eugenius, 98. Freſh laws againſt heretics, &c. 99. Forces the Alps, 101. Defeats Eugenius, 102. Suppoſed by a miracle, ibid. Clemency to the revolted, 103. To Eugenius's family, 104. Divides the empire between Arcadius and Honorius, 106. His death, obſequies, and character, ibid. & 107. Maſſacre of the Theſſalonians, 108. Repentance for it, ibid.

Theodoſius, his ſquare and column finiſhed at Conſtantinople, 100.

——— II. the ſon of Arcadius born and baptized, 152. Created emperor, 153. But eight years old when his father dies, 164. The peaceful ſtate of his empire, 172. Piouſly brought up by his mother, 195. Removes to Eudoxiopolis, 199. Refuſes to acknowledge Conſtantius, 201. Marries Eudocia, 202. Wars againſt the Perſians, 203. Defeats them, ibid. & ſeq. Makes peace with them, 205. Kind reception of Placidia, 206. Proclaimed emperor of the weſt, 211, 212. Sends Placidia thither, 214. Makes her ſon emperor, 216. Makes peace with the Vandals, 222. Deſtroys all the relics of paganiſm, 223. His code publiſhed, 224. Jealouſy of Eudocia, 227. Sends a fleet to Valentinian, 228. Shameful peace with the Hunns, 231. Slavery to Attila, 232. Makes a more ſhameful peace with him, 235. His death and character, 237.

——— the ſon of Ataulphus born, 194. Dies in Spain, 195.

——— the ſon of Mauritius put to death by Phocas, 330.

——— the brother of Conſtantius II. put to death by him, 346.

——— an obſcure perſon proclaimed emperor, 357. Enters Conſtantinople, ibid. Reſigns to Leo, 358.

Theodota married to Conſtantine Porphyr. 373. Brought to bed of a prince, 374.

Theodulus's writings and character, 291 n.

——— a cruel miniſter of Juſtinian, 351. Burnt alive, 352.

Theon's writings and character, 116 n.

Theophanes put to death, 332.

Theophania married to Saturatius, 379. Retires from the world, 380.

Theophano takes the government upon her, 419. Intrigues with Nicephorus, 420. Married to him, ibid. Treachery to him, 422. Baniſhed, 423. Recalled, 429.

Theophobus, his extract, ſucceſs, and ſtratagem againſt the Saracens, 391. Singular fidelity to Theophylus, 393. Death, 395.

Theophylact, the ſon of Romanus, deſigned for the church, 412. Dethrones him, 414. Falls out with his brother, ibid. Baniſhed, 415.

Theophylus biſhop of Alexandria exaſperates the heathen, 86, 87.

——— one of the compilers of the Juſtinian pandects, &c. 318.

——— ſtratagem againſt the murderers of Leo, 389. Ingratitude to Manuel, 392. Great honours to him, 393. Pardons the revolted Perſians, ibid. Grief for the loſs of Amorium, 394. Death and character, 395. Burns his wife's ſhip, ibid.

Thermantia, the celebrated daughter of Honorius, 34.

Thervingi driven out by the Hunns, 12. Fall foul upon the Romans, 15.

Theſmantia, the celebrated mother of Theodoſius, 33.

——— the daughter of Stilicho born, 118. Mar-

Married to Honorius, 168. Divorced, ibid. Her death, ibid. & ſeq. Stately tomb diſcovered, 169.

Theſſalians defeat Alaric, 153.

Theſſalonica taken by the Saracens, 405. Betrayed to the king of Sicily, 494.

Theſſalonicans, 7000 maſſacred by Theodoſius, 108.

Thomas's extract, treaſon, and conqueſts, 384. Repulſe before Conſtantinople, 385. Defeats and kills Gregory, 386. Defeated by the Bulgarians, ibid. Impriſonment and death, ibid.

Thoriſmond's bravery at the battle of Chalons, 248. Proclaimed king of the Goths, ibid. Returns home, 249. Repulſes Attila, 252. Murdered, ibid.

Thouloufe Vide Toulouſe, 192.

Thrace ravaged by the Goths, 16. Abandoned to them, 17. Deſtroyed by the Quadi, 30. Freed by Theodoſius, 39 Ravaged by the Hunns, 216. Repeopled by the barbarians, 253. Waſted by the Hunns, 283. Ravaged by the Turks, &c. 521, 523.

Tiberius, Juſtin's prime miniſter governs during his madneſs, 322. Created Cæſar, ibid. Choſen emperor, 323. Creates Anaſtatia his empreſs, ibid. Generoſity to Hormiſdas, 324. Death and character, ibid.

——— brother of Conſtantine III. diſfigured by him, 348.

——— Apſimar depoſes and confines Juſtinian, 352. Driven out by him, 354. Put to death, ibid.

——— the ſon of Juſtinian II. murdered in a ſanctuary, 355, 356.

Tigranes yields his ſhare of Armenia to Theodoſius, 230.

Timaſius ſent general againſt Maximus, 79. Commands the Romans againſt Eugenius, 101. Baſely betrayed by Eutropius, 128. Dreadful baniſhment, 129.

Timotheus, the Eutychian, raiſes new troubles, 300.

Toulouſe taken by Ataulphus, 192. Made the metropolis of the Gothiſh kingdom, 200. Beſieged by Litorius, 225.

Trading forbid to men of quality, 170.

Trajan murders the king of Armenia, 6. Sent againſt the Goths in Thrace, 16. Defeated by them, ibid. & ſeq. Degraded, 18. Noble ſpeech to Valens, ibid. Death, 21.

Trapeſond, the kingdom of, by whom founded, 506.

Trauſtila, the aſſaſſin of Valentinian, 256.

Treaſon, men of quality when guilty of, how their eſtates were diſpoſed of, 41, The laws againſt, mitigated, 99.

Trebilis's kindneſs to Juſtinian, 354. Recompenced by him, ibid. Succeſs againſt him, 355.

Trebonianus, a compiler of the Juſtinian code. &c 318.

Treves burnt by the Franks, 191.

Triarius ſlain at Argentaria, 27.

Tribigil revolts againſt Arcadius, 140. In great diſtreſs, 141. Succoured by Gainas, ibid. Plundering march againſt Conſtantinople, 145. Death, 147.

Triton river, 584.

——— worſhipped at Carthage, 631.

Trocondus ſent againſt Zeno, 286. Revolts, ibid. Taken and beheaded, 289.

Tunes deſcribed, 574. By whom founded, ibid.

Turks, their firſt appearance, 449. Inlarge their conqueſts, 458. Defeated by Diogenes, 461. Make new Inroads, 470. Succeſs in Aſia, 472. Defeated by the cruiſadors, 481. By Alexius, 484. By John, 486. Make peace, ibid. With Manuel, 490. Totally defeated by him, 491. Drven out by the Tartars, 510, 513. Succeſs in the Mediterranean, 520. Firſt invited into Europe, 521. Betrayed by the Greeks, 522. Their revenge, ibid. Victory over Paleologus, ibid. Defeated by Philes, 524. Shut up by ſea and land, ibid. Intirely cut off, ibid. New invaſion, 527. Succeſs againſt Andronicus, 532.

Turpilio ſacrificed to the mutinous ſoldiers, 175.

Tuſca, river, one of the limits of Africa Propria, 572.

Tyrach defeated by the Romans, 452.

Tyrians, built cities in Spain, 559. Ther bloody worſhip of Hercules, 628.

Tzachus erects a new principality at Smyrna, 475. His treachery to Delaſſenus, ibid. Death, 476.

Tzibus forces the Lazians to revolt, 311.

V.

Valemir, king of the Goths, where ſettled, 253.

Valens's ſeverity againſt philoſophers, 2, & ſeq. Againſt the Theodoſians, 4. Againſt Paras, 5, 6. Peace with Perſia, 6. Settles the Goths in Thrace, 13. Aſſaulted by them, 15. Offers a new peace to Sapor, 16. Marches againſt the Goths, 18. Defeated and killed, 21. His character, 22. Fatal jealouſy of Gratian, 28.

Valentine general of Honorius, his narrow eſcape, 175. Promotion, ibid.

Valentinian II. choſen emperor, 7. Governed by his mother, 59, 60. Defeats the Sarmatians, 64, Rebuilds St, Paul's church at at Rome, 69. Invaded by Maximus, 78. Perſuaded to renounce Arianiſm, ibid. Succoured by Theodoſius, 79. Reſtored by him, 82. Rejects the requeſts of the heathen, 93. Deſires to be baptized by St. Ambroſe, ibid. Murdered, ibid. & ſeq. His character, obſequies, &c. 95.

—— III. the ſon of Placidia, born, 201. Betrothed to Eudoxia, and created Cæſar, 215. Crowned emperor, 216. Marries Eudoxia, 223. Yields part of Illyricum to Theodoſius, 224. His offspring by Eudoxia, ibid. Embaſſy to Attila, 244. Over-reached by him, 245. Second embaſſy and truce with him, 251. Murders Ætius and his friends, 254. Murdered by Maximus, 256 His character, 257.

Valerianus, maſter of the horſe, ſlain, 21.

Vailia, choſen king of the Goths, 196. Makes peace with Honorius, 198. Wholeſome advice to him, ibid. Succeſs againſt the Silingi, 199. And Alani, 200. His reward and death, ibid. & ſeq.

Vandals enter Gaul, 162. Defeated by the Franks, ibid. Over-run Gaul, 175. Spain, 180. Defeated by Ætius, 266. Over-run Afric, 221. Make peace with the Romans, 222. Conqueſts in Afric, 226. Repulſed by Majoranus, 268.

Vandaluſia, whence ſo called, 180.

Varanes choſen conſul of the eaſt, 181.

—— renews the war againſt the Romans, 203. Repulſed before Theodoſiopolis, 204 Defeated, 205. Makes a hundred years peace, ibid.

Vates among the Carthaginians, in great eſteem, 660.

Vegetius's writings and character, 112, n.

Venetia, the country of, abandoned, 250.

Venetians, antient, deſcribed, 250. Support Gregory I. 361. Succeſs againſt R. Guiſcard, 47, 473. Aſſiſt young Alexius, 500 At the ſiege of Conſtantinople, 504. Their ſhare of the Empire, 505. Settle at Conſtantinople, 517. Recover the Iſlands of the Archipelago, 518.

Venice, the foundation of, 250.

Venus Calvus worſhipped at Carthage, 618.

Verianus driven out of Spain, 165. Put to death, ibid.

Verina obtains Baſiliſcus's pardon, 277. Conſpires againſt Zeno, 283.

Veſtals ſuppreſſed by Gratian, 46.

Veſuvius a dreadful eruption of, 280.

Victims, practiſed by the Carthaginians, 602, 608. Aboliſhed by Tiberius, 639. The horrid exceſs of them, 640. Eſpecially in calamitous times, ibid. & n.

Victor Aurel. his advice at the battle of Adrianople rejected, 19. Bravery and death, 21.

—— the ſon of Maximus made his collegue, 53, & ſeq. Put to death by Theodoſius, 81.

—— the younger, his writings and character, 111, n.

Victory, the altar of deſtroyed by Gratian, 46.

Vienne taken by Gerontius, 186.

Vigilantius ſacrificen to the mutinous ſoldiers, 175.

Viminacium taken by the Hunns, 232.

Vindelici ſubdued by Ætius, 219.

Vindemir, invades Italy, 280.

Viſigoths, who, and where ſettled, 253. Defeated by Ægidius, 272. More ſucceſsful in Spain ibid In Gaul, ibid.

Vitalianus raiſes a revolt in favour of the orthodox, 301. Over reached by Anaſtaſius, ibid. Conſulſhip, and death for treaſon, 303.

Vithimir, killed by the Hunns, 12.

Vitus defeated in Spain, 234.

Uldes defeats Gainas, and ſends his head to Arcadius, 149, 150.

Uldin ſent againſt the Goths, 161. Driven out of Thrace, 174.

Ulphilus, a Gothiſh biſhop, corrupts them with Arianiſm, 12, 13. Stratagem againſt Conſtantinople, 188.

Urania worſhipped at Carthage, 615.

Urban II. encourages the holy war, 478.

—— IV. ſupports the tyrant Paleologus, 518.

Urſula the martyr, and her 11,000 virgins, the ſtory of expluded, 55.

Urſus the murderer of Maximus, 258.

Uſher, archbiſhop vindicated and cleared up, 687, n.

Utica deſcribed, 573. Becomes the metropolis of Afric, ibid.

Uzians, who, 458. Invade the Romans, ibid Defeated by the Hungarians, 459.

Uzita, where ſituated, 583.

W.

WAR, the noble, why ſo called, 367.

—— holy. See Cruiſade, 477.

Widows forbid to marry during the year, 41.

William, lord of Sicily, wars againſt Andronicus, 494.

Wine forbid the Carthaginian ſoldiers whilſt in the field, 659. And to the magiſtrates during their office, 660.

Worms taken by the Vandals, 162.

X

XEne ſent priſoner to Conſtantinople, 527. Releaſed, 528.
Xiphilin, the patriarch, outwitted by Eudocia, 460.
Xiphius's revolt and ſubmiſſion, 438.

Y

YEar of the Carthaginians, how computed, 675.
Yeſderjird king of Perſia. See Jiſdegerdes, 139.

Z

ZAbache, the ſea of, where, 11.
Zacharias, patriarch of Jeruſalem, carried priſoner by the Perſians, 336.
Zagan diverts Mohammed from raiſing the ſiege of Conſtantinople, 552.
Zagaria given to Trebelis, 354.
Zea, St. the church of built by Marcian, 265.
Zeno marries Ariadne, 277. His extract and riſe, ibid. Promotion oppoſed by the Romans, 280. Declared his ſon's colleague, 281. His wicked character and flight, 283. Purſued into Iſauria, 286. Dethrones Baſiliſcus, ibid. & ſeq. Shameful peace with Theodoric, 287. Beſieged by Marcian, 288. Yields Italy to Theodoric, 290. Cruelties and death, 291. & ſeq. Character, ibid.
Zenonides Zeno's wife, declared Auguſta, 283. Her death, 287.
Zeugitania deſcribed, 573. The ſea and inland towns of, 579.
Zimiſces John, his ſucceſs againſt the Saracens, 421. Ill requited by Nicephorus, 422. Murders him, ibid. Submiſſion to Poliencius, 423. Crowned, ibid. Takes Romanus for his partner, ibid. Succeſs againſt the Roſſi, 425. Peace with them, 427. Poiſoned, 428. His character, ibid.
Zizais put to death by Phocas, 332.
Zochares defeated before Antioch, 424.
Zoe I. married to Leo, and dies, 404.
——— II. the mother of Conſtantine, 404. Baniſhed by Alexander, 409. Recalled by her ſon, 410. Takes the government upon her, ibid. Defeated by the Bulgarians, 411. Confined by Romanus, 412.
——— Conſtantine's daughter, married to Romanus II. 440. Poiſons and murders him, 443. Marries Michael, and makes him emperor, 443. Over-reached by his brother, 444. Confined by Calaphates, 447. Recalled, ibid. Marriage, 448. Death, 452.
Zoganus commands at the ſiege of Conſtantinople, 548.
Zorus's expedition to Carthage, 559.
Zoſimus's partiality againſt Theodoſius, 38.

The End of the Sixteenth Volume.

Directions to the Binder.

A Map ſhewing the ancient Situation of Carthage, Utica, Tunes, and the Carthaginian Bay; with a Bird's View of the Situation of ancient Carthage 366

Two Siculo Punic Medals; the Foſticon of the Aqueduct near Carthage; and the monſtrous Serpent killed by the Romans on the Banks of the Bagrada 654

AN

UNIVERSAL HISTORY,

FROM THE

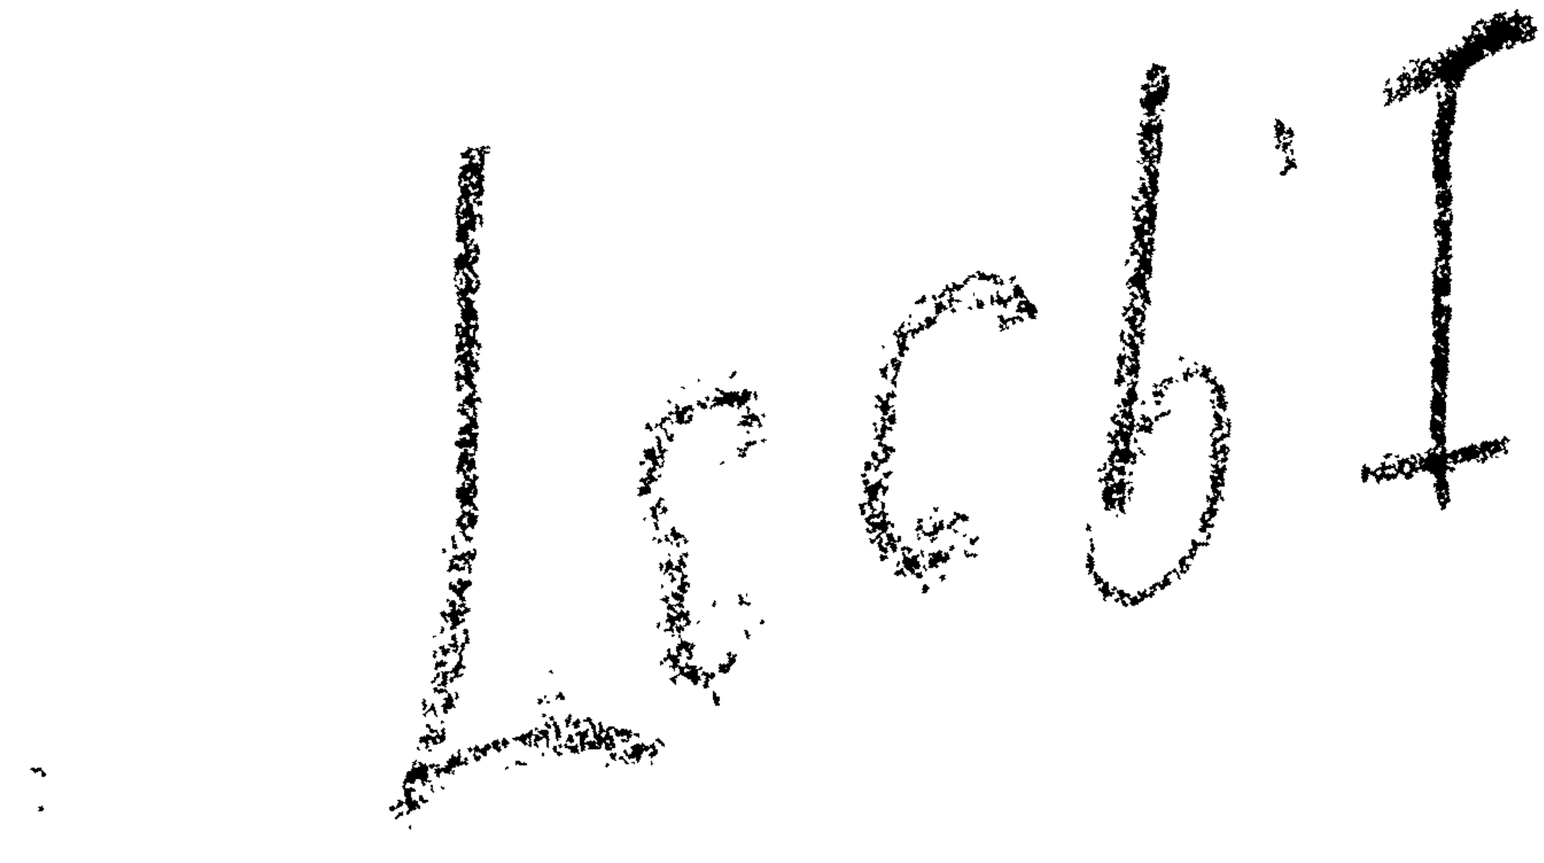
Earliest Account of Time to the Present.

COMPILED FROM

ORIGINAL AUTHORS;

And ILLUSTRATED with

MAPS, CUTS, NOTES, Chronological, And other TABLES.



VOL. XVII.

Ἱστορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεσθαι μὴ καλανόει, ἐν ἀυταῖς γὰρ ἐυρήσεις ἀκόπως ἅπερ ἕτεροι συνῆξαν ἐγκόπως. Basil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

DUBLIN:

Printed for R. OWEN, S. HYDE, G. RISK, J. LEATHLEY, G, and A EWING, W. SMITH, J. SMITH, P. CRAMPTON, G. FAULKNER, A. BRADLY, T. MOORE, E. EXSHAW, C. WYNNE, C. CONNOR, O. NELSON, P. WILSON, W. POWELL, I. KELLY, T. BUTLER, and W. BRIEN, Booksellers.

MDCCXLV.

AN UNIVERSAL

HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earlieſt Account of Time to the Preſent.

CHAP. XXXVII.

SECT. V.

The Hiſtory of the Carthaginians, from the foundation of their city to the firſt Punic war.

ELISA, known alſo by the name of Dido, fled from Tyre in the ſeventh year of the reign of Pygmalion king of that city. Her flight is ſaid to have been occaſioned by the cruel and inſatiable avarice of Pygmalion, who was her brother. This prince, in order to ſecure to himſelf the immenſe treaſures of his uncle Sichæus, who had married his ſiſter Dido, was the prieſt of Hercules, and, by virtue of that poſt, the ſecond perſon in the kingdom, found means to deſtroy him. The manner in which this was effected, is differently related: Virgil will have it, that Pygmalion barbarouſly murdered his uncle at the altar; but Euſtathius and Cedrenus intimate that he diſpatched him at an hunting match, and then throwing him down a precipice, gave out, that the fall had been the occaſion of his death. However, as Sichæus was well acquainted with the fordid and avaricious temper of his nephew, he had, by way of precaution, buried his riches under ground; which, with the prudent and artful conduct of Eliſa, rendered abortive the tyrant's deſign. Sichæus, appearing to his diſconſolate widow in a dream, appriſed her of his tragical exit, and adviſed her to fly immediately, in order to avoid the ſame fate. Upon this ſhe determined to make her eſcape, and carry off thoſe treaſures, which had prompted her brother to ſo inhuman an action; but, in order to this, ſhe judged it proper for ſome time to amuſe him; which ſhe did by diſſembling her reſentment, and keeping up the appearance of an affection for him, till an opportunity offered of aſſembling her friends, and concerting with them the proper meaſures for ſpeedily abandoning Tyre. The principal of theſe were her brother Barca, and ſeveral ſenators, who, hating Pygmalion, and apprehending themſelves every moment in danger of being ſacrificed by a prince, who had broken through all the ties of nature and humanity, engaged to follow her at all adventures. To execute the deſign ſhe had formed the more effectually, ſhe applied to the king for veſſels to carry her, Barca, and their effects, to Chartica or Chartaca, a maritime town in his dominions, under the pretext of reſiding there. To this Pygmalion readily agreed, as imagining, that by ſuch a ſtep he ſhould become maſter of what had ſo long been the object of his moſt ardent deſires. Eliſa, being thus ſupplied with men and ſhips, weighed anchor; and being got into the ocean at a proper diſtance from Tyre, commanded her men to throw into the ſea ſome bags filled with ſand, which, ſhe told them, contained the wealth of her huſband Sichæus, and, in a doleful tone, entreated his manes to accept of thoſe riches as an oblation, which had been the cauſe of his deſtruction. Then, addreſſing herſelf to her companions, ſhe gave them to underſtand, that there was nothing terrible they might not fear from the tyrant's reſentment, for being inſtrumental in defeating his avaricious purpoſes, if ever they fell into his hands; by which means having fixed them more firmly in her intereſt, ſhe purſued her voyage, and got out of her brother's reach, before he was appriſed of her reſolution [a].

Cauſe of Eliſa's departure from Tyre.

PYGMALION,

[a] Juſtin. l. xviii. Tacit. annal. xvi. Tertul. in Pal. Sil. Ital l. i. Appian. in Lib. ſub. init Euſtath. in Dionyſ. Afr. ut & ipſe Dionyſ.

Pygmalion prevented from purſuing Eliſa.

PYGMALION, finding all his hopes thus defeated by his ſiſters ſubtlety, and being grieved, that thoſe treaſures ſhould be ſnatched from him in a moment, which he thought himſelf to be ſure of, and which he had ſo long enjoyed in imagination, gave orders to fit out a fleet with all poſſible expedition, in order to purſue the fugitives; but he was diverted from this deſign by the entreaties of his mother, and the menaces of the inſpired college of vates, who threatened him with the indignation of the gods, if he offered to obſtruct in any manner the grand project Eliſa was gone upon [b].

Eliſa touched firſt at Cyprus.

THE firſt place our heroine touched at was ſome port in the iſland of Cyprus, poſſibly Salamis, which was then in its infancy; ſince, according to Virgil and Servius, in conjunction with the Arundelian marbles, Teucer and Mettinus, Eliſa's father, ſeized upon Cyprus, or at leaſt a part of it, not very long before, when the former of theſe built Salamis. Here ſhe met with a prieſt of Jupiter, who offered to attend her with his whole family, and partake of her future fortune; which ſhe readily accepted of. As this motion of the prieſt proceeded from an impulſe, or rather command, of the deity himſelf, ſhe looked upon it as a good omen, and ſettled the prieſthood of Jupiter in that family [c].

Cyprian women proſtitute themſelves for dowries.

IT was a prevailing cuſtom in this iſland at the time of Eliſa's arrival, for the maids to go on certain ſtated days, before marriage, to the ſea-ſide, there to look for ſtrangers that might poſſibly arrive on their coaſts, in order to proſtitute themſelves for gain, and thereby acquire a dowry. Out of theſe the Tyrians ſelected a certain number, Juſtin ſays eighty; and carrying them on board, found them very ſubſervient to their deſign of planting a new colony [d]

Dionyſ. Herodian. l. v. Liv. xxxiv. Vel. Paterc. l. i. Virgil. Æn i. & iv. Serv. in Virg. Æn. i. & iv. Georg. Cedren. hiſt. compend. p. 140. edit. Par. 1647. Joſeph. antiq. l. viii. c. 13. cont. Apion. l. i. Solin. c. 30. & 27. edit. Salm. Vide & Salian & Torniel. in annal. Petav. de doct. temp. l. ix. c. 63. & rationar. temp. par. ii. l. ii. c. 13. Tatian cont. Græc. Theophil. Antiochen. apud Autolyc. l. iii. Tertul. apol. Clem. Alex. ſtrom. Strabo, l. xvii. Plin. l. v. Ammian Marcel. Plutarch. Eutrop. Flor. Oroſ. Zonar. Reinecc. hiſt. Jul. vol. i. & ii. Hendr. de rep. Carth. l. i. ſect. i. c. 1. [b] Juſtin. l. xviii. [c] Idem. ibid. Virg. Æn. i. Serv. in loc. Apollodor. Newton's chronol. p. 65. [d] Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

She lands in Africa.

FROM hence they ſteered their courſe for the coaſts of Africa, and at laſt happily landed in the province called afterwards Africa Propria, not far from Utica, a Tyrian colony, and city of great antiquity; which we have already deſcribed. The inhabitants received their countrymen with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy, and giving them a moſt kind reception, adviſed them to build a city upon that ſpot, to which the fates had conducted them [e].

Cultivates a good underſtanding with the natives.

IT was Eliſa's firſt care, upon her arrival, to cultivate a good underſtanding with the natives, to which they were by no means, for any conſiderable time, averſe, on account of the advantages they perceived would naturally flow to them from an eſtabliſhed commerce and harmony betwixt the two nations. She then purchaſed a tract of land of them, for her and her wearied Tyrians to ſettle upon. Juſtin, Appian, Virgil, Euſtathius, Themiſtius, &c. intimate, that the Phœnicians impoſed upon the Africans, when a bargain was made betwixt them, in the following manner: They deſired for their intended ſettlement only ſo much ground as an ox's hide would encompaſs. This requeſt the Africans at firſt laughed at; but were ſurprized, when, upon their granting it, they found Eliſa cut the hide into the ſmalleſt ſhreds, and with them ſurrounded a large extent of territory, on which ſhe built a citadel, from this incident called Byrſa. The learned, however, unanimouſly agree in exploding this fable, which ſeems to owe its origin either to the envy and malice of the Romans, or the vanity of the Greeks, who ridiculouſly affected to deduce every thing that ſavoured of high antiquity from their own nation or language, though never ſo remote from them. Appian ſeems to inſinuate, that at firſt Eliſa met with ſome oppoſition from the natives; which may poſſibly be true, ſince it is certain an annual tribute for the ground the Tyrians poſſeſſed was, by their firſt agreement with the Africans, exacted from them, which they were obliged to pay for many years after [f].

THE neighbouring people, at firſt invited by the proſpect of lucre, and with this view repairing to the Phœnici-

an

[e] Idem ibid. [f] Juſtin. l. xviii. Virg. Æn. i. Euſtath. in Dionyſ. Afr. Appian. in Lib. ſub init. Themiſt. orat. xxi. p 260, 261. Serv. in Æn. i. Liv. l. xxxiv. Dionyſ. in perieg. Julin. l. xix. Sil. Ital. l. i. Vide Voſſ. th. gent. l. i. c. 32. Bochart. Chan. &c.

an ſettlement to ſell theſe foreigners the neceſſaries of life, in a ſhort time incorporated themſelves with them. Theſe inhabitants ſoon growing very numerous, Eliſa followed the advice of the Utican embaſſadors, who were ſent to congratulate her upon her happy arrival in the name of their ſtate; and built a new city, or at leaſt much enlarged the old one, which could make no very conſiderable figure before. As the natives of the country, or Aborigines, were of the ſame ſentiments with the Uticans in this particular, and, as may reaſonably be preſumed, gave the Tyrians all neceſſary aſſiſtance, both in the building of their city, and peopling it afterwards, Carthage ſoon became a place of great fame and demanded the reſpect of all its neighbours [g].

Either builds a new city there, or enlarges an old one

We are told by Juſtin, that, in digging for the foundations of the city, the workmen firſt found an ox's head, which was indeed a ſymbol of fertility of ſoil, but at the ſame time preſaged continual toil and perpetual ſervitude to the city. Upon this they removed to another ſpot, where, in digging, they diſcovered an horſe's head, which they interpreted as a happier omen, portending the future martial genius of the inhabitants. Euſtathius adds, that the horſe's head had a palm tree, or at leaſt a branch of palm, diſcovered with it; which they conſidered, without doubt, as an emblem of victory. This determined Eliſa to fix upon that ſpot for the ſituation of her city; and in alluſion to this it was, that the Carthaginians had, in after-ages, an horſe's head, or an horſe and a palm-tree, ſo frequently upon the reverſes of their coins [h] (C).

A horſe's head found whilſt the Tyrians were digging for the foundations of Carthage.

The principal names of Carthage have already been given in the firſt ſection of the hiſtory we are now upon. However, it may not be improper to remark, that the Carthaginians are ſometimes called Sidonians, and their city Tyre, Different names of Carthage.

[g] Virg. Serv. & Juſtin. ubi ſup. [h] Virg. & Juſtin. ubi ſup. Iſidor. l. xv. c. 2. & l. ix. c. 2. Euſtath. in Dionyſ. Afr. Steph. Byzant. de urb. Anton. Auguſtin. dial. ant. 6. Suid. Cæl. Rhodigin. ant. lect. l. xviii. c. 38. & Boch. Chan. l. i.

(C) Some of theſe coins, particularly of the ſilver and gold ones, are of exquiſite workmanſhip, nothing at all inferior to any of the Greek or Roman. They are found in the kingdoms of Tunis and Algiers, in thoſe parts of Spain the Carthaginians firſt poſſeſſed, and in Sicily. Numbers of them may be ſeen in Aldrete, Paruta, Haym, and the cabinets of the curious.

by antient authors. Eusebius seems to affirm, that its most antient name was Origo; but as Carthage and its foundress are both mentioned in that passage; and as her name, Elisa (D) or Elissa, imports the same thing in Hebrew or Phænician as Virago in Latin, Bochart takes the word Ὀριγὼ or Origo to be a corruption of Ὀυιράγω or Virago; and consequently supposes it to refer not to Carthage, but to Elisa or Dido. As Servilius asserts, though falsly, Dido in Punic to have answered to Virago in Latin, and it is very possible Eusebius might have been imposed upon by this mistake, we cannot help declaring ourselves entirely of Bochart's opinion. It is likewise denominated by Stephanus Oenusa, or Oenussa; by Eustathius, Cadmea; and by Suidas, Aphrice. According to some, the name Tarshish in scripture sometimes denotes Carthage; in one passage particularly this word seems so plainly to point at that city, that it is rendered by the vulgate version Carthago. Theodoret and others countenance this notion [i].

Dido fought in marriage by Iarbas, a neighbouring prince.

EVERY thing thus conspiring with Elisa's views, and succeeding according to her desire, by the coalition of different nations, the new city, in a short time, grew wealthy and flourishing; which agreeable situation tempted Iarbas, a neighbouring prince, to endeavour at making himself master of it without any effusion of blood. In order to which he desired

[i] Virg. & Sil. Ital. pass. Sal. de bell. Jugurth. Tibul. l. iv. ver. 137. Ovid. ep. her. D. August. de unit. eccles. Ezek. xxvii. 12. Theodoret. Hieronym. Euseb. in chron Boch. in præfat. Phal. & Chan l. i.

(D) According to the author of the etymologicon magnum, Elisa or Elissa was the first name of this princess, which, as Bochart shews, may either be interpreted divina virgo, or, with the Arabic article perfixed, virago, κατ' ἐξοχήν. Phavorinus, in conjunction with the author of the etymologicon aforesaid, will have the name Dido to have been given her after her arrival in Africa, as importing the traveller, or wanderer, to which Bochart agrees. Eustathius absurdly says, Dido signifies a murderer of an husband; whereas Elisa or Elissa will admit of such an interpretation: and Servius, with as much impropriety, translates Dido virago, the undoubted signification of Elisa or Elissa Many more conjectures about these words may be seen in Bochart and Vossius, which it is not worth while to recite (3).

(3) Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 24. & l. ii. c. 24. Eustath. in Dionys. Afr. Voss. idol. gent. l. i. c. 32. Serv. in Æn. Reinec. in hist. Jul. [illegible] 1, 2.

deſired, that an embaſſy of ten of the moſt noble Carthaginians might be ſent him; which having obtained, he propoſed to them a marriage with Eliſa or Dido, for that, in all probability, was the name ſhe went by after her departure from her native country, threatening them with a war, in caſe of a refuſal. The embaſſadors, being afraid to deliver the meſſage, told their ſovereign with Punic ſubtlety, that Iarbas deſired ſome perſon might be ſent him, who was capable of civilizing and poliſhing himſelf and his Africans; but that there was no poſſibility of finding any of her ſubjects, who would leave his relations for the converſation of barbarians, who were as ſavage as the wildeſt beaſts. Here being reprimanded by the queen, ſhe aſked them, if they were not aſhamed to refuſe living in any manner, which might be beneficial to their country, to which they owed their very lives? They then opened to her the king's commands, adding, that, according to her own deciſion of the point, and to ſet her ſubjects a good example, ſhe ought to ſacrifice herſelf to her country's welfare. Being thus enſnared, ſhe called upon her huſband Sichæus with tears and lamentations, and at laſt anſwered, that ſhe would go where her own fate and that of her city called her. In the mean time, ſhe cauſed a pile to be erected in the fartheſt part of the city; and at the expiration of three months, which time ſhe required for the execution of her deſign, killing many victims, as tho' ſhe intended to ſacrifice to, and appeaſe the manes of, her huſband before her ſecond marriage, ſhe aſcended it. Then looking all around her upon the ſpectators, ſhe told them, ſhe was going to her huſband, as they had ordered her: and immediately, with a dagger ſhe had taken with her for that purpoſe, put a period to her days [k].

Juſtin and Virgil differ in their opinion of Dido's death.

THIS is Juſtin's account of the death of that princeſs, which, we need not tell our readers, is different from Virgil's. Cedrenus and Sir Iſaac Newton favour Virgil's notion, though they do not in all points agree with him. The former of theſe relates, that Æneas the Phrygian, after the deſtruction of Troy, came to Africa, and reſided ſometime with Dido there; but perceiving Iarbas, king of the Numidians, the Mauritanians, the Maſſyli or the Gætulians, to take umbrage at this, he thought proper to retire, as dreading the effects of his power and reſentment. This [k] Juſtin. ubi ſup.

This paſſage of Cedrenus, whom we take to have been a very good compiler and collector of antient hiſtory, ſeems greatly to ſupport Sir Iſaac Newton's opinion, in relation to Æneas and Dido's being cotemporaries, and likewiſe to evince a moſt material point, viz. that Virgil and Trogus, whom Juſtin epitomized, agree in their chronology. What Sir Iſaac Newton advances concerning Dido's father Mettinus and Teucer's ſeizing upon Cyprus, about the time of the Trojan war, renders Virgil's chronology likewiſe more probable, than the generality of learned men are willing to allow. But this we ſhall juſt touch upon immediately [l].

Dido's character.

How long Dido reigned at Carthage, or when ſhe came to the violent death above-mentioned, we cannot take upon us to determine. What ſeems to be the beſt ſupported by antient hiſtory is, that her brother Barca and ſiſter Anna attended her from Tyre to Africa; and that, by their committing every thing to her management and direction, it ſhould ſeem ſhe was a woman of an uncommon genius. This likewiſe appears from the artful manner in which ſhe impoſed upon her brother Pygmalion before her departure from Tyre, when under the pretence of diverting her melancholy on account of her huſband's death, which ſhe inſinuated, Carthage could not fail of perpetuating, ſhe had the addreſs to perſuade him, that her intention really was to retire to, and reſide at, Chartaca. The ſecrecy and prudence with which her grand enterprize was conducted, as well as the cunning device by which ſhe fixed even Pygmalion's men in her intereſt, above-recited, indiſputably evince the ſame thing; That ſhe was a lady of moſt attractive charms, as well as a rare pattern of chaſtity, is atteſted by the beſt authors [m].

Macrobius inconſiſtent with himſelf in relation to Dido's character.

MACROBIUS tells us, that Virgil's relation of Dido's amours with Æneas, and of her laying violent hands on herſelf at his departure from Africa, after he had debauched her, was univerſally eſteemed as fabulous in his age. This indeed we diſbelieve, but not upon Macrobius's authority; for that author is inconſiſtent with himſelf in reſpect to Dido's character. In one place he celebrates her temperance and chaſtity, which is exactly agreeable to the faith of hiſtory; whereas in another he makes her guilty of the greateſt intemperance,

[l] Cedren. ubi ſupra. Newton's chronol. p. 65, 66. &c
[m] Reinec. hiſt. Jul. t. 1. Sil. Italic. Juſt. ubi ſupra. Tertullian. Macrob. Auſon, &c.

perance, luxury, and profuſion at her entertainments; which, in our opinion, deſerves no credit at all, as being not only contrary to the general character of our princeſs, but likewiſe to the Carthaginian genius, as has been above obſerved. Virgil, as a Roman, we believe, in this particular did not pay the greateſt regard to truth, the antipathy betwixt his nation and the Carthaginians not permitting it; but notwithſtanding this, we cannot help imagining his chronology to be ſomething nearer the truth than is generally ſuppoſed, and that for the reaſons hinted above, as well as for the following one, which to us ſeems ſomething cogent, and which therefore we beg leave to tranſcribe from the excellent Sir Iſaac Newton. "The Phœnicians, after the death of Melcartus, "ſays this incomparable author, built a temple to him in the "iſland Gades, and adorned it with the ſculptures of the "labours of Hercules, and of his hydra, and the horſes, to "whom he threw Diomedes, king of the Biſtones in "Thrace, to be devoured. In this temple was the golden "belt of Teucer, and the golden olive of Pygmalion, bearing ſmaragdine fruit; and by theſe conſecrated gifts of "Teucer and Pygmalion you may know, that it was built "in their days." If theſe facts, and the reaſoning built upon them, be admitted, it will follow, that Teucer and Pygmalion were cotemporaries, and conſequently that Æneas and Dido might be ſo. Now, though we cannot pretend to aſſert, that this argument is demonſtrative, becauſe there is no abſolute neceſſity to ſuppoſe, that all theſe ornaments were brought into the temple at once, yet, conſidering what we have before offered from Sir Iſaac Newton, Apollodorus, Servius, and the marbles, in proof of Teucer and Mettinus's being jointly concerned in the conqueſt of Cyprus, we cannot look upon it as void of a tolerable degree of probability [n].

A chaſm in the hiſtory of Carthage for above three hundred years.

How long monarchical government prevailed at Carthage, or what accidents befel this ſtate in its infancy, or even what tranſactions it was concerned in for ſeveral ages at firſt, we cannot inform our readers, ſince there is a chaſm in the Carthaginian hiſtory for above three hundred years after the tragical end of Dido. In general Juſtin, and he alone, gives us to underſtand, that Carthage was much agitated by civil civil diſſenſions, and haraſſed with the plague during part of this period. It likewiſe appears from Diodorus Siculus and Polybius, that this republic had got a ſtrong footing in Sicily and Sardinia, and made conſiderable acquiſitions elſewhere, before the date of any of thoſe tranſactions it bore a part in, the knowledge of which has reached us. Thucydides and Herodotus moreover put it beyond diſpute, that it was very formidable by ſea even in the time of Cyrus and Cambyſes, and that it muſt have performed many brave exploits upon that element even before the reigns of thoſe puiſſant monarchs. But this is not to be wondered at, it not being poſſible for any nation endued with ſuch a genius, and poſſeſſed of ſo much power as the Carthaginians muſt have been famous for in very early ages, to have long remained in a ſtate of inaction, either by land or ſea. A flouriſhing ſtate of commerce naturally begets riches, and riches power; and, conſidering that ambition is a darling paſſion in the minds of great men, and almoſt inſeparable from power, and that war, for the moſt part, is the effect of ambition, it cannot well be doubted, but that our republic made many expeditions againſt, and incurſions into, the territories of its neighbours, long before the beginning of, what may be termed with reſpect to us, the Carthaginian hiſtorical period of time. Had the writings of Philiſtus Syracuſanus, Ephorus, Timæus Siculus, Aratus, Trogus Pompeius, the ſixth, ſeventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth books of Diodorus Siculus, or any of the Punic hiſtorians, been now extant, we might have received ſufficient light from them in many material points relating to the firſt ages of Carthage; but all theſe have, for a long ſeries of generations, been no more. The Punic archives would alſo moſt certainly have ſet us right in all particulars of moment relating to the hiſtory we are now upon, had they been in being; but theſe the Roman virtue, generoſity, greatneſs of ſoul, and love of truth, thought proper to deny poſterity, leſt they ſhould have given their minds a wrong bias, and been prejudicial to the cauſe of truth. We are therefore obliged, tho' with great regret, to paſs over the tranſactions of the Carthaginian ſtate during the chaſm aforeſaid, as buried in oblivion, and proceed to continue this work in the beſt manner we can from thoſe pieces and fragments of antiquity that, through the injuries of time, have been handed down to us.

[n] Macrob. ſaturn. l. v. c. 17. &. l. vii. c. 1. Philoſtrat. in vit. Apollon. l. v. c. 1. apud Phot. Newton's chronol. p. 112, 113, &c.

Carthage very formidable by ſea in the time of Cyrus and Cambyſes.

We have juſt hinted, that the Carthaginians were very powerful by ſea in the time of Cyrus and his ſon Cambyſes, not not to ſay much eaſier. This appears from ſeveral conſiderations, particularly from a naval engagement that happened between the united fleets of the Carthaginians and Etruſcans and that of the Phocæans, one of the moſt formidable nations in the world by ſea in Cyrus's reign, wherein tho' the Phocæans got the victory, yet their whole fleet was either ſunk or diſabled; inſomuch, that they durſt not venture a ſecond engagement, but abandoned the iſland of Cyrnus, now Corſica, to the Carthaginians and Etruſcans. The Phocæans retired to Rhegium, and ſoon after to OEnotria, now Ponza, a ſmall iſland in the Tyrrhenian or Etruſcan ſea, over-againſt Velia in Lucania, which their anceſtors had firſt peopled; and the Carthaginians, with the Etruſcans, took quiet poſſeſſion of Cyrnus. Herodotus and Thucydides both take notice of this ſea-fight, as one of the moſt ancient to be met with in hiſtory. The Carthaginian and Etruſcan united fleets conſiſted of an hundred and twenty ſail, the moſt active part of which, we may ſuppoſe, was the Carthaginian, ſince the Etruſcans at that time did not make ſo great a figure by ſea; and the Phocæan of ſixty. Herodotus ſeems to ſneer the Phocæans upon their victory, as being in a manner ruined by it. According to Thucydides, the Phocæans built Maſſilia, now Marſeilles, ſome time near this period [a].

The Carthaginians, in conjunction with the Etruſcans, defeated in a ſea-fight by the Phocæans.

TOWARDS the concluſion of Cyrus's reign, or that of his uncle Cyaxares the ſecond, as we have ſtated it, the Carthaginians carried on a war with the neighbouring African princes, wherein they obtained great advantages, which, according to Juſtin, were chiefly owing to the conduct and bravery of their general Machæus(E). Soon after the concluſion of this war, they ſent a great body of forces, with a powerfull fleet, to Sicily, under the command of the ſame general, who reduced a good part of that iſland to their obedience. But, notwithſtanding the happy ſituation of their affairs abroad the

[a] Herodot. l. i. Thucyd l. i. ſub init.

(E) This general's name, in ſome manuſcripts of Juſtin, is Maleus, in others Machæus or Macheus. Oroſius calls him Mazeus; and Grævius, Malchus. Voſſius likewiſe ſeems to prefer the laſt to the others; but offers no ſolid argument for this preference. We beg leave therefore to follow Reineccius, Ubbo Emmius, and Hendreich, who chuſe Machæus, notwithſtanding many of our late editions of Juſtin have Maleus.

They reduce a good part of the island of Sicily.

the author above-mentioned insinuates, that they were much agitated by civil dissensions at home, and afflicted with other evils, of which the pestilence, that then made dreadful havock at Carthage, seems to have been the most terrible. This they attributed to the anger of the gods, and endeavoured to appease them with human sacrifices; nay, in order to render them more propitious to their city, they scrupled not to offer up their children themselves on this melancholy occasion. This detestable practice, so contrary to the dictates of humanity, and all the tender impulses of nature, instead of producing the desired effect, incensed the gods still more against them. In consequence of which, according to Justin's observation, their arms were attended afterwards with ill success, though they had before been so fortunate in Sicily, (which, by the way, proves their settlement in that island to have been coeval with, if not prior to, the beginning of the Persian empire) for, immediately after the conclusion of the Sicilian war, transporting their forces into the island of Sardinia, they intended nothing less than making an absolute conquest of it; but the displeasure of the goods now pursuing them, they received a notable defeat here from the Sardi, in which above half of their army was cut off. Enraged at so many disasters, instead of endeavouring to discover the true cause of them, they banished their general Machæus, with the remainder of the army under his command. That commander, covered with glory and victory before the last unhappy expedition to Sardinia, could not but highly resent such ungrateful, as well as inhuman, treatment, especially as by his conduct and bravery, he had reduced a great part of the island of Sicily to the obedience of the Carthaginians, and greatly extended their frontiers in Africa. First therefore he sends to Carthage in an amicable manner, begging the senate not to impute to him and the troops the misfortunes that had befallen them, but to permit them to return home quietly; adding withal, that, in case of refusal, they would do themselves justice by force of arms. But neither this friendly remonstrance, nor the menace annexed to it, making any impression on the senate, after waiting in vain some days for an answer, they went on board their ships, and advanced with great expedition towards the city. As soon as they had invested it, they appealed to the gods above for the purity of their intentions, and declared in the presence of gods and men, that their design was not to hurt their fellow-citi-

Incense the gods by sacrificing children to them

Banish their general Machæus.

Who besieges Carthage.

zens,

zens, but only to demonſtrate to them what wrong ſentiments they had entertained of their valour, when they attributed the loſs above-mentioned to a want of bravery in the troops; whereas it ought to be aſcribed to the caprice of fortune. This not availing, after they had cut off all communication betwixt the city and the continent, they beſieged it in form, and ſoon reduced it to the laſt extremity for want of proviſions. The Carthaginians, involved in theſe deplorable circumſtances, began now to reflect upon their paſt folly and ingratitude; but how to extricate themſelves out of their preſent difficulties, was the grand queſtion. In the mean time, Cartalo, the general's ſon, arrived in the city from Tyre, and, had matters taken a right turn, might have had a conference with his father, and poſſibly have diſpoſed him to an accommodation. This Cartalo had been ſent by his countrymen to Tyre, with the tenths of an immenſe quantity of plunder taken by his father in Sicily, intended as a donation or offering to the Tyrian Hercules; and paſſing by the camp in his return home, was ordered by his father to come to him immediately; but this command, for the preſent, he refuſed complying with, under pretence, that he muſt perform the public offices of religion, before he could give an inſtance of filial duty. Machæus was far from being pleaſed with this anſwer; however, for the preſent he took care to conceal his reſentment, as not daring to do any thing that might look like the leaſt violence offered to religion. Soon after this incident, having obtained leave for that purpoſe, he came out of the city to the camp, dreſſed in his pontifical robes; for he was, as it ſhould ſeem, the prieſt of Hercules. His father, far from being ſtruck with ſuch a pompous appearance, taking him in private, addreſſed himſelf to him in the following terms: "Haſt thou the aſſurance, moſt abandoned "wretch, to appear in this rich and ſplendid habit be-"fore ſo many miſerable citizens, and a camp overwhelmed "with woe? What mean theſe enſigns of peace and felicity "at this juncture, but to inſult all of us? Was there no o-"ther place for thee to diſplay thy pride and haughtineſs in, "but this ſpot of ground, which is the ſcene of thy father's "miſery and diſgrace? How came you ſo lately to deſpiſe, "with ſuch an inſolent air, the command, I will not ſay of "your father, but of your general? And what are theſe "gorgeous robes but the fruit of my victories? Since there-"fore you have conſidered me not as a father, but an exile, "I, in return, will behave to you not as a father, but a "general."

And crucifies his ſon Cartalo. The city ſurrenders.

"general." And he was as good as his word; for immediately ordering a high croſs to be erected, he had him crucified thereon in his ſacred veſtments, in the ſight of all the citizens. Some days after, the city ſurrendered; when convening the ſenate and people, he complained of the injury and indignity offered him, and excuſed the hoſtile manner in which he had behaved towards them, as not being the effect of choice, but neceſſity. He, for the preſent, made no alterations in the eſtabliſhed form of government; but contented himſelf with putting to death ten of the ſenators, by whoſe advice the late violent reſolutions againſt him and the army had been taken ° (F).

ALis

° Juſtin. & Oroſ. ubi ſupra.

(F) In this note we ſhall endeavour to give ſome account of crucifixion, which was a capital puniſhment uſed among the Syrians, Egyptians, Perſians, Jews, Africans, Greeks, and Romans. According to Fagius, it was not at firſt in uſe amongſt the Jews; and indeed this appears from the law of Moſes itſelf. The learned Caſaubon concurs with him herein, though Baronius and Lipſius maintain the contrary opinion. Sigonius confounds this with hanging or ſuſpenſion, as does father Calmet in many inſtances, particularly thoſe of the worſhippers of Baal-peor, and the king of Ai, who were hung up alive. The Talmudiſts refer it to ſtoning or lapidation. There were three different ſorts of croſſes erected for the execution of malefactors. The firſt was the crux decuſſata, in the form of the letter X, as St. Andrew's croſs is pictured. The ſecond the crux commiſſa, like the letter T. The third the crux immiſſa, when one piece of wood was tranſverſely faſtened to another in ſuch a manner, as to cut it at right angels at ſome diſtance from the top, ſo †. Such, according to antient medals, and the tradition of the chriſtian church in all ages, was our bleſſed Saviours's croſs. Crucifixion was the puniſhment appointed for ſlaves and the ſcum of the people, when guilty of the moſt enormous crimes; and was therefore called ſervile ſupplicium; the freemen, or perſons of diſtinction, in ſuch caſes, falling by the ax or ſword. The criminals, before execution, were taken either from home or the prætorium amongſt the Romans, and ſcourged in a moſt cruel manner. Sometimes they were tied to the croſs, as we find our bleſſed Saviour was, and always obliged to carry it, or part of it. When they arrived at the place of execution, they were ſtripped naked, and nailed to the croſs, either lying on the ground, or erect. Their hands and feet were firſt tied to it with cords, and afterwards nailed with three or four nails, as the executioner pleaſed, beginning with the right hand or

ALL things in Carthage being thus ſet upon the antient foot, the republic enjoyed ſome repoſe. But this was not of or foot, and proceeding from thence to the left. Upon the piece of wood riſing above the arms of the croſs, an inſcription was poſted, ſpecifying the crime for which the malefactors ſuffered, though ſometimes, inſtead of this the crier proclaimed it to the ſpectators attending the execution. In Judæa, the thighs of the malefactors were broken, in caſe they were not dead by ſun-ſet; becauſe the Jews, by their law, were obliged to take them from the croſs at that time, which the Romans, their governors, permitted them to do. By the Roman laws, the bodies remained on the croſs, till they were entirely conſumed, as our notorious offenders do now upon gibbets; nevertheleſs the judge, or ſupreme magiſtrate, had the power of giving the bodies to friends or relations, in order to be interred. On the emperor's birth-day, or ſuch like feſtivals, they were frequently taken down from the croſs, and buried without the interceſſion of friends. The Jews conſtantly buried the bodies of crucified malefactors, in conformity to their law, though the pagans left them expoſed on the croſs as aforeſaid. According to ſome authors, the patibulum, or gallows, and the antient croſs, were the ſame, though Iſidorus makes them different. He calls the tranſverſe piece of wood patibulum, and the erect one ſtipes and crux. Afterwards patibulum and furca, the gallows, were the ſame, and the puniſhment on them was looked upon as much milder and leſs ignominious, than that on the croſs; for on the gallows the criminals ſoon expired, whereas on the croſs they continued a long time in torture. Sometimes offenders ſuffered death on the croſs with their heads downwards, as St. Peter; and ſometimes with their thighs as well as arms expanded, in like manner as St. Andrew is ſuppoſed to have been crucified. The croſſes were made of the hardeſt wood, frequently of oak, as ſome believe our Saviour's was. The places of execution were either near the public roads and high-ways, or on the top of ſome mountain or eminence, that the bodies might be ſeen by all people, and thereby a terror ſtruck into them. If the crux and patibulum were originally the ſame, crucifixion prevailed at Rome in the time of the kings. The perſons condemned to be crucified, or deſerving it, were called by the Romans cruciarii. To be crucified was a mark of great infamy to ſoldiers, officers, and men of quality. This puniſhment was ſo common amongſt the Romans in the times of the republic, and afterwards, that pains, afflictions, troubles, and unproſperous affairs, were called croſſes, and the verb cruciare frequently denoted the infliction of all ſorts of chaſtiſements, and pains of body and mind.

Friends

of long continuance; for Machæus, puffed up with the late advantages he had gained, endeavoured to ſubvert the conſtitution,

Friends and relations generally attended the execution, in order to beg the bodies of the ſupreme magiſtrate or commanding officer, at leaſt in Judæa. When this did not happen, parties of ſoldiers were poſted near them, to prevent their being carried off. Conſtantine aboliſhed crucifixion, thinking enormous villains, and perſons guilty of the moſt flagrant crimes, unworthy of ſuffering death in the ſame manner our bleſſed Saviour did, and introduced hanging in its ſtead. The Jews did not permit the relations of the perſons executed to place their kinſmen in the tombs belonging to their families, till their fleſh had been firſt conſumed in the public ſepulchres; then they were allowed to remove their bones into private ſepulchres. It was perhaps for this reaſon that Joſeph of Arimathea deſired leave from Pilate to lodge the body of Jeſus in his own tomb, that he might not be thrown into the public burying place appointed for criminals (6).

The Carthaginians, contrary to the practice of other nations, crucified their nobility, ſuffetes, and even the generals of their armies themſelves, however abſolute they might be in the field, if their enterprizes were not attended with ſucceſs. The croſſes of malefactors amongſt them ſeem to have been higher or lower, in proportion to the quality of the perſon ſuffering, and the heinouſneſs of the crime for which they ſuffered. If any notorious offender of diſtinction eſcaped juſtice in his life-time, his body after death, was expoſed on a croſs, in order to deter others from committing the ſame crime, eſpecially when it merited the moſt ſevere and ignominious puniſhment. Of this Hanno, in Juſtin, not to mention others, is a pregnant inſtance (7). We muſt not omit obſerving, that the Greek word σαυρὸς, which ſignifies a croſs, is put often for a piece of wood only fixed in the ground, by the Latins called palus or vallum. Our readers will find a fuller account of this puniſhment in the authors referred to in this note.

(6) Paulus Fagius ad Deut xxi. xxii. Caſaub. exerc. xvi. num. 77. Baron. in annal. Juſt. Lipſ. de cruc. Sigon. de rep. Hebræor. l. vi. c. 8. Liv. & Senec. paſſ. Lucian. Plut. Plaut. Petron. in ſatyric. paſſ. Apul. de aſin. aur. l. iii. Joſeph. l. v. c. 32. B. Gerhardi harmon. evang. hiſt. paſſ. Chriſt. c. 19. Philo in Flac. Cic. 5. in Ver. & Tuſc. quæſt. Joſeph And. Queneſtedius de ſepult. vet. c. 3. Durand. variar. l. ii. c. 15. Cerda in adverſa. Iſidor. l. i. Gretſer & Joſeph. Laurent. de torment. c. 7. Aur Vict. in Conſtant. Sozom. in hiſt. eccleſ. Vide & alios quamplurimos apud Calmet. in dict. bibl. ſub voce croix.

(7) Hendr. in repub. Carthag. l. ii. ſect. 1. c. 5. & Juſtin. l. xxi. c. 24.

ſtitution, and introduce arbitrary power. But his pernicious views being happily diſcovered, his ſcheme was defeated, and he received the puniſhment due to ſo great a crime; upon which event Juſtin makes this reflection: "He was juſtly "rewarded for the cruelty he had been guilty of both to his "ſon and his country [p]."

He endeavours to introduce arbitrary power; but his deſign being diſcovered, he receives condign puniſhment.

We are told by Herodotus, that Cambyſes, in the ſixth year of his reign, reſolved upon an expedition againſt the Carthaginians; but that he was forced to drop his project, by reaſon the Phœnicians, without whoſe help he could not carry on that war, refuſed to aſſiſt him therein, becauſe the Carthaginians were their deſcendents. This is a plain proof, that the whole naval power of the Perſian empire at that time, without the aſſiſtance of the Tyrians, was not able to cope with the Carthaginians [q].

The Phœnicians refuſe to aſſiſt Cambyſes againſt the Carthaginians.

In the year after the regifuge, the Carthaginians ſent embaſſadors to Rome, and concluded a treaty with the Romans. They were the firſt nation the Romans were acquainted with out of Italy, and with whom they entered into an alliance. This treaty chiefly related to navigation and commerce, and was to be ſeen, in Polybius's time, on the baſe of a column, in the antient Roman language, which, as that writer tells us, was ſo different from what was ſpoken in his time, that thoſe who were moſt converſant in the Latin tongue, could not, without much ſtudy and labour, underſtand it. As in our eleventh volume we have inſerted this treaty as tranſmitted to us by the Greek hiſtorian, it will be entirely unneceſſary to repeat it here. However, we ſhall beg leave to make four or five ſhort obſervations upon it [r].

The Carthaginians conclude their firſt treaty with the Romans.

First, This treaty was ſigned twenty-eight years before Xerxes invaded Greece, and gives us to underſtand, that the whole iſland of Sardinia, and part of that of Sicily, were then ſubject to the Carthaginians.

Some obſervations upon it.

Secondly, It appears, that the Carthaginians were very well acquainted with the coaſts of Italy, had viſited ſeveral of the petty nations ſeated there, and even made ſome attempts upon them, before this period.

Thirdly, It is evident, that this nation was tolerably verſed in the art of fortification, and made it a common practice to build forts or caſtles upon their making a deſcent ſcent in any country; ſince they are prohibited by one article of this treaty to erect any forts whatſoever in the country of Latium, even in caſe they at any time invaded it in an hoſtile manner.

[p] Juſt. ubi. ſupra. [q] Herodot. l. iii. [r] Polyb. l. iii. p. 245, 246, 247. edit. Gronov.

FOURTHLY, This treaty makes it manifeſt, that the Carthaginians were particularly careful to exclude the Romans from all the territories ſubject to them, as well as from the knowledge of what was tranſacted in them; as though, even at that time, they took umbrage at the growing power of the Romans. They ſeemed, even in theſe early times, to harbour in their boſoms the ſecret ſeeds of the jealouſy and diffidence, which were one day to burſt out in long and cruel wars, and which nothing could extinguiſh but the ruin of one of theſe two moſt potent republics.

FIFTHLY, The Carthaginians, according to Polybius, would not allow the Romans to ſail beyond the promontory called the Fair promontory, lying to the north of Carthage, leſt they ſhould diſcover the fruitfulneſs of the land, and the happy ſituation of the cities, and conſequently ſhould be tempted to make a ſettlement there. This, it muſt be owned, was a wiſe precaution, and ſhewed, that the Carthaginians were not only a people of foreſight, but likewiſe acquainted with the enterpriſing genius of the Romans, long before they came to blows with them.

Mago ſucceeds Machæus in all his high poſts;

THE republic being delivered from the imminent danger that threatened it in the manner above related, choſe Mago to ſucceed Machæus in all the high poſts he filled. If we may judge of Mago's capacity from the good effects of his adminiſtration, he was a perſon of moſt conſummate merit and abilities. Juſtin tells us, that he was the firſt who introduced military diſcipline amongſt the Carthaginian ſoldiery; that in his time the dominions of Carthage were much enlarged, its commerce rendered more extenſive, its riches encreaſed, its military glory raiſed to a high pitch, virtue alone countenanced both in the army and ſtate; in ſhort, that he left his country in a moſt flouriſhing condition. His two ſons, Aſdrubal and Hamilcar, ſucceeded him in all his high employments[s].

And is ſucceeded by his two ſons, Aſdrubal and Hamilcar;

ASDRUBAL

[s] Juſtin l. xix. ſub. init.

ASDRUBAL and Hamilcar being adorned with the ſame virtues that rendered their father ſo conſpicuous, the people of Carthage thought they could not do better than confer upon them the command of the army that was to act againſt Sardinia; which iſland, it ſeems, had then revolted from them. Accordingly they landed their forces here, and for ſome time carried on a war againſt the Sardi; but with what ſucceſs, is not ſaid: only we are told, that towards the cloſe of it Aſdrubal was mortally wounded, by which melancholy accident the entire command of the forces devolved upon his brother. The Carthaginians made great lamentation for this general, as indeed they had good reaſon; for he had been eleven times one of the ſuffetes, and diſcharged the duties of that high function with great applauſe, and in his military capacity had triumphed no leſs than four times; nay, the enemy themſelves looked upon his death as a blow given the Carthaginians equivalent to the cutting off of their whole army [t].

Who command the army appointed to act againſt Sardinia.

SOMEWHERE near this period, the Carthaginians had a mind to ſhake off the African yoke, that is, to diſcontinue the tribute, which, by their original contract with that people, they were obliged to pay; in order to which they declared war againſt them. The Africans having juſtice on their ſide, ſucceſs attended their arms; and, notwithſtanding the power of their enemies, a peace was concluded to their advantage, the principle article of the treaty being, that the tribute at firſt impoſed upon them, for the ground on which their city ſtood, ſhould be continued [u].

The Carthaginians attempt to ſhake off the African yoke; but do not meet with ſucceſs.

ABOUT this time, Darius Hyſtaſpis, king of Perſia, ſent an embaſſy to Carthage, requiring the people of that city to abſtain from human ſacrifices, and eating dogs fleſh; to burn their dead, and not bury them, as had always been the practice in their territories; and laſtly, to furniſh him with a body of auxiliary forces to ſerve in the war he was going to declare againſt Greece, for which he was then making vaſt preparations. Every thing was complied with, at leaſt in appearance, for ſome time, till all apprehenſions of feeling his reſentment were vaniſhed, except the laſt article, which the Carthaginians deſired to be excuſed from paying regard to, becauſe all their troops were then otherwiſe employed. Juſtin inſinuates, that this monarch laid his commands upon the Carthaginians on this occaſion; but this we can ſcarce believe, ſince it does not appear from hiſtory, that Carthage

Darius Hyſtaſpis ſends an embaſſy to Carthage, inviting the people of that city to enter into an alliance with him againſt the Greeks.

[t] Idem ibid. [u] Idem ibid.

was ever ſubject, or even tributary, to the Perſians; beſides, this author, from whom the particulars here mentioned are drawn, affirms Darius to have ſent embaſſadors to Carthage; which is a plain intimation, that the people of that city were not his ſubjects. That the Carthaginians, and conſequently the Phœnicians, buried their dead antiently, may be collected from hence; but this is ſo clear from ſcripture, that it ſtands in no need of any other teſtimony to ſupport it. Juſtin likewiſe here obſerves, that the Carthaginians at this juncture were much embroiled with their neighbours; which ſeems to ſuggeſt, that either the war with the Sardi and Africans above-mentioned, or ſome other, was then carried on. It is no wonder Darius ſhould apply to the people of Carthage for aſſiſtance againſt the Greeks, ſince both the Perſians and Carthaginians looked upon that nation as their common enemy.

SOME few years afterwards, the Greeks of Sicily, being extremely haraſſed by the Carthaginians, ſolicited Leonidas to ſend ſome Lacedæmonian forces to their relief[x]. From Herodotus it appears, that they could not obtain their requeſt; but that, however, Gelon, the tyrant of Syracuſe, was ſo happy as to preſerve his own dominions, and even to enlarge them. From the prodigious forces with which the Carthaginians invaded Sicily almoſt immediately after, it is probable they did not ſuſtain any very conſiderable loſs in that war. It cannot be inferred from Herodotus, as we formerly imagined, that the Carthaginians were driven out of Sicily by Gelon at this time; but only that the tyrant gained ſome advantages over them, extended his frontiers, and ſupported himſelf without the aſſiſtance of the Greeks, as the paſſage referred to implies. It is rather probable from thence, that both parties in the main kept what they were in poſſeſſion of before the beginning of the war, though the Carthaginians might loſe ſome particular diſtricts, eſpecially ſince, according to Juſtin, there was no conſiderable, much leſs deciſive, action in it. The excellent character Herodotus has given us of Hamilcar, and the high encomium he has paſſed upon that general's conduct, ſeem likewiſe to determine in favour of our preſent opinion[z].

Gelon gains ſome advantages over the Carthaginians in Sicily.

NOTWITHSTANDING the Carthaginians, by reaſon of the various wars they were then engaged in, could not ſupply Darius with any ſuccours againſt the Greeks, as has been juſt obſerved; obſerved; yet it appears extremely probable from hiſtory [a], that an offenſive and defenſive league was made betwixt theſe two powers towards the cloſe of that prince's reign. At leaſt it is moſt certain, that an alliance was formed between Darius's ſucceſſor Xerxes and the ſtate of Carthage, not many years after the Perſian embaſſy above-mentioned was ſent to that city. By the treaty concluded with Xerxes, the Carthaginians were to invade Sicily with all their forces, and endeavour to drive the Greeks from thence, as well as the continent of Italy, whilſt that prince ſhould march in perſon with the whole ſtrength of the Perſian empire againſt Greece itſelf. But of this more hereafter [b].

[x] Herodot. l. vii.

[z] Herodot. l. vii. Juſtin. l. xix.

BEFORE we enter directly upon the tranſactions of the Carthaginians in Sicily, we ſhall beg leave to give a ſhort account of the firſt footing this nation got in Spain. We are no-where told in hiſtory preciſely when this happened; nevertheleſs there is good reaſon to believe, from Diodorus Siculus and Juſtin, that it was very early, and before the times we are now ſpeaking of. The former of theſe authors aſſerts, that the great nerve of the Carthaginian power were the mines of Spain; that by them they were enabled to equip ſuch powerful fleets, and bring ſuch formidable armies into the field; nay, that by their aſſiſtance they made ſuch great conqueſts in Sicily and Africa. Hence 'tis apparent, that the firſt Carthaginian ſettlement in Spain muſt have long preceded, not only the reigns of Xerxes and Darius, but even that of Cyrus himſelf. But this is ſtill rendered more evident by Juſtin, who intimates, that this happened when the city of Gades, now Cadiz, was but of late ſtanding, or even in its infancy. The neighbouring Spaniards, finding this new city beginning to flouriſh, attacked it with all their forces; inſomuch that the inhabitants were obliged to call in the Carthaginians to their aid. Both of them being originally colonies from Tyre, the Cathaginians readily granted their requeſt; and furniſhing them with powerful ſuccours, not only repulſed the Spaniards, but likewiſe made themſelves maſters of almoſt the whole province in which the new city ſtood [c].

THIS happy beginning made that ambitious nation entertain thoughts of ſubduing the whole country, to which they were alſo ſtrongly excited by the rich mines above-mentioned. 'Tis

Greateſt part of Spain remained unſubdued till the time of Hannibal

[a] Juſtin. l. xix. [b] Diodor. Sic. l. xi. c. 1, 2.
[c] Diod. Sic. l. v. c. 2. Juſtin. l. xliv. ſub fin.

'Tis probable they could not push their conquests far at first, because they had there to do with very warlike nations, who defended themselves with great courage and resolution. It appears from the accounts of Livy and Polybius, that the greatest part of Spain remained unsubdued till the wars of Hamilcar, Asdrubal, and Hannibal. Nay, 'tis very probable the Carthaginians could never have entirely reduced so many provinces there, as Strabo observes, had all the Spaniards formed but one state, or mutually assisted one another. But as every canton, every people, were entirely detached from their neighbours, and had not the least correspondence with them, they all by degrees fell a prey to the common enemy.

The Carthaginians plant a colony in the island Ebusus, or Eresus, now Yvica.

We are told by Diodorus Siculus, as has been taken notice of in the chronological table, that the Carthaginians planted a colony in the island Ebusus or Eresus, now Yvica, on the coast of Spain, an hundred and sixty years after the foundation of their city. The city Eresus, the capital of the island, built by this colony, was surrounded by a good wall, and had a commodious harbour for ships. The houses in it were for the most part built in an elegant taste, and inhabited by a variety of barbarous nations, as Diodorus calls them; but the most numerous of these were the Phœnicians or Carthaginians. 'Tis highly probable therefore, that about this time the Balearic islands, at present known by the names of Majorca and Minorca, were likewise either planted or reduced by the same people. This can scarce be doubted, if we consider, that the name itself is Phœnician or Punic; that Ebusus is but seven hundred stadia, i. e. not an hundred miles, distant from the Balearic islands; that the Carthaginians possessed these islands from so remote an antiquity, that their first arrival here is prior to every thing related of them by any historian now extant, except their peopling the island Ebusus; and that, according to Vitruvius, Ebusus was reckoned to belong to the Balearic islands, which 'tis very natural to suppose. Now as we learn from Justin, that the first expedition the Carthaginians made to Spain was in order to assist the new city of Gades (A) above-mentioned; and as the Carthaginian fleet

(A) It appears from the word Gadir or Gaddir, the true Phœnician or Punic name of Cadiz, that the city received its name from the island on which it was seated, and therefore that the Tyrians fleet ſailing from Carthage to Gades eaſily might, nay, almoſt naturally would, take Ebuſus and the other Balearic iſlands, in its way, there is pretty good reaſon to believe, that Gades was ſuccoured, and Ebuſus, with the other Balearic iſlands, planted or reduced much about the ſame time. The particular periods likewiſe, in which Juſtin and Diodorus have related theſe events to have happened, ſeem nearly to correſpond; which in ſome meaſure confirms our opinion. Let this be admitted, and it will follow, that the Carthaginians made their firſt deſcent in Spain about an hundred and ſixty years after the building of their city, which we apprehend to be one of the moſt early foreign tranſactions they were concerned in. Farther, ſince Carthage was ſo potent when Gades was in its infancy, we muſt ſuppoſe the former to have been at leaſt eighty or an hundred years older than the latter; and if ſo, Dido might have founded her city not far from the time of the Trojan war, ſince, according to Velleius, Gades was built by the Tyrians about that number of years after the deſtruction of Troy. This is an additional argument in favour of what rians were in poſſeſſion of it ſome time before they built the city. For Gadir properly ſignifies an incloſure, or ſpot of ground ſeparated from all other tracts, as this iſland was by the ſea. It likewiſe denotes a fence or mound, as this iſland was doubtleſs conſidered by the Phœnicians, after their long and fatiguing voyages, againſt the rage and fury of the ſea. According to Strabo, the Tyrians firſt ſailed to this iſland a conſiderable time after Hercules was deified; and made ſeveral fruitleſs expeditions, at conſiderable diſtances of time, before they could ſettle upon it; which, in conjunction with what has been advanced by Philoſtratus, renders it highly probable, that the city was, at leaſt, of as late a foundation as we have ſuppoſed. The author of the etymologicon indeed inſinuates it to have been built by Archaleus, the ſon of Phœnix, which will carry it back to a very remote antiquity; but this ſavours ſo much of fable, that but little credit is to be given to it. We ſhall only at preſent farther obſerve, that Cadiz and Tarteſſus were frequently miſtaken for one another. A particular deſcription and hiſtory of this city may be expected from us, when we come to the hiſtory of Spain (1).

(1) Strab. l. iii. Philoſtrat. in vit. Apollon. l. v. c. 1. apud Phot. & Newton's chronol. p. 112, 113. Salluſt. in fragment. ex hiſt. l. ii. Feſtus Avienus in or. marit. Plin. Arrian. &c. apud Bochart. in Chan. l. i. c. 34. Solin. Iſidor. Heſych. apud. eund. & Liv. l. xxviii.

what Sir Isaac Newton has advanced as to the time of that destruction, and seems to carry with it an air of probability. As to Velleius's assertion, that Gades was more antient than Carthage, he is plainly refuted by Diodorus and Justin, and the reason of the thing; neither had he asserted this, had it not been in consequence of an hypothesis. The Romans in his time generally followed the technical chronology of Eratosthenes, supposing it to be true: Velleius finding therefore in some good author, that Gades was absolutely affirmed to be built by the Tyrians eighty or an hundred years after the Trojan war; and by the Punic records, that Carthage was betwixt two and three hundred years later than that war, according to the artificial chronology of Eratosthenes, which he took for granted was true; he thence concluded, that Gades was older than Carthage. But that Eratosthenean chronology is now by some very learned men believed to have placed the destruction of Troy near three hundred years too high; and if so, no great stress is to be laid upon it. Velleius's authority therefore, when he asserts the city of Gades to have been built about eighty or an hundred years after the Trojan war, depends upon some good author, as is plain from Justin compared with Virgil, Servius, Apollodorus, and the marbles; but when he makes it older than Carthage, upon the chronology of Eratosthenes, which cannot be entirely relied upon, particularly in the point before us, as appears from Justin, Diodorus, and others; in the first case therefore it is pretty widely different from what it is in the other. Justin clearly intimates, that the inhabitants of the island of Gades had a temple there sacred to Hercules, before the city was built; so that nothing can be inferred from that temple's being erected either about or immediately after the time of the Trojan war, in prejudice of what has been advanced; which yet we are far from positively insisting upon as matter of fact, but only propose it to our readers as a point deserving farther consideration. On this occasion it may not be improper to remind our readers, that, according to the common computation, Troy was taken the twenty-fourth day of the month Thargelion, or April, 1184 years before Christ; whereas Sir Isaac Newton places it 904 years only before the commencement of the christian æra[d].

ANOTHER

[d] Diod. Sic. l. v. c. 1. Vitruv. Justin. ubi. sup. Vell. Paterc. l. i. sub init. Newton's chronol. p. 3, 66, 112, &c.

Soldiers from Spain one great nerve of the Carthaginian power.

ANOTHER motive to the Carthaginians to make themſelves maſters of Spain, was the great number of brave recruits found in that country. The Spaniards were valiant, eaſily diſciplined, and capable of enduring all kinds of labour and fatigue. With ſuch immenſe treaſure therefore as they annually drew from thence, and ſuch bodies of the beſt ſoldiers as were continually formed there for their ſervice, tis no wonder the Carthaginians ſhould make ſuch prodigious efforts, as we learn from hiſtory they did, to enſlave all their neighbours[e].

First ſettlement of the Carthaginians in Corſica.

As Diodorus Siculus has given us a deſcription of Sicily, Sardinia, the Balearic iſlands, Corſica, &c. in the ſame chapter, we think this authorizes us to ſpeak a word or two here concerning the firſt Carthaginian ſettlement in the iſland laſt-mentioned. Sardinia, as has been intimated above, was in the hands of the Carthaginians, and had been ſo for ſome time, when the firſt treaty was concluded between them and the Romans. Corſica likewiſe, we have reaſon to imagine, was poſſeſſed by them either wholly, or in part, in very antient times. This iſland, called by the Greeks Cyrnus, by the Romans and natives Corſica, had a beautiful large harbour, according to Diodorus, named Syracuſium, together with two conſiderable cities, Calaris, or Aleria, built by the Phocæans, and Nicæa by the Etruſcans. Notwithſtanding the defeat of the Carthaginian and Etruſcan fleets by the Phocæans, in the reign of Cyrus abovementioned, the victory coſt the latter ſo dear, that they were obliged to abandon Cyrnus to the former. And we are farther informed by Herodotus, that the Cyrnians, i. e. the Corſicans, were one of thoſe nations, out of which the Carthaginians formed that vaſt army, with which they invaded Sicily in the days of Gelon. Theſe, to omit many others, that might eaſily be produced, are ſufficient proofs, that the ſtate of Carthage had a footing, at leaſt, in Corſica in very remote times[f].

Malta and Gozo antiently ſubject to Carthage.

THE ſmall iſlands of Melita and Gaulos, now Malta and Gozo or Gozzo, being conveniently ſituated for trade, and having commodious ports, were indiſputably in ſubjection likewiſe to the Carthaginians. It appears from Diodorus, that theſe iſlands were at firſt peopled either by the Carthaginians, or their anceſtors the Phœnicians[g].

WE

[e] Diod. Sic. l. v. c. 2. Herodot. l. vii.

[f] Diod. Sic. ubi ſup. c. 1.

[g] Diod. Sic. ubi ſup.

When the Carthaginians first carried their arms into Sicily unknown.

WE have above observed, that part of the isle of Sicily was subject to the state of Carthage before the beginning of the Persian empire; but when the Carthaginians first carried their arms thither, for want of sufficient light from history, we cannot take upon us to determine. M. Rollin affirms Xerxes to have been the first who prompted that people to attempt conquering the island at present under consideration, which is contrary to the faith of history; and immediately after, almost in the same breath, declares the period, in which the Carthaginians first landed there in an hostile manner, not to be exactly known. This is a plain inconsistency, but not the only one in his system of antient history. As we have already given so particular a description of Sicily, as well as those heroic atchievements and great transactions, of which it was for so many ages the theatre, we shall have occasion to refer our readers frequently to some of the preceding parts of this work; though after all, in order to preserve and continue the thread of our history, we shall find repetitions in many places unavoidable[h].

HOWEVER, in order to render these the more tolerable, whenever we are obliged to them, we shall endeavour to diversify the narration with several fresh incidents, not mentioned in any of our former volumes, as not so immediately relating to the histories of the countries we were then upon, drawn either from the historians quoted by us there, or others which at that time had escaped us.

The Carthaginians make great preparations for an expedition to Sicily.

AFTER the conclusion of the treaty with Xerxes, the Carthaginians, in pursuance of their engagements, made vast preparations for a war with the Greeks of Sicily, both by sea and land. The Carthaginians at this time were the most powerful people of all the west; and while the Persians invaded Greece, they were to fall upon the Greek colonies, both in Sicily and Magna Græcia, as above, that thereby the Greeks, of all countries and denominations, might be diverted from helping one another. The preparations for this war were so prodigious, that it was three years before they were completed, notwithstanding Xerxes sent them vast sums of money from Persia for that purpose. With these they hired great numbers of mercenaries in Spain, Gaul, Liguria, Corsica, &c. and raised what forces forces they could in Africa. All things at laſt being in readineſs, they ſet ſail from Carthage with an army of three hundred thouſand men, compoſed of different nations, and a fleet of above two thouſand ſhips of war, with three thouſand tranſports, not doubting but to make an entire conqueſt of Sicily the firſt campaign [i].

[h] M. Rollin. in hist. antient des Carthag. p. 2. c. 1. sub init.

Hamilcar's horſes and chariots loſt in a ſtorm.

THE general who commanded in this expedition was Hamilcar, the ſon of Hanno, according to Herodotus, or of Mago, as Juſtin will have it, a perſon of great authority both in the army and the city, who had behaved himſelf with uncommon conduct and bravery on many occaſions in the ſervice of his country. In his paſſage from Carthage to Sicily, his horſes and chariots, with the veſſels they were on board, periſhed in a ſtorm, which the Carthaginians doubtleſs, being extremely addicted to ſuperſtition, looked upon as ominous. However the general himſelf, upon his arrival at Panormus, now Palermo, endeavoured to diſſipate all gloomy apprehenſions, by declaring, that ſince they were happily arrived in Sicily, he looked upon the war as concluded, and that all the pain the late ſtorm gave him was a fear of the Sicilians eſcaping the danger that threatened them [k].

He inveſts Himera.

AFTER he had landed his troops, he halted three days to refreſh them, and repair the damage his fleet had ſuſtained in the late ſtorm; and then marching to Himera, a city in the neighbourhood of Panormus, immediately cauſed it to be inveſted. To give ſome idea of the capacity of this general, Diodorus tells us, that, upon his ſitting down before Himera, he diſpoſed his army in two camps, the one deſtined for the land forces, the other for the ſhips and marines. He took care to ſecure his long ſhips or galleys, by drawing them on ſhore, ſurrounding them with an entrenchment, and placing all his marines there for their defence. The land forces were encamped in front, oppoſite to the city, extending themſelves from the lines of the other camp to the hills overlooking the town. The place being thus blocked up on the weſt ſide, he unladed the ſhips of burden of their proviſions, and ſent away what veſſels he had left to Africa and Sardinia for a further ſupply. After this he advanced with the flower of his army to the very walls of the city, routed a party of the garriſon

[i] Diod. Sic. l. xi. c. 2. Herodot. l. vii. Ephor. apud ſchol. Pind. Pyth. 1. ad ver. ἐπὶ ἅρμασι. [k] Diod. Sic. & Herodot. ubi ſup.

riſon in a ſally they made upon him, and thereby ſtruck a great terror into the beſieged [l].

Gelon defeats the Carthaginian foragers.

THERON, tyrant of the Agrigentines, at that time commanded in the place, who, though his garriſon was very ſtrong, being intimidated by the late diſaſter, as well as the numerous forces of the enemy, diſpatched an expreſs to Gelon at Syracuſe, with all poſſible expedition, for immediate relief. Gelon having got his troops in readineſs to march at an hour's warning, upon advice of what had befallen the Himeræans, advanced to their city without delay, with an army of fifty thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe. He firſt encamped near the city, and afterwards fortified his camp in ſuch a manner as to put it out of danger of being inſulted by the enemy. By this means he infuſed new life and vigour into the garriſon, and freed them from all apprehenſions of the Carthaginian power. He ſent his horſe in queſt of the enemy, who were diſperſed in ſmall parties all over the country, in order to forage. Theſe, meeting with the Carthaginians ſtraggling about the country, without any diſcipline or order, fell upon them, took above ten thouſand priſoners, and brought them triumphantly into the town. By this action Gelon's glory was raiſed to a very high pitch, and the Himeræans inſpired with a contempt of the enemy.

Gelon finds an opportunity of ſurpriſing the Carthaginians.

TO demonſtrate to the Carthaginians the high contempt he had them in, he cauſed the gates Theron had before built to ſecure him from their approaches, to be pulled down, and built others, more eſſential to the defence of the place, in their room. In fine, Gelon being an able warrior, and excelling in ſtratagems, ſet his head to work to find out ſome method of deſtroying the Carthaginian forces without any danger to himſelf or his army, which in ſtrength was ſo much inferior to the enemy. Fortune favoured the project he was upon by the following accident, which brought on a battle, and occaſioned the death of Hamilcar, and the total overthrow of his army [m].

The Carthaginians entirely defeated by Gelon

A courier was brought to Gelon, having been intercepted by a party of his horſe, carrying letters from the inhabitants of Selinus, confederates of the Carthaginians, to Hamilcar; whereby he underſtood, that Hamilcar was to offer the next morning in the camp of the marines a ſolemn ſacrifice to Neptune, and that he had appointed the Selinuntine cavalry to join join him the ſame day in the ſaid camp. Gelon, taking advantage of this intelligence, drew out an equal number of his own horſe, ordering them to advance to the enemy's camp about the time agreed on, as if they were the Selinuntines. Upon receiving theſe orders, by favour of the night, they conveyed themſelves privately to certain poſts cloſe by the Carthaginian camp, of which they took immediate poſſeſſion; and the next morning, approaching the ſaid camp, were admitted into it about ſun-riſing, without the leaſt ſuſpicion. Hamilcar was then buſy in ſacrificing, and the greater part of the ſoldiery attending him without arms, according to Diodorus. But Herodotus intimates, that this general ſtaid in the camp during the whole time of the engagement, which continued from morning till the duſk of the evening, without intermiſſion. Diodorus adds, that the Syracuſans, without the leaſt oppoſition, making up to Hamilcar, killed him, purſuant to their general's orders, cut in pieces moſt of his marines, and ſet fire to the ſhips. Herodotus, on the contrary, gives us to underſtand, that Hamilcar was employed the whole day in throwing heaps of victims upon a flaming pile; but that ſeeing his troops put to the rout, he himſelf ruſhed into the fire, and was entirely conſumed. Upon the firing of the ſhips, Gelon, who had notice of the ſucceſs by a ſignal given him from the top of a neighbouring hill, drew out his army, and attacked the other camp. The Carthaginians at firſt made a gallant reſiſtance; but when news was brought them of their general's death, and at the ſame time ſeeing all their fleet in a blaze, they had no longer courage to ſtand their ground, but betook themſelves to a precipitate flight; and then the ſlaughter was dreadful. As Gelon's orders were, that no quarter ſhould be given during the heat of the engagement, no leſs than an hundred and fifty thouſand men were ſlain in the battle and the purſuit. The reſt retired to an eminence, where they for ſome time defended themſelves; but at laſt, for want of water, were obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. This was the greateſt blow the Carthaginians had ever received before that time; for they did not only loſe their general Hamilcar, who was himſelf by his mother's ſide a Syracuſan, but had their whole army in ſuch a manner cut off, or taken priſoners, that not a ſingle man of it eſcaped to Carthage, to carry thither the news of this unparallelled defeat [n].

[l]. Diod. Sic. ubi ſup. [m]. Idem ibid.

POLY-

[n] Herodot. & Diod. Sic. ubi ſup.

POLYÆNUS, in his account of the Carthaginian general's death, differs ſomething both from Diodorus Siculus and Herodotus. According to this author, Gelon, finding himſelf not ſtrong enough to attack the enemy, ſent Pediarchus, the captain of his archers, who much reſembled him, dreſſed in royal robes, out of the camp, with orders to offer ſacrifice upon ſome altars near the ſpot of ground on which Hamilcar uſed daily to ſacrifice. Pediarchus was attended by a party of his archers, cloathed in white garments, with large ſprigs of myrtle in their hands, as an evident ſign of their going to perform ſo ſolemn an act of devotion. Under the myrtle each of them had concealed his bow, with ſeveral arrows, which were to let fly at the general as ſoon as he came within ſome diſtance. Hamilcar, ſuſpecting nothing of violence, came as uſual, with his attendants, to addreſs himſelf to the Gods, and was immediately ſlain. However this may be, the Carthaginians and Syracuſans, both of them ambitious of claiming ſo great a man to themſelves, gave out, that Hamilcar, upon the defeat of his troops, vaniſhed, and was never afterwards ſeen. The former, notwithſtanding his misfortune, and their immediate reſentment of it, in after-ages paid him divine honours, both in their capital city, and every other place where their colonies ſeated themſelves [o].

The Carthaginians deify Hamilcar.

WE muſt not here omit obſerving, that Terillus, the ſon of Crinippus, invited the Carthaginians at this time into Sicily, and therefore was, in ſome reſpect, as well as Xerxes, the occaſion of this fatal war. Terillus was tyrant of Himera; but being driven from thence by Theron, the ſon of Æneſidemus, tyrant of Agrigentum, he meditated revenge. To gratify which, at the inſtigation of Anaxilaus, the ſon of Critineus, tyrant of Rhegium, who married his daughter Cydippe, he had recourſe to the Carthaginians, being well aſſured they would not let ſlip ſo favourable an opportunity of enlarging their dominions in the iſland of Sicily. Hamilcar, in order to ſecure his fidelity, obliged him to ſend his ſons to him for hoſtages. This account Herodotus tells us he received from the Sicilian writers of his time, who made no mention, as far as we can find, of the alliance between the Perſians and the Carthaginians [p].

Terillus invites the Carthaginians into Sicily.

HERODOTU

[n] Herodot. & Diod. Sic. ubi ſup. [o] Polyæn. ſtrat. i. c. 27 ex. 2. Herodot. ubi ſup. [p] Idem ibid.

HERODOTUS farther informs us, that the battle of Himera was fought the ſame day with that of Salamis: but Diodorus Siculus will have the Carthaginians to have been defeated the ſame day that Leonidas, with his brave body of Spartans, periſhed at Thermopylæ. Upon which he makes this reflection: "The gods on purpoſe ſeemed to "have deſtined theGreeks at the ſame time a glorious victory "in one place, and a moſt honourable death in another [q]." Battles of Himera and Salamis fought the ſame day.

